little strained from the smoke. “They were only making mistakes. Simply expelling them from their local organs would be purity-testing. The people they served are now aware of their missteps, and it’s up to them whether they’re recalled.”

“Because people are famously known for making good decisions.”

“I would argue that yes, they are.” Hwang blew smoke out at the clearing. “They will decide if their ri chairmen will still be allowed to serve them after holding banquets with their own money, while the ones who committed actual crimes by requesting more taxes or squandering state property will be charged.” He eyed him from behind his foggy glasses.

“Tch. It’s not my damn fault he was doing that shit.”

His People’s Committee Provincial chairman had been caught wasting resources. Not just allocating funds to the wrong places, but embezzlement, too. But they’d got his ass. Him being an oldhead from the fight against Japan hadn’t saved him like he’d probably thought it would.

“I didn’t name names,” Hwang said innocently. “Though while we’re on the subject, it is slightly your fault. If you were more versed in politics, or perhaps in gauging people, you likely would have caught him out sooner.”

“I’m just as ‘versed in politics’ as the others.” Not as versed as Hwang, since he was a damn egghead. Literally. But he’d been forced by Korea to read all the same theory and history as the rest of them. “You mean if I joined the fucking Worker’s Party.”

“It would give you more sway when you spoke of adhering to the Party line and fighting corruption,” his cousin said, tucking the hand not holding his smoke into his coat pocket. “And if you at least familiarized yourself with the halls of power more, you would be able to see the signs of it better.”

“Don’t act like you don’t have corruption in your province, too,” North Hamgyong growled, irritated. “That county chairman of yours had people in his district pay for a damn cow for his party.”

"And Hae expertly sleuthed out the matter and brought him to justice," Four-Eyes said smoothly.

North Hamgyong couldn't see his eyes behind the foggy glasses, but he saw the way he worried his lip as he thought about his sister.

It made his shoulders hunch.

"There's no point in fighting corruption," he said around his cigarette, leaning back against the mountain. The cold stone leaked through his tunic, freezing him, but he didn't give a damn. "People are corrupt. They always will be."

"And yet out of our hundreds of ri, county, town, city, and provincial People's Committee chairmen and Party officials, only around twenty have been caught engaging in any sort of misdeed."

"Key word- caught."

Hwang pursed his lips, tapping ashes on the ground. "Well, if you think there's more to be discovered, perhaps you should join the Worker's Party to ferret the rest out."

"Fuck you."

He wasn't going to do it. The more Four-Eyes and Korea pressed, the more it made him not want to. He wasn't losing against South Pyongan, or more importantly, South Hamgyong.

He didn't want to talk about this shit, but he still said, "More will get caught. Now that Korea's put out that 'voluntary surrender' bullshit, people are going to think it's okay to break the law."

Hwang gave one of his annoying sighs, like he was the one being harassed. "You know, from the amount of things you pretend not to understand, sometimes I think you really are a musclebound idiot."

North Hamgyong punched him hard enough to knock him on his ass, watching unempathetically as he climbed back to his feet, dusting himself off with dignity.

You think it would make him consider shutting up, but he just continued, “The voluntary surrender principle is that those who worked or are working with reactionary organizations will be given leniency if they turn themselves over willingly. And while we may have varying opinions on whether or not that leniency is deserved, you cannot deny that it’s sent us an influx of those who aided the enemy during the tactical retreat that we weren’t able to root out, and deserters from Rhee’s active guerrilla units. It's also netted us the location of one of their home bases. By tomorrow it should be gone.”

North Hamgyong eyed him. “You supposed to know that?”

Hwang pretended to have a sudden coughing fit, so he took the opportunity to thump him on the back harder than he needed to.

“Anyway,” he said, wheezing for real when he came back up. “It’s for clearing infiltrators from our ranks. Those who are actively causing harm, or whose fear of retribution might have driven them to work for the enemy again.”

“Cowards like that should be shot and buried.” He knew Korea felt the same damn way. But he was too damn soft-hearted to smash through the ‘Party Line.’

North Hamgyong grit his teeth, tasting rich soup on his tongue.

Scratch that. He pretended to be a soft heart. The bastard was ruthless except when North Hamgyong wanted him to be. Far more ruthless than South Hamgyong would ever admit, or Hae would ever know.

“As I said, varying opinions.” Hwang puffed smoke from his chapped lips. “But that law has no bearing on those caught out for corruption. They’re still being punished harshly.” He coughed into his fist. “Aswithyourchairman.”

“It won’t work.” North Hamgyong crossed his arms, the butt of his smoke wedged between his lips. “Humans are naturally corrupt.”

“You don’t truly believe that,” Hwang scolded.

Maybe, maybe not. But he knew he preferred talking about this than to what his cousin had primed in the chamber.

"Don't tell me what I believe."

"Our State is still developing," Hwang said, looking up at the black sky, his stupid glasses protecting his eyes from the snowflakes that slapped against them. "We're faced with a multitude of reasons for corruption. We're still eliminating the vestiges of Japanese practices, for one."

"It'll be seven fucking years of Korea and the Party forcing anti-bureaucracy down our throats this October," he grunted back. "If they haven't learned by now, they won't."

Seven. Seven damn years since they should've been free.

"Those views weren't formulated overnight, and they won't be destroyed overnight," Hwang said, unbothered. "First the system changes, then the people in it, then those born into it are raised with new beliefs, and those beliefs change the culture. We're also compounded right now by the fact that the people in power now weren't born into rich families or with silver chopsticks in hand. They aren't used to having money or nice clothes or enough food. Now that they can, it's natural that they want to indulge."

"And then they'll turn into the same bastards that ruled before."

"If the indulgence wasn't cracked down on, yes," Hwang agreed, pissing him off by refusing to get defensive. "But we are. You also need to understand that most of those in power before, and our good firm cadres, were purged by the enemy, alongside their most suitable replacements. Most of our ri chairmen don't have proper ideological training. You'll remember that's what our joint meeting was addressing. I found your speech lacklustre, by the way."

"Go to hell."

The General had said it was full of too much criticism and not enough praise, too. Which was rich coming from Mister 'We're all doing great, BUT-' The man had just given him one of those damn enigmatic smirks when he'd said that to him.

“Yours was too damn long,” he retorted.

“Hm, yes. I expect it might have been beyond your attention span.” Hwang blew smoke out the side of his mouth, at his face. “My point is that we’re facing a host of exacerbating issues due to our current material conditions. In the future, those practices won’t be baked into our society.”

“But they’ll still be there.”

“There will always be corrupt people,” Hwang admitted. “Those seeking power only for the gains it brings, and those looking to exploit the system. But so long as we remain vigilant and punish them harshly- real punishments that don’t need to be coerced from us, as they are from the Rhee clique- then one day corruption won’t exist.”

“Not possible.”

“In a world where everyone is supplied with what they need, what would be the point of hoarding?” Hwang asked, raising a brow. “In a world with no money, how would one embezzle?”

“That’s assuming a world like that is possible.”

His cousin sighed, exhaling smoke. “Have you considered that the reason you refuse to consider yourself a Communist is because then you’d have to have hope for the future? And you’re just too utterly committed to being grim?”

North Hamgyong wasn’t a Communist, but he wanted that crap for Korea, he really did. Their people deserved it. But it seemed more out of reach every damn day.

With this fucking war, everything seemed more out of reach, and all of his cousins and Korea and that damned idiot South Hamgyong just closed their eyes and pretended it wasn’t. Like this could still end well.

“If I wanted to be psychoanalyzed or some shit, I’d go to Kangwon.”

His fists clenched as he saw the man's calm expression.

'Hae's recovering well. She told me to say 'Howdy.''

'Another fucking liar.'

The ember of the cigarette touched his lips, and he let it burn there for a second before tossing the stub to the ground, letting it drown in the snow.

Maybe they could get rid of corruption in the future. But not if Korea got Reunified with the Southern bastard. South Hamgyong had talked about the food and nice clothes she'd been given in captivity while people starved and the traitor didn't give a damn, and Kangwon had talked about all the frivolous shit he'd said he'd done before the war. Clubbing, singing, dancing while tens of thousands of people were cut down in the streets and buried in mass graves. He was barely a man, let alone a politician, let alone one that would punish decadence the way it needed to be punished to make sure it didn't spread.

Korea had been as loud-mouthed as usual at the joint meeting, enough so that North Hamgyong had gotten genuinely caught up in his speech as he railed against corruption and called for them to keep watering the flower of the Revolution, as that was the only way the people would keep tending to it.

Until he remembered that Korea had completely glossed over the way South had acted at their criticism session. He'd targeted officials directly in the crowd with his eye as he called them out for wearing fancy shit and holding parties during wartime, but North Hamgyong knew if the Southern bastard had been in there, it would have skirted over him, making excuses the way Hwang had. So what if the people spending too much had never had anything before this? Neither had North Hamgyong, but you didn't see him going around wearing a double-breasted suit and hosting banquets.

What would happen if that excusing carried over into Korea? He already had to grind his teeth whenever they criticized him. The last thing they needed was a weak-willed puppet that excused his own bad behaviour. They might as well let Rhee and his corrupt court win in that case, since they'd be going the same way as soon as the General was gone.

And still his idiot cousins wouldn't kill South even if he had a gun to their heads. They could pretend it was for their country all they wanted. It wasn't. Korea would be fine, better than fine, if they Reunified with the Southern bastard dead. It was Korea that wouldn't be.

But it would be better for him, too, in the end. It would be better for all of them.

North Hamgyong wouldn't take that shit into his own hands. If it was good for Korea, he wouldn't give a damn that it made him hate him. But it wasn't his job to deal with his burden.

And he wouldn't have to do it anyways. Pretending it'd be good for Korea wasn't the only thing the others were pretending about the Reunification.

He hunched his shoulders against the cold, gritting his teeth.

Seven years.

'Going on seventy more.'

Hwang stayed quiet, blowing smoke rings as thin as him, his gloved hands shoved in his pockets. North Hamgyong wished his skinny ass would freeze over so he'd keep his damn trap shut.

He didn't obviously. It was impossible for him.

"I spoke with SH a couple days ago."

North Hamgyong bared his teeth. "I told you not to."

"I didn't say anything about you," his traitor cousin assured him. "There's nothing to say, since you remain as open as a padlocked book."

"There is nothing to say," he grumbled.

The glasses-bastard had been nagging him about the way the Hamgyongs had been avoiding each other. North Hamgyong had decided he was worse than Kangwon. At least his other cousin tried to offer solutions instead of just whining. Even if they were stupid fucking solutions that were impossible. And he knew when to back off.

North Hamgyong wasn't the problem. His sister was the one icing him out, not even trying to drown out his realism with her grating optimism like she usually did. He could see her watching him at breakfast and dinner, the two times they were forced to be together, daring him with her eyes to say something that went too far, to tell the others what he really thought about this war so she could go for his throat and make him hit back by saying those words, even though she knew what would happen once he did.

He wasn't going to give her the damn satisfaction.

"I wish you'd say something," Hwang said, his ushanka dipping as his brow furrowed. "To her at least."

Wasn't that the fucking problem? His damn sister was always saying shit, that she was happy, that she wasn't angry, that she loved him, that she knew they'd win. Anything but what she really thought, the way she always had, giving him the same fake smile she'd given him across that table as she said everything was just fucking peachy. He couldn't take it anymore.

"She says enough for both of us," he grunted.

Hwang tapped his fingers inside his pocket. "You remember when we first met, I asked you what you did for your first years of existence?"

North Hamgyong remembered. "I told you to fuck off."

"You told me to fuck off," the other man agreed. "Which I don't hold against you, as SH supplied me with the answer afterwards. But it occurs to me I never asked you how your relationship with your sister was before…"

He trailed off, making North Hamgyong curl his lip.

“She’s inside. You don’t have to pussyfoot around it.”

His sister was the only one that cared about that shit. She was the one that couldn’t accept it. He had. He’d been an idiot, and she’d been even worse.

Hwang cleared his throat. “Well, you clearly know what I’m referring to. So what was it like? Your relationship?”

His sense of smell was deadened by the cold, but for a flash, North Hamgyong could smell mildew, sea spray, and roasting fish, and see the curve of lips. A carefree laugh rang in an enclosed space.

He shook his head, snorting out the memories until all he could smell was bitter smoke and the tang of blood.

“It doesn’t matter.”

It was all fucked now anyway.

Hwang wiped the film of snow from his glasses with a hand, his slender eyes flicking over his face until they were obscured by flakes again.

“Has it occurred to you that perhaps the reason the two of you fail to get along is because you’re too much alike?”

North Hamgyong couldn’t help the harsh bark that left his mouth. “We are nothing alike.”

She cared what people thought about her. He didn’t. He could admit crap to himself. She couldn’t. Even now that she’d actually been able to tell the damn truth, that she was angry at him, furious, she still kept the rest of that shit inside and put that ugly smile back on her face.

He wasn't afraid of the truth, and she was. That’s what it boiled down to.

“My observations beg to differ.”

The words sparked anger in North Hamgyong’s stomach, like a faulty spark plug. It was easy for this bastard to judge when he only had Hae to put up with. She might be a manipulative little creature, but she was an open book that didn’t have a spiteful bone in her damn body. He knew even if he told her about that sickening fucking thing Korea had done, she’d find some way to justify it and forgive him.

South Hamgyong would, too. But she wouldn’t forgive him even if he got down on his knees and grovelled, even if he slammed his forehead into the ground until his skull cracked.

He wouldn't deserve it anyway. But he was her brother. By her own fucking logic with Korea and his brother, she should.

“You want to talk about observations?” he demanded, turning to him as the words boiled over. “Hae’s fucking dead.”

The blue drained from Hwang’s flower like gas from a punctured tank. “She isn’t. Kangwon says she’s recovering.”

“Because Kangwon’s a fucking liar,” he growled. “You say I can’t gauge people, but somehow you don’t recognize his ‘everything’s fine and the soldier isn’t missing his entire lower half’ act?”

He’d always been like that, even back when he’d been a nervous little kid. He’d look you in the eyes with red up to his elbows and say the civilian whose stomach had been sliced open by a sword had only lost a little blood with a smile. Half the time he didn’t even lie, but with the way he said things you just knew he was leaving out half the damn story. ‘The wound should heal well’ meant the infection probably wouldn’t. ‘Hae’s recovering’ could have meant anything. And he knew what it meant.

“She died,” he repeated, looming over Hwang. “The Yanks fucking killed her with those clams. She shit her guts out and now she’s lying up there on a hospital bed dead. And Kangwon’s not saying shit because he knows Korea will lose his fucking mind. If you want to worry about sisters, why don’t you worry about yours and I’ll deal with mine?”

Hwang looked away, pushing his glasses up with a shaky hand as he took a breath that made his shoulders shudder. North Hamgyong crossed his arms over his chest.

After a moment, his cousin said quietly, “I would appreciate you not using Hae’s condition against me when I'm only trying to help.”

His tendons strained. “Then stop pestering me about stupid shit.”

“You have to give SH one point at least,” Hwang said, still subdued. “You really can be an unpleasant person sometimes.”

North Hamgyong looked out at the forest, his jaw aching.

Hwang finished his cigarette in silence, then turned and went inside, leaving the Hamgyong to wipe the blood his knuckles left on the door off the thick steel.

Hwang, through tears: Ad hominem.

With great sheepishness* Comrades… I fear we’re going to have a trilogy. It’s not confirmed yet, I just fear it. A reminder that my original outline had around ninety chapters. I’m not sorry. Why don’t we instead blame the US for their illegal invasion and destruction of Korea, as well as stretching the war out through various sabotaging actions that have been previously discussed. If they hadn’t invaded we could have got a happy ending around chapter thirty-five. And also Korea wouldn’t be deeply divided today and millions of Koreans wouldn’t have died back then. I would also be willing to bet that the death toll of the Arduous March would be lessened, and that of homeless people in the South . Instead of blaming me for being unable to keep one chapter as one chapter, let’s focus our ire on America for being the most bloodthirsty, destructive empire in the history of existence.

There is no enmity in the world like that between me and the yellow lóng from Black Myth Wukong. Count your fucking days and you will find them LACKING. You scaly FREAK.

Rising Fever

North could feel the fever creeping in.

There had been more reports of suspicious insects and air drops in the last week, and more illnesses cropping up. Dysentery, smallpox, typhoid. Not a pandemic, yet. But they were spreading. More people were getting sick, and he could feel hot tendrils worming their way though his body, invading it, invading his country.

“Comrade Korea?”

North realized Pak Sun-do was waiting for a response, and unlocked his jaw to answer. It was an effort. The muscles felt sore all the way down into his shoulders.

“I understand our civilians wish to celebrate our People’s Army’s foundation by observing the salute,” he said, spine aching as he held it straight. "But remind them not to gather in crowds. I expect the Yankees will be out in force this year.”

Some of the MiGs flown by their own pilots had been moved from beyond the Chongchon to protect the skies above the cities where the gun salutes would be taking place. But North wouldn’t take any chances.

“And remind them about the anti-epidemic measures.”

They were finally able to use the words ‘biological warfare’ outside of labs and closed-door meetings (not that he hadn’t already been using them). Their official protest wouldn’t be launched until they had more physical proof and lab results back, but the Ministry of Public Health was distributing leaflets and formulating a plan for dealing with the attacks, and by the end of the month, they would have a meeting to implement the measures in full.

It made North's teeth itch to wait that long, but he knew their treasurers needed time to arrange a planned budget, and their antiepidemic workers needed it to mobilize in full force. Aside from that, they were already as prepared as they could be- civilians had been coached since last year in how to deal with suspicious illness, or any illness, their health workers had been reminded at the beginning of winter to raise their work level and fight outbreaks with every available resource, and after the mass vaccination campaigns, almost everyone in the northern half of Korea should be vaccinated.

But it wasn't enough. The ranks of their healthcare workers were thin, the influx of southern refugees and mass displacement brought in unvaccinated people and made it difficult to confirm who had already received shots and who hadn't, and vaccines weren't always reliable anyways. Like with Hae. And the supplies dropped by the Yankees were too valuable to destroy for some. It was hard for a starving man to willingly turn away food.

'Ah was just hungry.'

He still hadn't been allowed in to see Hae.

"I will, Comrade Korea." Pak Sun-do confirmed his orders with a salute before hurrying off.

North had almost expected him to have disappeared after that first fake atom bomb, to have broken and ran away to the south with his family, as far from the threat of nuclear annihilation as possible. But he shouldn't have worried- the man's commitment to their cause had only deepened.

It was a good thing he had been there that day with the ruined bridge and the old woman.

Pyongyang was busier than most days since the war had began, donkey-pulled carts heading into the city with artillery guns strapped to the back, being hauled down to the Taedong. Soldiers carried crates of ammunition out of hidden warehouses and truck beds, stashing them near the river for the salute in a few hours.

Two hundred and forty guns, eighty in Pyongyang, Hamhung, and Wonsan respectively, even more than last year, each firing twenty shells.

The waste made North prickle, even though he knew it was necessary. Despite their limited funds, resources, and factories, they had to show that they weren't cowed. And their soldiers needed to know they were appreciated.

He marched around the firing area, barking orders and hauling ammunition and arranging guns and trying not to think about how just a year ago he had been doing this exact same thing in Seoul.

His arms ached in a way they shouldn't as he carried the next crate of shells to the house across the road from the river. Even when he wasn't in combat, he did his exercises every day, yet they screamed in protest as he set the box down.

Despite the frigid cold, and the steam bursting from the mouths around him, sweat ran in rivulets down his forehead, stinging as they soaked into the bandages hidden under his collar, making them cling. As North left the building, his lungs suddenly constricted, refusing to let oxygen in, and his 'ears' hurt at the sharp laughter coming from the Song and Dance Ensemble down the shoreline. His throat was swelling shut and he could feel the fever building in his skull.

All of a sudden his clothes were too tight.

He turned on a heel, leaving the river, vanishing into the maze of rubble and ruined homes his capital (Not his capital, Seoul was his capital) had become, trying to find somewhere still standing, somewhere he could get away from the heat squeezing his body.

He found a tea house with its bottom floor still mostly intact, ducking beneath the broken arch of the door, catching glimpses of shattered porcelain, wood, rotting fabric (Who had been drinking here when it was destroyed?), and tearing blindly at his coat until it joined the scraps on the floor.

The sudden blast of cold cleared his head slightly, letting him unbutton the top of his tunic more calmly, along with his undershirt, exposing the bandages that carpeted his upper chest.

And throat.

He pulled at the latter, tugging them away from his skin, trying to relieve the sticky, cloying warmth, finally able to think properly again as the pressure went away.

Immediately disgust flooded through him.

Ssi-bal, he should be able to handle a few bandages. He'd been wearing them for almost two years now.

But he'd been trying to avoid wearing them on his neck, using patches instead. And now the burns had covered almost his entire throat in mottled red and black, ending just below his jaw, like some invisible barrier was holding them back from his face, forcing them to pile up. He had no choice but to wrap the bandages completely around it.

It was better than if they spread higher, he told himself, one finger hooked into the fluid-soaked fabric, trying not to think about the way the fibers pressed against the back of his neck. So long as they weren't on his face, he could hide them.

North closed his eye, taking a deep breath, trying to make his lungs expand again.

He wasn't actually sick. It was the sympathetic fever, and it meant his people were. He had no right to be acting like this when they were the ones that were suffering.

Carefully, he let go of the bandage, finding the clip, gritting his teeth as he pulled it tight again, and the warm smell of cooking (rotting) meat was muted as the pressure against his windpipe resumed.

He buttoned both his shirts up again, grinding his jaw as he glared at the coat draped over a broken chair. Reluctantly he picked it up, dusting off wood splinters as he shrugged it back on, intensely aware of the extra weight it put on the burns on his arms, thighs, and neck especially.

North inhaled deeply, exhaling a cloud of mist.

He was fine. His body felt heavy and warm, and his head was still spinning, but he was fine.

With light seeping in the holes in the roof and shattered windows, the tea house hadn't been dark. But the pale pink sky outside was still too bright, piercing his temples.

"There you are."

North almost jumped at the voice from behind, but controlled himself, turning around. His vision swayed, and when it cleared what he saw made his breath grow tight again.

China was standing in the street with a girl on his shoulders, only around ten or eleven. She had wide-set black eyes and a mushroom cut, and was bundled in a patchwork coat. On the hands lightly patting the top of China's head were oversized olive mittens.

"No," North said before he could say anything.

China raised an eyebrow. "No?"

"No," North repeated, his throat swelling shut again as he tried not to look at the child, still seeing big brown eyes and a cheery smile and blood pouring out of a little body. "Get her away from me."

"She says she snuck into the city to watch the guns," China said, and his unbothered voice made North want to smash his head off the rubble behind him. "I'm watching her until my comrade finds her mother."

"Watch her somewhere else."

North's voice was tight, and he knew he shouldn't be saying that in front of the girl, in front of one of his people, but it had only been a year since they'd stood together in Seoul as the guns blasted at the sky and O-geun sat on China's shoulders and cheered, and North promised him he would free their country and silently promised himself that in a year the boy would never hear guns again unless it was at a celebration like that, and his hand was on fire, burning, as he felt tiny fingers crush under his grip.

“I can’t do this, Ch-“ He just barely stopped himself from saying the other country’s name. “Get her away.”

The girl looked uncertain, asking in a small voice that made North guilty and increased his need to be far away from her, “Did I do something wrong?”

“No, meimei,” China soothed. “Gege is just under a lot of pressure right now. It’s hard planning a celebration, you know.”

“Don’t call me that.” He wasn’t the girl’s big brother, and he hadn’t been O-geun’s. He was only one person’s brother.

China gave North a look that was too knowing, even with how clear it was what his problem was.

“I suppose we’ll go look for your mother, too, then, Little Sister,” he said, tilting his head up. “Maybe I’ll even convince her to let you stay and watch.”

Her eyes widened, and North refused to look. “Really?”

“En. But only if you stop playing janggu on my head.”

The girl giggled, and China started to carry her away. But she twisted to look back over her shoulder at North, her small brows furrowed in concern.

Her Countryhuman didn’t meet her eye, fleeing towards the river to throw himself back into preparations.

By the time the sun had set, and the only thing left was to wait until closer to twenty hundred to bring everything out of hiding, the work had steadied him enough to make him burn with shame.

He shouldn't have reacted like that. He needed to get it together for his announcement later. He wanted to find the girl and apologize, but… He couldn’t. There wasn’t any explanation he could give her.

North hid himself in the shadows of the houses, watching from the side as the Song and Dance Ensemble put on a show for the soldiers responsible for the ceremony from the back of a long-bedded truck across the road, men and women swirling around in colourful choson-ot by portable spotlight. He should go congratulate his comrades on the fourth anniversary of the KPA's founding, but he didn't want to detract from the performance.

And his bandages were still too tight.

The upbeat strains of 'On the Road To A Decisive Battle' echoed along the shore, almost managing to soothe the pricking in his skin, if he didn't think too deeply about the lyrics.

But as a drone sounded overhead, the singers and musicians faltered, and all eyes went skyward. It was only a second, just long enough to confirm that the shape silhouetted against the near-full moon was the lithe form of a MiG and not a bulky foreign bomber, but it was enough to make the blood in North's veins run hotter.

As his comrades launched back into the song with renewed vigour to defy their pause, his eye strayed to the artillery guns, then across the shore, finally losing the battle he'd been fighting since he got here.

The far bank was dark and empty, the main bridge across the Taedong still destroyed, twisted steel looming above pontoon crossings. North imagined gunshots echoing back across at him.

If he'd heard them, especially with combat over, he would have gone running, needing to know what was happening. If his soldiers had been executing civilians, he would have stopped it.

So why hadn't South?

He grit his teeth as the thought returned, like it always did when he was at the river's edge.

South couldn't have gone running off. Kim Hye-suk herself had said America was there, and her injured comrade had confirmed it after she recovered. Even if he had managed to find out for certain what was happening, he couldn't have stopped it. He couldn't have done anything but what America wanted. That was why he'd disarmed Kim Song-hui. Why he'd gotten her and her comrades killed.

It didn't matter that North would have tried anyway. His brother wasn't him.

'잘못했어.' He had to remember that.

"So do you intend to never speak to a child again?"

North had been trying to avoid watching China as he flitted amongst his people, before finally walking towards him. He kept doing it as he settled under the shadows with him.

"You're the one who said I wasn't good with children."

"It might be difficult." His comrade tucked his gloved hands into his long sleeves. "Patriotism should be instilled at a young age. Waiting until they're seventeen to meet them stymies that a bit."

North wanted to bite down on the question, but it finally burst out.

"How do you do it?" he demanded. "How do you-"

He could still see the way China had looked at him over O-geun's body as he asked him what he wanted to do, and how he had kissed Zhang Guangqiang's bloodied brow, and it made him grit his teeth. He hadn't been able to accuse the other man of that for awhile now, for either of their people.

'They're all very precious to me.'

"How do you pretend to not care?"

China smiled at him from under his mask. "Maybe I don't. I could have been lying to you before."

North knew the man couldn't have tricked himself into thinking that. "South Hamgyong told me about that concert you put on."

He didn't appear bothered at that. "In as little detail as possible, I'm sure. But I suppose you've got me."

"How can you be so unaffected when you do care?"

North didn't want to be unaffected by the loss of any of his people. He didn't want to pretend he was either. He just wanted to stop letting it make him lash out like he had earlier.

"You mourn your people, but every time I see you with them, you're asking about their families and hometowns and what they want to do after the war," he said, trying to keep his voice low so it wouldn't echo, but unable to hide the frustration in it. "And you mourned… O-geun, but now you're out here trying to make friends with another child who-"

He cut himself off, fighting the urge to wrap his arms over his chest.

"I like to know people," China said simply. "Even if it means I'll have to mourn them at some point. Grief isn't exactly a negative emotion. If anything, it's positive. It just means you knew someone well enough to miss them."

North would grieve anyway. They were his people. And the Chinese were fighting for them. He didn't have to know anything but that.

'Think when I go home, I'll help him make salted carp again.' 'I have a daughter I've never met.' 'I don't like being alone either, Comrade Korea.' 'If I die, you better make sure I'm buried in my home village.'

'Her favorite colour is blue. It used to be sky blue until our flag changed.'

He didn't want any of those voices in his head. The grief was enough.

"And it means you lost them," North said to China.

It meant he hadn't been strong enough to save them.

"If all goes well, you and I should live for a very long time," China replied, and his voice softened slightly. “We’re both going to lose a lot more people who mean something to us.”

Kim Jong-suk’s face flickered in his memories, his General’s next to it, and North gave in, crossing his arms tight, the crushing against his chest nothing compared to the crushing feeling inside it.

“Would you have rather not known O-geun at all?” China asked, tilting his head.

North didn’t answer.

His comrade watched him for a long moment while he watched his people.

“My answer to how I pretend I don’t care is that I have lots of practice,” China said eventually. “My answer to what you’re really asking is that I purposefully put myself through pain because I find the benefits of knowing people outweigh the hurt of losing them. And because I’m a masochist,” he added after a moment’s thought.

North had plenty of practice, too. It would never be enough.

“Her and her mother are down the river, by the way,” China said after another long moment of watching the performers. “Close enough to hear the show, but outside of the drop zone.”

The Korean relaxed slightly.

He couldn't understand the other country's point of view. Feeling grateful for the time he'd spent with someone could never make up for the hurt of losing them when that hurt was the end of that time. Any happy memories, any wishes they'd voiced, any dreams they'd shared, all turned sour in their absence, and drowned in the sea of grief. He couldn’t think of Kim Jong-suk’s kind smile as she handed him that dosirak without remembering that he would never see it again.

He didn't want it not to hurt. He was their Countryhuman, and it should hurt. The loss of any of his people should pierce him like a blade, and the day it stopped would be the day he deserved to be taken apart by their hands.

But he wanted it to hurt less.

China didn't leave, watching the dancing with interest from beside him. North's gaze wandered reflexively over the small crowd, finding North and South Pyongan on the edges, the woman playing cards with a few men on the river embankment in the glow of a lamp. Her brother scanned the people, hustling over to North Hamgyong as he arrived, asking him something. The man shook his head irritably, and they both looked around.

They were looking for him. North didn't move, picking out the others. Hwang hunched over a script with a writer from the Song and Dance Ensemble, gesturing enthusiastically at something.

His jaw clenched as he searched for a few seconds more before realizing there were no others. Just him. SH was only in Hamhung to oversee the salute there, and Chagang had been sent to Wonsan in Kangwon's place. But Gangwon couldn't leave the Quarantine Hospital for fear of being Commanded, Kangwon was too involved in the anti-epidemic work to leave the labs, and Hae was sick.

And the other eight were still trapped down south with the rest of his people. And his brother.

North watched a few Chinese soldiers approach South Pyongan, and she and her group gestured them in, dealing more cards. Beyond them, ice glistened on the Taedong, and he couldn't help but remember the report he'd received in the middle of he and Kangwon's investigation.

A Korean child, a frozen river, and a PVA soldier. He had saved the boy, but at the cost of his own life.

North knew he should say something to China about it. But he hadn't been able to find the words.

"Liu Qingshan and Zhang Zishan's trial is in two days," he said abruptly.

"Aiya, you're paying attention to my affairs?" China sounded pleased. "You really do care about me."

"You should be there for it."

The two officials had been caught embezzling vast sums of money for post-war relief and construction. It was China's first huge corruption scandal, and it was being loudly broadcast because of that. Whether or not North cared, he would have heard about it anyway.

"As far as anyone knows, I will be."

North still didn't know who China's doppelganger was, and it didn't matter.

"You should be."

It was a monumentous moment, as his country demonstrated it would no longer tolerate corruption like it had used to. Like North's public trials for officials, it would prove that Communist China wouldn't accept those that hurt the masses. He knew how important that was. He had attended public executions and seen people weep not because they were mourning the loss of life, but because they were celebrating justice they'd never received before.

"My influence isn't needed," China said easily. "I know what my people will choose."

"Will they be executed?"

"En." China smiled at him, his eyes narrowed. "The Three and Five Evils won't be tolerated in New China. They hurt the people they were meant to serve, and tarnished the Party's image. The only way to remove corruption is to burn it out. Or blow its brains out among a crowd of onlookers."

North's fists clenched. "And you should be there."

"But I'm here." China looked out at his soldiers, some of them talking casually with the Korean soldiers, some watching the show, and a few cursing as South Pyongan trounced them at cards. "And I think you've steeped yourself in quite enough guilt for tonight, don't you?"

North grit his teeth, listening as the vibrant voices of the singers carried over to them, now singing 'Bowie March.'

"The People's Army advances, Move forward on the path to victory!"

Not enough.

He should go talk to his soldiers. But he would do it after the salute. His clothes felt tight again.

Beside him, China shifted in the way that meant he was hiding his shivering, even though North suspected he was wearing his summer uniform under the padded yellow-green winter one, and had his old grey and white scarf wound around his neck.

His fingers hesitated on the buttons, but then he removed his long coat, feeling slightly less like he was choking as the night air washed over him.

He held it out to China wordlessly, hoping he wouldn't think about that day, and knowing he had to be.

"It's a bit cold tonight to just be in your uniform, don't you think?" the other man asked, his tone just a little too smooth, his teeth clicking together at the end.

"I'm not going to wear it," North relied blankly. "If you don't, it will just stay on my arm."

"I guess I'll take it then." His comrade plucked the coat, shrugging it on and buttoning it up to his chin, clearly eagerly. He rearranged the scarf before nestling his chin into the fabric, humming in contentment.

It was cold, but North felt a bit less prickly with it numbing his skin. And he was used to it.

He didn't care for the idea of the people around him seeing that he'd given his officer's coat to a Chinese soldier, but he supposed it did look good. Though if they'd known it was China, there was no way he would have.

North stood still, trying not to think about all the things he could be doing right now. Investigating more germ warfare reports, interrogating the Yankee pilots (though he knew he couldn't allow himself to), giving blood, fighting at the front, visiting Hae. He had to be here. His soldiers needed to know it wasn't them he blamed.

As the performance ended, and the Song and Dance Ensemble started to pack up, a few of the women singers he'd seen China speaking with earlier clustered together at the front of the truck, whispering and looking his way. Evidently they'd been keeping a close enough eye on him to know he'd retreated to the shadows.

China had spotted them, too, and to North's alarm, he raised a hand to beckon them over. There was a brief flurry from the group, and the Korean tensed as one split off, walking towards them. She was swaying her hips in an exaggerated way so the thick skirts under her army jacket swished side to side, clearly trying to appear unhurried, though she was almost bouncing.

"Comrade Korea," she greeted when she reached them, dipping her head, then thankfully turned to China, her tone changing to something more playful that put North's hackles right back up. "Comrade Mao Zhilong."

"Comrade Yong-sung," he replied in Korean, just as playful.

The woman should have bristled at a near-stranger using her first name so casually, but she giggled instead, twisting a loose strand of her bound hair around her finger.

"Me and my comrades were wondering if you wanted to come talk about the show with us after the salute."

China seemed to perk up at that. "I'd love to. I found your singing in particular enchanting. You must enjoy it."

Sounding a little less playful and a little more passionate, she bobbed her head. "I've always wanted to sing since I was a girl. I'm really lucky to be able to fight for my country, and provide a bright moment to my comrades who fight with me. And to Comrade Korea for giving me the chance to."

She hurriedly dipped her head to him like she'd remembered he was there.

"It wasn't just me," he said, gritting his teeth as he remembered the speech he'd given on Liberation Day at the Raktong. "All of our comrades fought for the right of our artists to blossom."

"And we're all very thankful." She bowed, then hurriedly turned her attention back to China. "I'm looking forward to speaking with Comrade Zhilong about my singing in more… detail."

North couldn't hide his grimace as she used China's 'given name,' but neither of them were looking at him anyways.

"As am I," China said smoothly. "Maybe if the conversation is interesting enough, we can talk more privately in the future."

The woman's cheeks were already red from the cold, but they went even redder, the hair winding faster around her finger.

"I'd like that," she said coyly. "I'll see you later, then. And, um, Comrade Korea. HappyArmyFoundationDay."

She bowed quickly, looking suddenly embarrassed, and scurried back to her comrades, where they all started whispering and giggling furiously. China's eyes squinched up above his mask.

North glared at him coldly. "Stay away from my women."

He didn't want China to think he was accusing him of anything again, but he didn't seem to.

The other country cut him a mischievous glance. "Oh? But she seemed rather eager to be near me."

"I don't care if she's eager or not," he said flatly. "Stay away."

"You'd tell your people who they can and can't have relations with?"

"No," North said. "That's why I'm telling you."

He knew it wasn't his business who his people were attracted to (even if he couldn't fathom it), or who they chose to have… relations with. But he didn't like the idea of his women having them with a foreign country, no matter if he was a comrade. A Countryhuman had more power than them, and they might feel pressured into it for the sake of their alliance.

None of them actually knew China was a Countryhuman. But still. It made him uncomfortable. And if they did something with him, they would know.

And he especially didn't like the idea of China being attracted to his women, or using them. The Chinas of old- Ming and Qing especially- had stolen Korean women, or demanded they be handed over in tribute. And Joseon had done it, negotiating with the fathers of wealthy girls and kidnapping the poor, if they were deemed attractive enough, shipping them off to foreign lands to be sold into the harems of the rich and powerful, either dying in sexual slavery or one day returning home to be completely shunned by society for 'their' degeneracy, often killing themselves out of shame.

Korea's women had long been coveted by the countries around them- China, Russia, Mongolia, Japan. By everyone but Korea, who treated them like bargaining chips and prized cattle.

No more. North valued his own women more highly than any other country, as people. He had no say in who they chose to… be with, but he did have a say in keeping foreign countries away from them.

He lifted his lip at China, showing him his fangs as he repeated, "Stay away from my women."

The man examined him for a moment, then sighed. "I really do just want to talk about her singing."

North glared at him.

"I do," he insisted indignantly. "I wouldn't do something like that with someone I don't know. I'm as virginal as a maiden, if you must know."

North glared at him.

"Aiya," China said with exaggerated dismay, hiding his masked mouth with the sleeve of North's coat. "You don't believe me? But it's true. I'm a romantic. I don't judge others, but I wouldn't do something of that nature with someone I didn't love deeply."

He side-eyed the women, who were still watching him, and tipped his head in a clear wink, making them giggle and blush.

"But looking doesn't hurt anyone."

"It will hurt you," North muttered, but decided he was probably telling the truth. At least about not pursuing his women.

He might not be thrilled with North Pyongan and Liaoxi's… dalliance. But at least it seemed to make the Chinese woman slightly more forthcoming. She'd told his province her Countryhuman's flirtations were empty air, and North admittedly hadn't seen or heard anything to contradict that. And he had asked around.

And so long as China kept his promise about his province not being an issue in the future, he would tolerate it. As he would tolerate the man's sweet-talking. So long as that was all it was.

"What about you?" China looked back at him. "Have you no interest in women?"

North opened his mouth, then stopped, suddenly suspicious.

China's eyes were wide and curious, and his tone was perfectly innocent. But it was a little too innocent. He had a feeling if he could see his mouth, the curve of his lips would have that guilelessness that North had come to be able to identify as mischief.

"…I have no time for relationships," he answered warily.

"Mm," China hummed, and he thought he could hear a slight edge of disappointment to it. “I see.”

North thought of a tiger prowling through the forest, its paw just narrowly missing the steel jaws of a hunter’s trap, and had the feeling he’d just escaped one of his own.

“From what I’ve seen, that’s likely a blessing for the women,” his comrade said, tucking his hands back in his sleeves and snuggling down in the borrowed coat.

North glared at him again.

Soldiers started to hustle around, and he realized China had distracted him long enough for the final preparations to start. He finally stepped out of the shadows, heading to help, ignoring North Pyongan asking where he’d been.

As they carried the final crates of ammunition down to the snowy riverbank, China suddenly froze, his head swivelling around.

North was automatically on edge, dropping the crate and hefting his pistol, following his gaze until it landed on a group of people speaking in Mandarin as they came down the road, escorted by a few KPA soldiers, and dressed in casual clothes with white lab coats over them.

He relaxed, holstering his gun. The Chinese scientists here to help with their lab tests. Ri Pyong-nam had likely sent them here thinking Kangwon would be around.

Handing off his ammunition crate to a comrade, he strode over to greet them, noticing that China hung back.

“Comrade Korea.” One of the men stuck out his hand.

North stared at it for a second, then shook it, gritting his teeth as the burns under his gloves protested. The man was wearing gloves, too, so he couldn’t glean anything from his palm.

“Duan Longping,” he introduced himself. “And part of my team. We’ve been sent personally by Comrade China to investigate these incidents of anomalous biological matter.”

North examined them. There were six men, ranging from late thirties to fifties, he would say. And one woman who could have been in her forties. She was short and slender, with a round face, and long hair in two plaits over her shoulders, a surprisingly young hairstyle he usually saw on the female Chinese soldiers, not older women. Her downturned brown eyes searched the people working behind him.

He made note of her. Like his country, it hadn't exactly been easy for women to become any sort of scientist before Socialism, and he couldn't see someone with less than three years of schooling being assigned to such an important task.

"Korea is glad to have your assistance," North replied formally.

He also begrudged it slightly, even though they weren't here because his own scientists couldn't handle things, but because they had different experiences with outbreaks to bring in. And China wanted his own country to be prepared in case the germ warfare was spread to it.

"Minister Ri said a Comrade Kangwon would be able to familiarize us with the work already done," Duan Longping said, looking around. "We'd like to get straight into things, if that's alright with you."

More than alright.

North nodded to the soldiers that had brought them. "Comrades, escort our Chinese comrades out to the Quarantine Hospital, and have them directed to the labs."

The location of the underground laboratories needed to remain fairly limited knowledge. They were studying the infectious bacteria found in the insects collected from drop points, and the last thing they needed was one of Rhee's saboteurs breaking in and causing a lab leak.

The men snapped salutes. "Of course, Comrade Korea," one said.

The Korean country bid farewell to the science team, telling them to work hard, too used to bossing around China's soldiers to catch himself. As he did, he noticed the woman's eyes catch on something. Even as they walked away down the road, she twisted to look back.

"Do you see that woman?" China suddenly murmured too close to his 'ear,' making him stiffen. "The stunningly beautiful one?"

North had no way of gauging whether or not a woman was 'stunningly beautiful,' but since there was literally only one in the direction they were looking, it had to be the Chinese woman.

"What about her?" he asked warily.

"You're about to be very mad at me."

He opened his mouth, but was cut off by someone calling, "Gege?"

He looked to see the woman had left her group while they carried on. She was standing rooted on the road, staring at him. Or rather, at China.

"Gege?" she breathed, and there was such a depth of emotion in that one word that it made North blink. "That's you, isn't it?"

"I'm afraid I don't know what you're talking about." China's voice sounded suddenly childish and slightly dopey, but the smile in it was still recognizable. "My mother only had one child."

The woman's eyes widened, and she burst into a grin that lit up the night, breaking into a run. "Gege!"

To North's surprise, China stepped forward, smiling under the mask.

"Hello meimei."

He didn't run, but he walked with more haste than North had ever seen outside of combat, like an invisible string was tugging him towards her.

They met halfway on the dark street, the woman colliding into him like a bullet, so hard that she knocked him back, and as she wrapped her arms around him, China did the same, lifting her off her feet and spinning her around, both of them laughing.

It wasn't like the laughter he'd heard from him on the battlefield. This was just as joyful, but also soaked in a relief so deep it felt palpable. It almost sounded… familiar.

His comrade set the woman back on her feet, embracing her tightly, and her arms snaked around his back, digging into his shoulders as he held onto her just as tightly.

Her face was towards North, and in the bright glow of the moon, he could see tears shining on her face as her eyes screwed shut.

"You knocked it down," she choked out to China, and he murmured something too quietly for North to hear. But he could hear the woman's reply as she said, "You did it. That's what matters," and then, "It's alright. I know you had more important things to do. And I knew it was you."

China said something else, and she laughed again, the sound shaky and drowning in joy, so bright it could have been a child's.

They weren't stepping away from each other, only pressing closer, the woman's face smushed into his shoulder, and the man half bent over her, crushing her to his chest like he could absorb her. It was the embrace of two people that hadn't seen each other in a very long time, and hadn't thought they ever would again.

North watched her fingers clutch at the back of the coat he'd given to China, desperately trying not to lose him again, and felt phantom digits digging into his own.

As North Pyongan called for him to start the salute, he walked away, back into the bright white light of the spotlights.

Even as North gave his short foreword for the salute, praising his soldiers for all their efforts and congratulating them on the foundation of their People's Army, he had to fight to keep his gaze from being drawn back to China and the woman.

They weren't hugging anymore, but they were still holding each other, her arm around her Countryhuman's waist, and his around her shoulders, pressing her into his side, like now that they'd been reunited, they couldn't bear to be parted again. China's eyes kept straying back to her upturned face as North spoke.

"We have a righteous army." His voice echoed over the riverbank, their planes droning overhead as more chased the enemy in the distance. "A truly genuine People's Army filled with men and women that know there is no greater honour than to fight and give their lives in defense of their country. If we didn't, we would not have been able to withstand the Imperialist aggressors' aggression for as long as we have. We would not be able to Reunify our country."

He strayed back to China, seeing the woman trailing her hand up and down his side, seeming to barely notice she was doing it.

"But we do," he said, projecting his voice harder. "And we will be Reunified under your efforts."

Thrusting his fist in the air, he called, "Long live the Korean People's Army! Long live the Worker's Party of Korea! Long live the Chinese People's Volunteer Army and their loyal sons and daughters!"

He saw China smile at him from the corner of his eye, and he took a subtle breath.

"Long live the brave volunteers and Korea's own sons and daughters who have fallen in defense of our homeland!"

His voice had almost caught as he saw big brown eyes again. Almost.

"Long live the Democratic People's Republic of Korea! And long live the Korean people!"

The applause was thunderous, loud enough to cover up the bombs falling on the edge of the city, his soldiers' eyes alight with hope and joy and the absence of the fear he'd managed to drive away again.

Despite his wounds and the creeping fever and how he still felt like he was being strangled, North found himself wishing today was an occasion like Liberation Day or Foundation Day, that he could step into them and immerse himself in the crowd.

He watched the way China ran his hand back and forth on the woman's arm, like he was reminding himself she was real, and turned his back, facing the guns as he signalled the men to begin the salute.

Eighty soldiers jumped into action, loading shells into the artillery guns and firing with single-minded unity. Eighty guns fired out at the river in unison, then again, and again, the roar loud enough to drown out the enemy planes and the bombs, but not North's thoughts.

A year ago he had stood in Seoul and watched this same sight, sixty guns blasting out at the Han like a promise to the enemy across it that they were coming. A year ago O-geun had almost fallen asleep on China's shoulders by the time his mother came to get him, and had leaned his head against North as he helped him down, nuzzling into him and groggily calling him 'hyung.' A year ago he had sat on top of Bukhan Mountain and stared out at his capital and the darkness beyond it, fantasizing about the fruit trees they would plant this spring, convinced he would be in Busan by the year's end.

A year ago he had thought he would have finally been able to embrace his brother again by now.

North remained stone-faced, his spine straight, as round after round blasted from the artillery, an endless roar of percussion that was loud enough that his final declaration went unheard.

"Long live Reunification."

China's ideal outcome for 'Have you no interest in women?' was North saying 'No' (as he was going to), so he could make gay jokes that went over his head for the rest of the night. North is also a forty-two-year old man that calls sex '...That.'

Yes, modern day it does piss North off IMMENSELY that China has sexual relations with his people. He can't exactly stop him because if the women are willing and there's no laws being broken, he can't just insert himself into their lives like 'No.' (he actually could, but since autonomy is important to him (and so is not having awkward conversations) he doesn't). And China will no longer heed his desires. In SP and WP, North sort of just seems passive-aggressive over it, but this is genuinely a point of friction in their friendship. He's just given up confronting him because he doesn't want to give China the satisfaction of disobeying him again, but he has not given up feeling violated and hurt over it (not that he would use those words). This is why China does it. If you're interested in what changed between China's 'I'm a romantic' mindset between now and present day, the answer is nothing.

The people fantasizing about blowing up the Three Gorges Dam if China continues to 'provoke' us over Taiwan are unhinged lunatics and deserve to be taken out back and disposed of. First of all TAIWAN IS THEIR TERRITORY. Dislike it if you want (but please remain consistent- Americans must want to divest from Puerto Rico and Hawaii, and British must want to divest from all their current overseas holdings (these things aren't similar, they are actually worse) but it is legally not a distinct country. They can't provoke us over their territory. We are sticking our mouths out in someone else's business over a place we colonized. Second of all SIXTY-SIX MILLION PEOPLE WOULD DIE. Right-wingers will say something like 'Nanjing didn't happen because there's no way that many people would be killed,' then actively get turned on at the idea of killing SIXTY-SIX MILLION PEOPLE for the sole crime of existing in a country WE keep antagonizing. It's like if a kid shoved another kid on the playground, so he shoved him back, and the first kid started frothing at the mouth at the idea of bashing his and his family's heads in with a rock. But far worse because it involves SIXTY-SIX. MILLION. PEOPLE. Also I want to say that half the people saying 'Oho, they wouldn't be so smug if Japan blew up the Three Gorges Dam' aren't even Japanese. So for your proxy war you'd like us to kill sixty-six million people, then have our entire country wiped off the face of the map in retaliation while you shove fast food in your face and do nothing? Okay, great, just confirming. I'm not moving, I have chosen to die here.

Last Little Sister

North wanted to escape as soon as the salute was over, and bury himself in preparations for the Anti-Epidemic Corps until he forgot about the bandages suffocating him. But once the artillery guns and spotlights were being hauled away by bleary-eyed donkeys, and the soldiers had started to disperse back to their barracks, China made a beeline for him, dragging his mystery woman by her hand.

"Comrade," he called excitedly, making North's shoulders hunch. "I'd like to introduce you to someone."

"I have things to do," North clipped, his eye finding his four provinces down by the river with their bodyguards.

"It will only take a moment." The other country stopped in front of him on a patch of scuffed snow where one of the artillery guns had stood. "This is Zhao Jingjing." He gestured at the short woman. "Jingjing, the striped face should make it clear who this is. He's gege's new best friend."

"We are comrades," North stiffly corrected.

Ssi-bal, he had better not be referring to him that way to anyone else.

"I'm sorry, he's so informal," Zhao Jingjing said apologetically. Her voice was throaty and rich, with the slightest hint of a lisp, and something about the reserved way she spoke sounded familiar. "It's an honour to meet you, Comrade Korea."

To North's relief, she didn't bow or try to shake his hand. She only inclined her head, her twin braids sliding across her white lab coat.

"You're with the science team?" he asked, getting his chance to question her at least.

“I am. But I’m not a scientist,” she said. “I’m in medical school, but I’ve only been taking classes for around two years.”

North narrowed his eye. “Those aren’t very impressive credentials to be part of a team sent to study biological warfare.”

His questioning didn’t seem to make the woman nervous. “They aren’t. But my professor said I could earn valuable experience as a lab assistant.”

“This isn’t an ‘experience’ job.” This was the lives of his people and the fate of his country.

“We can trust her,” China cut in. His hands had returned to his sleeves, but now they emerged again so one could rest on her shoulder.

“I don’t blame Comrade Korea for the questions,” Zhao Jingjing assured. “He’s right that it is suspicious someone who’s only a student would be sent to help with something so important.”

She raised her face to China, arching a dark, angled brow.

“It doesn’t surprise me,” he said easily. “You’ve always been my smart meimei.”

The word seemed to fall from his lips with less of a lilt than usual, confirming North’s feeling that his female soldiers had nothing to pout over at being blown off for the woman.

The other country slid his arm around Zhao Jingjing’s neck. “Of course they sent China’s future most valuable doctor.”

“I need to talk to you.” Without waiting for a response, North grabbed China by the sleeve of his coat, dragging him a few paces away into the darkness.

The country clicked his tongue. “I told you you were going to be mad.”

“What is wrong with you?” North hissed back. “Don’t ask me if I want a list or I will throw you in the river.”

China's black face mask pushed out as he pursed his lips.

"You invited someone here who knows who you are?" the Korean demanded, barely caring that that someone could probably hear him. "Do you want to go to trial again?"

"In my defense, I was planning on her never seeing me."

"But she did." He could have slipped away the moment he heard her voice, and hid until she was gone, but he hadn't, and he also hadn't even tried to play dumb when she called out to him. "And now she could turn you over, or tell the other scientists so they can turn you over."

The man was nonplussed. "Jingjing wouldn't do that."

North's fists balled. "You're willing to bet your country on that?"

"Yes," China said, suddenly serious as he looked him in the eye. "As paranoid as you are, even you have people you would trust not to betray you, no matter what they were offered."

Kim Il-sung flashed in his mind. Another face tried to, but flickered and faded.

"Jingjing is one of mine." China looked back over his shoulder at her like he couldn't help it, his eyes softening almost imperceptibly.

North grit his teeth, the scar over his empty eye itching. "Anyone can betray you."

"Jingjing won't."

"Zhilong-gege's identity is safe with me," Zhao Jingjing's throaty voice suddenly assured, making North spin back to her. "I've kept it safe for-"

Her brown eyes flicked to China. "Awhile."

Her gaze was the same as her country's, only less well hidden.

"I love my nation," the woman said, her voice firm as she looked back to North. “And I share Zhilong-gege’s dream for it. I would never do anything to jeopardize that.”

In North’s anger, the reason her speech sounded familiar clicked. Her words were measured and restrained, but flowed in a way that was almost musical. It was similar to the way SH spoke, and the Jeollas.

His eye flicked to the hands clasped at her waist, and the calluses that thickened them.

“Fine,” he said coldly, making no effort to lower his voice now as he looked at China. “It’s your head.”

“It is,” China agreed. “And I know my little sister will make sure it rests easy.”

North knew he had to be imagining the slight emphasis he’d heard on the one word, but it still made him bristle. He turned away without another sound.

“Do you want your coat back, comrade?” China called.

“Keep it.” North needed the frost stabbing into him to keep the fever at bay, and the prickling fury.

Whatever Zhao Jingjing was to China, it was clear he hadn’t seen her in awhile. He didn’t know what she could have done in that time, who she could have spoken to, what she could have come to believe. Whether North was right about what she’d been or not, anyone could be convinced to turn. She could have been lied to like his soldiers in the camps, bribed, or threatened.

He would have thought China was smart enough to see that, but from what he’d seen- the way he’d went to her so eagerly, the way it looked like he kept trying to distance himself from her, but kept being drawn back, how he hadn’t hidden in the first place, and how he had embraced her so tightly when she could have had a knife hidden anywhere in the long sleeves and deep pockets of her lab coat that she could have used on him- North now doubted it.

Whatever. It wasn’t his problem.

Except it was, and not just because if China's soldiers left, North's would be facing America and his puppets alone. Even if the Yankee picked up his stakes and went after the Chinese mainland, allowing the KPA to Liberate the entire Peninsula, it would still be his problem. China had made it his problem at Chorweon. He'd made it his problem by answering Korea's call for aid at all.

"I'm driving you all back to the bunker," North said flatly as he walked past his provinces, now waiting for him at the side of the road. "Come."

He didn't know if China would take the Jeep back or follow Zhao Jingjing to the labs. He didn't care.

"Is that a good idea?" North Pyongan worried. "You'll have to walk back."

"It's necessary," the Countryhuman clipped, and because their eight bodyguards (Kim Don-om now recovered from the highway ambush and back at his post) were there, none of his provinces could protest more.

North needed to walk. He needed to freeze this heat out and make up for his loss of composure earlier. He would make the almost hour-long march without flinching at the chafe and choke of the bandages.

He led them away to where the GAZ was hidden, not looking back at China as he left. Part of him wanted to go back and seize the keys to the Jeep from him, but Liaoxi and Liaotung were still in the city, and in case he did return to the bunker, he didn't want- he couldn't let him walk.

They had been gathered together here openly. It would be easy for someone to have put eyes on them.

North scanned the dark streets, the looming piles of debris and hollowed-out shells of buildings, empty windows gaping like dead mouths, moaning as the frigid night wind blew through them. Someone could be watching from any darkened doorway, any gap in the rubble, waiting to try and spirit away his provinces or expose his comrade.

He hated knowing that they had a traitor, lurking somewhere in their ranks like a worm in an apple.

As if reading his mind, Hwang lengthened his stride, pulling up beside him. “Korea, any word on that venture of ours?”

He spoke low, but they were all so close together it didn’t matter. North Pyongan politely kept his eyes forward, and the guards kept theirs on their darkened surroundings, hands on their pistols. South Pyongan quickly looked away as North shot her a glare.

“No,” he said.

Nothing positive or negative.

“I see.” Hwang dropped back in disappointment.

“It will come.”

It had only been a week. It would have taken a few days to get the orders to the agent that would bring them to Choi Jung-nam, and for him to get them to the man himself. And the transport plan would need to be arranged between them, hopefully in a way that wouldn’t compromise any other operatives.

The Yankee woman complicated things, too. They couldn’t go until she was able to get away from America, which would hard to pre-plan.

North didn’t exactly relish the idea of letting someone so close to the foreign Countryhuman near them, even for a few days. But he knew she couldn’t be left with her country. He’d already sent the message to CCCP, asking if he could shelter eight non-combatants, enough for Grace Hartman, Suzuki Yoshi, and her and Choi Jung-nam’s children and their families, once North figured out how to get them over from Japan.

He hadn't been able to risk swaying the Soviet by saying one knew America personally, but the man had sent back a simple ‘Yes,’ without it. It made the Korean’s jaw ache.

But between those factors, and depending on whether or not they could risk sending a communication, North might not even know Choi Jung-nam and the Yankee were coming until they showed up north of the 38th Parallel.

They would. Hwang's former student couldn't fail.

'We love each other.'

He didn't want another voice. Even though he knew one day the man would be one anyways. And Suzuki Yoshi and every single other that had helped them achieve Liberation from Japan, like Son Du-soon and Dan Hoon and Bong-nam-

North shook his head jerkily, prompting a raised brow from Hwang.

That was why he needed to end the war. So that the comrades that had survived this long would survive even longer. So he could win Reunification and ensure they lived the long happy lives they had fought so hard for, that they deserved.

He couldn't let America stretch this out any longer than he already had with his puppeteered attacks and targeted bombings and refusing to return their POWs while demanding Gangwon be returned, and still not handing over that list of forty-four thousand missing soldiers, even now that he'd finally given the others in proper Korean and Chinese. North couldn't let him succeed at stealing another one of his provinces.

They needed to eliminate that leak. Choi Jung-nam had to get the information they needed, and get home safe. He knew he could.

North finally looked over his shoulder, subtly, like he was checking for threats.

Past South Pyongan's bodyguards, Stalin Street was dark and empty.

And he hoped China was smarter than him.

—

Ice crackled as it slowly spread over the Taedong in a thin skin, the snow at their feet shifting with an almost imperceptible sound as the frost-withered grass under it recovered from the hours of being tramped upon, once more slowly reaching for the inky sky above. Under the obnoxious drone of the planes that buzzed in his skull like angry hornets, China could hear the softer beat of wings from overhead, and the hum of voices, all too far away for even him to make out what they were saying. North had disappeared into the dark ruins, leaving only the faint footsteps of his entourage behind, quickly fading.

"He seems nice."

The honeyed milk of Jingjing's rich voice had grown the creak of seasoned timbers in it since he'd seen her last. China would forgive the reflexive lie. In the years of his absence, her old occupation had demanded it.

"He's tolerable," he said, turning back to the woman, having to stifle his heart's desire to leap as it had when he'd heard that voice, still so familiar after so long, and seen her face, not buried under cold dirt like the Kuomintang's victims, or maimed into an unrecognizable smear of scarlet, black, and white like the corpses in that blood-soaked city, but whole, beautiful.

She was a good few years older than the last time he'd lain eyes on her, those few stolen minutes of not much more than tears and renewed promises. But his little sister's eyes were still warm and alive, that spark dwelling in their red bean-coloured depths unquenched by her years of hardship.

This time he couldn't stop his heart from squeezing in relief. Even after he'd taken so long to free her from her tower, she had kept her promise.

"Mmm." Jingjing hummed at his words, eyeing the KPA epaulets on the coat he was wearing.

China laughed quietly as he pulled North's olive long coat tighter around him. Unlike the scarf, it still smelled like gunpowder and snow-dusted pines, with traces of overcooked meat clinging to it.

Putting aside what it represented, he found even that smelled pleasant.

He listened again, hearing only the crackle of the ice as it spread, and the squeak of some furry thing in the snow.

Still he suggested, “Why don’t we find somewhere more private, meimei?”

His identity might be concealed, but he was still a Chinese soldier that spent an unusual amount of time with the Korean Countryhuman. He was a target, along with anyone seen associating with him. Until his friend took care of that rat, the quiet Pyongyang night wasn’t safe.

China had been making his own efforts, but was limited by not having access to more confidential Korean information, access he knew his paranoid friend wouldn't be giving him.

Of course, that had never stopped him before. But he didn’t want to do anything to shatter the fragile web of trust he was weaving between himself and North. So for now he would trust the efforts of his friend’s comrade, even if China could have told him that trusting a Westerner was tantamount to turning yourself over directly. Whether by malice or incompetence, he doubted their get-away plan would go the way they wished it to. But his friend wouldn’t appreciate being told something he already knew.

China led his Jingjing to the wreckage of the tea room North had been having his little episode in earlier. Part of the roof had fallen in, bringing with it the owner’s private residence on the second floor, a chest of drawers included. The clothes were gone, either taken during evacuation or looted, but the cracked wood remained. His 'little sisters' were out in the hills right now, but tomorrow he would send them to chop it up for the refugees. For now the Countryhuman brushed at it with a sleeve, before gesturing grandiosely for his little sister to sit.

She did, giving a slight curtsy, and he joined her. No longer in the open, he was free to remove his mask, his face cooling while his right side warmed as he pressed it to hers without restraint, Jingling eagerly mirroring him.

She was both softer and harder than she'd used to be. Her slender form had started to plumpen with age, though she remained quite youthful-looking for her fifty-six years. Conversely, her hands were no longer the soft pads and delicate fingers that had once held a brush. He'd had her remove her gloves to greet his friend, and he could see they were weathered with work.

Her former career wasn't one you grew old in, yet she had still been there to be freed. He would guess she'd been one of the lucky ones that had served her youth and been able to retire to the role of teacher and housekeeping.

Or unlucky, depending on how you saw it. Dying in the street was better to some.

China felt no guilt over how long it had taken to fulfill his promise. It had been fulfilled as it fast as it could be. He only regretted that revolution was such long work.

But now that they had it, change had been fast.

"Enjoying your schooling, meimei?" he asked, and her eyes lit up even brighter.

"More than anything." She curled a fist to her chest. "All the classes, studying, the tests. It's what I always dreamed of. I can't wait until I'm a real doctor."

"Good." He nodded in satisfaction. "I'm sure you'll put it to good use."

"I'll save lives," she vowed. "No one else will end up like my mother."

A modern healthcare system with trained doctors, many of them women and men that had never had the chance to learn before, putting the health of the country before profit. China could empathize with North's provinces' bounciness at the idea.

"And do you have any complaints about the program that put you in it?”

Jingjing’s braids swayed as she shook her head. “No. Even the men were polite. And they were-“ Her throat bobbed. “It meant a lot. Especially for the younger girls. I know we were only one place, but I didn’t hear any complaints from anyone.”

Her answers were more considered than when she’d been a child, looking outside her own experience. It pleased China, as did the news.

“Your sister?” he asked, hoping.

It was granted as she said, “She’s well. She actually left awhile ago to get married.”

“Not a patron, I hope?” China masked his disgust at the idea.

She shook her head. “The man that delivered our medicine. He scraped together enough to buy her out.”

That was good. And her healthy complexion and weight told him she didn’t need medicine now, which was even better. There wasn't any doubt that did make her one of the lucky ones.

“You’re still full of questions,” Jingjing said, her small lips curving up.

China mimicked her. “I’m still looking for answers, meimei.”

He always would be. The death of searching was the death of progress. And China still had many many li to go. He never intended to stop.

He voiced another question. “Do you still paint?”

“It’s hard with school, but…” Jingjing reached into her pocket with, pulling out a piece of pulp paper.

She opened it for him, revealing a small painting of a chandelier, excellently captured in oils. Even with the limited colours, the glass beads that hung from it danced, refracting light around a hall that wasn’t shown.

China smiled, sliding his hand into North’s sleeve, working it into the padded one of his own uniform, and removing another paper, larger. He unrolled it with the care one would afford to a priceless scroll.

The inks were faded, the edges torn and crinkled, and small spots of water damage and old, rusty stains covered it. The protection of China’s sleeves and the coat of wax applied too late had done little to protect it from decades of war.

But it was still clearly the same chandelier.

Jingjing’s eyes welled with tears as she looked at it, vindicating China in his request that his Chairman rifle through his meager hoard to find and ship it to Korea with his last care package.

He really hadn't been planning on meeting Jingjing. But leaving it in whichever quarters she was staying in would have had the same effect.

His little sister turned aside, fumbling in her bag for something else, pulling out a cigarette case. China was certain she hadn’t fallen to smoking, and wasn’t disappointed as she withdrew something that wasn’t a cigarette, holding out a small, withered brown object, displaying it with shaking fingers.

It was an old trumpet creeper bloom, pressed flat, the desiccated petals flaking even as she held it up between them with a tremulous smile.

China dropped his mask, leaning in to crush her to his chest again. Jingjing gripped at his back, and he could hear the crunch as the four-decade old flower crumbled to dust in her fist.

No matter. When the war was over and summer came to Beijing again, he would get her a new one, fresh and crimson.

“I missed you,” the woman murmured, tears dampening his neck.

“I missed you, too, meimei.”

He saw no need to mask the truth, and for once didn't do it anyway. He knew what a liar looked like, and he knew Zhao Jingjing wasn’t one of them. He hadn’t met someone who could successfully lie to him yet, especially the woman who he’d watched grow up, spending hours staring at her face as he did her make-up, watching her eyes as they devoured the medical textbooks he’d taught her to read, and her mouth as her tongue stuck out the side of it while she painted. He had practiced her expressions and inflections in the mirror until if it wasn’t for their bodies, he could have replaced her. She still carried the dent in her lip that told him her tell had never stopped betraying her.

But he knew North wouldn’t believe any of that. The tears in Jingjing’s voice as she clung to him would only make him more suspicious of her, not hearing the sincerity glittering in them.

Interesting how his friend could be once bitten, twice shy, and still defend the dog that had sank its teeth into him.

Or fox. China hadn’t decided yet. He needed a meeting, and if all went well, he would never get one.

It wasn’t his place to say if things could still go well or not. His view wouldn’t change the course of action for either of them anyway. It also wasn’t exactly his place to spread dog safety awareness, but…

The soft fabric of the scarf North had given him brushed against one cheek as the other rubbed against Jingjing’s hair.

He really was fond of his new friend. And with how things were playing out… He would say something. Not now, when North was adorned with that dark circle under his eye and the feverish glint in it, different than the one he had when he was on stage. Or when he'd been able to hear his quick, tight breaths as he stood in this very room. But eventually, once this germ warfare was more dealt with.

Even if it was nonsense, his friend should know what he knew.

His Jingjing leaned back, still keeping one arm around him as she wiped at her eyes with the other.

"Look at me," she sniffled. "I'm still crying like a kid."

That was good. The world had tried to make her grow up too soon. It warmed China's heart to know she'd continued to defy it even in his absence.

"Children aren't the only ones that cry, meimei."

She chuckled, wiping away a tear. "Are you sure you shouldn't call me jiejie now?"

"Aiya, when you still look so young?" China tweaked her leathery cheek. "You'll always be my cute little meimei."

Not his only one. He could still taste the dust of the others on his tongue. But the first. And the only one that had survived the appellation.

"So what are you doing here?" Jingjing asked. "I thought the reason you never came to visit was because you were busy with our country, not Korea."

"Perhaps I'm only here to greet you."

She arched a brow. "Really? Were you coincidentally here last May Day, too? Because I went to Tiananmen Square, and even though I couldn't get close, I think you still would have noticed me if that really was you."

"Gege isn't very attentive," China said, using the harmless voice he'd used for most of their acquaintance, listening as he did.

Jingjing gave him a long stare, and he sighed.

"Aiya, my meimei really is clever. Very well. I may, perhaps, have been in Korea for some time."

Longer than he should. But not as long as he was willing.

"Korea is our country, Little Sister." He reached out to toy with one of her braids, working the ribbon from it. “Or very similar. The fate of it is the fate of China. I won’t leave our comrades to struggle alone.”

She didn’t ask why, just stared up at him with those red bean eyes, then shook her head.

“You said you didn’t want to be a hero, but it looks like you still ended up one.”

China clicked his tongue. “I’m no hero, meimei. Our Chairman Mao and all our soldiers are. I was just there to help.”

And to become the China his people needed.

“And that’s why I’m here,” he said, successfully freeing her hair and moving on to the next braid. “To help.”

Jingjing hesitated, then asked, “But aren’t you tired of war? You’ve been fighting since you left, haven’t you?”

“En. I’m very tired of war, meimei.” No matter how much he enjoyed the rush of battle and artistry of combat. “All of China is. But so is Korea.”

China had never considered himself a soldier first. But he could tell that for North, being one came before a great deal of things. He expected a life without the straightforward fixes, violence, and suffering, or at least less of it, would be foreign to his friend in a way it wasn’t to him.

But he knew the Korean would take it. The way he couldn’t speak the name of the boy that had been their little brother clearly, how he’d reacted to the girl earlier, and the look in his eye as they spoke about grief proved that.

Korea was tired of war, if only for his people’s sake.

“The only thing worse than war is not fighting a war that needs to be fought.” With her hair fully unbound, China cupped Jingjing’s face. “And this war needs to be fought. Korea and his people deserve to be free, just as much as China and his.”

Jingjing placed a cold hand over his, her eyes searching his face. Then she smiled.

"You've changed."

The words burst in him like a firework. 'Change.'

She hadn't seen him since he'd became soaked in the lifeblood of their people. But he could tell she sensed it, beyond his mask, the way it had seeped inside him and watered what he was. She couldn't understand, but she felt what it meant.

China had changed, China was changing. The way they had needed to for so long.

He didn't answer Jingjing. He just hugged her again, the way they'd used to, the way they'd both desperately needed. She was more than halfway to a century old, but she drew her legs up on the broken chest of drawers like it was the old sofa-chair, curling them under her as she lay her upper body in his lap, and he wrapped her in North's coat and his arms, holding her like he would never let go.

China knew he couldn't feel about Jingjing the way North felt about his brother. He couldn't love her like a real little sister. He just wasn't wired for it. If she ever did betray their nation, he would snap her neck with his own hands without hesitating, like he had all his other little sisters and brothers. He would regret that it had to be done, not that he had done it.

But he did love her, and he knew that between her and his Chairman, the grief when he was eventually made to let go would be enough to make him want to agree with his friend about the emotion.

But he wouldn't. Jingjing had been the start of his change, and he wouldn't lose those years with her for anything, no matter how badly they one day hurt.

The face buried in his chest was etched with lines and wrinkles, the body pressed against his was aging, time wearing rough patches and slowly taking it apart, and the hair he carded his fingers through had become streaked through with filaments of moonlight.

But she would always be his little sister.

I love whatever is wrong with him.

Zhao Jingjing features more in that temporarily forbidden China backstory one-shot. Also related to that one-shot, I want you to know that no matter how eyebrow-raising China and North's relationship gets, China and Mao Zedong's is much worse. Largely because Comrade Mao reciprocates. I like to think it's like a collective gaslighting event amongst the original government members. You try to ask if their relationship seems… weirdly close to anyone else, and you're hit with a barrage of 'Of course they're close! Chairman Mao loves his country and China loves all his people, and they're both very passionate revolutionaries,' until you feel like the crazy one. Then you look over and China is half in his lap (not really, they act normal in public, I just think it's a vibe you would pick up on). I don't think saying this is disrespectful towards Comrade Mao because I feel with my full heart that he would approve of me saying that he had an intensely intimate relationship with the representation of his country. I would bet money on this. And China is just not capable of having a normal relationship with people he likes and he is fully aware of this.

Hard Call

1916

Hwanghae stood next to his desk, restraining himself from fiddling with his glasses as he watched the students file out of the middling-size classroom.

Despite his nerves, he still remembered to call out, “Nakajima-san, don’t forget to turn in your essay tomorrow. It’s the last day.”

The boy half-turned back, but his peer grabbed him by the arm, pulling him forward.

“We have the game tonight,” Ishida Motojiro- one of the more affluent students- urged. “Besides, he can’t actually do anything about it anyway.”

He shot a smug look at the province. Nakajima Kozo’s was slightly more ashamed, but he left the classroom regardless.

Hwanghae sighed. A bit of disrespect was expected when he wasn’t even a professor, just a teaching assistant frequently called in to fill roles the less enthusiastic teachers wanted to perform. Not to mention he looked to be the same age as the second-year students, younger in many cases, and couldn’t even claim more years of life to counteract it. He only possessed five and nine months of them.

But he knew his inexperience and lack of authority weren’t where the majority of the students’ contempt came from.

It was because he was Korean, and a Korean province at that. The young Japanese had been told they never had to listen to the words of those whose country they were Occupying, and the young Koreans…

Well, Hwanghae shuddered to think what they had been told about him. The students may be too young to fully understand what it meant to have him filling in for hungover colleagues (which was truthfully a strong word), and relegated to grading essays, but their parents understood. He could see it in their eyes when they came to observe classes, lingering on him standing like a silent white shadow in the corner, ready to leap into action when the real teacher beckoned.

They wished to pretend that their children attending this prestigious school next to the children of wealthy Japanese meant they were equal to them. But Hwanghae was a reminder that that wasn't the case. They were being allowed to study next to their foreign peers. And if Japan wished, he could change that just as easily as he had banned the study of geography and history.

The old Hwanghae had worn robes spun from the finest threads, and while he had eschewed the more elaborate headdresses and crowns of the other Provincehumans, his horsehair hat had been pristine, at least in the few old records the new one had been able to get his hands on before they were spirited away to Japan or destroyed forever. The province had been responsible for recording the now surely burned 'Veritable Record of the Divine,' the record of a life even those that had compiled the 'Veritable Records of the Joseon Dynasty' wouldn't dare touch. He had been Joseon's personal scribe, trusted to write his letters and proclamations faithfully, and bear witness to his country's innermost thoughts.

And now Hwanghae fetched paper cutters and graphite for Japanese teachers that distorted history. He was a trophy of how far Korea had fallen, and a reminder that no matter how deeply the wealthy Koreans collaborated with Japan, no matter how loyal they raised their children to be, it would never be enough. When even a Korean Provincehuman wasn't equal to a Japanese intellectual, how could a Korean human ever hope to match up?

Hwanghae was a permanent reminder to the Korean children that they would always be lesser, and one to the Japanese that they would always be superior.

He exhaled, rubbing a hand over his face.

And he had been the one to come up with the idea. He had asked for this job, even facing down Japan to attain it.

Perhaps he'd been a fool. Those first moments of life had been a whirl, and he'd known he only had seconds to act. When he had formed nearly on top of those kempei as a small, thin boy, what hope had he had but to try and win a scrap of freedom with negotiation? It at least gave him a chance to fight back from within the Occupation system.

But perhaps there was no fighting back. The bits of knowledge he saved from old textbooks and archives were precious, but they didn't change anything. The minds of the youth weren't set in their prejudices yet, but how was he supposed to mold them when he only saw them for a few hours each day, and was never able to teach anything real? If he went off curriculum even slightly, it would be punished, judging by how some of his more excitable lessons had been responded to.

It was difficult to even approach some of the sympathetic students to attempt to challenge their minds when it came with such a risk. Even the Korean boys, who should be *em*pathetic, couldn't be trusted. They could be even more ruthless in their judgement of what was deemed seditious, having it drilled into their heads that they needed to remain loyal to Japan if their families were to maintain their status. Even a simple slip of the tongue, as had happened with the boy who had reported him for criticizing Japan's banning of Korean history, could end in disaster.

Hwanghae hadn't blamed him. A child's own parents should be safe to share knowledge with. It hadn't been his fault that that wasn't the case. And it wasn't as if the province had received a hundred lashes for it, only a few days locked in his dorm, and a threat that if he shared any further criticisms, he might once more get to meet Japan personally.

The thought sent a shiver down his knobby spine as he recalled those cold, distant eyes and flat voice.

'Once was quite enough for that.'

It had made him leery of stepping out of line. Even if he couldn't fight back like this, at least he wasn't imprisoned, as there was a very good chance some of the other Korean provinces were.

Hwanghae had been keeping his head down, his nares buried in books and essays.

But now…

As the last few students streamed out the twin doors, he mustered his courage and called, "Mr. Choi. Please stay a moment."

The boy jolted, his eyes darting between the province and the door, as if calculating his escape. But then he squared his shoulders, turning to face Hwanghae, staring him down as his peers left him behind with only a few backward glances.

"Shut the door, please," Hwanghae bade, adjusting his glasses as he sought to hide his knocking knees by sitting.

Choi Jung-nam complied, muting the end of day hallway chatter, before coming to stand across from the desk, his expression defiant.

"What is it, Professor?"

Hwanghae took a steadying breath as he reached into the desk, removing an essay, one he hadn't kept stacked with the others he had finished grading for this class' real professor. Choi Jung-nam tensed as he placed it on the desk.

"That's my essay," he correctly identified.

"Indeed." The province adjusted his glasses again, reading the first few lines aloud with a dry mouth. "'The Occupation of Korea at the hands of Japan is a disgrace, both to the five thousand-year long history of my country, and to all the people of both nations. Not only does it subject the Korean people to the indignity of being treated as second-class citizens in our own land, but it also puts the people of Japan in the inglorious category of 'oppressor.'"

Choi Jung-nam shifted uneasily.

Hwanghae continued, "'With the formation of a new Japan in 1868, and Joseon's shift towards modernization as the Korean Empire, our two countries were in the perfect position to clear the slate of their history. Instead, the new Korean Countryhuman remains locked away, not even permitted to oversee Korea as a figurehead.'"

That was only an assumption, though a popular one. There was no evidence against the Korean Countryhuman being imprisoned, but it could very well be that he- or she- simply saw no reason to govern when it would only be a pretense.

Or perhaps they had more shame than Hwanghae, and refused to be used as a reminder.

But he knew the next sentence was an objective fact.

"'And Japan lords over us, demanding that we worship him as a god, and ensuring that the bad blood between our nations will never be wiped clean.'" Hwanghae looked up from the paper to a tense Choi Jung-nam. "You go on to argue your point."

Quite eloquently. It wasn't a perfect essay, taking a far too involved voice, personal biases refusing to be masked with clinical detachment, with a few redundant sentences. But it was passionate and well-researched.

The boy squirmed, then steeled himself, jaw clenching. "Yeah," he said. "And I stand by it. The Occupation cripples us and hobbles Japan. It's no good for either side."

"You're lucky that I'm the one that read this first," Hwanghae said.

If the man supposed to be sitting in this chair had done his job, Choi Jung-nam could very well have been expelled already.

'Or worse.'

"It's well-written," he praised, then said apologetically, "But I'm afraid I can't let you hand this in."

“Why not?” the boy demanded, slapping his palms down on the desk. “It’s the truth.”

Hwanghae swallowed nervously. “Yes,” he admitted, cringing, almost expecting an officer to burst in the door the moment the word left his lips. “It is.”

Choi Jung-nam blinked, as if surprised he would admit that.

“But if this is turned over, you will be expelled, fined, and blacklisted, if more drastic measures are not taken.”

The boy hunched slightly. “My Father is wealthy. They couldn’t just do that.”

“Wealthy as he is, he’s still Korean.”

The classroom was silent as they both felt the weight of those words.

“I understand your desire for others to hear this, and to change their minds,” Hwanghae said gently, despising his role in stifling a student’s voice. “But your words won’t be allowed to circulate. They will be erased. And so may you. The costs far outweigh the benefits. I would advise handing in a different essay by tomorrow. Your grade may take a hit, but it’s preferable to any other outcome.”

He clasped his hands, hoping he sounded convincing. Choi Jung-nam glared down at the paper and the treasonous words scrawled across it in neat kanji.

Then his chin dipped.

“Fine,” he said quietly, sliding the essay off the desk, crumpling it in his hand. “I’ll write another one.”

He started to trudge for the door. Hwanghae watched him, wringing his hands, the shame in his thin chest burning brighter.

It would be risky, especially considering who his father was. Rebellious words didn’t always translate into rebellious actions. And Choi Jung-nam was young and popular, with many friends both Korean and Japanese that he could accidentally brag to about something he thought might impress them. At such a young age, a certain level of mutiny was considered fashionable, until it wasn't.

And by then it was too late.

But the boy was smart. Hwanghae had 'borrowed' his student record, and looked over his past assignments while he deliberated over this decision. His Korean and Japanese were both solid, along with his Hanja. His Morals mark wasn't the best, as this wasn't his first occasion of saying things that shouldn't be said, only his most egregious, but that could be considered a positive in this case. And his arithmetic was excellent. The province didn't want to curb the passion in him, or his desire to rebel, not when he had the sort of promise Korea needed.

Hwanghae had chosen to be a part of this system that churned out unquestioning labour for a foreign country, that snuffed out any real desire to learn and grow. He had done it to be a spanner in the works, not to facilitate the production. But if he allowed Japan's education system to overwhelm with fear his desire to inculcate, how was he supposed to make sure his students truly learned?

Hwanghae wanted to teach. More than anything, he wanted to teach.

"Wait!"

His voice broke slightly as he shot up, bidding Choi Jung-nam to stop with his hand on the door, looking back with a raised brow.

Hwanghae cleared his throat, fiddling with his crooked tie as he gathered his words.

"Your essay spoke true," he said, making an effort to restrain his nerves. "I would say I… empathize with the sentiments in it."

Choi Jung-nam's eyes went wide with shock at the direct confession. "You do?"

"Yes," Hwanghae managed, fidgeting.

This was it. The moment where he might be arrested. Or rather, the moment he might start a chain reaction that ended in him being arrested and- And Choi Jung-nam was still staring at him expectantly, hearing the unfinished thought in his voice.

The province boy took a steadying breath.

"And I was wondering if perhaps you would be interested in an… extracurricular class to discuss those ideas in more detail?"

And as he voiced the question he had been waiting a week- five years and nine months, really- to ask, Choi Jung-nam grinned.

—

1952

Hae was perfectly fine. She had to be.

Yes, it was true that Kangwon had a tendency to downplay the severity of an injury or illness, but certainly he wouldn't do that for Hae. And yes, Hwang wasn't exactly the foremost expert at gauging people, but he was just as versed in their silent language as his cousins, so surely he would have noticed Kangwon's microexpressions. Though it was also true that if his cousin wasn't intentionally broadcasting them, then he was less likely to pick up on them. Perhaps he had looked a bit too steady as he told him his sister was recovering well…

No. Of course Kangwon had looked steady. Because Hae was fine. There was no difference in steadiness from lying or steadiness from truth. Hwang had simply pushed North Hamgyong too far in his attempt to reconcile him with SH, so his cousin had lied with the express intent to upset him. It didn't matter that Korea was in a tense enough state right now that hearing that Hae had 'died' would likely set him off, and keeping that knowledge to himself to avoid further stressing him was definitely something Kangwon had done before, such as the Kim Mi-ju debacle Hwang had heard of last year, and multiple other accounts. It also didn't matter that he had borrowed a medical textbook from Kim Il-sung University to confirm that the mental file he'd found was right and that the symptoms of cholera should only last for a few days at most, not the month and six days Hae had already been in the hospital for, and certainly not the projected two months Kangwon had claimed. Hae was weakened by a number of other factors- her unhealing burns, her calorie count that had only been satisfactory for a few days before she'd gotten sick, the sympathetic fever Hwang was sure she could feel coming on, as he did. It made sense her recovery would be extended. Though why she would be kept in the Quarantine Hospital when she was no longer capable of transmitting, especially when the Political Committee of the Central Committee of the Worker's Party had just met to discuss preparations for sowing season…

No. Hae was fine. When Hwang next got his chance to speak to his cousin, and inform him of what North Hamgyong had said, he would laugh it off and tell him she was alright. Perhaps he could even get her to write Hwang a note to prove it.

He just hadn't gotten his chance to ask yet, because Kangwon was frequently out of the city conducting fieldwork and collecting information in preparation for the Anti-Epidemic Corps, and on the rare times he was in Pyongyang, he was shuttling between the hospitals and the hidden labs, and Gangwon was always shut up in the Quarantine Hospital. And he couldn't just ask for either of them to set aside time to speak to him because Korea had said that just yesterday several more clusters of insects had been found in Kangwon's province, and that there had been a case of encephalitis in Pyonggang County, where mites and mosquitoes had been dropped at the end of last month.

The news had sent a shiver down Hwang's spine, along with the knowledge that he couldn't distract either of the Kangwons from dealing with the very important task of making sure it didn't spread. Not for his surely unsubstantiated worries.

North Hamgyong tried to hurt those around him all the time. This was simply another of those attempts. It had just managed to pierce Hwang more than any of the others had.

He removed his glasses, setting them aside on the university office desk to put his head in his hands, attempting to clear his mind to focus on his task- combing through the list Ri Sang-cho had put together of their MIA soldiers that they suspected to be part of the missing forty-four thousand names from the enemy's list as a fresh pair of eyes.

He couldn't do it. Even without his worries over Hae, a million other subjects crowded his head. The germ warfare, the possible encephalitis outbreak, the missing POW names that the American negotiators had sworn would be handed over within the next few days, the essays he had to grade, the refugees clustered in the caves in his province.

Hwang's intellect might be his greatest- and only- pride, but sometimes he wished he could empty his mind like Kangwon or Hae.

And looming over it all, the fluttering, uneasy anxiety of Choi Jung-nam.

Was he alright? Had he succeeded in his mission? Was he on his way here even now?

Or had he failed, and fallen victim to everything that entailed?

Hwang knew there was a good chance he had, and a good chance that if he did, he would never even hear about it. Undercover operatives conducted work that never came to light until after the war was over, and sometimes not even then. And their deaths were often the same way. He would need more than two hands to count the number of comrades that had disappeared into Japanese prisons or organizations as spies, only to never be heard from again.

That was the worst part. The not knowing. Choi Jung-nam could be lying in a mass grave or floating in the sea even as he sat at this desk. He could still be alive, but be being tortured, beaten, electrocuted, treated like those in Sincheon as the enemy tried to force what he knew out of him, who he worked for, what other operatives he was aware of.

Hwang shouldn't have given his permission to let him meet with Grace Hartman. He should have-

He shot up as footsteps pounded down the hall, his heart beating, hoping they wouldn't stop outside his door and hoping they would.

They didn't stop, but his door did burst open, a young man with the armband of the Signal Corps wrapped around his bicep skidding in.

"Comrade North Hwanghae," he said, barely snapping off a salute. "You're needed immediately. There's a transmission for you."

Hwang was already moving as he asked questions. "From whom?"

"I don't know," the man panted, clearly out of breath. "I was just told you need to hurry."

Hwang did, cramming all his work into his suitcase before tossing his office keys to a fellow teacher and ordering her to lock it for him. Not the most secure, admittedly, but he could tell this was urgent.

Korea had been letting him stay near the city for the past week, ostensibly to focus on the list and his university work, but in reality likely wishing to allow him to hear any news about Choi Jung-nam as soon as possible.

As Hwang hustled over the hills and into the waiting vehicle, his heart pounded against his ribcage, uneasy hope filling it.

Surely if it was a transmission, that meant the man had succeeded? It was strange that it would be sent to him, but he couldn't see any other purpose for it. It certainly wouldn't be for him if he hadn't succeeded.

To Hwang's surprise, he wasn't taken to a Signal Corps outpost, but to the rebuilt telephone exchange nestled amongst the ruins of other buildings on the edge of the residential district. The war had damaged many phone lines, but it still kept a skeleton crew, manual operators and technicians for the automatic exchange alike.

'A phone call?'

The hope in his heart grew. If Choi Jung-nam was risking contacting him by phone, then he had to be in the north.

Though he did suppose this having nothing to do with him was also a possibility.

Hwang was ushered into the call building, where phones awaited the majority of those who didn't have them at home, blinking as his eyes adjusted to the dim light.

The room was empty, more so than it should be even for keeping lines clear to avoid obstructing priority communications. Two women awaited, one with her hand resting on a black phone in one of the booths.

One leaped towards him, her braid flying. "Comrade Hwang! This is for you."

"Report," Hwang said, scanning the scrap of paper she handed him.

A string of numbers was written on it. A phone number. One from the south, if he was correct.

"A man called and said he needed to speak to you right away," the woman rushed. "I wasn't sure at first, but he said it was really important, so I thought you should know."

Hwang furrowed his brows. "Did he say who he was?"

The older woman with her hand on the phone said with a thick Pyongan accent, "He said his name was Choi Jung-nam."

Hwang's blood went cold.

No. He was sure the Americans had cracked their military communications, let alone their phone lines. Choi Jung-nam wouldn't call from the south, not unless-

He rushed by the women, snatching the phone up. But his finger froze on the dial.

It could be a trap. If something had gone wrong, he could dial this number and have the South's voice Command him from the other side. 'North Hwanghae, don't hang up.' He could bombard him with more Commands before anyone even realized what was happening.

Hwang tried to counsel himself. With the ground they held, Haeju was no longer directly at the front. There was no way the enemy could have advanced far enough to capture it in a day, hence the South couldn't Command him.

But what if one of the enemy's aerial landings had succeeded? They didn't need to hold the capital for long, just enough time for Hwang to be Commanded south or to divulge military information. He wasn't supposed to know anything, but he couldn't help asking questions, and had admittedly accidentally learned things he shouldn't, and extrapolated too much from small scraps he'd gleaned.

No, Haeju couldn't be captured. Surely the Signal Corps would have heard, and he would have been notified. Korea would have sent someone to get him right away.

But the call could still be traced, and the telephone exchange targeted. Or Choi Jung-nam could be captured by the enemy, but only suspected. Hwang picking up could be the final nail in his coffin, terminating the mission.

His hand slid away from the phone.

He couldn't risk it.

"Comrade North Hwanghae?"

Hwang balled his fists on the desk, gritting his teeth.

Would Hae call? He knew she would, and he also knew it would be the wrong choice. It was too dangerous, far too risky. Even if there was important information to be passed, it wouldn't be worth the risk.

He squeezed his eyes shut, seeing that defiant face, the tentative hope as he realized he wasn't going to be punished, the joy on it as Hwang went to fight for their country, the courage as he offered to do the same, the love as he gazed at Suzuki Yoshi.

And he grabbed the handset again, raising it to his ear slit as he stuck his finger in the dial.

Choi Jung-nam was his student. Something had gone wrong and he needed to know.

He wanted to call. He wanted to be the sort of person that would call.

"You, stay with me," he ordered the Signal Corps man as he rotated the dial. "If it looks as if I freeze up at any point, shoot the phone. Don't worry about harming me. Then detain me and notify Comrade Korea right away."

It was overthinking. He was certain Hajeu couldn't have been taken. But better safe than sorry.

"Everyone else out."

The woman with the Pyongan accent said, "I can-"

"Out," Hwang said sharply as the phone began to ring.

The women hustled away, shutting the door, leaving him with the young man and his racing heart.

Ring. Ring.

'Pick up, pick up, pick-'

"Hello?" a young woman's voice answered, incongruously cheerful with the blood pounding in his temples. "How can I help you?"

Taken aback, it took Hwang a moment to answer. "…I received a call from this location, and was asked to call back. Can I ask where it is?"

"Haeyansaek Tea House in Busan," the woman answered, making the tendons on his hand flex. "Hold a moment, please."

There was a 'thunk,' followed by a muffled call, something like, "Sir, your call."

Hwang leaned over the desk, his palm slick against the plastic handset, his blood rushing so violently though his veins that he shook.

After a few seconds, a familiar gravelly voice said, "Hey Prof."

"Com-"

"No time," Choi Jung-nam cut him off. "They found me."

Hwang's heart plummeted to his feet. "How?"

"Don't know," he said, his voice low, his words coming out like sentences rushed from a typewriter. "I saw plainclothes guys following me. They're outside. Waiting to see who's here to meet me. Then they'll come in."

The phone creaked under Hwang's grip. "Run. You need to get out of there."

"I can't." His shaky breath crackled in the province's ear slit. "The source is supposed to meet me in five minutes."

Grace Hartman.

"If she comes in here, they'll know she's a traitor. Even if there's no one here to meet her. This bastard's too paranoid. He'll kill her. I need to do something to make sure she knows not to come close." He swallowed. "Something big."

"You need to leave," Hwang urged, alarmed by the words. "She's likely betrayed you."

"I don't believe that," he firmly denied. "You should have seen her. She's just a kid. She's scared. I can't just let them kill her. I can't let him hurt her again. And you need this intel."

"And what about your children?" Hwang demanded, nails scratching at the desk. "If they catch you, you put them at risk, too."

There was a long silence. Then, "Anything for the mission, right?"

Hwang's jaw creaked as he made his decision. "Damn the mission. It's over. And if you don't get out of there, your life will be over, too."

"She still has the information," he replied. "She knows where we were supposed to meet the guy. She can still get it to him. He can get her out. But it's too late for me."

His voice was calm, steady. But Hwang could hear the waver under it.

"I just wanted to call you. Let you know." Another shaky breath. "Say thank you. For everything."

"No," Hwang said. Unable to find any other words, he repeated, "No."

"Sorry I couldn't see this to the end." A wry exhalation came across the line. "Some agent I was."

"You worked with us loyally for years," Hwang said, pleading, "And you can for many more. Just leave, please."

"I can't," the man rasped, resigned. "And time's almost up, Prof. Promise me you'll look out for my family."

Hwang's glasses had started to fog over, melting the inside of the exchange into a smear of tan and grey. "They're your family, that's your job."

"My job is to serve my country." His swallow was audible. "Promise me, Comrade Hwang."

"I-" The tendons in Hwang's hands strained, then went slack.

"I promise," he said quietly.

A quiet exhale. "Thank you. And take care of the source, too. If you can. And tell Yoshi-"

His voice broke fully now. "Tell her I'm sorry. Wait, no. Don't. Tell her I love her. I've loved her ever since she accidentally smacked me in the face with that copy of 'Yaregaki,' and I'll love her until I- forever. Tell her. Please. Please tell her."

"I will," Hwang rasped.

Choi Jung-nam released a quiet, shuddering breath. "Good. Good. Then I can die happy."

"Comrade-"

"I chose this, Prof," he interrupted. "And I couldn't ask for anything more than to die in Korea. When the Kanto Carnage went on, when the bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki and we thought it was the end of the world, that was my one regret. That I wouldn't die on the soil I belonged on. But here I am."

"Here you are," Hwang said quietly.

"I'm sorry I'll never get to engineer anything for Korea." The man inhaled. "But if the source gets that intel to you, then I get to say I played a part in Liberating our country, giving my family a place to belong. All our families."

"You did," the province assured him, fighting to keep his voice steady. "No matter what, you've done enough, Comrade Choi Jung-nam."

There was no threat in giving away his identity now.

With a watery smile in his voice, his former student said, "Yeah. I guess I have."

There was a sound, and he swallowed thickly. "And now I've got to go."

"You don't have to."

Choi Jung-nam drew in a long breath, and when he spoke, his voice was steady again, the waver gone.

"I do. If she was my kid, I'd want someone to do the same."

Hwang squeezed his eyes closed. "You were a good man."

"I had a good teacher." Somehow he actually chuckled, before sobering again. "Long live Korea, Prof. Tell my family I love them."

There was a clunk as he set the phone down.

Hwang didn't know whether he was too disconnected to realize he needed to hang up, or whether he left their connection on purpose, knowing how much his old professor would want to know exactly what had happened. Or maybe he had simply misjudged the distance between the handset and the cradle.

Whatever the case, Hwang could hear a muffled cry of alarm from the tea house proprietor- "Sir, you have to pay your bill!" He could hear as a door opened, and Choi Jung-nam started to scream, distant unintelligible, the only clear word "Manse!" over and over again.

And he could hear as the guns opened fire.

"Jung-nam!" It was irrational, Hwang knew. He couldn't hear him. But the name burst from his mouth anyway as he clutched desperately at the phone, cramming it against the side of his head like he could slip through the receiver to his aid.

"Are you okay?" he frantically demanded. "What's happening?"

There was, of course, no answer. As the guns fell silent, the only sound that came through the phone was the muffled sobbing of the woman, then boots pounding on a wooden floor as a man barked to take in everyone in the building and search it top to bottom, and that just because the rat was dead, didn't mean there weren't more.

There was a clunk, and suddenly a gruff voice was demanding in Korean, "Who is this? Who's on this line?"

Numbly, Hwang set the handset down, cutting the connection.

I read the phone conversation out loud to make sure it was under five minutes. I cried while doing so.

At the point in time in the flashback, Korean schools under Japan had four years of secondary school, which is why Choi Jung-nam is a second-year student in 1916 but in his final year in 1919. The parts about history and geography being banned at that time are true.

The Veritable Records of Joseon are records of all past Joseon kings (modern day they're called the Veritable Records of Feudalist Joseon, since the DPRK is also called 조선). They were recorded by scribes and faithfully detail the kings' lives (if you've ever seen that joke about King Taedong falling off his horse it's because the scribe wrote it down despite being told not to). In this world the Veritable Record of the Divine is also like that, but it's personally written by Hwanghae (even before he was Hwanghae, and carried on by Haeju during the year-long provincial dissolution before he was restored), and details Joseon personally, going from his formation in 1392 all the way to his dissolution in 1910. No one else ever got to see it but Hwanghae, so it's unknown how much of it was in earlier Korean and how much was in more modern Korean, and how exactly it was kept. Scrolls? One big book? Joseon actually ordered him to stop writing it after he became a Japanese protectorate in 1905 (out of shame), but he secretly carried on right up until the final day. Unlike the real Veritable Records, it only had one copy. This copy was destroyed by Japan at the beginning of the Occupation. But there are rumours that it was actually taken back to Japan, and is still there, or that people had torn parts out and smuggled it away, or that Hwanghae had actually made copies of certain passages and hidden them when he saw what was coming. Every now and then a page will crop up and people will claim its genuine, but there's really no way to tell. North and South both have a couple being studied. China has found the most convincing page passed down by Koreans that fled to his country during the Occupation and gifted it to North (not that anyone will ever know that's where he got it from).

In other news, the DPRK recently expanded a chicken farm to raise black swans and ostriches for meat (they've being doing this for awhile, I'm just talking about this farm in specific). I think it must be fun to work in a profession for so long that you get to see life change like that. 'I guess we're doing ostriches now.' But also I would be so scared if all I ever had to deal with was chickens, then I had to square off with a bird taller than me all of a sudden. One of the officials in the video is offering his hand to an ostrich off to the side like you would to a horse to get it to nuzzle you. The whimsy of humanity is universal.

The Coming Tide

"She did it."

Hwang raised his head, hardly daring to believe his ear slits.

SH spoke up next to him, voicing her own tentative hope. "You mean...?"

Korea nodded soberly. "The source got us the intelligence."

It was excellent news. But Hwang couldn't find it in himself to feel excited by it. It was difficult to tell with the moon hidden by the peak of Jangsan above them, but Korea didn't appear any more enthused than him.

SH closed her eyes, letting out a breath. Hwang simply closed his eyes.

The question was harsh, but he needed to know.

"Was it worth it?"

Korea's jaw feathered. "We will make it worth it."

Hwang looked down at the tips of his snow-dusted boots.

Often agents sacrificed themselves for minor information, simple troop counts or deployment details, or intelligence that was outdated by the time it reached Supreme Command. That was just the way it was, he told himself. Any cost for the mission, no matter how small.

And yet this cost still felt egregiously steep.

"And what about Grace?" SH asked after a second.

"She is still in Busan."

Hwang lifted his gaze at that, clearing his throat before he trusted himself to speak. "But she delivered the information to our operative. Shouldn't she be here?"

"Our agent monitored the location they'd agreed to meet at for a day after the shooting," Korea said, his tone flat and cold as the trampled snow of the clearing. "She walked by, escorted by a full compliment of guards. He found a paper with the information on it lying on the ground after she left."

Hating to even voice the idea, Hwang said, "So it could be false intelligence."

"Yes. But we're going to look into it anyway."

There was a distant explosion, and Korea looked up at the sky reflexively, though it was empty, before dragging his gaze back down.

"There was more than we were expecting. But I can't share the rest of it."

SH's voice was soft. "So she's still with America."

Korea's was grim. "Yes. I have recalled the man supposed to transport them so he can't be captured."

Hwang's glasses had become useless, so he shut his eyes against the night. Choi Jung-nam had sacrificed himself so Grace Hartman could get away.

And she hadn't. Not truly.

"Could we... attempt to save her?" he ventured, and Korea's look gave him all the answer he needed.

"Of course," Hwang murmured. "We can't risk any further operatives. And with Choi Jung-nam dead-"

His voice strangled, making him duck his head, trying to clear his throat. SH's hand rubbed comforting circles on his thin back.

"There's no one she can give up to the enemy," she finished regretfully. "So we can't afford to save her."

"I won't waste any more resources on something that isn't tactically necessary."

Korea's words were harsh, but they could both hear the bitterness coating the word 'resources.'

SH thankfully looked saddened by the news, not reacting with the calllousness she'd displayed before.

In an attempt to comfort her, Hwang said, "At least America shouldn't have any reason to suspect she had anything to do with Choi Jung-nam. Neither him nor I referred to her with pronouns during the call, so he won't even be able to narrow the person we were talking about down to a woman."

Korean didn't use gendered pronouns in sentences to the same extent that some other languages (like English) did. So long as they knew what the subject was, it wasn't necessary. Since they had never used the word '그녀,' even if their call had been recorded, and America were to listen to it, he would likely only hear 'the source' or 'they' when Grace was referred to.

SH wrapped her arms around herself, her eyes downcast. "But she's still in her cage."

Hwang didn't know what to say to that. It was his turn to gingerly pat her back.

"I am arranging to have Choi Jung-nam's family brought to the Soviet Union as soon as possible," Korea said, not looking at the woman. "You said he mentioned Suzuki Yoshi's given name on your call. We can't afford to waste time."

The words brought a small semblance of comfort, though Hwang still felt numb, as he had for the last three days.

It was still difficult to wrap his head around. The boy that had always sat in the middle of the class, that had put his hand up to answer his questions when no one else would, even when he knew he was wrong, and that had showed up to their first extracurricular lesson with some of his mother's homemade onion kimchi was dead.

Hwang knew logically that it wasn't his fault. Choi Jung-nam had returned to Korea explicitly to be a spy. He had come to him, not the other way around. He had been the one to want to approach Grace Hartman, and he had made the choice to stay in that tea house until she would be close enough to hear him be eliminated, and know to turn around.

His brain knew it wasn't his fault. But his heart was refusing to be convinced.

"That's good," he said quietly to Korea.

Even if they couldn't take the American woman into custody like Choi Jung-nam had wished, at least they could protect his family as Hwang had promised.

He removed his glasses to wipe the condensation from them. "Please notify me if they reach the Soviet Union safely."

"When," SH corrected.

"If I don't, I'll have someone else do it." Korea didn't make a sound, but the cloud of mist emitting from his nares plumed larger. "I'm going to pass on the information on the leak we were given."

Hwang raised his brows. "To the others?"

"Just the intelligence, not who gave it to us. We all need to be on high alert." The Countryhuman looked between the two of them. "Don't mention either Choi Jung-nam or Grace Hartman."

Hwang wondered if that should sting, though he knew his cousins being aware of Grace Hartman's role in this could compromise her safety in the future. And as for his former student... It simply wasn't necessary information to divulge. The less people that knew any covert operational details, the better. And it wasn't as if he was keeping silent on news about someone's sister- Choi Jung-nam meant the most to him.

He wondered if he should feel guilty that it didn't sting.

"We won't, Korea," SH assured, with a sympathetic glance at Hwang.

He bobbed his head at their country's look. "We certainly won't."

Korea dipped his head. "South Hamgyong, stay on watch. North Hwanghae will tell you the details after."

SH saluted, and the two men headed inside the bunker, the heavy steel door groaning as Hwang helped pull on it. It crossed his mind that Korea almost seemed to be straining more than usual, but he quickly discarded the thought.

In the dark of the short tunnel, they were both blind. Korea didn't turn on his flashlight, and Hwang collided with his back as he suddenly stopped moving.

"Korea?" He fumbled to straighten his glasses. "Are you-?"

"He died to free his country."

The province's throat bobbed. "Yes. The way he wanted."

Even if they weren't able to make the intelligence he had died for worth it, Choi Jung-nam would never know that. Hwang would be the one that had to live with it. And he knew it was par for the course when it came to covert operations. Their comrade had fulfilled his desire to feel like he was doing enough for his country, and completed the mission. That was what mattered.

Hwang just wished it hadn't been necessary.

"Thank you," he said quietly to Korea.

The man didn't answer, heading to bang on both doors at the end of the hall. He didn't stop at his room, seemingly aware that China hadn't returned to the bunker tonight.

Most of the male provinces were still awake from when Korea had came to fetch Hwang. Chagang winced slightly as he rose from his cot, but only North Hamgyong rubbed irritably at his eyes. He performed the most manual labour out of them with the Rehabilitation Corps, and was usually asleep from the moment his head hit his pillow, unable to be roused until muster.

Hwang could see how stiffly he was moving, subtly kneading at his lower back. With Kangwon keeping too busy with the biological warfare to give him his massages that he insisted weren't massages, his back problems were likely acting up.

His cousin caught him looking, and curled his lip.

Hwang supposed it was his fault for feeling a twinge of sympathy for him after he'd felt none for him. He wanted to turn his chin up, but couldn't muster the energy, looking away instead.

The female provinces took longer, all three well asleep. Korea bade the Chinese duo to emerge as well, all of them clustering in the hallway.

Hwang listened intently as Korea recited what information 'an agent' had retrieved on their leak.

America had referred to them as 'she,' and her code name, or at least how the foreign Countryhuman called her, was 'Agent Maine.' She was in a position to be aware of how often Korea and Kangwon had been travelling recently, and had been tasked with getting proof of Gangwon residing in the north.

His lips pressed flat as Korea fell silent.

The white glare of North Pyongan's flashlight made their Countryhuman look pale and washed out, darkening the shadow under his eye. He looked as grim as Hwang felt.

North Hamgyong's snort was loud in the confines of the tunnel. "That's all? That's almost fucking nothing."

"But it is something," Hwang cut in before Korea could.

"She's a chick and she has some bullshit code name that could just be the miguk-nom's stupid nickname for her," his cousin said scornfully. "You know how many damn women are in Korea? Way more than half our population now that all the men are dead."

"North Hamgyong," Korea said sharply, and he sneered.

"It's true."

Hwang took a deep breath, glad that SH was standing outside. "It's more than we had," he said calmly. "And I believe we can safely say she's stationed in or around Pyongyang now."

Looking at Korea, he explained, "Her knowledge of your and Kangwon's movements could be due to having contacts in other locations, or being close enough to the city to observe when your vehicles leave and arrive. But even if she's part of a network, and mostly responsible for passing on the information of others, the order to gather proof of Gangwon sounded like a direct one. She must be in the Pyongyang area."

"A woman in Pyongyang." North Hamgyong scoffed. "Good luck with that."

Hwang's hands balled into fists, though he quickly unfurled them as the burns between his fingers protested.

"Our agent retrieved the information from the south," he said firmly, understanding a bit of SH's feelings towards the man. "Now that our search demographic is narrowed down, I am certain we are capable of unearthing the traitor in our midst."

North Hamgyong narrowed his eyes at him.

"That's enough," Korea said, not as snappish as usual. "The point is that I want you to be even more on guard than usual. Don't stop at rest stations or allow civilians to mend your clothes."

North Pyongan opened his mouth, and their Countryhuman said, "When you visit Oh Tae-min and Hyun Han-jin, do it at their place in the hills." He narrowed his eye. "And ration sharing only on the weekend."

"I remember, Korea," the man said quickly. Hwang caught Liaoxi's lips twitching slightly.

It was his turn to raise his hand. "Allowing our civilians to mend and wash our uniforms builds a stronger bond between them and their provinces, as well as gives us chances to impress the justness of our cause on them. I don't think we should give that up so easily."

For some not involved in the Party or other political work, the war could seem like something impersonal whose only impact was on their own conditions. If they didn't see beyond that, they would be more susceptible to taking bribes to betray their country, such as food or money. The more they humanized their government to the populace, and forged personal connections, the less likely they would spring another leak.

Chagang dipped his head in agreement. "They are the river to our fish. And it makes them happy to help their People's Army."

Korea shifted from foot to foot, then clipped, "Fine. But never anywhere secluded, and never give away anything you don't have to. Make sure you don't mention Gangwon at all."

His eye flashed.

"We still not telling him or Kangwon the Yank's pretty much put a warrant out for him?" South Pyongan asked, yawning.

"No. And nothing about China either."

"It might be wise," Hwang ventured. "Not about Comrade China, obviously. But about the demand. Our best defense is-"

'Critical thinking.'

"Knowledge."

"Like if you'd actually fucking told us you thought there was germ warfare shit going on," North Hamgyong grunted. "Hae wouldn't be fucked up in a hospital bed."

"I told her-" Korea reined himself in, baring his teeth as he gritted out, "I will reinforce to Kangwon and Gangwon that they need to be as careful as possible. That is all that is necessary. Comrades Liaoxi and Liaotung."

"Yes, Comrade Pr-" Liaotung winced suddenly.

From beside her, Liaoxi said sweetly, "Yes, Comrade Korea?"

"Pass the message about the leak on to your Countryhuman whenever he surfaces."

Hwang knew he must be tired, as he made no effort to hide his grimace.

Liaoxi dipped her head. "I can assure you for one, it will be done."

"Yes, gege," Liaotung politely agreed.

"Don't call me that," Korea deadpanned. "And tell him to meet me at the military complex at fourteen hundred tomorrow. I need to pass on the decisions of the enlarged meeting of the Military Commission."

The Chinese women agreed. North Hamgyong, of course, didn't.

"How are our military decisions any of their business?" he demanded.

With an icy look, Korea said, "If I need to remind you, we are comrades-in-arms. And we are discussing the implementation of measures to combat this germ warfare. With the People's Volunteer Army stationed all over our country, they are going to have to work hand-in-hand with our People's Army, Anti-Epidemic Corps, and our populace. It is their business if we don't all want to die of-encephalitis."

Had there been... the slightest hesitation there? As it always did when Korea withheld information, it made Hwang uneasy.

His Countryhuman's expression gave nothing away as he ordered, "Now everyone back to sleep." After a moment he added, "And stay close to Pyongyang for the next few days. We want to limit travel as much as possible."

The provinces all nodded, the Chinese women included. They all likely assumed it was solely due to the risk of spreading germ warfare (alongside Hwang, South Pyongan had reluctantly shared with Korea that she, too, was developing a sympathetic fever), but Hwang knew Korea was also wary of Grace Hartman's actions being uncovered. If America knew an operative was compromised, she may be ordered to do something drastic. If she was in Pyongyang, staying here meant they were closer to her. But it also meant they were closer to him.

Korea didn't say goodnight. He just told Hwang to inform Kangwon of the leak's miniscule details after the meeting tomorrow, then turned away, striding down the hall, past his door.

"You should stay here tonight," North Pyongan called, sounding slightly alarmed.

"I have work to do."

It was past midnight. Work should have ended several hours ago, especially with a public appearance in a few hours. But Hwang knew that would never be the case with Korea.

"Big Brother said you could take the Jeep," Liaotung offered.

"No need." Korea pushed open the exit, and Hwang was almost certain he struggled more than usual before it clanged shut.

Liaotung muttered something that sounded suspiciously like 'prickly pear' before yelping again.

"I don't know why you bother," North Hamgyong grunted.

"Because China's ob-" Liaotung shot a glare at her sister, rubbing her arm.

Innocently, Liaoxi said, "When the hour grows late, you are not quite up to task. Forgive me, dear sister, but you've forgotten your..." She twirled a hand expectantly.

Liaotung didn't answer, suddenly yawning. "Yes, I'm tired," she agreed, turning for their door. "Let's get back to sleep."

Liaoxi followed her, touching hands with North Pyongan before slipping back into the room. South Pyongan smirked at her brother, joining them.

"Nation traitor," North Hamgyong muttered at the male Pyongan, not for the first time. He'd been quite displeased when Hwang had told him their cousin was courting the Chinese province.

Hwang had his own misgivings- if it became common knowledge to their people that one of their provinces was dallying with a foreign province, it could make them believe he was a nation traitor, or at the very least compromised. But he had informed North Pyongan of this and received the assurance that he wouldn't announce it to anyone, so that had to be satisfactory. At the very least, his cousin was discrete. The only reason Hwang knew was because Liaotung had asked him what he thought about the pairing.

North Pyongan, for his part, patiently said, "Comrade Liaoxi is a friend that's fighting for our country, not an enemy. And I bother trying with Korea because I care."

"You sound like South Hamgyong," North Hamgyong sneered, a scathing insult from him. "And a nation traitor."

North Pyongan sighed. "Goodnight, cousin." He and Chagang disappeared into their room, leaving Hwang and North Hamgyong.

Hwang went to follow, but was stopped by the other man's voice.

"Who was it?"

Tensing, he looked over his shoulder. "Elaborate."

North Hamgyong was illuminated by the glow of the flashlight clipped to his belt. The man crossed his broad arms. "The agent that got us that shit was someone we knew, right? You've been moping around for a couple days now. That means they're dead. Who was it?"

Always humbling to be reminded that there was a good possibility he was less emotionally observant than North Hamgyong of all people. Though his cousin mostly seemed to use it to target a man- or South Hamgyong- when they were weakest.

"Classified," Hwang clipped.

North Hamgyong rolled his eyes. "If the Yanks take Chongjin and give the Southern bastard the chance to Command shit out of me, we're already done for. A dead op's identity won't matter."

"Not necessarily true," Hwang sniffed. "We made a comeback before, we could easily do it again."

Perhaps not 'easily.' But it did no good to say that out loud.

His cousin's eyes flashed as he opened his mouth, then grit his teeth. "Who was it? I'm not going to snitch on you to Korea."

Hwang deliberated. He supposed it really was only Grace Hartman's involvement that mattered.

He sighed. "You won't even recognize the name."

"Don't tell me what I won't recognize."

"Choi Jung-nam."

His cousin crossed his arms again.

"I told you." Even though Hwang knew for a fact that North Hamgyong had been told the names of both he and his wife, both when speaking of his life pre-Korea, and when they would retrieve information from them. He could remember the man referring to Suzuki Yoshi by a slur.

"He was my student," Hwang reminded him, feeling a pang. 'Was' suddenly seemed to no longer be neutral past tense, but to carry a decidedly negative slant. "One of those that helped us during the Occupation."

"Right," North Hamgyong grunted. "The one that married the Jap."

Negative reinforcement didn't work on him, so Hwang simply nodded. "Yes."

And how would Suzuki Yoshi feel when she heard her husband was dead? Who would tell her? A Soviet who knew neither of them? One of their own agents? Or would Korea not want to pass that information on for security reasons, and leave her fretting in the Soviet Union until the war was over, never even knowing that Choi Jung-nam would never be coming home? Did she even know he'd come here with the intention of being a spy?

She would have known. She'd always been a smart woman. Hwang had known it from the moment he caught her creating an expert distraction to steal the textbook she wanted. Even if they refused to tell her why she and her family were being uprooted, she would know.

But she wouldn't know the part Hwang had played in it. Not until he had to be the one to tell her.

Dread filled his stomach at the thought.

North Hamgyong was shaking his head.

"Care to put a voice to your disapproval?" Hwang asked, knowing he would do it anyway.

"Yeah. You should've known this would happen."

Hwang flinched at the words, though he knew they likely weren't the accusation he heard them as.

"And just what is that supposed to mean?"

"It means even though you're supposed to be the smart one, you still go and get attached."

Hwang blinked at that, slightly baffled. "To our people? Yes. We're Provincehumans. That's what we're supposed to do."

So many hadn't and didn't see that. But the provinces of the People's Korea's had to be different.

North Hamgyong curled his lip in disdain. "Yeah, but you make it personal. You and her-" He flung his hand at the door. "And the others. Even Korea can't meet a fucking invalid without asking for their damn name."

"Don't you know Kim Mae-jon's name?" Hwang arched a brow as he used the name of the woman his cousin had been providing rations to.

"Against my will," he growled back. "And I don't know the names of her brats. You know why? Because they're probably going to fucking die."

"Everyone dies someday," Hwang said, pushing his glasses up. "Most Countryhumans and every human."

"Exactly," North Hamgyong snapped. "You don't have to make friends with them before they do. Do you think you'd be so fucking depressed right now if all that man was to you was just some guy that helped us out?"

"Do you think I want to talk about this right now?!" Hwang burst out, unable to help himself. "I'm already worrying over my sister, and I just told you I lost someone that you correctly identified as a friend. Do you think it helps to hear he was going to die anyways?"

"It would help if you stopped cozying up to people!" North Hamgyong snapped back.

"My personal proximity to them has nothing to do with my grief," Hwang refuted. "They are our people. Even if someone whose name I don't know, whom I've never met, loses their life, it grieves me."

He had to edit their magazines, their casualty counts from the latest air raids, the obituaries and memorials to the sheer loss of life the Americans were causing. And every number stabbed like a sharpened quill. Hwang didn't need to know them to feel their loss.

North Hamgyong growled, "But it would 'grieve' you less."

"I don't want it to grieve me less."

If anything, he wanted it to grieve him more.

The door to their room opened slightly, and North Pyongan stepped into the hall. Hwang jumped back, and North Hamgyong looked away as if it could remove him from the conversation.

"I can hear you in the room," their cousin said politely, keeping his voice low.

Hwang blinked, alarmed and embarrassed. "Specifics?"

"Only when you raised your voices."

He eased. That meant they hadn't heard him say Choi Jung-nam had been working for them. It wasn't serious, but Korea was on edge... 'Lately' implied 'recently,' and that wasn't entirely true. Korea had been on edge for awhile now, and he'd rather not have a repeat of the New Year's Eve ration incident focused on him alone.

North Pyongan looked at their broader cousin. "North Hamgyong, you-"

"I don't want to hear any Jesus shit," he interrupted.

The cobalt-skinned man sighed. "I was just going to say that you can't avoid getting close to our people just because you are afraid to lose them. We owe it to them to share their lives, their bitters and their sweets. We cannot guide them properly if we don't."

"Who said I want to be a guide?"

"You don't have a choice," North Pyongan said softly. "We were put on this path the moment we were formed as Provincehumans. We can either lead or follow."

His fist rose to his heart as he gazed at them both solemnly. "And we can't afford to follow."

Hwang would have put it slightly less mystically, but he nodded. "If you remain distant from our people, they'll sense it. It could easily turn your province into a base for counter-revolutionary activity."

"My people wouldn't turn against the damn revolution just because I don't go to their kids' fucking doljanchi," North Hamgyong said, and Hwang was glad to hear he sounded defensive. At least he had some affection for the people of his province.

"No, but they'll have less reason to follow your example, and less personal drive to be patriotic if their Provincehuman refuses to intermingle with them," Hwang pointed out.

"You could lose us, too." There was a flicker in North Pyongan's white eyes at the thought. "We are only conditionally immortal. Do you think it's better to remain distant from us?"

North Hamgyong's shoulders hunched to his ear slits as he turned his head, not even permitting them to read his facial expressions.

Hwang exchanged a look with North Pyongan. His cousin gazed back sorrowfully.

"Whatever," North Hamgyong muttered. "I'm fucking beat. I don't want to stand here and get nagged."

He barged past them, but North Pyongan caught the sleeve of his undershirt.

"Cousin," he said gently. "Grief is part of life. It's impossible to avoid. Try to make it worthwhile."

'Worthwhile...'

Hwang thought of those after-school classes hiding in supply closets with Choe Jung-nam, excitedly discussing Liberation and the Occupation in hushed whispers, and later huddling around the table in that abandoned hut with Suzuki Yoshi, laughing and chatting as they read banned books and the pieces of their old country that the province had managed to save. He thought of his smile as he told him about his family.

It had all certainly been worthwhile.

"You'll live a lonely life if you refuse to get close with our people," North Pyongan told him.

"And if you keep pushing away those you're already close with," Hwang sniffed.

North Hamgyong tugged his arm free, marching over to his cot at the back without another word.

Hwang exhaled, trading another glance with North Pyongan.

"Don't make fucking faces about me," their cousin's voice said from the dark.

The two stepped into the room, North Pyongan using his light to help Hwang navigate. His bunk was to the right of the door, at the bottom (the top filled with books he'd recovered from the wreckage of their cities; he was still in mourning over his collection).

As he climbed in, still fully dressed (sans his glasses) to ward off the chill, he asked, "Chagang, do you have any input?"

The man was a light sleeper, and he didn't like to leave him out of the conversation. And perhaps part of him pettily wanted to rub their words in to his recalcitrant cousin as revenge.

Chagang was silent long enough for him to think he was mistaken in assuming he was awake, before he said from the bunk across from his, "I don't like grief."

"Aren't you fucking special?" North Hamgyong grumbled.

"But it's part of love."

"How oddly poignant of you," Hwang remarked, before wincing as he realized how callous that came off. "Apologies, I didn't mean to imply-"

Chagang cut him off with a, "It's fine," sounding as unbothered as always.

He could hear North Hamgyong turning over in his cot, wrapping his thin pillow over his head to shut them out. Hwang sighed, bidding the others goodnight as he snuggled down in his bedroll, pulling it over the top of his ushanka to seal his body heat in.

'Grief is part of love.' It was a touching sentiment. If it came to being emotionless or filled with grief for those he'd lost, Hwang would always choose the latter. He didn't want to be some clinical, unfeeling caricature of an intellectual, and never had.

Still, he couldn't help but half agree with North Hamgyong's feelings. Not so much what he had voiced out loud, but that more subtle desire.

Wouldn't it be nice if the pain never had to come?

He struggled to let the sorrow keep him up, but even that primal force wasn't enough to prevent his eyelids from closing.

And as he drifted off, he wondered if Suzuki Yoshi would feel that the grief that would soon hit her was an acceptable price to pay for the years of love.

—

Kangwon slid into Hae's room, finding his brother on a palette on the floor, his head pillowed on his arms.

He moved quietly, checking his cousin's condition, filling with relief as he felt her heart beating under her sharp ribcage, as it had been since late January. She still wasn't stirring from her recuperative coma, but her pulse was steady. She'd recover, hopefully before Korea or anyone else realized he was lying.

Gently, he placed a small, white-wrappered milk candy on the bedside table. China had given it to him for when 'the Little Tiger wakes,' along with a knowing smile in the face of Kangwon playing dumb, and an assurance that 'his secret' was safe with him.

Hoping that was true, the province adjusted the sheets around his cousin, then sat on the edge of the bed, pulling the telegraph paper from his pocket to read it by the light of his flashlight. His russet palm cupped over the beam painted the room an ominous red colour, dyeing the paper and the words on it the colour of old blood.

Kangwon resisted the urge to bite his nails as he smoothed the strip over his thigh, rereading the words, almost hoping they'd say something different than every other time he'd read them, so that he wouldn't have to let their cousins and their Military Commission in on what he, Korea, and Gangwon had known for almost a week.

But the message was unchanged.

The flies and other insects that'd been recovered from the parts of Chorweon County they still held had been difficult to test. They hadn't been able to detect anything in the mites, and most of the flies had been too damaged by the cold to get any conclusive proof of contamination.

But their bacteriologists had been able to see the masses of bacteria in the guts of the fleas, and isolate it, enough to determine what it was- Pasteurella pestis. The same bacteria that spread the diseases responsible for the pandemic that had led to the deaths of seventy-five million or more people worldwide in just seven years back in the 1300s.

Plague bacteria.

For the 'Hwang and Choi Jung-nam never referred to Grace as she in their conversation,' I did use she and her, but that's because using they or just 'the source' felt too impersonal for the emotionality of the conversation. So written in English she and her were used, but in the Korean they were talking in, they wouldn't have been because the pronouns would have been implied.

Pasteurella pestis is now called Yersinia pestis. Keep this in mind for a future document I'll link. Yersinia would also be a beautiful name for a girl. Me and my lovely daughters Pasteurella and Yersinia. Ultimate kirakira names?

I wrote this before the consumption, so hopefully it's coherent. I am viewing this as learning experience for future chapters. Everything hurts. The 4D shapes are inside if my skull. But I made very good pie and I am healing.

Placing The Blame

Hwang left the underground assembly hall with his mind awhirl.

The enlarged meeting of the Military Commission had been successful in discussing measures for anti-epidemic work. More observation posts were to be arranged in every army unit, workplace, residential area, and periodically along the highways, not just for planes now, but for what they delivered. The contaminated drops had to be identified and reported to the local Epidemic Prevention committees, then to the State Extraordinary Epidemic Prevention Committee and the Medical Bureau as swiftly as possible. Communications was to give all news of this sort ultimate priority, and all organizations were being rallied to the fight, from the Ministry of the Interior to the Ministry of Railways.

As part of the Ministry of Culture and Information, Hwang had been charged with the task of helping conduct information work about the germ warfare by the Premier himself, making sure every soldier and civilian knew the proper hygiene protocols and how to dispose of any biological materials.

But the influx of work that had to be carried out to make certain their material conditions were suited to combat an epidemic wasn't what had rattled him.

"It really is the plague?"

Kangwon looked around instinctively as they passed through the manufacturing district to reach the military hospital before saying, "Yeah. Sorry I couldn't tell you all before. You know how it is."

'How it was' was Korea, obviously.

"Of course," Hwang agreed, though the obfuscation made him uneasy for an entirely different reason. "But you're sure it's the plague?"

"Do you think Korea would've let me tell the Military Commission- and the Premier- if we weren't sure?"

"Fair point," Hwang conceded.

The plague. The 'Black Death' as the pandemic that had obliterated over half of Europe's population had been called. He couldn't believe he'd been worried about encephalitis just a few days ago.

The bricks that had once made up the kilns in the kilning district had been stacked neatly where the building once stood, surrounding a pile of unsalvageable rubble. A few militia members were on watch around them, guarding the resources that hadn't been taken for other projects yet, clustered around a charcoal-burning stove. They called out in greeting, and Kangwon waved back.

Hwang waited until they were some distance away before asking, "And there isn't any chance of the bacteria being natural?"

He'd never heard of any naturally-occurring cases in their country before, even during the Manchurian Plague of 1910 and 1911. And those that had emerged during the second plague in the early 1920s had came from Chinese labourers, and been rapidly contained. But Kangwon was the medical expert, not him. Though he was certainly going to be reading as many textbooks as he could get his hands on for the foreseeable future.

His cousin shook his head. "It doesn't originate here. It usually doesn't appear outside its endemic zones much at all. If it does, well."

'Well,' indeed. It wouldn't solely be Korea's problem then.

"Anyway, the closest zone for the bubonic plague is in Manchuria, over a thousand ri away," Kangwon continued as they approached the hospital. "And China says he hasn't had any cases."

"Unlikely fleas could carry the disease all the way here without infecting anyone in China," Hwang mused.

Or in their own provinces, as the fleas that had carried the bacteria were found down in Kangwon's province.

"Yeah, and they're human fleas, not rat fleas, which are the ones that usually carry the plague. Plus they were found in the wilds outside villages, when they shouldn't go where there aren't any people." Kangwon stopped outside the hospital door so they could finish their conversation. His lips were pressed flat. "So definitely not natural."

"Definitely not," Hwang agreed heavily.

He supposed having that confirmation was good for his information work. It was one more thing with which to convince the American POWs they were on the wrong side.

Yet a natural outbreak would be easier to fight than one with deliberate intent.

Kangwon let out a deep breath, then shook his head. "We'll handle it. Korea's already importing supplies for more vaccines, and rat poison and stuff. It won't become a full-blown epidemic."

There he was again with that reassurance, though there was really no way to know if it was true.

"Come on. You have to tell me about that thing."

Putting aside his misgivings, Hwang followed Kangwon into the hospital, going through the disinfection process, and sliding on a white lab coat, gloves, and face mask on over his uniform. Though the military hospital didn't house the sick, injury could compromise the patients' immune systems, so the utmost care had to be taken.

Kangwon led him though the cheery teal and white halls. As they passed the room he and his brother had used to use, Hwang noted a nurse going in with a bottle of antiseptic.

"Do you not sleep here anymore?" he asked.

"I don't really sleep anymore." His cousin chuckled a tinch too tiredly. At Hwang's concerned look, he said, "I'm joking. I've just been out in the field a lot lately, and when I'm here, I'm running between this hospital, City Hospital One, the Quarantine Hospital, and all the clinics. Gangwon was the one that needed the privacy of the room, so I just sleep in a cot in the break room now. Or in Hae's room when I'm over that way."

Kangwon's cheek dimpled as he sucked on the inside of it. "We're going to need all the room we have."

The statement was grim, but Hwang had latched onto the sentence before it.

"How is Hae?" he asked in a way he hoped was casual.

"She's good," his cousin answered. "Gangwon's taking care of her. She says 'hi' again. Well, 'howdy.'"

Hwang examined his face from the corner of his eye. His cousin turned his head, raising an eyebrow.

He looked away. "Tell her I say it back."

The hospital hallway wasn't the sort of place to discuss that. And he had to prioritize information about the leak.

The break room was empty, allowing them to use its privacy. Kangwon pulled the striped curtain over the window, leaving the yellow overhead bulb as their only light as they sat on the spare cot.

Hwang wasted no time in explaining what details had been provided about the leak. He spoke more slowly than usual, monitoring his tongue so it wouldn't slip up and mention Choi Jung-nam or Grace Hartman.

And still he was finished too soon.

Kangwon's brows furrowed as he considered his words. "Agent Maine..."

"It's an American state," Hwang provided. "It's located in the northeast, next to the Canadian border."

"Hm." His cousin shook his head. "I'll keep an eye out. And tell Gangwon and Hae's bodyguards to be extra careful. If she was ordered to get proof, she could be a nurse."

Hwang had considered that. "I don't think so. At least not at this hospital. Otherwise I feel as if she would've already been able to obtain it."

"Yeah, I guess that makes sense."

By the line still marring his brow, something still appeared to be bothering him.

But before Hwang could ask, his cousin shook his shoulders out, and beat him to it.

"Are you feeling okay? Emotionally, not healthwise. I know you've got that sympathetic fever."

Taken aback, Hwang said, "Why do you ask?"

Kangwon shrugged. "You're usually excited when you get to tell people stuff. But you were a little low energy there." The corners of his lips turned down. "Did we lose someone else?"

The province hesitated, then admitted, "Yes."

His cousin exhaled. "Who?"

Hwang's heart squeezed. "I can't say. It's classified."

Kangwon wasn't North Hamgyong, so he didn't force the matter, just nodded. "Tell me when the war's over. We'll drink to them."

They were going to need all the alcohol in Korea if they were going to drink to everyone they'd lost.

Hwang looked down at his lap. "Kangwon may I ask- how long is it appropriate to feel grief for?" Realizing the question made him sound slightly like he had no idea how to act human, he quickly clarified, "I mean I'm well aware that it varies by person and cause, and grief never truly fades, just gets easier to bear, I only..."

He twiddled his thumbs together. "It's been four days since they died. Is it... callous of me to already be recovering emotionally?"

He didn't want to be. He didn't want to get excited at the idea of sleuthing out who the leak was, or the assignments he was creating for some of the elementary school students, or the anti-epidemic information work he was going to get to create. When his mind started racing off down an avenue of thought, it felt like a betrayal to Choi Jung-nam.

"You've always recovered quick," Kangwon pointed out.

Hwang winced. "I'm aware."

Choi Jung-nam wasn't the first comrade whose death had impacted him. It was perhaps the most severe by virtue of who he'd been to him, but it wasn't the only severe loss. He tended to overcome the sorrow quickly. From the war against Japan to the nation-building to this war, there was simply never any time to be consumed with grief.

But with how deeply he'd cared for Choi Jung-nam, it felt like this time should be different. The fact that it wasn't made him worry.

"Is that normal?" he asked. "Or at least within the range of normality? Or does it make me... clinical?"

He had a feeling his sister would be upset if she knew how long her use of that word had stuck with him. But it had lodged under his skin like a splinter.

'Or a needle.'

"Hae bounces back from things fast, too," Kangwon said, leaning back on his palms. "Honestly, sometimes she does it faster than you."

"But she doesn't truly bounce back," Hwang returned. "She only pretends to."

As with Sincheon, both the initial event, and their visit there months ago. A mere day later and she had been her usual bubbly self, according to SH.

But he knew it had stayed with her. Every time they left Haeju together, she insisted they visit the town, even if only to stare up at the board of missing persons posters for a long minute. She was always more subdued than usual when she got back in their vehicle.

"But she's pretending to herself, too," Kangwon said. "You're both just good at compartmentalizing."

Hwang downcast his eyes. "That word does sound a bit clinical."

"If you're clinical, then I am, too," his cousin replied. "Every doctor needs to be good at compartmentalization. Do you think I'd be able to remove a bullet from someone if I was thinking about all the ways I could screw up, or everything else going on right now? I had to practice that. You're lucky it comes naturally."

He didn't feel lucky.

He didn't voice the thought, but Kangwon read it in the dip of his brows, and nudged his shoulder with his own.

"Trust me, cousin. You're not clinical. People just show sensitivity in different ways." He plucked at the lapel of his own coat. "I didn't cry when I got told Choe Bong-nam was martyred, even though we were friends."

His heavy-lidded eyes flickered slightly, but he carried on. "That doesn't mean I'm callous or anything. I'm just not a crier. And you're just not someone who gets hung up on stuff. That's fine."

It was true that he'd never seen Kangwon cry. And he'd certainly never viewed him as anything less than compassionate. The thought mollified Hwang slightly.

"So it isn't a betrayal to... those we've lost to move on so quickly?" he tentatively asked.

Kangwon shook his head. "You're not moving on. You'll still be upset, right?"

"Yes," Hwang said quietly.

He didn't think he ever wouldn't be. He knew in the future as they rebuilt their country, every time he looked at a highway or building, he would think that Choi Jung-nam could have had a hand in engineering it, if only he had lived.

"There you go," the other man said. "You're not moving on. Just moving forward. And that's good. Denying your grief isn't good for you, but neither's wallowing in it. That's what makes certain people we know so miserable sometimes."

It was clear who he meant. For once it wasn't Korea.

Kangwon placed a hand on his shoulder, giving him a warm smile. "None of us think you're a cold person, Hwang. Handle your grief at your own pace, no matter how fast or slow that is. Don't cling to it just because you feel like you should."

Hwang let out a steady exhale, then nodded. "I won't."

He knew Choi Jung-nam wouldn't have approved of him letting his grief over his death distract him. Wanting to remain in that initial stage of overwhelming emotional pain was simply him being selfish, wanting to assure himself he cared using someone else's metric.

He knew he had cared about his former student. He knew he always would. That was enough.

Hwang cleared his throat, looking away. He was open-minded, but it really was embarrassing for a man to cry as much as he had since the war began, if only because he could hear North Hamgyong mocking him for it in his head.

"Thank you," he said when he trusted his voice to be steady. "And I'm sorry for bothering you with something so silly when I'm fully aware of how busy you are."

Sitting this close to his cousin, he could make out the dark purple shadows marring the green magnolia petals under his eyes even clearer.

"I asked," Kangwon reminded him. "And it's my job. You actually coming to me with your problems makes it easier. Please keep it up."

Hwang chuckled, though he privately resolved to only do so after the war, or if it was very urgent. No matter how skilled Kangwon was at compartmentalizing, he didn't wish to add any further weight to the burden of his anti-epidemic responsibility.

"Was there something bothering you, by the way?" he asked. "You looked slightly distracted after I told you about the leak."

"It's nothing. Just thinking about something."

The reflexive reassurance finally allowed Hwang to gather his resolve. He felt slightly guilty at lodging what was essentially an accusation after his cousin had just comforted him the way he had, but he knew with the efforts against the germ warfare increasing, there was a good chance he wouldn't see him alone in a nonprofessional setting for some time.

Adjusting his glasses, he ventured, "I was talking to North Hamgyong a few days ago."

"Always fun," Kangwon replied dryly.

"Quite. He said something that sort of... alarmed me."

Pulling a leg up onto the cot, his cousin waited expectantly.

Hwang cleared his dry throat. "He heavily implied- or more outright said- that Hae, well..."

It was foolish superstition to not want to say the word out loud, so he forced himself to.

"Died."

Kangwon's eyebrows went up slightly. "He really said that?"

"Yes." Hwang licked his lips nervously. "He said she died of her illness, and that you've been covering it up to avoid worrying Korea. And us as well, I assume. Is that... That couldn't be true?"

He wrung his hands as he anxiously waited for an answer.

It came immediately as Kangwon shook his head.

"No," he denied, as relaxed as before. "Hae's fine."

His expression wasn't ridden with guilt or alarm. As he gazed back at him, it was as easy-going as ever. Hwang searched it using his proficiency in their silent language.

And found nothing.

"Of course," he said. "I was certain he was only attempting to upset me. I only asked because I remember reading that cholera only lasts for a few days."

"Yeah," Kangwon agreed, not seeming uncomfortable at being called out. "But don't tell Hae that."

His meaning clicked in Hwang's brain. "Ah."

He nodded. "She's over the cholera, but she's still weak from the fluid loss. Between the burns and all the waste she was expelling, on top of her malnourishment, it was pretty severe. She's not contagious anymore, but if I let her out of the Quarantine Hospital, she's going to want to get back to work, especially with sowing season coming up."

Of course. At the meeting of the Party Central Committee's Political Committee preparations had been discussed, Korea and the Chairman reinforcing that localities needed to produce their own fertilizer to make up for the destruction of their factories (he had been able to hear SH's teeth grinding, not that he was judging), draught animal and implement-sharing had to be organized amongst the peasants, seed grain stores needed to be assessed so that the State could make up for shortages where necessary, and a large-scale stock farm was to be built near Paektusan to attempt to make up for their meat shortage, amongst a host of other issues. Special attention needed to be paid to Ongjin County and South Yonbaek County, which were still newly under their jurisdiction. Soldiers were to be sent to aid the peasants there specifically in order to demonstrate the character of the People's Army to those who had formerly only known Rhee's cut-throats and high-taxers.

Hwang knew that if his sister had been there she would have been vibrating with excitement at the work to do, and would want to launch herself into it immediately, no matter her condition, following Korea's example.

"Sorry," Kangwon apologized. "I'd planned from the start to keep her longer to get some weight back on her, but I didn't want Korea getting antsy about her returning to work. I should've told you."

Hwang searched him again, digging deep for some sign that he wasn't telling the truth.

But the only thing he found was an apologetic tilt to his brows.

"No, no, it's alright," he assured him, almost physically slumping as a weight lifted from his shoulders. "I understand. And it isn't as if you lied- you said she was recovering, and she is."

"Yeah," Kangwon said easily. "She is."

Hwang let out a relieved breath. "Do you think you could have her write me a letter the next time you see her? It's not that I don't believe you-" he tried to explain, but Kangwon cut him off.

"No, I get it. I'll get her to write one. It might be awhile, though. I'm going to be busy for the next..." He trailed off. "Well, you were at the meeting."

Hwang bobbed his head. "Don't go out of your way. Your work is more important than assuaging my fears."

It was enough to hear she really was well.

"Maybe," Kangwon admitted. "But that's important, too. It would be hard for you to focus on work if you're worrying about Hae."

Hwang laughed sheepishly. "I'm not that skilled at compartmentalizing." He sighed, leaning back on the cot. "I'm sorry about that. You know how North Hamgyong can get under your skin."

"I've definitely heard about it," Kangwon agreed.

"Honestly, you think he'd have more empathy about me fearing for my sister's condition after what happened to South Hamgyong during the tactical retreat."

SH had been in unknown condition in enemy captivity after suffering a wound at his own hands. He should know how it felt. (Hwang could also add that he had been nothing but empathetic to him after he'd been told, though it had gone unappreciated.)

"I hate to say it," Kangwon said. "But that's probably why he was lashing out." He rubbed a hand over his eyes. "I'll try to talk to him again."

"Only if you need to raise your blood pressure," Hwang muttered. "I swear he's-"

Kangwon suddenly sat bolt upright, his eyes wide.

Hwang jumped up instinctively, his hand going for his pistol and his eyes darting to the window, expecting to spot someone peering in the crack visible last the curtain, but seeing nothing.

"What is it?" he asked tensely.

"The tactical retreat." Kangwon's voice carried an excitement it didn't normally as he snapped his fingers. "When we were in the holding camp. That's what I was thinking of."

He stood, rocking on the balls of his feet as he spoke without his usual lackadaisical tempo. "There was this American nurse named Marianne, and she was from Maine."

Hwang raised a brow skeptically, certain he wasn't suggesting she was the leak. An American woman wouldn't exactly be subtle.

"And you were trying to recall that?"

Kangwon nodded vigorously. "Maybe this is a little bit of a long shot, but I heard her in Pyongan dialect, from around the coast."

Hwang perked up at that, feeling a trickle of his own excitement. "You're suggesting-?"

"The leak seems to pass on info pretty quick with how North and South Pyongan got ambushed that one night," Kangwon rushed, eyes gleaming. "If she's got a radio, America's probably heard her voice before."

Hwang picked up the thought. "And he would hear her Pyongan accent as from-"

"Maine," they both finished.

Hwang tried not to let himself get to excited at the revelation, aware that it was made of conjecture. But it was hard not to be.

"Can you pin the location down any further?" he urged. "Or simply the coast?"

Pyongan dialect was spoken from South Pyongan to North Pyongan to Chagang. If Kangwon had simply said Maine dialect sounded like Pyongan dialect, it wouldn't have made his mind race like this- of course someone in Pyongyang spoke Pyongan dialect.

But like most dialects, Pyongan dialect wasn't uniform. It varied with terrain, isolation, and proximity to other provinces and China. 'Coastal' was already a great help.

Kangwon thought for a moment. "I'd say it was more Northern Pyongan. You know how the farther that way you go, the rounder their vowels get, and they kind of start overpronouncing things? Don't tell South Pyongan I said that."

Hwang nodded so fast the room blurred. "They become more adverse to the 'w' sound in our vowels that contain it, and don't palatalize sounds as much. Kangwon! I think you might have narrowed the search!"

As the capital, Pyongyang was filled with people from across Korea. But moving cross-country still wasn't exactly feasible for or desired by most Koreans. Most of those that moved were either Party officials or specialists being sent out to rural locales, or specialists being called into the city. In which case they should have records.

A woman in Pyongyang who had been raised somewhere near coastal North Pyongan long enough to have developed the dialect. It wasn't exactly enough to give them an exact target, but any parameters that helped drain the pool of suspects helped.

His cousin laughed in relief. "Maybe Korea'll forgive me for letting myself get captured now."

"Doubtful!"

He sighed. "Yeah."

Hwang started to pace excitedly. "I wonder why our northwestern dialect is similar to the American northeastern one? What do you think affects that? I've heard the Shanghai dialect- of Mandarin, not Shanghaiese- also comes across as Pyongan dialect. What determines that? You know, studies have never really been conducted on-"

"Hwang." Kangwon firmly seized his shoulders. "Go find Korea and tell him."

Hwang snapped to attention. "Right!"

He darted for the door, then darted back, grabbing his cousin's hands.

"Kangwon," he said seriously, squeezing hard. "Thank you."

He couldn't tell him why this meant so much to him, but he didn't have to.

Kangwon smiled, and Hwang sprinted off to find Korea to share the good news.

Hae really was okay.

And they were closer to making Choe Jung-nam's death worth it.

—

Kangwon sighed as the door slid shut behind Hwang, slumping back onto the cot to stare up at the white plaster ceiling, his glow of excitement at being able to help out with the leak fading.

Yeah, he was going to have to get down on his knees and beg for Hwang's forgiveness after Hae was better.

He knew his cousin might want to keep her death a secret permanently, but he didn't see it happening. She'd end up telling someone, and that someone would probably be Korea.

And then he was going to have to slam his forehead on the ground until he got blood on Hwang's shoes.

Kangwon rubbed a hand over his eyes, trying to wipe the blear from them, but just making the room even blurrier.

He didn't want to lie to his cousin's face. But he'd already came this far, and Hae really was recovering. A couple more weeks and she'd be awake and as healthy as any of them could be right now. And it wasn't just her not wanting to worry Korea that was driving him. He didn't want to worry him either, or Hwang or any of the others. Not with all this going on.

Hwang wasn't light-mouthed, but he was right about not being good enough at compartmentalization to completely shove aside his worries about Hae. He couldn't be distracted from his information work. With their severe lack of supplies, the best way to save lives was for everyone to avoid getting sick in the first place. And to do that, the masses needed to know as much as possible about the germ warfare and how to combat it.

At least their material conditions would be slightly better after today's meeting. The State was producing and buying as much disinfectant, rat poison, and insecticides as they could for distribution, the Engineering Corps would be working on tunnels for more labs, and the Food Administration Bureau was going to be devoting even more resources for segregated patients.

They had to hurry with the vaccines, not just for refreshers for the common ones, like cholera and typhus, but the plague. Like Kangwon had said, cases didn't originate in Korea, and there hadn't been any reported in years, so it hadn't exactly been a high priority vaccination before. Now that it was, they needed to get everyone inoculated as soon as possible.

Especially when another mass of flies had been dropped on Balnam-ri in South Pyongan's province just a couple days ago.

Kangwon wanted to rub his eyes again, but he felt like his arms were sinking into the flimsy material of the army cot, too heavy to lift. He vaguely wondered why it was so dark, then realized he'd shut his eyes at some point.

Twitching, he forced himself up, briskly shaking his head to get rid of the muzzy fever feeling in it. It was only the sympathetic type, so he couldn't let it distract him.

Putting his face mask back on, he stretched to limber himself back up, then slipped back into the hall.

First he had to find Kim Yong-hwan and pass on the list of symptoms for the nurses here to watch out for, and the protocols to follow if they were found, then he had to go to the Quarantine Hospital and fill Gangwon in on the Military Commission meeting, and grab his hazmat suit, then head for Balnam-ri with Korea.

He wondered if he should invite South Pyongan since it was her own province, then decided against it. His cousin was... more than a bit paranoid about the possibility of getting sick. Korea had had him give the others a check-up before the meeting, and she'd refused to take her face mask off near him, or for the entire thing, even leaning away from the comrades that sat next to her.

'Mm, there's another thing to do.' He'd grab her some surgical gloves. It might make her feel a little better.

He took a pair from one of the supply boxes, walking through the halls until he heard Kim Yong-hwan's slightly exasperated voice from up ahead, around a corner he knew led to a dead end.

"I'm fine."

"I'm just worried about you," An Il-rae replied with concern.

"I know. You worry too much."

"That makes one of us."

Kim Yong-hwan sighed, her voice softening slightly. "I'm sorry."

Kangwon raised his brows, smirking at the rare words from her.

"I'm just tired," the nurse said. "And stressed. That's all it is. And it's not going to go away until this damn war is won and these Yanks are off our land. So don't stress yourself over it."

An Il-rae was silent for a moment. "You'll tell me if you get sick? You promise?"

"Yes."

"Because I can't lose anyone else, Yong-hwan." Her voice quivered with tears. "Especially not you. I can't."

"You won't. I promise, Il-rae."

There was a deep tenderness under the woman's usual steely tone.

Kangwon crept back down the hall until he reached the far corner, giving them enough time to finish up, then turned and walked back, making sure his footsteps echoed on the cement floor.

The two women came around to meet him, and he got why An Il-rae had been worried. Kim Yong-hwan's dark shadows were heavier than ever above her mask, and the depth of her eye wrinkles made them look twenty years older than the rest of her face. For the first time, he realized he could see glints of silver in the bobbed black hair held back by her white headscarf, even though the New Year had just turned her forty-six.

But at least her voice still sounded hale as she said, "Comrade Kangwon. Where's that no good Countryhuman of yours gotten to?"

An Il-rae stood on her tiptoes to whisper into her ear, "Comrade Kim, he's our Countryhuman, too."

The other woman snorted. "Not when he's been avoiding my cleaning, he's not."

Not acknowledging Kim Yong-hwan's exhaustion or how An Il-rae's eyes were still slightly red, Kangwon said, "Sorry to say, but I haven't gotten to do it either."

Even though he and Korea had been spending so much time together investigating. Every time he'd asked, he was turned down. And he couldn't try begging when there were scientists with them. He'd die of shame if anyone else ever walked in on that.

"Colour me shocked," Kim Yong-hwan said dryly. "A damn epidemic and he still won't take care of himself. Tell me when he gets a fever so I can send him a letter that says 'I told you so.'"

"Yong- Comrade Kim, you can't say that," An Il-rae hissed in alarm as Kangwon handed the woman his list.

Kim Yong-hwan sobered slightly. "I didn't mean with the plague. I'm talking about exhaustion."

"I know, but he might still be here." Her 'friend' looked down the hallway both ways with brown eyes.

"Korea was here?" Kangwon asked, confused.

Weird that he'd send Hwang with him to talk to him about the leak when he was coming here anyway. But maybe he'd just wanted to dodge another attempt at cleaning his wounds.

"Yes," An Il-rae replied. "He was asking about diseases."

'Oh no.' There shouldn't be any reason to ask anyone but him about disease.

"You didn't tell me that," Kim Yong-hwan said sharply, jerking her head to her.

The brown-haired woman blinked in confusion. "He asked you, too, didn't he?"

"Yes, and I said I'm a war nurse that doesn't know the next thing about diseases. Which is what I hope you said."

An Il-rae bit her lip. "I mean, I know a little about diseases. Our soldiers used to get dysentery all the time. And I've been reading up on them in case we need more hands on anti-epidemic work. Scarlet fever, yellow fever, typhus, the plagues, cholera."

"What ones did he ask you about?" Kangwon cut in, trying to sound casual.

"That one," she said. "Cholera. He just asked how long it lasts for, and I told him it's usually between a few days to a week or two."

Kangwon's heart sank.

Her eyes flicked between the two of them, and she suddenly looked nervous. "That's right, isn't it? I read it in a textbook."

"Yes," Kim Yong-hwan said grimly. "It's right."

She shouldn't know anything about Hae's condition, but unlike An Il-rae, she knew enough about Kangwon and Korea to lie to the latter instinctively. She cut her eyes to the province, who trapped his fingers in his palms.

"I've got to go," he said calmly. "Work hard, comrades."

He turned and quickly left while Kim Yong-hwan assured An Il-rae she hadn't done anything wrong.

Kangwon met his guards at the entrance, and immediately started for the Quarantine Hospital, really hoping he'd run into Korea on the road in time to feed him the same story he'd fed Hwang.

But he didn't, and when he reached the semi-dug-out hospital, the Jeep was parked nearby, not even covered by a tarp.

The province left his guards, darting inside, every minute of decontamination protocols making it harder to resist shoving his fingers in his mouth. As soon as he was free, he jogged down the hall for Hae's room, nestled safely towards the heart of the aboveground portion.

'Don't be there, please don't be there.'

But when he made it around the last corner and saw Gangwon loitering nervously outside the door, he knew his time was up.

His brother made wide eyes, silently warning him. Kangwon winced, reaching for the door. Gangwon grabbed his sleeve before he could, furrowing his brows.

'Do you want me with you?'

Kangwon shook his head.

It was his fault. Korea's anger should be focused on him.

Gangwon hesitated, then his expression firmed, his grip on him tightening. 'I'm coming with you.'

At least he wouldn't be able to get any more deaf.

Kangwon blinked appreciatively, steeling himself before entering.

Korea was standing over Hae's unconscious body, a face mask crumpled in his hand, and his back to them. As Kangwon slid the door shut, his head slowly turned, the rest of him staying completely motionless. The look on his face made the province instinctively step in front of his brother.

"Comrade An Il-rae told me that cholera only takes a few days to recover from." His Countryhuman's voice was as scarily blank as his expression.

Staying calm, Kangwon said, "It can take up to two weeks. And patients can be contagious for longer."

Korea continued like he hadn't spoken. "It has been six weeks." His chin touched his shoulder, his head still the only part of him facing them as his eye narrowed. "So why is South Hwanghae still in here? And why isn't she waking up?

Kangwon opened his mouth, and he bared his fangs, his voice lowering to a growl as he finally faced them fully.

"If you lie to me again, it will not end well for you."

The province finally broke, looking away, unable to help the way he cringed. "Gangwon doesn't have anything to do with this, just me. I'm sorry. I didn't want to lie to you, I just-"

He saw Korea's eye flare and braced himself, shutting his mouth so he wouldn't bite his tongue as his Countryhuman slammed him back into the door, Gangwon diving out of the way with a yelp.

"For the last time- I don't need you to protect me!" he snarled in Kangwon's face, spraying him with spittle. "It is my job to protect you! So stop lying to me like I'm a fucking child that can't handle bad news!"

He heaved Kangwon forward and slammed him back again, rattling the door in its frame. Gangwon watched anxiously, his hands hovering like he wanted to stop him.

Kangwon shot him a subtle look, telling him not to. When Korea was worked up like this, touching him would only freak him out more.

"I warned you after you kept Kim Mi-ju's death a secret from me that if you ever did anything like that again, I wouldn't be able to trust you to treat our people," Korea growled, his fingers balled in his province's lapels. "Or me."

Alarmed, Kangwon forced past the fist pressed against his throat, "You can still trust me. Korea please, you need to let someone clean your wounds. If it's not Kim Yong-hwan, it has to be me."

"You should have thought about that before you neglected to tell me that South Hwanghae fucking died!"

"K-Korea!" Gangwon cut in from a safe distance away. "It's n-n-not Kangwon's f-fault! Hae's the one that didn't want to tell you."

Korea swung his head his way. Kangwon could've used his distraction to escape, but he stayed pressed up against the door, letting him keep his hold on his coat.

"Why would she do that?" he demanded, making Gangwon shrink back.

"Because she didn't want you worrying about her either," Kangwon said calmly. "And she didn't want you to be mad at me for losing her."

"And why shouldn't I be?" Korea spat, tightening his grip again. "You did lose her. She's dead because you couldn't save her!"

Kangwon flinched, heart cracking, all of the guilt he'd been feeling ever since he'd found Hae on the floor rushing out.

"Hey!" Gangwon cried disapprovingly. "Korea that's t-too far."

He came closer, and their Countryhuman twitched away, forced to release Kangwon so he could face them both, his hackles up.

"I kn-know there's no way Kangwon didn't do everything he could for Hae," his brother defended. "He would've tried everything he could've."

He had. He'd had her on a constant saline drip, kept her with a supply of water and rice, and even hooked up an IV with his own blood in it to her other arm, even though it didn't work like it did with their people.

Even with all that, she'd just lost fluids too fast.

"And it wasn't enough!" Korea snarled.

"But it means it's not his fault," Gangwon said firmly.

"She's still dead." Korea flung a hand at the unconscious woman on the bed. "Look at her! She's going to miss preparing for sowing, and she might even miss sowing itself. She died."

Kangwon watched his Countryhuman's face fall slack as his words echoed in the small room, like he'd finally realized what they meant.

"She's gone."

Gangwon looked confused, either because the words were too quiet or because they weren't.

Kangwon shook his head. "Korea, she's not gone. She's just in a recuperative coma."

He didn't seem to hear him. "She's gone and it's all your fault."

His eye didn't look like it was looking at Kangwon now. It was wide and glazed, burning with a feverish light as he started to back towards the wall.

"South Hwanghae is dead."

"She was dead," Kangwon corrected soothingly, careful to make sure Korea had a line of sight with the door. "But she's alright now. She's healing. I wasn't lying when I said she'd be better in two months."

"You don't fucking understand!" Korea was suddenly fierce again, his eye snapping back into focus, but still filled with that unsteady light. "She's dead and it's my-!"

His jaw clacked shut, and he suddenly lunged for the door. Kangwon made the mistake of trying to stop him, knowing he shouldn't touch him, but not wanting him to go. He put an arm out, hoping it would stop Korea short, but he collided with it and seemed to think it was a precursor to being grabbed because he whirled and launched himself at the province, who went down at the sudden attack.

He grunted as his back hit the hard ground, hearing Gangwon cry out in alarm as the two of them tumbled across the floor, Kangwon trying to free himself, and Korea taking it as trying to capture him, and fighting harder, grabbing at his arms and legs, attempting to work him into a hold.

Kangwon was alarmed to find that even though he wasn't actually fighting back, and was being careful where he put his hands, not wanting to hurt that deep burn on his country's body, he was winning.

He quickly backed down, allowing Korea to slam him back onto the floor, straddling his stomach as he pinned his arms at the shoulders, growling down at him, his chest heaving. Kangwon was barely out of breath, but the man on top of him was sucking in air in jagged gasps.

He suddenly cracked his neck around like he thought Gangwon was sneaking up on him. But the other province had pressed himself against the far wall, as far from the door as possible. He held up both his hands to show they were empty.

Korea looked back down at Kangwon, still breathing erratically. Kangwon gazed back up calmly.

"Is it because she was looking for the dog?"

Korea's fingers dug into his shoulders as his jaw tightened.

"We know," Kangwon said, keeping his tone easy. "We lived off of deer for years, remember?"

They'd never eaten that meat until after they went with Korea, away from the starving dog pack with feral eyes, and they hadn't eaten it often, so he might not have recognized it. But the deer they'd used to catch could last one man half a year. They both knew what venison looked and tasted like better than any other meat.

And though his brother hadn't said anything out loud, he knew they both knew Korea's New Year soup hadn't been venison.

Korea darted a look at Hae, then scrambled off of Kangwon, lurching unsteadily to his feet. The Provincehuman sat up, but stayed on the floor.

"I'm not judging you," he soothed. "I think you did the right thing."

His Countryhuman narrowed his eye warily as he put his back to the door. "I know I did. I don't need you to tell me that."

"I'm not just yes-manning you." With some distance between them, Kangwon climbed slowly to his feet. "You know I don't believe in that. Hae needed that meat. Everyone did."

Not just for the nourishment they'd been giving away. Kangwon and Gangwon hadn't eaten with the others, but as they slurped down the marrow and chunks of fat Korea had made sure went into their bowls, they'd both felt warmed from the inside out. The effect had been clear on their cousins, too.

Kangwon would call himself an animal lover. But he was also a doctor. And his patients' health came before anything.

Korea's jaw feathered. "Don't tell her."

"We won't," Kangwon said, casting a look at Gangwon. He couldn't hear what they were talking about, but he nodded at the prompt. "If you had, I wouldn't be able to approve."

He'd been a little worried after drinking the soup, which had been part of the reason he was at the bunker the night Hae got sick. For check-ups, yeah, but also to make sure she wasn't acting strange, since he wasn't able to see her before she left for her province. He'd been relieved to hear her mention not seeing the dog, like she still expected to see it.

Hae needed the calories. She didn't need to have her spirit broken.

Korea's shoulders lowered slightly, though Kangwon could still see the tension quivering through his muscles. Or maybe he was just shaking.

Knowing any sign of concern over his health would make him flee for real, he kept his voice slow and neutral. "You had good intentions, Korea. And they worked. It's not your fault Hae went out looking for that dog after, and it's not your fault she ate that clam."

"She shouldn't have been out there," he said tightly.

"No," Kangwon agreed. "But she chose to go looking, and she chose to eat the clam. You're right that she should've known not to."

Korea's eye flicked to the sleeping woman. "She only did it because she was hungry."

Yeah, SH was definitely right that they shouldn't mention their hunger around him anymore. Kangwon could tell he was still thinking about Hae saying those words.

"And you did something so she wouldn't be," Kangwon said. "If you hadn't done what you did, and Hae had ran into the clams anyway, you'd still blame yourself."

Korea opened his mouth, but shut it at his knowing look, glancing away.

"But it's not your fault either way." For someone else, Kangwon might've put his hand on their shoulder. He kept them at his sides. "Hae would've been hungry no matter how much you fed her, because she's hungry because of the war. And the war isn't your fault."

He gave his Countryhuman a pointed look that he avoided.

"It's America's. And the clams were there because of America. That's whose fault her death was."

The foreign country with the sick canine grin.

"Not yours."

"And n-not Kang's," Gangwon added loudly, having been watching his lips carefully.

"And not mine," Kangwon agreed, trying to make himself reinternalize the words.

He'd done everything he could. His cousin's death wasn't his fault. He knew that.

"And she's going to be fine."

Tentatively, he reached for Korea's hand, but the man hunched, so he beckoned him towards Hae instead. Putting a finger on her chapped bottom lip, he gently pulled it open, inviting Korea to hold his hand in front of her mouth.

"See?" he said when he'd had time to feel the soft brush of her breath against his palm. "She's alive. Just sleeping."

Almost like he didn't realize he was doing it, Korea's hand brushed over the bandage on Hae's forehead.

"It's almost been two months," he said, still tense. "Why is she taking as long as I did?"

Kangwon sighed. "I've told you before- there's no way your recovery should've taken only two months. Hers isn't long- yours was short."

And it hadn't been complete. Even after the extra months of non-coma rest, it had been even more into their travels before Korea entirely stopped limping, and his wounds finally healed over, allowing Kangwon to stop giving him his daily check-ups.

That was back when he'd actually let him take care of him.

"Hae is fine, Korea," he patiently repeated, catching his hand this time.

Korea's fingers spasmed in his gentle grip, and he noted with concern that the skin under the bandages was burning hot.

Carefully he guided his hand to over Hae's left ribs, pressing his palm against the fabric of her hospital gown so he could feel the sturdy, rhythmic pumping.

"See?" he hummed again. "Alive. She's going to be better in no time. I really wasn't lying about that."

Korea's fingers curled into claws, scratching at Hae's gown like he was about to try digging down to get at the organ pumping blood under her skin to make sure it wasn't some trick. Then they went limp, and he snatched his hand away.

"I know she's alive," he said gruffly, not meeting his eyes.

Kangwon turned to him. "I'm sorry for not telling you, Korea. But I promised Hae."

"The promises you make amongst yourselves aren't as important as your responsibility to tell the truth to your Countryhuman." Korea's voice had lost the growl, going stiff and cold like it did when he was embarrassed.

This time Kangwon didn't bother trying to tell him there wasn't anything he could do anyways. That'd never worked before, and he knew it wouldn't now.

"It was important to Hae," he said instead. "And I didn't want to let her down more than I already did."

Korea's eye flickered as he looked back at Hae. He didn't apologize, but Kangwon didn't expect him to.

"But I'm sorry," he said again. "I promise it won't happen again."

'Hopefully.'

"This is your last chance," Korea said, his hand twitching towards the cot. "If you ever hide the truth from me like this again, I am done trusting you to treat me or our people."

He could've said 'The reason I want to hide the truth from you is because you react like this to it.' But he knew Korea would hear it as a provocation, not advice.

Instead Kangwon quietly pointed out, "You already don't let me treat you."

His Countryhuman's gaze strayed, then met his again. "I mean it."

Exhaling imperceptibly, he said, "I promise, Korea."

Korea looked to Gangwon.

"He really didn't know," Kangwon said quickly. "I didn't tell him until you sent him here."

"I've spoken to him since then," Korea said coldly. "He had the opportunity to retract your lie." To Gangwon, he said, "No more lies, either from you or your brother. I don't care who you've made promises to. Got it?"

Gangwon watched him sign the words, and nodded vigorously. "G-Got it, Korea."

Korea glared between them both, then at Hae's body. Then he turned for the door.

Kangwon really just wanted to let him go get fresh air, but he knew if he let him hear the news from Hwang, if he was still in a bad mood he might count it as Kangwon withholding information again.

"Wait," he said. "I've got a possible new lead on the leak."

Korea whipped back. "Talk."

Kangwon briefly explained, and he thought for a moment, then nodded.

"It's worth looking into, at the very least." Korea rubbed under his eyepatch, staring past Kangwon at the window, long enough that the two provinces exchanged concerned glances.

Then he shook his head.

"Fill Gangwon in on the Epidemic Prevention Committee measures, then meet me at the lab for the truck to Balnam-ri."

He whisked away without another word, leaving Kangwon to slump over in relief.

Yeah, he was really looking forward to that truck ride.

"Thanks for sticking up for me," he said to Gangwon.

He shrugged. "It's what brothers are for, I think."

His lips curved up like he couldn't help it, and Kangwon found himself mirroring the expression.

"And it really isn't your fault, Kang," his brother said, resting a hand on his arm. "Hae didn't want you blaming yourself either."

He sighed. "I know."

He'd promised he wouldn't. He'd try to keep that one.

At least he didn't have to lie to Korea anymore. Though he'd literally just doubled down on it to Hwang, and he had a feeling his Countryhuman was going to tell the others he'd been lying.

He was escaping the ultimate punishment of losing his trust, but that didn't mean he could escape punishment altogether.

'Hate to vindicate North Hamgyong's pessimism.'

Picking up on what he was thinking, Gangwon said, "The others aren't going to be mad. They'll g-get it."

"They'll be a little mad." He knew they'd all get why he hadn't told Korea, and couple would get why he hadn't told Hwang. But every single one would think 'But you should have told me.'

"W-Well, maybe just a little." Gangwon fidgeted. "I guess I'd be upset if no one told me you'd d-d- You know."

"Yeah, me too." Kangwon admitted.

That was because he'd want to be there to comfort him in his coma, though. If he couldn't visit the hospital anyway, and his brother was going to recover, he'd understand not being told. It wouldn't help him get better, and would just distract Kangwon from helping others.

But he wouldn't begrudge any anger his cousins might feel, just like he didn't begrudge Korea's, even though he kept proving that all of Kangwon's reasons for not wanting to tell him about Kim Mi-ju, Hae, or similar situations were reasonable. It was only human to want to know what was happening to the people you loved, even if you couldn't change it.

Kangwon just wished Korea wouldn't blame himself for that, too.

Gangwon was already looking at the door in concern. "D-Did he seem...?"

Kangwon could still feel the heat emanating from Korea's skin clinging to his hand. "Yeah. I'll keep an eye on him."

And that'd be it, since he definitely wasn't going to be able to squeeze a field check-up in after this.

"I'm sure it's just his sympathetic fever," he said, mustering a reassuring smile for Gangwon.

He smiled nervously back, not buying it. Kangwon didn't really either.

Whether Korea liked it or not, he'd been his doctor for over thirty years, and he knew when he was getting sick.

The only question was how long he could pretend he wasn't.

I do like to consider myself the leading authority in using a one-off line as an important plot point around a hundred and seventy chapters later.

North Hamgyong working hard to single-handedly reinforce the patriarchy in the family unit by attempting to bully the emotionally open men around him into being ashamed of crying. It must make him so mad that modern day it's seen as admirable for men to cry in the DPRK. (I'm not sure about the personal level, but aside from the funeral tradition of wailing and sobbing, Kim Jong-un has cried openly multiple times, and it's common for Party members to tear up at important speeches, or for farmers to do it when receiving free homes).

Can I tell you a secret? Chagang is spelled 자강. So I should be spelling it in English as Jagang. But when I was creating his character I used the old romaji version because I think it looks better than when it starts with a J. I actually use the old romaji for all of the Northern provinces. Just another example of my sporadic transliteration. Such as using Choi and Choe in one chapter. They're both 최. But they have different vibes to me.

Also I'm healthy again finally. Yay! ^^

Pestilence And Plague

The plague was spreading.

They hadn't been able to destroy every fly dropped on Balnam-ri. Five days after Korea and Kangwon had visited, the first case had emerged. Five days later and over fifteen people were already dead, with dozens more in the village of six hundred ill.

It worried Choe Yong-gon. His expression was military-firm, but Chagang could see the wisps of olive floating around him as he watched Korea over the war table. He didn't voice his concerns, but he kept his distance as they spoke about the talks.

"So that's our final message on those POW lists?" Choe Yong-gon grunted. "We won't be getting them?"

Korea stared at him, his expression slack. It almost looked like he didn't know who he was.

Chagang made himself speak past the throbbing in his head. "No."

The enemy had never handed the list of forty-four thousand names over as promised. They had said on the radio that they had. Then retracted the statement almost immediately. Then yesterday they had finally said directly that they wouldn't be handing it over.

It would satisfy Chagang more if he could slot the missing number into enemy counts. Forty-four thousand reactionaries from their ranks to keep on guard for, either sent to replenish the destroyed garrison on Yuk Island, or parachuted in.

But there had been a mass shooting on Geoje Island, where the biggest enemy camps were, on the 18th. The foreign newspapers were all giving different stories, but the main one was that prisoners had resisted screening, and attacked guards, or been attacked. The screening of the soldiers should have been done with. Either the Americans had lied, and their claim about the majority of KPA soldiers not wanting to return home had been based on unfinished screening, or they had lied, and the forty-four thousand 'civilians' still waiting to be screened weren't civilians at all.

Chagang thought some of the missing could still be reactionaries being used as infiltrators. But from the American's refusal to provide information on the shooting when they had asked for it, he was also sure that the majority of the forty-four thousand were still theirs. Korea was, too.

If they had been enemies, it would have been easy to eliminate them. But the enemy was refusing to return comrades.

Choe Yong-gon sighed, raking his fingers though his short hair. "Pity."

Dark red flickered from him.

Chagang looked at Korea. He swayed slightly.

The air around him was empty of colours. But it was distorted like a heat wave. The Peninsula map behind him wavered, undulating from Jeju to Gangwon.

Then he jolted, and shook his head like a fly had flown at it.

"We saw it coming," he said gruffly. "We keep trying for the armistice without the list. We've made our own. We know who is missing, and who needs to be accounted for."

His voice lowered, inky black and red seeping out of the heat wave. The sudden assault of colour made Chagang's jaw lock.

"And who the enemy will need to pay for when this is over."

Choe Yong-gon dipped his head. "And what of Comrade Gangwon?"

Chagang had braced himself as soon as he heard his cousin's name. He squinted against the onslaught of maroon.

"We do not hand him back," Korea growled low in his throat. "No matter what they try to use against us."

America had finally made the threat. There would be no armistice without Gangwon in South's possession. They had pulled away from the talks again.

"Comrade Nam Il has concerns about the fate of the ceasefire," the Minister of Defense said neutrally.

"I'm aware," Korea clipped. "They're only doing this for show. They've 'pulled away from the talks,' but still have their junior team discussing the POW issue with us."

"And when the POW issue is settled?"

The red around Korea suddenly flared as he pounded his fist on the table. "I am not handing over Gangwon! He has chosen to be here, and I'm not putting him back in the same hands that are spreading plague!"

Surprise tinged with alarm spiked from Choe Yong-gon at the outburst. "I didn't mean to imply that we should," he said quickly.

Korea gripped the table, lost in a haze of red and the shimmering heat. "I need to save them."

More alarm rose from Choe Yong-gon. And from Chagang.

"Korea," he made himself say. "You can't go rescue our POWs."

Through the haze, he gave him that vacant look, like he didn't know who he was.

After a second, he muttered, "I'm not going anywhere."

Teal belied Choe Yong-gon's stern face. "That's good. Your guidance is needed here, General." He leaned over the table. "Since we won't return Comrade Gangwon, why don't we remind the Yanks why they gave in to the talks in the first place?"

Golden-green excitement shimmered across Korea, then vanished. "No. We initiate nothing. We give them no chance to place this on us. With their refusal to provide proof that we have Gangwon, right now they're pulling away because of their own suspicions. It's harder to justify."

"And we need to limit combat," Chagang said. "The more chaos, the faster the germ warfare spreads."

Kangwon was already at his limit. He had seen him for his check-up yesterday. But he hadn't actually been able to see him through the thick grey and olive cloud of exhaustion and anxiety around him, only made denser by now knowing about how badly the enemy wanted his brother. The news had been too openly-known to keep from him. Though they were still hiding it from Gangwon.

All of the nurses at the hospital had been drowning in those colours. Even the ones that didn't specialize in disease had to be involved in its prevention.

Choe Yong-gon nodded grimly. "I see your point." He looked between the two of them, then said, "There's been a few rumours from the frontline, where the pockets of fighting are. Some of the infantry are saying they've had insects launched at their positions in artillery shells."

Olive spiked from Korea. "What?"

The man shook his head. "I don't have anything more than that. But the men were told to report it to Epidemic Prevention."

Korea's jaw feathered. "Ssi-bal."

"It's too close to the front for you to investigate," Chagang said.

"Don't tell me what I can do," his Countryhuman snapped, dark blue bristling from his shoulders.

Chagang was undeterred. "The enemy might try to take Kangwon."

They didn't have to worry as much now. But they did still have to worry.

Korea ground his teeth, reaching his hand under his eyepatch, a coarse scratching sound coming from it as he dragged his nails over the scar there. He didn't answer.

Choe Yong-gon finally spoke up. "Comrade Korea, have you been to the hospital recently?"

The Countryhuman stared at the blank wall, his hand moving rhythmically under the star patch. The Defense Minister gave Chagang an olive-shrouded look.

"Korea-" Chagang tried.

He flinched, sick yellow pluming out of him before being strangled by irritation.

"I'm fine," he clipped, spinning on a heel. "Continue to hold the line. I'll speak to Comrade Nam Il."

A hand clamped on Chagang's shoulder before he could follow.

"Take care of him," Choe Yong-gon said in a low voice.

Chagang didn't know how. But he still said, "I will try."

His head ached as he hurried through the halls, Korea already gone. Even with no one around, and no colours to choke the corridors, his temples still throbbed. It was getting harder to push everything back.

His province hadn't been hit as hard as the others by the germ warfare, but the slight sympathetic fever was enough to make it worse. He wasn't looking forward to returning to the bunker tonight. His cousins' unending fog of pain and hunger had been tinged grey ever since they had been told the truth about Hae.

Chagang hadn't been mad. He had already known Kangwon was stained with too much olive and guilt to be telling the truth. The others had been, but by the time they saw Kangwon, the colours had faded.

And they had all been able to tell that now wasn't the time.

He found Korea outside, standing rooted outside the cluster of red brick buildings that disguised the military complex. The body of winter was over, but light snow still dusted the hills outside Pyongyang, heavier in the hollows and crags.

His Countryhuman was staring at these with his eye wide, a cloying swirl of colours filling the air around him. Chartreuse, ochre, gold, teal, irritation, anger, unease, and hurt. A confusing mix.

"It's March First," he said in a small voice Chagang hadn't heard from him before.

He could smell blood. "Korea, I think you should be in quarantine."

He whipped around like he hadn't heard him follow him up. "I'm not sick."

"You were at Balnam-ri before the plague broke out," he reminded him.

"I wore my hazmat suit," he snapped. "I never took it off."

Chagang felt a sharp pain in his left temple, as if Korea's frustration had just stabbed him in it. His tongue felt too heavy to speak.

"I'm fine," Korea said, his voice rasping.

The province slowly forced out, "I think… you are getting sick."

More sick yellow burst from Korea as he curled his lip. "I wasn't aware you were a doctor. If you are then you should be in the hospital with Kangwon."

"I'm… not."

"Then I will follow his instructions. And he says I don't need to quarantine." He turned away. "Go get me information on coastal defense. I need to talk to the General."

“You shouldn’t walk back to the city alone.”

“Don’t tell me what I shouldn’t do,” he snapped back, not turning back.

Chagang watched him go. He was swaying side to side, and making the road look like it did on a summer’s day, heat waves shimmering off it.

‘Take care of him.’ He wished he could do that.

He wished any of them could.

—

North tried, he really did. He tried to push back the heat and headache, he tried to crush it down inside of himself and keep it as a sympathetic fever. He wasn’t sick, he could just feel the plague crawling through his villages, the tuberculosis that was spreading through the towns, the cholera that had already killed a dozen, and Hae, and Hae, and Hae. That was all it was, his people’s sickness rampaging through his body, invading him, invading them, and now China, too. Springtails, spiders, and flies, infected with diseases that could kill animals as well as humans, dropped over Liaoxi and Liaotung. And more plague for Korea, for Cholsan, and Yangdok, and Kowon.

They had made it through winter, and now they had to pay for it.

He didn't know how many days past March First he made it because every time he fell asleep at his desk, those were the first words that echoed in his skull when he woke, bleary and apocryphal.

‘It’s March First, it’s March First, get up, it’s March-‘

It wasn’t. He didn’t know what day it was.

It came on suddenly, he told himself. He had been fine. He wasn’t sick.

And then he was. A persistent scratch in his throat, like he’d swallowed a nail, growing worse and worse, gouging at the sensitive flesh. The heat that had been simmering inside him for days rose and rose, slow-cooking him until it reached his head, and he suddenly couldn't remember why he was sitting in a wooden pew listening to someone talk.

No, he could. They were going over epidemic prevention measures. Party members were the most active in their communities, and many of them had gotten sick. He had to speak.

He clung to that as he tried to clear his throat to no avail. Every swallow made it close a little more, every light cough made the nail dig deeper.

By the time he got up to speak, it was in his head. As he stood, a deep pain shot through his bones, throbbing in his thighs and hips, like the old ache had never left. He wanted to limp up to the podium, but he made himself stand tall, his spine aching all the way into his tailbone.

He didn't know what he said. He hated not knowing what he said. Every ounce of concentration went towards gripping the podium and standing straight, looking into the sea of faces and trying not to waver before them. It took five minutes, it took five hours. As he staggered off the stage with applause ringing in his head like someone was smacking it into a gong, he didn't take his seat, but kept going, pushing out into the hall, then into the outside.

There was still snow on the ground, it was still winter, but it only felt hotter. The heat dwelled in his sore back and pounding temples, and in his swelling throat. It burned behind his eyepatch like the sun.

Someone said something to him, and he said something back, the panic in his chest tightening as he realized he'd already forgotten what it was. He knew the person, whoever they were, could tell. He knew every single person in that hall had been able to tell.

He was sick. He was sick and vulnerable and he wasn't safe here.

Not knowing where he was going, just knowing he had to get away, North left Moran Hill, his head stuffed full of heat. He could feel it spreading though him, each pump of his heart pushing it through his veins like poison, like the plague. His heartbeat shook his entire body, beating in his temples, in his burns. His skin pulsed, down into that deep gash. His organs throbbed against the flimsy skin between them and freedom, and North knew if he put his hand in there he would be able to feel them, like if he just applied enough pressure he would break through the membrane that kept them inside him. It was what they were going to do if they caught him.

He was on the highway, somewhere, out in the open, away from the city, from the endless maze of ruined buildings. The walls of Seoul rose up around him and fell away, again and again like waves, and he could hear their voices on the wind, 'Find him, catch him, bring him to Japan.'

Someone called out to him, and he was on the road again, looking up at a truck that slowed beside him, trying to see the guns sticking out of it for what they were, and keep his own holstered. 'Not danger,' but not help, they couldn't help him, he couldn't let them. He had to do this on his own.

One of the men looked behind him, then smiled down at him, saluting, and the truck drove off, allowing him to continue on.

Had someone said something to them? Had it been him? He didn't think so. He'd just been trying not to shoot.

Almost there. Almost where? The bunker. This wasn't like back then, he had a place to go. And this wasn't like back then, his organs were still inside him, not leaking through his body. He just needed to sleep off his fever, that was all.

He staggered though the sea of severed tree trunks, trying to look behind him for pursuers. He caught a glimpse of olive, then his legs tangled around a stump, and he hit the ground, scrambling up, back onto his feet, burning with shame, hoping no one had seen, burning, melting.

Throb throb throb. His heart felt like it was going to burst, shaking his frame as he stumbled into the forest, feeling it beat in every inch of him, overwhelming, every thrum making his brain swell against the inside of his skull.

A mangy dogwood loomed in front of him, and he lashed out, trying to tear the eye from the distorted face leering out at him, and meeting air instead, tumbling forward into the snow.

North thrashed, trying to get up, before curling onto his side, trapping his temples between his palms, feeling them beat against the bandages, feeling his organs throb throb throb against each other as he drew his knees closer.

He couldn't rest here. He wasn't safe.

Gritting his teeth, he forced himself onto knees and shaking arms, suddenly feeling as weak as he had when he was first formed, or in those awful days before the March First Movement.

'It's March First, get up, it's-'

He heaved himself back to his feet, staggering sideways, catching himself on a larch that was actually there, shoving off of it, his momentum sending him for the bunker again.

As he emerged into the clearing, the door loomed large before him, and he felt all the hair on his arms rise.

'Trapped trapped trapped.' The word beat in time with his pulse. He couldn't go in there. There was only one way out, it was too small, and he couldn't let his provinces see him like this. He couldn't.

North twitched back, then forward, then sideways, his head spinning, unable to think of anywhere to go. His breath came in sharp, unsteady gasps, filling the air with mist and his tight lungs with stabbing pain and too little oxygen. Then he went to the left, off into the woods, ricocheting off of tree trunks and boulders.

His body weighed him down, begging to just let it rest, but he sank his fangs into his lip and pressed on. He couldn't sleep here. He wouldn't. He was strong enough to make it. He'd faced worse, this was nothing, he could make it, he was fine.

The mountain towered above him, and he dragged himself up it, over sharp rock and slick crags, even once he was forced to his knees. His arms strained, quivering, refusing to lift, and he tore his palm over something sharp, feeling a new blast of heat, sharper than before, giving him the strength to drag himself the final few feet.

He didn't know where his resting place was, and he didn't know when he passed out. All he knew was that he had made it, that no one would find him here.

He wasn't sick. He just needed to…

—

1919

North didn't know where he was, didn't know how he had gotten here. All he knew was the heat and the pain, throbbing through his whole body. When one would recede, the other would rush in like waves against shores he had never seen, leaving him with no chance to gird himself.

Was South seeing him like this? Was he afraid, trying to shake him awake? He had to wake up, to get ahold of himself for him.

It had to have been a dream, a nightmare, a dream, leaving him, hiding in those alleys, body shaking, bleeding. Stumbling out of the city, somehow not being caught, out into the wilderness for he didn't know how long. Waking in that small house, those people- Kim Sun-hon and An Yong-un, he had to remember, even if nothing else he had to remember their names- unable to do more than wash the jacket of the Jap he'd managed to kill, and the remnants of South's shirt, rebandaging him, then taking him… somewhere. To find someone he had wanted to find.

Kangwon. They said they thought they knew where Kangwon province was.

He had found him, hadn't he? Was that the dream? The villagers, the woods, the boy with the big, frightened eyes that had reminded him of South's?

'South,' he tried to say, unsure of whether his lips moved. He couldn't open his eyes. They were swollen, heavy, gritty.

Why hadn't he come with him? Why had he looked at him with those hurt eyes, like North was in the wrong?

'I'm sorry,' he tried to say, not for leaving, but for not forcing him to go with him.

He should have dragged him, made him. Now Japan was going to kill his other half.

'South,' he tried to say again. Maybe it had been a dream. Maybe he hadn't woken up from the- his chest burned like the old fires inside Paektusan, hot and sick, five thousand has it been five thousand?- yet. Maybe he could try again, do it all again but with South at his side.

'I'm sorry.' Not for leaving, he would do it again, for their people, for Kim Sun-hon and An Yong-un, he would do anything. Sorry that he would.

'Why didn't you come with me?'

Even outside of this feverish limbo, he knew he could not fathom it. Why had his other half stayed, why?

South.

'South.'

"Please wake up."

'South?'

It had been a dream. He could hear his brother's voice in his fevered darkness, reaching out to him like a lifeline.

'I will,' he tried to promise. 'I'll wake up, I'll come back for you. I'll take you with me, South.'

“North… it’s okay.”

It wasn’t right for South to be saying that. North was the one supposed to be comforting him, to be strong.

He had to wake up, had to protect him. But why did he feel disappointed it had been only a dream?

Because he had to save their people. He had to fight for them.

He would. If he could escape in a dream, he could escape in real life. With South.

‘South.’

“We’re going to… be okay… You’re going to be okay.”

His brother’s voice was fading as the sea of pain and heat dragged North back into its depths. But he wasn’t leaving. He could feel him laying down next to him, pressing his back to him like they always did, even though he couldn't feel his own body past the agony.

Next time. He would wake up next time. He would save the boys with the scared eyes, and Kim Sun-hon, An Yong-un, and everyone else.

“We’re…. okay….”

North went under again.

This chapter perfectly is how I felt when walking to the store on my first day of illness, not counting the hallucinations. Though I think I might have been close.

South Pyongan during covid lockdown, pointing a gun at Kangwon outside her house: Six fucking feet.

Kangwon: I just need to come in a give you a check-up-

SP: SIX FUCKING FEET, DOC. I WILL SHOOT.

The provinces spent the first part of serious lockdown alone in their capitals to disperse the chances of them all getting sick, or getting North sick. Hae found it to be the most miserable experience of her modern life. But South Pyongan was more than happy to completely lock down her house and self. Respiratory illness? Permanent lung damage and weakened muscles? Brain damage or whatever? Noooo thank you. She was not getting sick, and she didn't.

Broken Wings

[image]

1919

Kangwon had not been formed a medic.

It had started small. The desperate wails of a mother with a child that had caught cold had drawn him from his solitude, terrified, but unable to resist trying to help. He had tried leaving dried leaves with which to make a soothing tea outside her door at night, but he had no way of knowing if they'd been used. Eventually he had worked up the courage to introduce himself, and after the initial shock, he had been allowed to nurse the child back to health with the same methods he used on himself.

Nothing fancy, simply herbs for a sore throat, and heat to sweat the fever out. But it had earned him enough of a reputation that when a local man was run through by a Japanese officer, the villagers had brought him to Kangwon.

He could remember insisting there was nothing he could do, but they had begged and pleaded, and in the end, it wasn't like the man could really get worse. Not that that was what had convinced him back then. No- it had simply been the amount of eyes on him, pressuring him.

Common sense had dictated that the wound needed to be cleaned, and with how deep it was, cauterized. Looking back, there would have been better methods, but none available to a hermit province and a handful of starving peasants.

The man had, miraculously, pulled through, something that Kangwon was convinced was at least fifty percent luck. But it had cemented him as a healer in the village's eyes.

Coughs, fevers, scrapes, fatigue, broken bones. All manner of ailments had been brought to him over those nine years.

Mostly, he was pressured into it by how desperately they needed treatment, and how unlikely they were to get it elsewhere. When a man needed stitches, he was the only one who could give them. He had some skill with a needle and thread from patching his clothes, and wasn't the concept the same?

It was not. Sewing was much more difficult when the cloth you were stitching together was flesh. But it was manageable.

In the end, it was a good exchange. They needed a medic (he couldn't yet call himself a doctor), and he needed help surviving in the woods. They brought him offerings of thread, antiseptic, clothing, and foodstuffs, and he saved their lives.

He hated taking from those who had so little, but they insisted, and he really did need the food, especially in the winter months. While he was an expert forager and skilled with snares, he sometimes had difficulty hunting animals. He didn't mind eating meat (even if he had, beggars couldn't be choosers), and he had no problem killing an animal quickly, but when one was injured…

A rabbit had gotten caught in his snare once while he was within earshot, and its squeals had been so full of pain that he couldn't resist cutting it free. Then he had gone hungry that night.

Another time he had encountered a goshawk with a broken wing that would have made a full meal. But when he had approached to put it out of its misery, it had cried at him so defiantly that he brought it back to his hideaway. If a splint helped a broken leg mend, surely it would work for a wing.

He had nursed it back to health, feeding it bugs and strips of rabbit meat. At first, it had pecked at him, but by the end, the bird would sit on his shoulder as he did his chores. Then he had set it free. It had flown away, soaring into the sky with a glad cry, and the province realized what it was to feel alone for the first time.

He had also gone hungry again.

He had only ever lost three patients- a girl with cholera too far progressed, an elderly man with a severe cough that needed medicine, not herbs, and a woman that had taken her own life after a severe… beating.

Every time it happened, Kangwon was convinced that the villagers would blame him and run him out or expose him. They never did, but it didn't stop him from spiralling into a nervous breakdown. If he had tried harder, been better-

Kangwon in the future could look back on the first two cases and know that he had done all he could. They had always been going to die, through no fault of his own. The only thing he could have done 'better' was have access to free, advanced healthcare, something that had been beyond him at the time.

The woman was the only one who haunted him. Her physical injuries hadn't been severe, only her mental trauma. Kangwon should have talked to her, tried to help her through it. But he had been too nervous and awkward, and when he had released her she had walked into the frozen river that very night.

In the end, patching a wound was only a small part of the healing process. A valuable lesson, but one he had paid too high a price for.

That had been what Kangwon had been thinking about on that day. As he strolled through the forest to see if the villagers needed anything or had left him supplies, he'd been mulling over that woman, or more accurately, his regrets.

He thought of the goshawk, too. Helping it hadn't been a regret, but rather… He regretted that his solitude was no longer quite so comfortable.

He'd taken on several apprentices since then, men and women, young and old, to share what little he knew of medicine in case anything ever happened to him. But they could never stay away from the village for long or the landlord would notice, and in the end, it was just him in his cave.

He could still bear it, but… It had been easier before, to think that his life would always be this way.

He had just reached the meeting spot he had set with the villagers when he froze. Something was crashing through the woods ahead, coming straight for him. By the way that branches and twigs were breaking underfoot, he knew it wasn't an animal. They weren't calling for help, so he didn't think twice, instinct driving him up the nearest tree.

He perched amongst the spring foliage like a cat as whoever- whatever- it was came closer.

The person- and it was a person, thankfully- staggered out of the brush. They were wearing a tattered Japanese military jacket, with a hood that hid their face, but when they called out, their voice was Korean.

"Kangwon-do?"

The province stopped breathing. Had the villagers finally given him away? Had they decided that the death of that young woman really was his fault?

The person raised his voice. He sounded near Kangwon's own physical age, maybe, but raspy and exhausted. "Kangwon province. I know you're out here. I- Ssi-bal." The boy hunched over, clutching at his ribs. He staggered over to the nok tree that the villagers hid things for Kangwon under, leaning against it.

"I need your assistance!" Slowly, he slid down the trunk until he was sitting. Even from so high up, Kangwon could hear how laboured his breathing was.

The boy ripped his jacket open, revealing a bloodstained white shirt so filthy it was grey, then threw back his hood, making Kangwon almost fall out of his tree. He knew that face! He had never seen it, but he knew it, the same way he'd know his heart if it was carved out of his chest and placed in his hand.

"Korea." He just barely whispered the name.

The Countryhuman painstakingly unbuttoned his undershirt, exposing a bloody mass of fabric wrapped around his chest.

Kangwon sucked in a breath.

'Bad.' He knew just from looking. Thoughtlessly, he put his thumbnail in his mouth.

Korea peeled back an edge of the makeshift bandage, wincing. "Ssi-bal," he cursed again, shutting his eyes tight. "Kangwon." His voice was barely above speaking volume. "If you're out there…" He gritted his teeth. "I need you."

Kangwon was so nervous the branch he was on was trembling. But the pain in those words was so clear that he couldn't sit back. Taking a steadying breath, he swung out of the tree.

Korea jolted when his feet thumped on the ground, not relaxing when he saw it was who he had been searching for.

"You're Kangwon?" he demanded, and Kangwon thought he was doing a good job not sounding like he was dying.

"Uh, yeah." He smiled nervously, chewing on his thumbnail.

"Good." Korea nodded grimly. "Fix me."

Then he slumped over, unconscious.

He didn't wake when Kangwon gathered him in his arms (so light!) or when he carried him back to his cave. And he didn't wake when he carefully undressed him and peeled off the bandages. They looked like they were the remnants of what had once been a nice shirt, one similar to what Korea had been wearing.

When the province saw the full extent of the damage to the other boy, his nail snapped off between his teeth.

His white skin was mottled blue-black over his entire body. Both eyes swollen almost shut, head covered in contusions, throat bruised where Kangwon could see the imprints of fingers that had wrapped around it. Similar finger-shaped bruises marred his wrists. The mottling continued down his torso- Kangwon's eyes skirted away from the most obvious wound- and his legs. One ankle was definitely at least sprained, and his right arm was tender, leading Kangwon to think that it had been relocated. On top of that, he was twig-thin, ribs and rotator cuffs sticking out like branches on a leafless tree, several of the former being broken.

Finally he looked at the real injury, the one that couldn't be ignored.

Starting from just above his left collarbone, crossing his thin chest at a diagonal to end over his right ribs, was a gaping gash. Glints of white could be seen where it began and ended, and the edges were crusted with dark blood and pus.

Kangwon… How was he even supposed to treat this? 'Fix me,' his country had said. But how when it looked like he had been attacked by… No, there was no equivalent to this. It could only be a knife or other tool that had been dragged over his skin repeatedly in roughly the same spot dozens or more times.

Actually, his body looked like when Kangwon scored the flesh of animals to cook. And he was not going to think of that the next time he made supper.

He couldn't panic or let himself be overwhelmed. He had to take things one step at a time.

First step- was the wound infected? The pus made it clear it was, but Kangwon still hesitantly sniffed at it. Definitely gangrenous, but surprisingly not as bad as it could be. Someone had clearly washed it before bandaging it. Had Korea managed to do that and relocate his arm? Impressive, if so.

Second step- blood poisoning. As hard as he looked, he couldn't see the telltale sign of black veins spreading out from the wound. Lucky, incredibly lucky. From the slightly green colour of some of the bruises, he suspected this damage was a couple weeks old, well enough time for poisoning to set in.

Third step- internal bleeding. Oh yeah, definitely. Dark purple streaks covered Korea's stomach, and it was oddly distended. He had no idea how he was going to handle that.

His mental steps faltered and he ripped off another nail. Well, he had to try, right?

Try he did. Kangwon had no illusions of sitting back and waiting for the regenerative powers of a Countryhuman to do their work. He was fairly sure this hadn't been done to the country by a human. If he didn't act, it could kill him. And even if it wouldn't, it would take forever to heal.

For two months he cleaned Korea's wound twice, sometimes thrice, daily, burning though his supply of antiseptic and bandages, even when the villagers had brought him more. It had been they who had directed Korea to him, something he thanked them for. He brewed teas to tip down the unconscious boy's throat, and made poultices out of leaves and flowers. He found berries and wild vegetables and meat to grind into paste to feed him.

The entire time his patient didn't stir, sunk deep into a coma.

Around the two month mark, though, things were looking up. Kangwon had scraped the pus out, cutting away more of the infected flesh (wincing guiltily as he did), and the internal bleeding hadn't taken a turn for the worse. Korea most likely still wouldn't wake up for several more months, but-

Kangwon yelped as he walked into the cave and saw eyes looking at him. Eyes that were still slightly swollen.

Korea was up. Sitting up, even. And staring at him.

The province had almost dropped his firewood. The two stared at each other for a pause, then he ventured, "Uh, hey. I'm Kangwon."

The country didn't blink. "I know."

"Oh. Right. Okay." Kangwon nervously inched into the space, placing his wood at the back of the cave. "And you're… Korea."

A muscle feathered in his jaw. "Yes. I am."

Of course he was, but still, to hear him confirm it… Kangwon couldn't fight his smile.

"I need to- to clean your wound again," he said, gesturing. As if Korea wouldn't know what he was talking about.

The country hesitated, then nodded his assent.

Kangwon squatted next to him, preparing his supplies. "You shouldn't be sitting up yet, you know."

"I'll be fine."

'Stubborn, then.'

Kangwon of course had a million questions, but he didn't want to disturb the other boy. He'd obviously been through something physically traumatic, and the province didn't want to stir up any mental trauma to go with it.

As he started to peel off the bandages, he asked, "Who did this to you?"

"Japan," Korea answered bluntly, then refused to answer anymore.

Kangwon had suspected as much.

Working on his- and wasn't that a word? His- country was far more unnerving while he was awake. He watched Kangwon with an intensity, barely blinking. The province tried to stay focused on his work, ignoring the eyes he could see on the edge of his vision.

"Why are you shaking?" his country abruptly demanded.

Kangwon winced, clenching his fingers. He added 'blunt' to the list of traits.

"I just d-don't- don't want to mess up."

Korea was unimpressed. "If I'm awake, obviously you haven't screwed up yet."

Kangwon swallowed. "That honestly has less to do with me and more to do with you taking good care of the wound." Then again, it looked sort of only initially taken care of. "Oh, uh, you were the one who washed and bandaged it, right?"

The other boy stared at him for a long, unsettling time, then clipped, "Yes. Me and some farmers."

Perhaps he hadn't had time to clean it again, since he was almost definitely on the run from Japan.

"You're lucky. It probably saved your life." Kangwon smiled at him, and he looked away.

With the eyes no longer piercing into him, it was far less nerve-wracking to finish his work.

Over the course of the next month, the two settled into an nervous cohabitation. Well, nervous for Kangwon, who wasn't used to having people around for this long. Korea seemed unfazed.

The boy was cold, but Kangwon sensed a great anger simmering just under his surface. He tried to gently prod at him to work out what it was, but only ever received brief, terse responses. And there was that odd, deep grief that he occasionally caught flashes of.

The province kept treating him, becoming less awkward at it up until Korea turned his eyes to him again. Then it was hard to still his hands.

He quickly learned to bring food back when Korea was sleeping and leave so he could eat. He got the sense that the country resented having Kangwon be responsible for everything, but the province put his foot down and refused to let him do anything physical until he was better.

At first he wondered why Korea watched him with such intensity when he made the fire and cleaned the kills, but when the country started to insist that he be the one to do it, he understood. Kangwon was impressed at the speed with which he picked the skills up, and it left him more time to forage and replenish his supplies.

It was nice to have the help, and Kangwon liked the feeling of having someone keep watch at night, even if it was repeatedly terrifying to wake up thinking you were alone, then spot a still shadow at the mouth of the cave. It got him into the habit of keeping watch, too, since Korea didn't seem to rest easy if he didn't. Though honestly, he also didn't seem to rest easy when he did. Kangwon frequently caught him with his eyes open when he should have been sleeping. Though whether he was watching Kangwon or the glimpse of the forest behind him, the province didn't know.

It was also relieving to have someone nearby when something snapped in the woods. Usually something like that would freeze Kangwon on his hay bed and leave him unable to sleep for hours. But when Korea would tense at the sound, he would have to search for an explanation, listening carefully to hear if it was a deer or squirrel or simply the forest. Which drove away his thoughts of kumiho and ghost lanterns. He wasn't actually sure if a kumiho could affect him, but he also wasn't eager to find out.

As Kangwon set out for the meeting tree to see if the villagers had managed to get him the antiseptic that he had requested, he mulled over the possibility of Korea leaving. He was restless in the cave, and while Kangwon didn't quite know what exactly his country wanted to do when he was fully healed, he didn't think it was play house in the woods.

The thought left him feeling more than a bit melancholic. If the goshawk had changed his contentment with a life of solitude, then it stood to reason that actually living with another person would shift it even more. Even if that person was blunt, terse, and not very talkative.

As he neared the meeting spot, shouting started to filter his way, and the province broke into a jog. The voices hadn't been raised in anger, but in fear, so he didn't hesitate to rush into the clearing.

"W-What's going on?" he asked, then saw.

Oh Kye-ok- one of the mothers from the village- was kneeling by the tree amongst several of the villagers, clutching a motionless lump in her arms. Her son, Bong-nam.

"What happened?" Kangwon demanded, crouching next to the woman.

She was crying too hard to answer him, but one of the men with her said, “He took an apple from the landlord’s tree. The police had him whipped.”

Kangwon winced. Whipping a child over an apple… Those who had everything really couldn’t bear to give anything. He was used to stories like this, though, and it no longer paralyzed him in horror.

“Ajumeoni.” He placed a brief, gentle touch on Oh Kye-ok’s shoulder, and she looked at him with glimmering eyes. “He’ll be okay. Whippings are rarely ever fatal, if they’re treated right. But I’m going to have to take him. Are you alright with that?”

The mother hesitated, clutching her son tighter, then relinquished him. “Please take good care of him. I can’t lose another son.”

Kangwon smiled, trying not to sound as nervous as he felt. “I will. And you won’t.”

One of his ‘apprentices-‘ a man named Kim In-ho- had accompanied her, and he informed Kangwon that the child had been given ten lashes, and fallen unconscious after.

“I thought it best to bring him to you right away, just in case.”

“You did the right thing.” Kangwon sort of wished he, too, could pass on the responsibility, but such was life.

Swiftly he carried the boy back to his cave. When he arrived, Korea looked up from his act of using Kangwon’s knife to sharpen a branch into another stake for the barricade. Kangwon had never thought he needed a barricade, but apparently Korea did. At least it kept him off his feet.

“Ssi-bal, what happened to him?” he demanded, looking at the boy.

“He picked an apple from the local landlord’s property.” Kangwon filled him in as he set the boy on the pile of dried grass that served as his bed. He wasn’t wearing a shirt, so he immediately got to work on wiping the blood from his back. “They whipped him for it.”

“The Japanese?” Korea’s voice was dark.

“The police, anyway.” Kangwon glanced up, seeing that the look on his country’s face matched his tone. It was a savage look that frightened him more than a little. He nervously repeated what Kim In-ho had told him, then made no further attempts at conversation as he worked on the boy, except to ask Korea to pass him things.

“Needle and thread.” He swallowed as the objects were placed in his hand. Luckily the boy only needed a few stitches, where the crop had cut into the delicate skin of his lower back.

It was still too many for Kangwon.

He paused with the needle hovering over the cut. Working on children terrified him the most. There was even more responsibility than with adults. It was up to him to make sure that they would heal well and be able to live a normal adult life, or a life at all. And if he didn’t…

The girl who had died of cholera had been called Pak Kyong-mi. She would never fall in love or get married or have her own kids. Her life had ended before it began.

“You’re shaking again,” Korea noted icily.

Kangwon flinched, his hand trembling harder. “S-Sorry. I really can’t help it.”

“It’s just a cut,” the other boy dismissed. “If you fixed me, he’ll be fine.”

“But if I mess up and it’s my fault that he…” Kangwon trailed off at the frankly terrifying look Korea was giving him.

“If you treat him wrong and he dies, it wouldn’t be your fault,” Korea growled. “It would be the fault of the Jap that beat him, and that miserly landlord’s. But if you’re too scared to treat him at all, and you let him die, then it’s your fault.”

The words were reassuring, ostensibly, but the tone the Countryhuman used was less one of comfort and more one of threat.

But in a way, he was right. It was at least enough to motivate Kangwon to start his stitches. Korea watched him with a visibly clenched jaw, dark energy radiating from his corner.

Kangwon made the stitches with little to no difficulty, because of course he did. It really was just a small cut. By the time he had finished and dressed the boy in one of his less-worn shirts, the child was stirring.

"Where am I?" he asked immediately, trying to sit up.

Kangwon told him what had happened, and Bong-nam relaxed.

"You're the doctor? Mom says we're not supposed to talk about you or the Japanese will take you away."

Kangwon nodded. "Your mom is right. So I'd appreciate if you didn't mention me when you go home."

The boy's eyes widened. "Would they whip you, too?"

Kangwon didn't really know what Japan would do to him if he was captured. It wasn't like he'd ever committed a crime or anything. He wasn't sure if that mattered or not, though, and he wasn't keen on finding out.

"They would," Korea answered for him. "Or do worse."

Bong-nam blinked fearfully at the country. "What's worse?"

Korea's eyes darkened. "You don't want to know."

"Big Brother over there is a bit scary," the boy whispered to Kangwon, who smiled.

"Yeah, but he's alright." Behind him, he heard Korea 'tch.'

Kangwon made a soup out of dried meat and some roots he'd found, and as the sun set, they gathered around the fire to eat. Built at the mouth of the cave, it tended to get a bit smoky, but it was better than sending up a signal to anyone that might have bad intentions.

He eyed Korea, smiling as he watched him devour the soup, clearly trying not to scarf it, but also clearly too eager to try very hard. He always ate like it was his first time being given food. And considering how emaciated he'd been when he came to Kangwon, it might have been.

"How are you feeling?" the province asked Bong-nam, noticing him wincing.

"It really hurts," he whined, tugging at the hem of his oversized shirt. "Do you have anything to make it stop?"

Kangwon winced. "Sorry, but no. You'll have to tough it out." Since painkillers didn't actually heal an injury, he could never prioritize acquiring them. And they would be far too expensive, anyways.

Bong-nam pouted, and his eyes glimmered slightly. Kangwon opened his mouth to reassure him, but was surprisingly cut off by Korea.

"You were brave," he said, not in the soothing tone that Kangwon would have used, but more like that of a commanding officer giving commendations. "I heard you didn't pass out until it was over."

Bong-nam brightened a bit. "That's right! I was awake for all ten lashes. And I only passed out because I, uh, got a bit tired after." He swiped an arm across his eyes.

Korea opened his mouth as if he might dispute this, then closed it, giving the boy a brisk nod.

The child chewed on his lip, then asked, "Doctor, why did they whip me?"

"Because they're bastards," Korea said, ignoring Kangwon's look.

"Didn't they tell you the charges before they sentenced you?" the province asked before his country could say anything else.

"They said I stole someone's property." Bong-nam looked up at him, confused. "It was just an apple, and it was on the ground."

Kangwon closed his eyes. Ten lashes for a boy not yet twelve years old, all over a windfall.

"It wasn't like anyone else was going to take it!" the boy continued defensively. "Chang-gyeol lives there and he's always bragging about how much he eats, but my mom can't afford fruit, and it's her birthday tomorrow, and-" He sniffled. "I just wanted to get her something nice."

Kangwon looked away, gathering his words, but once more Korea beat him to it.

"You weren't the one in the wrong. They are," he assured him. "There's no reason someone should have apples rotting in their yard while someone else starves."

"There is a reason," Kangwon pointed out nervously. "It's called 'the law,' and breaking it gets you whipped, 'or worse.'"

Korea whipped his head to him. "Are you saying that's right?!"

"No," he quickly denied. "It's awful, no property is worth harming someone over." He glanced at Bong-nam, then leaned over and whispered, "But you're talking to a kid, and I don't want to see him get hurt again because you encouraged him to break the law."

"He will get hurt again," Korea said, not lowering his voice at all. "So long as some people have too much while others have none, he will go hungry. Then the Japs will punish him when he's forced to steal. And if he's not told that's fucked up, he'll grow up to tolerate it instead of fighting back."

"Fight back?" Bong-nam asked with an eagerness that made Kangwon gnaw on his nails. "How?"

"You can fight back by getting better soon," the province interrupted, shooting Korea another look. “Time for children to sleep.”

“You don’t even look that much older than me!” the boy protested.

Actually, Kangwon was younger than him. Two years, younger, technically. But that wouldn’t get him to bed.

“Your mom wanted you to behave yourself while you were here,” he chided. “She’s already upset, you don’t want to stress her out even more, right? Especially so near her birthday.”

Bong-nam deflated. “I guess not.”

Eventually, he was coaxed to sleep, lying on his stomach. Kangwon pulled his blanket over him, then returned to the fire.

“I’m going to go pick some fruit tomorrow,” he told Korea. “The wild apple tree should have a few ripe ones by now.”

It would be a few more years before the one he had planted outside his cave bore fruit.

His country caught on. “For his mother?”

Kangwon nodded. “When I’m out, please don’t rile him up. I don’t want him back here in a month because he picked a fight with the landlord’s son.”

“How are you so calm?!” Korea burst out, only lowering his voice slightly when Kangwon hushed him. “Look at what they did to him over a damn apple! What gives them the right? Doesn’t it make you angry?"

The light from the fire mingled with the smoke, painting tiger stripes on his white face.

“Of course it makes me upset,” Kangwon replied. “It’s unfair. But I don’t see the point in getting worked up over something I can’t change.”

“We can change it!” Korea snarled. He took a deep breath, and when he spoke again, it was slightly calmer. “When will he be healed?”

Kangwon cast a glance at the slumbering boy. “He should be safe to go home in a week or so.”

“Good.” Korea nodded. “I’m leaving next week.”

Kangwon’s heart sank. “You’re really not healed properly yet, you shouldn’t-“

“I won’t sit around while every day the Japanese are doing things like that to our people,” Korea interrupted. “Maybe you can, but I can’t.”

That had stung a little. “What are you going to do?”

“I’m going to find the rest of my provinces, then we’re going to organize our people, give them the means to fight back.” Korea’s eyes gleamed in the firelight, making him look more tigerish than ever. “Together, we’ll overthrow Japan. We’ll make our country ours again.”

Kangwon blinked, astounded, unconsciously bringing his finger to his mouth. That first part hadn’t come out of nowhere- Korea had mentioned fighting back and ‘doing something’ about the Japanese several times now, along with finding the other Provincehumans, and helping their people. But Kangwon had thought he’d meant, like, bringing them food or something. Not…

“A revolution.”

“Yes.” Korea seemed to like that word. “I want you to come with me.”

That part had come out of nowhere.

“But-“ Kangwon realized he still had his fingernail in his mouth, and quickly removed it. “Who would take care of the villagers?”

“You being here isn’t actually changing anything,” Korea impatiently told him. “So long as we live under someone else’s laws, those people will come to you with illnesses and injuries, and it will never stop. You might save them, but there are hundreds of villages with no one to save them, and there won't be unless we change things. We could-" A spark lit in his eyes, and he started talking faster. "We could make healthcare free. Why should they have to pay to live?"

Kangwon had thought the same thing many times. Korea was far more animated than he had ever seen him, eyes aglow with whatever possibilities he was seeing. It was… sort of contagious.

The country shook his head. "But we won't be able to do anything until we control our country again. Until then, everything you do is just… putting a bandage on the wound. That won't heal it."

He leaned forward, almost in the fire. It made him look as if he were burning.

"We need to cauterize it."

Kangwon swallowed, the only sound in the cave the flickering of flames and the snap his nail made when it broke between his teeth.

He was right, of course. There were so many people suffering that Kangwon couldn't reach. They needed change. But…

"I'm sorry." He shook his head. "I really hope you succeed, but I don't think I'm the right person to help you."

He wasn't a fighter. He wasn't even a good enough doctor to be useful. He was just a hermit who lived in the woods and helped those who had nowhere else to turn.

Korea sat back, shadows sliding over his face. "Fine," he bit out, his tone returned once more to flint. "I only want the willing, anyway. I don't need cowards."

Kangwon couldn't be mad. He was right. But he could add 'lashes out when hurt' to his list of traits he was compiling for Korea.

He didn't sleep right that night, or the rest of the week, really. Whenever he laid down, he would find himself watching Korea sitting alone by the mouth of the cave, sharpening stakes. And when it was his turn to keep watch, he could feel his country's eyes on him.

Korea seemed so confident, so sure. Kangwon had no doubt he could accomplish what he needed to. He didn't need him.

But there was such an anger in him. Kangwon could always feel it radiating off him like a physical heat. He wasn't the only one.

"I don't think Big Brother likes me very much," Bong-nam had whispered once. "He seems mad a lot."

Kangwon wasn't sure how to explain that it wasn't the boy he was mad at, but rather the world. So instead he had said, "He likes you. He's just… not great at expressing himself."

Kangwon couldn't help but think of the woman that he had let walk away, and how she had walked straight into the river. He didn't want Korea to leave like that for fear he would do the same thing, plunging into fire instead of icy water. But there were no words he could use to comfort him or reassure him. Nothing but the change his country was seeking could do that.

The week ended far too quickly.

"Alright," Kangwon said, wrapping the bandages tightly around Bong-nam's torso for the last time. "You're officially discharged."

The boy jumped up, wincing only slightly. "Thanks, Doc! That means I can go home now, right?"

"Yeah," Kangwon said, glancing at Korea. The Countryhuman had a threadbare pack that he had requested Kangwon give him. Into it he was packing dried meat, nuts, and fruits. "I'll take you back."

"I'm coming." Korea slung the bag over his shoulder, wrenching one of the longer stakes from the ground.

This was it then. His wing was healed, and he was preparing to take flight.

As they walked through the woods, Kangwon couldn't help but glance over at his country. He was still limping, the spear doubling as a walking stick, and occasionally he would close his eyes for a bit too long, as if stifling pain. He really wasn't ready to set off, but there was no stopping him.

When they reached the meeting nok tree, Bong-nam broke into a sprint.

"Mom!"

"Bong-nam!" Oh Kye-ok caught her son in an embrace, squeezing him tight. "Are you alright? How are you feeling?"

"Great!" he cheered. "The Doctor says I'm all better, and Big Brother says I was brave. And he said that one day when I'm older, I can fight the Japanese!"

Kangwon shot a sharp look at Korea. Clearly, he hadn't listened to the 'don't rile him up' suggestion. At least he had specified when the boy was older.

"Big…" Oh Kye-ok looked up and paled when she caught sight of Korea. "Boy, show some respect! That's our country." She hurriedly bowed, forcing her son into one as well.

"It's fine," Korea said, slightly uncomfortably. "It doesn't bother me."

Kangwon raised his brows at that, biting back a smile. He had been telling the boy repeatedly not to call him by the familial honorific.

"Thank you, both of you." Oh Kye-ok bowed again.

"He did everything," Korea dismissed.

"I didn't really…" Kangwon trailed off at the country's fiercesome glare.

As he gave Oh Kye-ok his instructions for keeping Bong-nam healthy, he kept one eye on Korea, who was talking with Kim In-ho.

The man had given him a roughspun cloak to cover his tattered military one.

"We looked into it like you wanted, sir."

"Don't call me that."

"Yes, s- Yes, Korea." The man cleared his throat. "There are rumours that a Provincehuman has been arrested and sent to the Pyongyang Men's Prison in South Pyongan province."

Kangwon raised his brows. Had Korea asked them to gather information back when he had been injured? He really had been planning ahead.

Korea narrowed his eyes. "Arrested for what?"

Kim In-ho said awkwardly, "Murder, so the rumours say."

Kangwon raised his brows higher. It seemed while he was living an inconspicuous, crime-free life, some of his fellow provinces were not.

"No Korean province would kill someone without good reason," Korea dismissed. "It must have been self-defense. Or a Jap plot."

"Most likely," Kim In-ho agreed quickly.

"Good work," Korea praised. "I have nothing to thank you with, aside from the promise that one day, I will free you."

His voice was so assured that those gathered had no choice but to believe him. He had a way about him, Kangwon thought. When he spoke, you got the sense that what he said had to be true.

'Kangwon, I need you,' he had said on that first day.

But that had been when he was injured. Now that the healing was up to his own body, he didn't, surely. Kangwon chewed on his thumbnail.

"That promise is enough for us." The man dipped his head.

“I’m going then.”

“Kangwon-do?” Kim In-ho turned to him. “Will you be going with him?”

All eyes turned to Kangwon. Korea’s were especially piercing, as if challenging him.

‘Are you?’

Was he? He didn’t know the first thing about fighting back or revolution.

Then again, neither did Korea. He only spoke like he did, and he was so confident that you had to believe him when he said he was going to change things or that the stitches would be no problem for you. Yet he was still going to fight. To try, at least, to fix the rot that spread through their society.

His wound analogy had been accurate. Their country was a gangrenous wound, one that needed the infection scraped out, not just those Occupying them, but people like that landlord, who would have a boy whipped for taking something that he had plenty of, or those that decreed if you had no money you would receive no care.

Did Kangwon want to spend the rest of his life watching the village rot before his eyes? Did he want to see Bong-nam come back in a month, beaten for going after the landlord’s boy, then see him as a teen, whipped for stealing what he needed to survive, then to hear that as an adult, he had been executed for daring to fight back?

His jaw clenched, and he felt his nail snap down to the quick. It was unfair. It had always been unfair, he could just never do anything about it.

‘We can change it,’ Korea had declared. Kangwon believed him. And while he wasn’t sure he would be a great help…

He didn't think he could just sit back and do what little he could anymore. Just as setting that goshawk free had left him with the knowledge of what loneliness felt like, he knew that if he let Korea fly away, he would be left knowing what anger was.

"If I left," he began slowly. "Would you be able to get by?"

Kim In-ho nodded immediately. "I may not be as good as you, but I remember everything you taught me. So do the others, and we've been teaching some of the kids, too. If you have to leave, you can know that we'll be fine."

"Yeah!" Bong-nam cheered from his mother's arms. "Doc's going to go fight the Japanese with Big Brother!"

Kangwon inhaled deeply. "Yeah, I am." From the corner of his eye, he saw Korea's muscles relax the slightest bit. "And you aren't. You're going to grow up and take care of your mom and not get in any more trouble, right?"

Bong-nam pursed his lips. "Right."

"Promise."

The boy's shoulders slumped. "I promise."

"Good." Kangwon hesitated, then added, "Korea is right. What happened to you was unfair. You need to remember that. Don't ever let yourself tolerate it. But be smart, so one day you can grow up and try to make things fair."

Bong-nam brightened. "I will!"

"Thank you, Kangwon-do," Oh Kye-ok said, tears in her eyes. "For everything you've done for us."

"You've done far more for me," Kangwon replied, a bit guilty. "But I'm afraid I can't pay you back."

"Just help Korea free our country." Kim In-ho clasped his arm. "Good luck."

"Luck doesn't exist," Korea said. "We'll succeed because we have to. Let's go."

“Yeah.” Kangwon took in a deep breath, then smiled, feeling less nervous than he’d thought he would. “Let’s go cauterize this wound.”

And when Korea took flight, he spread his wings with him.

—

1952

Kangwon jumped from the back of the Jeep, Liaoxi and Liaotung following.

“Did you find him?” he called, spotting SH emerging from the woods.

She looked frustrated to see it was just them. “Not yet.”

Chagang had apparently seen Korea walking off towards the bunker in the middle of the day, which wasn’t normal for him, both because he never took breaks, and because he’d taken the keys to the GAZ with him.

“I’ve got the spare key Korea gave me for the bunker padlock, so it’s not like we’re locked out,” SH said, running her hand over her bandaged head. “But we can’t leave the GAZ there all night. And we can’t leave Korea wherever he is.”

Kangwon shoved his hands in his pockets. “Do we know he came here? You don’t think he ran off again, do you?”

“China’s still here, so that’s not likely,” Liaotung said, tossing the tarp across the Jeep.

SH nodded. “And his footprints are here.” She pointed to one of the pairs on the ground, leading off under the trees. “But we lost them in the places where the snow is thin. I'm sorry to pull you away from the hospital, but you’re our best tracker, and I’m worried-“

She cut herself off, wringing her hands. Kangwon dipped his head.

"I'm sure he's fine. Let's go look."

SH scurried off under the trees, followed by Liaoxi.

"I'll stay here in case he comes back," Liaotung volunteered, hopping up on the hood of the Jeep.

Kangwon followed his cousin, catching glimpses of the others off in the woods. He could hear South Pyongan calling for Korea, her voice muffled by her face mask, and once he reached the area SH pointed out as being where the last footprints could be spotted, he could see her and North Pyongan through the trees.

With SH distracted calling, he crouched, examining Korea's bootprints.

They were deep, like he was putting way too much pressure on them, favouring both legs. And they weren't straight. Usually Korea's gait was precise, each foot landing almost directly in front of the other. But on this trail, his toes kept pointing in different directions.

'That doesn't look good.'

Kangwon looked in the direction the toe of the last print was pointing, and saw someone step out from behind a tree deeper in the woods.

It was China.

He looked directly at Kangwon, subtly beckoning him over. The province looked around at his occupied cousins, then trotted towards him.

China disappeared behind the tree, then emerged from behind another one farther away.

'Oookay.'

Deciding to trust the process, Kangwon followed him through the forest this way, passing by North Hamgyong, who was kicking at rocks like he expected to find their Countryhuman hiding under one. He made a face as Kangwon passed.

He sighed. Out of all his cousins, the green-skinned man had been the most upset over hearing about Hae. Even Hwang had said he understood, just to please never do it again. But North Hamgyong was acting like he hadn't told them she'd died for real, even though he had been the one to make Hwang worry by bringing up the possibility in the first place.

It was like he'd really wanted to be right about something awful having happened to Hae, but learning he had been was some sort of betrayal.

'Maybe that means there's hope for him yet.'

Kangwon passed him by, following China along the curve of Jangsan, farther than he'd thought, occasionally catching glimpses of Korea's footprints in the thin snow under the trees. They meandered back and forth, but the Countryhuman was taking him on a straight path, so he ignored them.

Eventually when the spine of the mountain above started to lower, the edge of the ridge tapering, Kangwon reached the last place he'd seen China to find him waiting.

He had his mask on, but was wearing his ushanka normally, showing his angular white eyes. They squinched up as he held a finger over his hidden lips, then pointed up the mountainside.

Kangwon looked up, scanning the grey rock and brown trees that grew on the slope. He looked back to find China was already gone.

Okay, a hint was better than nothing, he guessed.

He started up the slope, keeping an eye out. There was half a footprint in a dusting of snow, there was a shelf that had been wiped clean, and there was a smear of blood over a sharp spur of rock that made him climb faster, following the little frozen droplets of crimson until he came to a split in the stone that bored into the mountainside at a forty-five degree angle. The snow at the mouth had drag marks leading into the dark.

“Korea?” Kangwon ventured.

No one responded, but he thought he heard something inside. Hoping it was his Countryhuman, and not a fox or some other animal, he shifted closer.

“Korea?”

“Go away,” a voice rasped weakly.

Kangwon sighed in relief, sitting back on his haunches. “Everyone’s looking for you. What are you doing in there?”

“None of your… business.”

There was a wet wheeze, and a short cough that Kangwon had years of identifying as the sound someone made when their lungs were full of mucus, but they didn’t want to have a coughing fit.

“Korea, you’re sick,” he finally declared to his face. Well, to the dark hole in the ground.

“I am not,” he growled, then lost the battle against his lungs, starting to cough, a wet hacking sound that rattled in his chest, echoing out of the small hole and across the mountainside.

It just kept going, until Kangwon couldn’t take it anymore, trying to reach in to thump him on the back.

“Don’t… touch… me,” Korea wheezed through his fit, his voice reedy and thin. He finally stopped coughing, struggling for air. “I’m not… sick.”

“Korea, please tell me your symptoms,” Kangwon begged. “We were in Balnam-ri. If you have the plague-“

“I don’t,” he snapped. “I’m- I’m-“

He started to cough again, louder, more desperate.

“A cough,” Kangwon said when he stopped. “Mucus in your lungs. A fever. Dizziness, I’d guess.”

Korea's temperature hadn't gone down since their confrontation in the Quarantine Hospital. He'd been burning up on the way to Balnam-ri and back, and his unsteady footsteps said he was having balance trouble. And the fact that he was hiding in a hole said he wasn't thinking straight.

"Those can all be signs of the flu, but they can also be signs of plague," he said, allowing a bit of his genuine concern into his voice. "And we're in the sweet spot for symptoms to show up if we got infected in that village. I need to know any others."

Korea was silent for a long moment. Then, "Sore throat."

"Sudden onset or gradual?"

"Sudden," he said grudgingly.

"Any aches or chills?"

"Yes. Both."

"Exhaustion?"

"Weariness," Korea corrected acidicly. "Just tell me the plague symptoms again. I'll tell you if I have those."

There were three types of plague, all caused by Pasteurella pestis- bubonic, septicemic, and pneumonic. They affected the lymph nodes, blood, and lungs respectively. The outbreak killing villagers in Balnam-ri was currently bubonic.

"Swollen lymph nodes, especially around your groin, or skin discoloration?"

"No."

"Have you actually checked your skin?" he asked knowingly.

"I know I don't have swollen lymph nodes," his Countryhuman growled. "And I think I would notice if my skin was necrotizing."

He probably wouldn't. But Kangwon would have to get him out of the hole before he checked that.

"Any seizures? Vomiting? Stomach issues?"

"No, no, and-" Korea panted, his breath rattling in his lungs, but fought off the fit. "No."

The lack of swelling in his lymph nodes was a promising sign against bubonic plague, though Kangwon wouldn't be reassured until he could look at him.

"Stomach pain? Bleeding from anywhere you shouldn't be? Low blood pressure?"

He received a negative for all of them, and a, "High… blood pressure."

Hm. Probably not septicemic then.

"Headaches? Shortness of breath? Chest pain?"

Korea didn't answer.

"Korea."

"…Yes," he finally admitted. "To all three."

Kangwon put the back of his fist to his mouth. "You've got all the symptoms of pneumonic plague."

"I don't have the fucking plague!" Korea snapped. "I checked that hazmat suit twenty times, and there wasn't a single hole. I am fine."

"You probably are," Kangwon soothed. "Those are all symptoms of regular pneumonia, too, and the flu. But we can't take any chances here. Pneumonic plague is always fatal if it doesn't get treated. I need to take a sample of sputum- your mucus- for testing."

"I'm fine," Korea repeated. "I just need to rest."

Kangwon hesitated, then nodded to himself. "You do," he said. "That's why I want you to go into a recuperative coma."

"No," his Countryhuman said immediately, shifting in the darkness. "Not happening. I just need a day, that's all."

"Korea." Kangwon leaned forward on his palms, looking into the hole, catching a gleam of light off of his eye. "You've been driving yourself as hard as you can since the war began. That's-"

He'd been going to say 'almost two years now,' but caught himself before he could.

"If you do have the flu, it's no wonder- you don't sleep, you don't eat, you don't let us disinfect your wounds-"

"I clean them."

"But you don't disinfect them," Kangwon stressed. "Your immune system can't take all of that."

"It can," Korea growled.

"It clearly can't. You're hiding in a hole in the ground." He patted the mouth of it. "That's not really what a healthy man does."

Let alone Korea. He actually did have a strong immune system. The provinces had caught bouts of stomach flu before, and colds had frequently torn through the revolutionary ranks during the war against Japan. Korea had either dodged or tanked them admirably.

Which was why Kangwon really didn't like that he was hiding like a wounded animal right now.

"You need rest," he said when his Countryhuman hadn't spoken up. "Real rest."

"I can't," Korea rasped. "I have a job to do."

"The talks are at a stalemate right now," Kangwon reminded him.

"And what if that changes?" the man shot back. "What if we finally have a chance to settle the POW issue?"

"Then you trust our comrades to handle it," Kangwon said patiently. “It’s not like you haven’t already gone over every possibility with them.”

“If it is settled, then Gangwon will be the only issue standing between us and a ceasefire,” Korea argued. “Without me to stop them, someone could decide to hand him over.”

“No one’s going to risk going behind you or the Premier’s backs to do that,” Kangwon soothed. “He’s my brother, but I’m not even worried about that.”

He doubted there was a single person in the halls of power that would want to hand over one of their provinces, let alone go against Korea to do it. And most of them didn’t know the Americans were right, and they did have Gangwon.

Korea shifted, his eye gleaming desperately in the dark. “You need me.”

“We need you healthy,” Kangwon corrected. “And if you don’t get some proper rest, you’re just going to get worse. If you don’t have the plague, you might be able to muscle through this. But then it’s only a matter of time before you get sick again, and more severely. Where while if you take a month and a half-long recuperative coma, your system will have time to repair itself completely.”

Korea’s voice grew tighter. “I can’t be out for that long.”

“A month.”

“A week.”

“That’s barely anything,” Kangwon pointed out. “If you want to actually heal, and avoid being forced to take more time off, you’ll go for a month. That’s my professional opinion.”

“…Three weeks,” Korea counterproposed.

He exhaled. “Alright. Three weeks.”

“And you wake me up the second something happens with the talks.”

"I wake you up the second something important happens with the talks."

"Everything is important," Korea growled.

"Yeah, but I'm not waking you up just because the Americans promise to hand the list over again." He honestly wouldn't wake him up even if they did. The prisoners would still be in the camps even with the missing names in their hands.

"…Fine," he grudgingly agreed. "But I don't want to be in the hospital."

Kangwon didn't bother arguing. He wanted him to rest, not to wake up every ten seconds convinced someone was coming to kill him.

"Where would you feel safe?"

The hole was silent.

"What about with the Premier?"

The energy coming from the cleft brightened, then darkened again.

"No. I don't want to get him sick."

"The bunker?"

"I don't want to get the others sick."

"You'll be in your room," Kangwon told him. "And when you're better, I'll scrub it with calcium hypochlorite."

That, mixed with a bit of hot water and mercuric chloride, made a good disinfectant. And Kangwon had priority access to the cleaning materials being rapidly churned out.

"How about that?" he prompted when Korea hadn't said anything.

"No."

Trying not to sound impatient when he really wanted to test Korea for the plague, he asked, “Why not?”

His Countryhuman shifted, breath shuddering in his lungs. “No.”

His claustrophobia, maybe? Or just the idea of being in a place with only one exit.

Kangwon could’ve pointed out that Korea had literally slept in a storage closet in the chosonjip, or that he was currently crammed in a dark hole that was barely big enough for a person. But he got that the body was weird. Korea’s comfort didn’t have to follow any logic, he just had to be comfortable.

“If you don’t want to be in a hospital, or around any of our leadership, the air raid shelter’s pretty much all that’s left,” Kangwon pointed out.

“If I’m sleeping here, I could be ambushed.”

“What if we set some of our bodyguards outside?”

“No,” Korea said sharply. “Don’t tell anyone that I’m… sick.”

The word came out reluctantly, and slurred.

“What if one of us stood watch then?” Kangwon suggested.

“You have jobs to do.” Korea’s voice went suddenly tight again. “I can’t do this. Just leave me alone. I’ll be better by tomorrow.”

“No you won’t,” Kangwon said patiently. “You’ll go into the bunker and enter a recuperative coma, and one of the others will stand guard during the day. SH and Hwang both have things they can work on here. That way you’ll be safe, and won’t have to lock your door.”

“I need to,” Korea said, alarmed.

“No,” Kangwon firmly denied. “Korea, please, don’t lock your door, even during the day. We can’t open it from the outside, so if something happens to you, we won’t be able to get in.”

There was a rustle as Korea adjusted himself, thinking. "…Fine," he eventually clipped. "But no one comes in unless it's to wake me up."

"I'll come in to clean your wounds, but no one else will," Kangwon promised.

"No," Korea said. "I don't want you to treat me."

Pain lanced through Kangwon's chest, but he kept his voice steady.

"Then who would you feel comfortable with?"

"No one. No one'ssh… touching me while I'm out."

Kangwon just wanted to get him down the mountain before he passed out. "Someone needs to."

"No." Korea's eye narrowed as his dark shape pressed farther back into the crack. "No food, no cleaning my burns. Just get Kim Yong-hwan to give me water."

He'd technically be fine without food, since his body would be running on as few processes as possible (if he actually let it go into a coma), but the burns were an issue.

"You need disinfecting," Kangwon stressed. "And do you really think Kim Yong-hwan is going to agree to come all the way out here just to give you water?"

"I don't want someone touching me while I'm asleep," Korea said tightly, squeezing even farther back, drawing his limbs in.

"What about the Premier?"

"I'm not making him drive out here just to deal with me," his Countryhuman muttered, though he'd hesitated a little.

Kangwon wrapped his arms around his knees. "You know, I took care of you while you slept for two months. And I never hurt you."

The gleam of Korea's eye disappeared as he turned away from the opening. "I don't think you're going to hurt me, Kangwon," he muttered, the new position adding a deeper wheeze to his words. "I told you it's not about you. I just don't want anyone… looking at me."

His shadow shrank in on itself. Kangwon silently exhaled.

"Alright," he gave in. "No cleaning."

Korea also gave in. "You can be the one to give me water. And juk, if you have to. Just don't take advantage and give me more than usual. Half rations."

Kangwon didn't try to argue for full. He knew it wouldn't work. "Okay."

"And don't let anyone take my clothes off," he added, slightly desperately. "I don't want anyone touching me."

"If the Premier is ever in the area…?"

"I don't want him going out of his way."

Kangwon nodded. That was as close as Korea would let himself get to consenting. He'd ask the man to come by once or twice to use his simple field medicine to clean out his burns. He knew Kim Il-sung wouldn't see it as going out of his way.

"I need to put affairs in order before I… sleep," Korea said, shifting back towards the mouth of the hole again.

"You need to get to rest," Kangwon said firmly. "I'll get SH to tell the Premier. He'll make sure everything's sorted."

"I need-"

"Korea, you might have the plague," Kangwon interrupted. "You aren't going anywhere but the bunker so I can take my sample and get it tested. Otherwise you might infect someone else. Do you want that?"

"…No," Korea grumbled.

"Then let's get you down."

"One more thing," he said. "Get some of the blood I donated and give it to Jong-il and Kyong-hui. I don't want them getting sick."

"That's probably not how it works," Kangwon told him.

"I don't care. It's worth a try." Korea peered up at him. "Do it."

"Alright." It couldn't harm the Premier's children at least.

There was a rustling, and Kangwon stepped back, watching as Korea's arms reached up out of the hole, followed by his head, squinting his eye against the light as he squeezed his shoulders out, then his hips, before dragging his legs free. He crouched for a moment, blinking in the sunlight, and Kangwon keenly examined his neck, looking for any sign of swelling in the lymph nodes there.

Gradually, he stood, swaying on the uneven ground. Kangwon went to steady him, but he flinched back.

He looked… rough. Even worse than the last time he'd seen him. His eye was sunken in, but his eyelid was swollen, turning his monolid to a double one. The red over it looked raw and irritated, and the red under it was stained a dark purple. His thin lips had gone from chapped to cracked, and he had blood smeared over his face. Kangwon subtly checked his hands, seeing the blood-soaked bandage his fingers were clutching compulsively around. He'd probably cut it on that rock.

The bandage looked caked into his blue skin. He'd get the Premier to visit almost immediately. He didn't think Korea had even been washing his burns for the past few days.

"See?" Korea said defiantly, tilting his chin up. "I'm fine."

Fever shone in his eye as it roved erratically, like he couldn't focus on any one thing.

"Yeah, and you'll be even better after a rest," Kangwon said, smiling. He offered his arm, but Korea walked by him, heading down the slope. He didn't make it far before he started visibly shaking, but he kept going.

Kangwon scrubbed a hand over his face. It should've made him relieved he'd finally managed to convince Korea to rest, but…

The fact that he'd agreed honestly worried him even more.

He sighed, and went to make sure he didn't fall down the mountain.

Happy New Year comrades!! I didn't do anything last night because I'm still sort of sick and don't want to give anyone it, so I just made tteokguk with evil tteok. I think they were life-shortening tteok if anything.

I really like egg onigiri but I think people that get it in the morning have something wrong with them. Because they're either just eating cold egg yolk inside cold rice or they're heating it up and risking getting egg yolk on their shirts. Egg onigiri is a night food.

Someone Like You

The bunker door squealed open, and Hwang turned to see the Premier emerging from the darkness, stripping medical gloves from his hands to tuck into a satchel. It was old and worn enough that the province suspected it might be a relic from his 'previous life,' as it were. It clashed with his black suit, despite its militaristic cut.

"Is he well?" Hwang fretted, his eyes darting to the young man the General had left to watch the door with him- Hyon Chol-hae.

As the man's personal bodyguard, he must be trustworthy, yet he still hesitated to discuss Korea's condition in front of him. His own guards were at the treeline, out of audio range.

"Better now," the Premier said, peeling off his face mask to store in a pocket, so it wouldn't touch the bloodstained gloves.

Hwang nervously looked at Hyon Chol-hae, then quietly advised, "While your care for Korea is appreciated, I think it may be safer if you don't interact with him until he's recovered. If you caught something…"

He trailed off, waiting for the man to interrupt him like others would. Kim Il-sung just watched him patiently, waiting.

He cleared his throat. "It wouldn't be beneficial for our country."

"Comrade Hwang's concern for me is also appreciated," the Premier said warmly. "But this arrangement is necessary. And I've risked more for my country. The flu is a far less fiercesome enemy than the Japanese."

It was just the flu, thankfully. Kangwon had rushed the sample taken from Korea through the laboratory, and confirmed it. It must have simply been brought on from a poor diet and exhaustion.

Though in their current climate, any illness was dangerous.

“It’s also far more difficult to shoot and kill,” Hwang said worriedly, making the man chuckle.

“That is the truth. But I couldn’t leave Comrade Korea to suffer.”

Hwang didn’t entirely see why Kangwon couldn’t just tend to Korea and tell him the Premier had, considering he’d never know. Perhaps that blurred patient consent a bit, but when the patient's demands were unreasonable (and he was part of your household), surely that wasn’t unforgivable. And Kangwon really didn’t follow the Hippocratic Oath in the first place. And while he followed the Declaration of Geneva in spirit, he’d never officially taken the vow.

Hm. It had always puzzled Hwang that, when asked, Kangwon had specifically clarified that he hadn’t taken it and wouldn’t. He wasn’t the sort to reject it simply because it had been drafted by foreigners after all. But now that it had come out that he’d been lying about Hae’s condition, perhaps that was why he wouldn’t take the oath- the article about maintaining the honour and noble traditions of the medical profession could be construed as not lying while practicing.

“While I’m here,” the Premier said, interrupting his suspicious mulling. “I bear good news that I believe our Comrade Korea might have been too preoccupied these past few days to share.”

Hwang perked up. “What is it?”

“The enemy’s operative within our system has been removed.”

Relief spread inside his chest, overwhelming him.

He closed his eyes. “Who was it? If that can be shared.”

“A woman by the name of Pak Um-ja,” he replied. “You have actually encountered her, I believe- she worked at the Telephone Exchange.”

Hwang smacked a fist into his hand. “The older woman that was there the day I took the call?”

After Kangwon had shared his North Pyongan-Maine dialect theory, Hwang had remembered that one of the women there on the day Choe Jung-nam had died had a more northerly Pyongan dialect, and had seemed to be reluctant to leave the room, and submitted her for investigation. But he hadn't expected it to actually be a hit.

The man nodded. "Her coworkers said they caught her trying to listen in during your call. When questioned, they admitted they'd had suspicions on her for awhile, but as their senior, they were hesitant to report her."

Hwang sighed. 'And still bureaucracy in the workplace.'

Though he knew it would take decades before there wasn't. As he'd said to North Hamgyong- cultural change took time.

"How did she manage to get so much information on our movements?" he asked, subtly eyeing their bodyguards.

The General seemed to pay them no mind. "As a civilian, she wasn't subject to the same scrutiny those with military positions are. But she still benefitted from military knowledge- her son is in the Signal Corps, stationed at a nearby checkpoint."

'Ah.' That explained it. Even with the repeated reminders to keep military information confidential, many soldiers wouldn't see that as applying to their own parents. They would naïvely assume they were safe to share it with. And being at a checkpoint would not only give the man the chance to witness Korea and the provinces moving around firsthand, but access to any cables about them.

"I hope they're both learning their lesson?" Hwang asked.

It wasn't the soldier's fault that someone that should have been safe, wasn't. Yet his light mouth couldn't go unpunished.

The Premier's lips twisted into a moue. "The son has been discharged. But there's a mild wrinkle- the woman wasn't feeding information out of malice."

"Let me guess," Hwang sighed. "A husband or other child taken prisoner by the enemy?"

The Premier nodded. “Husband. We’ve confirmed he’s one of those on the list of missing names.”

The thirty-eight thousand they knew to be KPA soldiers. Hwang had likely looked at his name with his own eyes just recently.

“She was being threatened with his death if she didn’t do as the Americans wanted,” the man continued. “Yet she didn’t turn herself over willingly, so she can’t take advantage of voluntary surrender.”

“What about her son?”

“He is sharing everything he ever told her so we have a grasp of what the enemy might know. He’ll be dealt with leniently.” The Premier tapped the toe of his black boot on the frozen ground. “And the woman has been offered leniency in the form of a deal. She still has the radio equipment the enemy provided her with. If she can successfully feed them false information, her charges will be lessened.”

If the enemy understood what she was doing, her life would be at risk, as well as the life of her husband in the camps. It was the ultimate form of proving she wasn’t a true traitor, only a manipulated woman.

“Well, I’m glad,” Hwang said quietly. “It seems the efforts of the compatriots that fought to get us this information weren’t for nothing.”

The Premier gave him a smile as his rough hand patted his shoulder. “No. They weren’t.”

Hwang didn’t know how much the man knew about what had happened. He was only the Premier, theoretically he shouldn’t be aware of the identity of every single one of their agents or what was transpiring with leaks and operatives around them.

Yet his smile seemed more empathetic than usual, and he seemed to have sought this information out specifically for Hwang. Perhaps Korea truly did tell him everything.

Not for the first time, the province wondered what exactly it was about Kim Il-sung that had drawn their Countryhuman to him. Of course he was a great general and tireless patriot, but many in the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army had shared those qualities. Yet not a single other would be trusted to clean Korea's wounds while he slept. He didn't even trust the provinces with that.

There was a chance the Premier was the only person in Korea that knew what the Countryhuman had gone through in those nine years he was imprisoned by Japan (the South excepted, of course). Hwang would never know because every time he asked, the human man just gave him that enigmatic smile and said something to the effect of 'Our country has shared a great many things with me. I would be remiss to pass any of them on.'

It would be nice if Korea could at least have trusted someone with a lighter mouth. Though he supposed light mouths sunk ships, as with Pak Um-ja.

"Thank you for sharing this with me," he said, dipping his head to their Premier. "Is it information the others can hear?"

The man dipped his head back. "Of course. Comrade Korea has his concerns, but I have faith that no more of our provinces will be lost."

Hwang opened his mouth, then closed it.

That was one question even he wasn't sure he wanted the answer to.

The Premier said his goodbyes, and departed with Hyon Chol-hae, Hwang bidding him to drive safe. If the man were to be hit by an enemy bomb while returning from treating Korea, not only would they lose a source of morale and a valued tactician, but Korea would bear that burden for… Well, likely forever.

Hwang was left with his bodyguards, Min Hak-sol and Pak Kong-sun, both of whom had served in Manchuria during the war against Japan. Since they hadn't fought with them directly, they must be recommendations from the Premier. That was the only substitute Korea would accept for personal ties.

Pak Kong-sun was the silent type, but quite useful for bouncing ideas off of, and Min Hak-sol enjoyed a good discussion now and again. Though currently he was scanning the forest with his dark eyes.

Ostensibly, they didn't know Korea was ill. In practice, Hwang thought they might have suspicions about why he'd stood guard over the bunker for half the day two days in a row.

They didn't say anything, sensing his pensive mood as he settled in for the rest of his shift.

The leak was eliminated. Choi Jung-nam had done his job.

There would always be more enemy operatives, of course. But to lose one in such an advantageous position… America would feel this.

And yet not as deeply as Hwang felt the loss of his former student.

The Americans were playing with pawns, a game lacking in emotion. They didn't care about the elimination of their guerrilla squads or their informants, beyond tactical considerations. They didn't care about the woman who now had to risk her life to feed them false information, or her son who had lost his army job and benefits, or her husband in their camps.

But for Hwang and his comrades, every piece on the board was a wife, son, mother, or brother. Every one eliminated was someone that had served their country loyally, or could have with a bit of re-education. Someone that could have done great things for Korea, if only they'd been given the chance.

'Someone we know.'

And Hwang had still chosen to risk Choi Jung-nam's life so swiftly.

He told SH the good news when she came to relieve him, trailed by China.

His cousin let out a sigh, as relieved as he'd been. "That's good." Her hands wrung the sides of her long coat, unable to reach the hem. “I still wish there was something we could do for Grace.”

“If it helps,” China said from the door. “She is still an American. There’s a good chance she deserves to suffer for other misdemeanours.”

“That doesn’t help, actually.” SH shot a look at him. “And you had better not be creeping into Korea’s room.” Realizing her tone, she added more sweetly, “It wouldn’t do for our comrade to catch anything.”

“Of course I’m not. I moved all of my things back into the men’s room, didn’t I?” China gave a mock shudder. “I hate sick people almost as much as I hate Yankees. I’m staying far away from your Countryhuman until he stops being infectious.”

With another shiver, he slid inside, the steel door shutting quietly.

SH narrowed her eyes at it. “What are the chances that Korea actually told him about Grace and that mission?”

“Highly unlikely,” Hwang appraised.

In fact, the foreign Countryhuman shouldn’t know who Grace Hartman was at all. The only times they had discussed her were at the criticism session after being reunited, shortly after that when the provinces had been asking each other clarifying questions about aspects of their accounts (sadly no one had asked about his bear encounter), and with Korea in relation to the mission.

The extent of China's knowledge of their private affairs went beyond narrowed eyes. If he gleaned too much of their inner workings, it could be dangerous when the war was over. Knowing how they operated, ingratiating Liaoxi in with North Pyongan, even just being aware of their family dynamic could all be used against them.

Hwang didn’t bring it up with Korea, as it was obvious he would have predicted the same dangers. But knowing that, it was baffling that he hadn’t put his foot down and sent the other Countryhuman home. It was also baffling that China hadn’t chosen to go home with America actively seeking to prove he was here to justify military intervention directly against his country.

It made him suspect he was taking the risk specifically to gather intelligence on them. Though why he would be so dedicated to gaining arrows in his quiver against Korea- a much smaller, friendly nation- while risking the wrath of a far more powerful one that was already seeking war with him, he didn't know.

Or maybe he was being too cynical, and he was simply here to help.

Hwang left SH behind, returning to the city in one of the small GAZ-67's that had been requisitioned for their watches. In case of emergency, they needed to be able to abscond from the area with Korea as fast as possible.

He had half the day left, and had intended to go to Kim Il-sung University to write up reminders for every facet of their society to combat bureaucracy and the old ways of refusing to question seniors, both in the family and workplace. Yet he found himself turning the vehicle before he reached the mountain pass, following another road worn between the fields into the hills.

His boots scuffed the hard ground outside the Quarantine Hospital as he bid his guards to remain outside. Best not to chance all of their well-beings for an emotional indulgence.

"Comrade Hwang." A man standing outside the hospital doors darted towards him. Kim Pong-ju, one of Hae's guards. The other was likely stationed outside her window. "Are you here to visit Comrade Hae?"

Hwang hesitated, then nodded. "Yes."

Foolish, perhaps. But he needed to see her. That subtle 'missing' feeling had been growing more distracting, though whether it was a true physical reaction from not seeing his other half for so long, or simply psychosomatic, he didn't know. Their separation over a year ago didn't provide any conclusions- his fear from the moment she'd left his side eclipsed any meaningful observations.

“Could you give her this?” Kim Pong-ju held out a bracelet made of woven straw. “My sister made it for her.” He quickly added, “Ah didn’ tell her about her condition. She just knows ah’m assigned to her ‘cuz Comrade Hae insisted we went and paid my family a visit, and she’s real worried, what with the germ warfare. She made it to cheer her up. Used her allowance to pay for the delivery fee herself.”

There was a proud tint to the last words.

“Of course I’ll bring it to her.” Hwang took the bracelet. “Has she awoken yet?”

Kim Pong-ju’s face shuttered, looking suddenly like the picture of a bodyguard who was willing to die to protect his charge’s secrets.

“I’m aware she’s in a recuperative coma,” the province clarified, and the serious look dispersed as quickly as it came.

“No, she hasn’ woken up yet,” he said regretfully. “But ah think it’ll do good for her to see we were all thinkin’ about her when she does.”

Should Hwang have done that? Though he didn’t know what he’d make. He wasn’t exactly crafty.

More importantly, was that confirmation that Hae’s bodyguards had been aware of Kangwon’s lie? If so, that made him feel slightly better. Personal objections aside, it would have been more difficult to protect her if they didn’t know she was compromised.

Though Kangwon was playing a dangerous game if he’d instructed the men to lie to Korea. Perhaps he’d only made sure they were scarce when he came around. Hwang would have to ask when he got a chance.

“Thank you for thinking of Comrade Hae,” he said, and Kim Pong-ju saluted.

“Anythin’ for my province.”

His province. It wasn’t exactly a clear delineation that Hwang wasn't his province. But it came close. Kim Pong-ju was from Changyon County, in the south of Hwanghae.

He didn't feel any jealousy. His own bodyguards referred to him in a similar way. But rather…

Hwang went inside the hospital, using his status as a Provincehuman to defy the quarantine, though promising to abide by the procedures he was given, being as humble and polite as possible to offset the negative image barging in this way could bring.

The nurse at the counter barely noticed, sending him through decontamination before hustling off as an alarm started to ring from deeper in the hospital.

Hwang donned the protective wear he was provided- a long white coat, gloves that went past his elbows, and gauze to wrap around his head, along with a face mask, the cobbled together version of what the bacteriologists in the field wore. The plague victims were being quarantined elsewhere, usually in the homes where they fell ill, to avoid the spread, but he didn't relish the idea of catching typhus, paratyphoid fever, tuberculosis, or any number of rickettsial diseases that the rickettsia bacteria dropped on both South Pyongan and also apparently Liaoxi's capital of Shenyang could cause.

Or the cholera the flies airdropped on Pyongyang's central district three days ago had been infected with.

He shuddered as he walked through the white halls, maintaining proximity to the wall to stay out of the nurses' and doctors' ways, but not touching it, mindful of the teams of workers in white suits methodically scrubbing one corridor with acrid chemicals. Loud moans echoed from behind closed doors, the sounds of men and women with disease eating away at their bodies.

"I want my mom," one man's muffled voice called, sounding far too old to be making the request. "Mom, please, it hurts."

"Hold on, Mr. Ku," a woman begged back. "Your medicine is on its way."

“Mommy,” the old man sobbed, and Hwang picked up his feet.

He would never say he hated the ill as China had. But he didn’t entirely enjoy being around those whose faculties had been ravaged by pain. Or being reminded of how easily it could happen to him.

Hae shouldn’t be here. If she wasn’t contagious anymore, she should be away from all this.

He found the room he’d been directed to, and slipped inside, belatedly realizing he’d forgotten to knock.

Gangwon looked up from a pallet on the floor in surprise, a small tin bowl balanced on his knees. He quickly swallowed the last of his rice, and stood.

“Hwang,” he said, wiping his mouth. “W-What are you doing here?”

“I came to visit Hae.” His eye was drawn to her form, supine on the small cot, relieved to immediately see the rise and fall of her chest under the white cotton sheet.

“She’s getting better.” Gangwon frowned with concentration as he made signs to accompany his words, though he dropped them to chew his nail as he said, “I’m just on a quick break, so I have to get going. B-But I wanted to say I’m sorry we didn’t tell you about her d-d- condition.”

“It’s alright,” Hwang assured him. “I understand why Kangwon did it. I’ll admit that I was a tad miffed to learn he’d lied to me.”

Especially directly to his face with no sign that that’s what he was doing.

“But we’ve settled the matter.”

He had asked his cousin to please never lie about an issue like Hae’s health again, and had received the reply of, ‘Yeah, I don’t really want Korea to kill me.’ Along with the explanation that Hae had been the one to request his secrecy. It felt unfair to blame Kangwon when he’d only been following his patient's request.

And when he looked so exhausted. And guilty.

"And you're blameless in this," he said to Gangwon. "We never had a chance to communicate after you came here."

"Even if we had, I would've lied to you anyways," the man admitted.

Hwang bobbed his head. "Naturally." The Kangwons were different people now, but not entirely different. "But you didn't get the chance. So let's just say you had nothing to do with it."

Gangwon followed his hands with his eyes. "Th-Thanks."

He scurried past him, pausing to put a hand on his shoulder, and give him a comforting smile.

"She really is getting better. I think she's going to wake up soon."

Then he put his face mask on, and whisked off, Hwang already able to hear someone calling for him in the hallway before the door was slid shut, muting the chaos outside.

Ah, he hadn't told him about the leak's capture. He'd do it on his way out, and be extra careful not to mention any names. The Premier had faith that no more of their provinces would fall to the enemy, but Gangwon had technically already fallen. Any information he knew was compromised information.

Perhaps it really was best not to tell him that China was wanted by the United Nations. With his placid demeanour, Kangwon often gave the impression that he didn't think much beyond current events, and Gangwon's nervous disposition only reinforced that on him. Not that Hwang was calling either of them unintelligent. They both simply seemed to be focused on the present, not possibilities.

But Kangwon's skillful lying, and Gangwon's admission that he would do the same had reminded him that they were both more clever than they acted. Even telling the latter that China had been taken to trial might be enough for him to start making connections. Korea had no intentions of handing him over to the enemy, but…

War was unpredictable. Knock on a stone bridge before crossing, as they said.

Hwang shook his head, exhaling as he crossed the small room to Hae's bedside, carefully placing the woven straw bracelet on her nightstand. There were several medical textbooks piled on it, likely Gangwon's, alongside his notes on sign language. Next to them was a piece of paper with an explanation that Hae was in the Quarantine Hospital, and that Gangwon would be right back, left to reassure her in case she woke up when he wasn't in the room.

There was another paper next to it, with three figures on it, and the words 'Get well soon, Comrade Hae' scrawled above them. At first Hwang thought it was another gift from Kim Pong-ju's sister, before realizing it was signed 'Kim Man-won and Kim Pong-ju.' The drawing was in the same hand as the first signature.

He glanced at the window, only able to see the trees on the hill the hospital was partially built into beyond the taped cross. But he knew the hulking Kim Man-won was out there.

He couldn't help but chuckle a little as he pictured the large man holding charcoal in his thick fingers to sketch the drawing of the bodyguards and Hae. Truly his sister was capable of winning over anyone.

His smile faded as he set the card back down, and placed the back of his hand against her forehead. It was cool, and the moment his skin touched hers, it was like a phantom pain had dissipated.

How had he lived with that absence for eleven years?

Hwang sat on the edge of the cot, then changed his mind. Hae was lying on her side, facing the sunlight coming in the window, so he went around to the other side of the bed, gingerly lying down with his legs awkwardly bent to keep the fabric tied over his boots off the sheets, facing her.

His sister's face wasn't peaceful. There was a line between her small white brows, and her bottom lip was pushed out in a pout, like she knew she was missing the start of sowing season.

Hwang swallowed. “Hae, I don’t know if you can hear me. Coma patients have reported being able to hear voices when they’re unconscious, but I don’t know if recuperative comas differ. I feel… a little silly talking to an empty room.”

He was instinctively speaking in a hushed tone, actually.

“I hope you’re okay,” he said, forcing his voice a little louder. “And that you’ll wake up soon.”

Hae’s face was still, her pink freckles stark against her pallid flag base.

Her brother cleared his throat. “I… lost someone dear to me recently. You’ve met him once before.”

He told her about Choi Jung-nam, and his final call. When she awoke, he wouldn’t be able to share it until the war was over. He had to admit, it felt cathartic to whisper the story to her sleeping form.

When he was finished, he took a shuddering breath. “Kangwon and SH assure me I’m not clinical, and I know logically that we made the right choice by sending him to do what he did. He accomplished his mission. It was necessary. But…”

Hwang gathered his words, more for himself than her.

“I can’t help wishing that I had hesitated to decide,” he murmured, his fingers curling in against the spotless sheets. “Even knowing I’d make the same decision. It’s illogical, but… I know you would have hesitated.”

He lifted his eyes to her sleeping face, tracing over the crisp edges of the bandages.

“I think… I want to be more like you,” he admitted quietly. “You’re right that I have my own good qualities, fields that I’m skilled in that you aren’t. But I’ve always admired how charismatic you are, even when you don’t realize it. You light up a room, and draw everyone in.”

That was the real reason his sister would always be more appealing to the masses, no matter how understandable the language Hwang used was. Her shared suffering let her understand them, and her loveable personality drew them towards her.

"You're so… warm."

It had been the first thing he'd thought when he met her. As emaciated and filthy as she'd been, locked away in a dank hole, when his hand had touched her arm, it had been warm. And as she turned to look at him, as sunken as her cheeks were, as confused and frightened as her expression was, her face had filled with the same warmth.

Hae was like a little piece of sun that had fallen down to Korea, radiating warmth and light, drawing everyone's eyes and affection towards her, not unlike Korea himself.

"I want to be warm like you," he murmured, reaching out to touch her cheek, feeling that same warmth he had then. "But…"

His hand slid away as he drew it close to his chest. This next part was shameful to admit.

"I don't want to be merged with you."

It wasn't as if he didn't know Hae felt similarly. When they'd spoken about it previously, unease always lurked under her expression, and she frequently talked about being made their own separate provinces. But he had always dodged her questions when she asked if that was what he wanted, or if he was looking forward to merging.

He should look forward to it. Their unification would be a direct symbolization of Korea's class divide narrowing, bringing together the best parts of the peasant and intellectual classes, creating the perfect province. Or at least an incredibly functional one. One who could thresh an entire rice field and grade over a hundred papers in a day, who always knew what words to use, who could lead a class and win hearts. Hwanghae, the way Hwanghae should be.

Yet he didn't. Ever since that night on the riverbank, when he had realized that he couldn't lose Hae, he'd lost any sense of neutrality at the idea. He didn't want to be Hwanghae. He wanted to be North Hwanghae.

He wanted to be Hwang. And he wanted his sister to be Hae.

"I want to be more like you," he repeated. "But I want to become more like you through my own strengths. I don't want to be gifted some miracle fix. I want to rely on myself to change. I want to learn how to be warm like you."

He squeezed his eyes shut, his glasses going askew as he buried his face in the cot, guilty at what felt like a betrayal. Not to his sister, who had been honest about wanting to remain herself for far longer than him, and not to their people, who already held their division in their hearts.

But to Korea.

"Ah think…"

Hwang jerked his head up, eyes wide as hurriedly adjusted his glasses, hardly daring to believe his ear slits.

"Hae?"

Her lips moved slowly, her eyes gleaming through the crack in her lids. "Ah think Hwang'shhh… plenny warm already."

Her hand twitched under the covers, trying to move towards him. He reached under, linking their fingers together desperately.

"But ah… don't want…"

She mouthed something, then her eyes rolled back in her head, bloodshot backs exposed under her stubby lashes as her head lolled to the side, lips still parted.

"Hae?" Hwang sat up, grabbing her shoulder. "Hae!"

A string of drool crept from her mouth, puddling on the sheets.

The line between her brows was gone.

Relief flooded through him as he clutched her close, not caring that her saliva was staining his white coat now instead. He squeezed his eyes closed, burying his face in her shoulder.

After his months of practicing with Gangwon as they learned sign language, he'd become adept at reading lips, enough to know what his sister's last sentence had been.

'Ah don't want to lose you either.'

Hwang held Hae close, and feeling like he was betraying Korea wasn't enough to stop him from rejoicing.

'You won't.'

When he left the room, her blush compact remained behind, pinning Gangwon's letter to the side table, the first thing she would see when she awoke for good.

Kangwon: I can't take that vow.

Hwang: You mean the Geneva Declaration? The one where the doctor vows to respect human rights and do no harm?

Kangwon: Yeah. Can't take it.

Hwang: …Why not?

Kangwon: Because I'd do harm.

Hwang: …What?

Kangwon: If a patient gives me permission, I'll do harm. (◜‿◝)

I don't want to misrepresent him, so I'll elaborate here. It's that 'so long as you did everything you could, it's not your fault' mindset. If the only chance of saving a patient was a really risky experimental medical procedure that could kill them, Kangwon would do it so long as they agreed to it (sort of like with Yun Jin-suk- giving a fourteen year-old girl an abortion with plants at eight months probably doesn't exactly fit in with the Geneva Declaration, but it was what was best for her, so Kangwon was willing to do it). Doctor 'Informed Patient Consent and Literally Nothing Else Is What's Important To Me' Kangwon.

Also his objection to the original Geneva Declaration was partly it saying 'I will have the utmost respect for human life from the time of conception,' because he was like 'Hm, don't like how that can be used in an anti-women's rights context. A life isn't a life from conception, and it can't supersede the life of the woman carrying it.'

Him, Maomao, and Dr. House. Questionable medical trio .

Every once and awhile I think about how Americans say Kim Il-sung has a cult of personality because of his statues. You CARVED the heads of SLAVE OWNERS into SACRED INDIGENOUS ROCK. You have MASSIVE HEADS OF YOUR FIRST LEADERS CARVED INTO A ROCK. Maybe you don't have the right to talk.

Philosophy Of A Scalpel

“So you really can cook.”

Kangwon startled slightly as the voice came from right behind him, eyes darting to see China leaning over his shoulder, gaze fixed on the juk he was making on the outdoor hearth.

“Were you here the entire time?” he asked.

He and SH’s bodyguards were out on the edge of the forest, watching the road. He thought they’d at least alert if they saw ‘Mao Zhilong.’

The Countryhuman smiled, not moving. “Who knows…? Have you been a chef this entire time?”

Kangwon shifted away, returning his attention to the juk, stirring the rice at the bottom of the heavy pot to keep it from burning.

He'd admit he was pulling out a few more of his cooking skills than usual by making a vegetable stock to simmer the rice in, and toasting the grain before combining it. He’d also admit (to himself, not China) that while he was sticking to using Korea’s rations like he wanted, and not making chicken juk, he had used his own funds to buy some radish, scallions, and garlic, and forgaged some mache greens, a winter namul.

Kangwon wouldn’t take advantage of his country’s sickness to feed him more. But he would take advantage of it to get some vegetables into him. He hadn’t said he wouldn’t after all.

“I’m not exactly chef-level,” he said to China, tapping his wooden spoon on the edge of the pan as he left the rice to toast for a final minute. “I just know a few dishes good for sick people.”

“And guests that provide their own ingredients?” China asked hopefully.

Kangwon raised a brow. “Are you sick?”

“Would that get me a free meal?”

The province stared at him placidly.

China sighed. “Very well.” Turning away, he muttered (loud enough to be heard), “Who pretends they can’t cook just to get out of the responsibility? Aiya, the disrespect.”

Kangwon shook his head. He actually wouldn’t mind cooking something simple for their comrade if he wasn’t so busy. But as soon as he was done feeding Korea, he had to go to Balnam-ri.

The bubonic plague usually took around ten days to kill, and they’d just passed that mark. If no one else had gotten infected, then the outbreak should die down soon.

Kangwon winced at his word choice as he lifted the pot of stock. The liquid sent clouds of steam into the early March air as it hit the rice, hissing like a nest of snakes.

Out of the confirmed fifty cases, they’d had thirty deaths so far. He hoped that number wouldn’t go up much higher.

It was too much to hope it wouldn’t go up at all. People were already weak from starvation. For a lot of them, the illness was just the final nail.

And Balnam-ri wasn’t the only place dealing with plague.

“Such a grim face, Little Brother,” China hummed, perching himself on the corner of the hearth, probably able to feel the heat through the brick. “Thinking about something dire?”

“Just the germ warfare,” Kangwon replied, mixing the rice into the stock. “You said you’re not sick. But do you have a sympathetic fever?”

“I’m a large country,” the man said, kicking his heels. “I’m sure more than my northeast would have to be affected for me to feel it.”

“I’m pretty sure it’s not a percentage thing.”

There were a fair amount of people in Korea getting sick, hundreds by now. But that was still a small percentage of their population of millions, and Korea had definitely had a sympathetic fever before his real one. Kangwon’s working theory was that the exact number of infected didn’t matter, it was more when an unusual amount of people got hit by illness at once.

“Maybe I’m just too pretty to get a fever then.” China batted his lashes.

Kangwon was too tired to hide his skeptical look.

The Chinese man ignored it. “But if I can ask a favour, keep an eye out for my Little Sisters, in case they start feeling the effects.”

They’d been responding to the germ warfare well here, managing to contain a real epidemic so far. Maybe that was why at the end of February, America had started to bombard China, too. He hadn’t stopped going after Korea, but their neighbour’s northeast had suddenly been hit with an influx of American fighter-bomber sightings and out of season insects, just like them. It was mostly Liaoxi and Liaotung, but Linjiang in Jilin province had been hit by mosquitoes a few days ago, too.

“Sorry your people are suffering for being part of our supply chain,” Kangwon apologized, setting the lid on the pot so the rice could simmer down.

China waved a hand. “No need to take responsibility. I blame the culprit, not the other victim.” His eyes narrowed, his voice cooling to the temperature of the snow around them. “And I’ll make sure they pay for it.”

‘Yikes.’

Kangwon took a seat on the nearby stump, his leg muscles singing at finally being able to rest. Between rushing medicine around the hospital, doing house visits, and running between the laboratories and the Anti-Epidemic Prevention Committee meetings, he barely even got to sit down nowadays.

Too many people to fix. Too many he'd lost.

China's tone had returned to normal as he said, "You don't have to worry overmuch for us. We've been conducting our own anti-epidemic work ever since we won, culling rats, insects, stray dogs and cats. The only thing spreading disease will be the Yankee's 'gifts.' And my people know how to take care of those."

Kangwon nodded. He'd heard good things about the efforts of the Chinese Party of Communists. A lot of Chinese cities had been cramped and dirty before, way more populated than their own, and none of their cliques had really done anything about it. It was good to know that was changing. Having healthy neighbours meant they'd have a better chance at staying healthy, too.

"By the way," China said idly. "I hear you've been trying to solve a little problem."

Kangwon glanced side to side, then said to him, "Yeah. The plague."

The man hummed in amusement. "I was talking about the delivery methods for it. My Jingjing says you're confused by how some of the payloads don't come with a casing."

Kangwon wasn't responsible for lab work, but he visited them to get results, and to make sure nothing was getting lost in translation between the Korean and Chinese scientists, so he'd shared his confusion about it with them before.

He snapped to attention. "You have an idea?"

Eyewitnesses had found a few bomb casings by now, from fragments of metal to shards of pottery to paper packets, which had delivered the plague-ridden fleas to Chinese soldiers in Chorweon County.

But there were a bunch of cases where the insects were clustered together, unharmed, and clearly not directly sprayed from the planes. Kangwon could dismiss it as people not looking hard enough, but his mind kept returning to the day him and Korea had investigated that old woman's claim. He knew there hadn't been a casing, but she'd heard something burst.

"I have the solution." China slid from the buttumak, slinking over to sit next to him. His smile faded slightly. "Have you ever heard the name 'Ishii Shiro?'"

Kangwon felt a chill run down his spine that had nothing to do with the clinging winter.

"Yeah," he said. "Who hasn't?"

Maybe not peasants or people that didn't pay attention to things that didn't affect them immediately. But he doubted there was a doctor in Korea that hadn't heard about the man. That almost definitely went for China, too.

When Japan had occupied Manchuria, his Kempeitei had set up laboratories across it, all top-secret. Manchu Detachment 731, the Kwantung Army Disease Prevention Shop, and many more. Despite the name of the latter, they'd been set up for the direct opposite- to create diseases and chemical weapons.

And test them.

Ishii Shiro had been the head of Manchu Detachment 731, or Unit 731. He'd been a Surgeon General in the Japanese military.

Koreans and Chinese knew him as a monster.

"Then I'm sure you're aware he didn't attend CCCP's little party for the Japanese involved in the same line of work," China said. "Though he was invited, and his presence was sorely missed."

CCCP's 'party' was the Khabarovsk Trials, held at the end of 1949, where twelve Kwangtung Army officers had been charged for their crimes against humanity, and sent to labour camps in Siberia for them. But plenty of the scientists and doctors were in America's hands in Japan, and there were rumours they weren't being punished the way they should.

“Yeah,” Kangwon said grimly. “I’d heard.”

He’d never met Ishii. But he could safely say he despised him, and every single one of his accomplices. Kangwon hadn’t wanted to become a doctor- he’d had to because he couldn’t just sit back and watch people suffer. So the people that had became doctors specifically to make people suffer disgusted him more than anything.

“Then have you heard a little rumour that he’s visited your country recently? Twice?”

Kangwon stiffened. “No.”

“It was in papers from your south.”

That would explain it. He hadn’t exactly had time for newspaper reading lately.

“Nothing confirmable,” China said idly, examining his nails. “But the reports came in January. Interesting timing, don’t you think?”

Right as the germ warfare started.

“You think America’s using his research?” the province asked.

“I’d go so far as to say I know.” China’s fingers curled in, nails piercing into his palm. “A country like him doesn’t ignore a resource. If you ask me, CCCP’s also stored away whatever he got when he made those birds sing. But at least he’s still clipped their wings.”

Hate simmered under his voice like the juk on the stove, a loud emotion for him. Personal, Kangwon thought.

“They said at the trials that the Japanese used biological warfare on you,” Kangwon remembered. “Not just tested weapons, but actually used them.”

It was the same thing really, just with different intentions behind it. Tests were just meant to see the outcome. ‘Use’ was for when you already knew what it would be. Either way, people died.

"En," China said. "They dropped fleas contaminated with the plague on eleven of my cities. We think at least seven hundred fell victim to that alone, not mentioning the glanders, anthrax, and other nasty things. Familiar, don't you think?"

Too familiar. Kangwon had had his suspicions last year, but now he was sure of it- America was using the information Kempeitei units had learned from experimenting on Koreans and Chinese, and infecting China's cities.

He grit his teeth. Medical information was useful no matter where it came from. People shouldn't've been tortured and killed by Unit 731, but they had been, and he didn't see any purpose in ignoring what they'd learned just because of how they'd learned it. Knowing how an illness would spread and affect a population was good. But it should be good because it would help prevent another epidemic from doing the same thing, not because it could be used to start their own epidemic.

Kangwon couldn't forgive anyone that looked at the gory information the Japanese had tortured innocent men and women, innocent children to get as a tool instead of something to prevent at all costs.

"Of course, it's all 'Communist propaganda,' as America says. For someone who was so eager to bomb the devils into the sea, he's awfully eager now to defend them now." China tipped his head. "I don't think I've seen you get angry before, Little Brother. I like it."

The province took a deep breath. "So Ishii Shiro is involved in this. How does that explain the lack of containers?"

"I suppose you can consider that more of a fun fact than anything," China said. "The important part is that America has the devils' information."

He smiled, reaching into his sleeve and pulling out a paper. Kangwon took it, finding it to be an article clipped from a newspaper.

"Can you read Japanese?"

“Not well,” he admitted. He’d never actually bothered to learn it, relying on his inherent knowledge from the Occupation. After Liberation, he'd pretty much lost all of it. The only words he could still read fluently were medical-related, gleaned from textbooks.

“Turn it over.”

Kangwon flipped the paper to find the words on the other side had been covered in graphite, with Korean characters carefully inked over it. Mainichi was the newspaper’s name. ‘Daily,’ a big paper in Japan, he was pretty sure.

“Nice handwriting,” he noted.

“Thank you.” China sounded pleased. “It’s one of mine.”

Kangwon started to read the long article, but the other man reached over to tap a certain section.

“You can read the rest later. This is the part you want now.”

He scanned it, finding that the article had been written by one of the men involved in the biological warfare experiments, Major Sakaki Ryohei, detailing how it had worked, and... the types of containers used.

His eyes landed on a couple lines, devouring the words as they spoke about how a parachute could carry a paper packet down after it was dropped from a plane, before a mechanism would light to burn the paper and impregnated silk away, leaving no trace except for the plague-infected rats it had carried.

“Read it?” China asked, not waiting for an answer. “I think that’s your answer.”

Kangwon nodded. He could picture a paper package being floated down, hitting the ground and opening to let the insects emerge, a slow-burning fuse giving them enough time to move away before it ignited the container. And if it burst in mid-air, as the Japanese Major described they could, then the insects or rodents would still land in a clump, and the remnants could even drift farther away before igniting. That would explain the ‘pop’ the old woman had heard, too.

"There were also a few cases of eggshell-type bombs being dropped on my country back then," China added. "Earthenware that was nearly paper-thin, and would shatter into little slivers that were almost invisible. None of my people have seen anything like that yet, but it's something to keep in mind."

Kangwon found the paragraph where the Japanese man explained that same thing, then asked, "I can keep this?"

"Go ahead. I have my own copy."

Kangwon carefully tucked it into his satchel to read fully later. But already he felt like he'd slotted a puzzle piece into place.

It wasn't super important in the grand scheme of things. But back on the 25th of February they'd made their appeal to the World Peace Council- a more left-wing organization filled with representatives from around the world- so that their doctors and China's could make their case, and hopefully get them to arrange an international investigation into the biological warfare (because America had been denying their accusations, and the UN had been dragging his heels), and it was scheduled for the 29th of this month. If they were going to get a proper investigation, he knew the topic would come up. A missing vessel for a germ delivery wasn't just something you could overlook. It would already be difficult enough to get the United Nations- or at least the other American-aligned countries- to believe them.

"Thanks for this," he said.

China smiled. "You believe my translation so easily? I could have written anything I wanted."

"You didn't know I can't read Japanese," Kangwon pointed out.

"Mm. As far as you know." His smile stretched slyly.

The province shook his head. "I'll get Hwang to translate it for me."

"He'll find it says exactly the same thing," China immediately pivoted. "But a word of advice, Little Brother- don't be so quick to believe the best of foreign nations. They're not all as dedicated to remaining faithful to the original as me."

Another cynic. Not that Kangwon could really blame him, considering his country's history.

"Noted." He got up to make sure the juk wasn't sticking to the sides of the pot, then sat back down on another log across from China. "If I can say, this all sounds really personal for you."

Korea hadn't even said anything about Ishii Shiro visiting the country (though that could just be him being heavy-mouthed), or the Mainichi article, even though it was dated January. Either way, it was clear China paid special attention to news about the Japanese scientists.

His voice was light, but his gaze was sharp. "I don't like getting sick."

'Who does?'

Kangwon chewed on the inside of his cheek, then asked, "Did you ever get to see the inside of those laboratories?"

China's smile faded as his eyes slid to him. "Yes."

"I've heard bad things," he said, understating it majorly. "But I've never been able to speak to someone that saw them firsthand."

The other country's face was more serious than he'd ever seen it. "And you don't want to."

"I have comrades that went into them."

It'd just been rumours at the time, that the Japanese took the prisoners of war they captured from the resistance groups fighting in northeast China and northwest Korea into their labs to experiment on. But they'd held enough water to make soldiers slit their own stomachs or force the enemy to shoot them instead of being taken, and to eventually make Korea forbid the provinces from operating in Manchuria without him, and nowhere near the locations.

And they knew now that the rumours had been true, and worse than they ever could've imagined. And Kangwon knew people that had disappeared, taken by the enemy with no execution ever taking place.

China regarded him with solemn eyes, his voice going flat. "Then you had better hope that they're dead."

Kangwon's heart chilled. For someone like China to say those words like that…

Maybe he was right. Maybe he didn't want to know.

He got up again, going to stir the juk, even though he just had.

China stayed quiet, his eyes fixed on somewhere far out in the woods, and a thousand ri away.

Kangwon looked into the depths of the pot, watching the juk blend into a pale slurry, the greens sticking out like emeralds on cotton, or bottle flies on silk parachutes.

"Do you think people are good?" he asked abruptly.

China stirred from his vigil, his voice light again. "Which ones?"

The spoon scraped against the side of the pot. "In general."

"Hm." Behind him, China tipped his head back. "I think people are stupid."

Kangwon darted a look at him over his shoulder.

"Aiya, don't look at me like that," he chided. "I love all my people, even the stupid ones. And don't think that's limited to peasants, or anything like that. Some of the dumbest people I've ever met have been intellectuals. Most of them, actually."

China shifted, leaning back on the stump. "I think the majority of people want to be good. But they want to be right more. And since most of them are stupid, they're born, taught what's 'right,' then refuse to ever relearn it. Take this war, for example." He swirled his hand in the air. "Anyone with eyes should be able to see that your southern government is a puppet government that wants to sell them out for personal gain. There shouldn't be any good people left on that side. But there are."

Kangwon didn't protest. He knew he was right about that at least.

"They think they're doing the right thing for them, for their country," China said lazily. "Despite all the evidence to the contrary. Because if they let that evidence sway them, then that means they've been on the wrong side the entire time, and aren't good people. And that means they were wrong."

"How would you fix people thinking like that?" he asked.

"I'm already trying to fix it," China replied, twisting his neck to look at him. "My people are being re-educated. They're being taught to challenge old ideas and those around them, and to question what's right. I don't think the majority will ever not be stupid. But we can make them a little less stupid. If they're inclined to believe the first thing they're told, then we need to make sure the first thing they're told is good for them, so that they'll hold to that."

Kangwon arched a brow. "And you know what's good for them?"

"Of course." China's lips curled in a sly, self-deprecating smile. "I'm right."

The Korean shook his head, looking back down at his juk.

He wouldn't believe most people were stupid. But he could believe most of them wanted to be right. China had said they wanted to be right more than they wanted to be good, but wasn't wanting to be right actually just them wanting to be good?

But some of them had to know they weren't. Ishii Shiro couldn't think he was a good person, not with everything Kangwon had heard about him, and how China had reacted to being asked about the labs.

And what did it mean for them, if their people did affect their personalities? If most people wanted to be good, but had been taught the wrong things were good? How could some people go on to become doctors to save lives, while others did it to end them cruelly, and wage biological warfare on other countries? Had Japan churned out people like Ishii Shiro, or had people like Ishii Shiro birthed Japan?

"Whatever you're thinking about, you're thinking too hard, Little Brother," China breathed right in his ear slit, making him twitch. "If you want a more simple answer, it's 'everyone is stupid, but some countries have people that are more stupid than others.' I can name them for you, if you want."

"It's alright," Kangwon said, rubbing his shoulder against the side of his head. "I think I know who you'd say."

"Ours, at least, are salvageable." China was still leaning into his space, or maybe the pocket of warmth emanating from the hearth. "Can I ask why the sudden philosophical question?"

Kangwon hesitated, then admitted, "I've just been wondering about how much of us is our people."

The rest was too private to talk about.

"Aiya," China said with what might've been real alarm. "Very little, I hope. I hate to think about what my personality might reflect on them."

That was actually something to think about. Kangwon had mostly been thinking about Korea, Japan, and America before. His country and the Japanese one were monoethnic, with one culture. A few different variations, yeah, but all Korean or Japanese. And while America was multiethnic, he had full control over his nation, and there was a prevailing 'American' culture.

But China had dozens of different cultures and ethnicities, places that had been occupied for years, or governed by splinter factions, or were so isolated that they didn't fit into the major culture. Did that have anything to do with why he was… the way he was?

When Kangwon thought about it, America was far more boisterous and eccentric than either Korea or Japan, too. Was that a quirk of more diverse countries? Not really a good or bad thing, just proof of influence?

Then again, CCCP was probably one of the most multicultural nations on earth, and if Kangwon was slotting him into 'steady' or 'eccentric,' he definitely wouldn't be going in the second one.

Maybe that was proof they weren't affected then. But then where had his personality at formation came from? Where had Japan and America's?

He still didn't have an answer.

"What's your Countryhuman's opinion on that?" China asked curiously.

"I don't know," he said, tearing himself from his thoughts.

Kangwon hadn't asked about any of his ponderings. He knew Korea wouldn't want to think about any part of him being influenced by someone against his will, even their people. And he was also self-aware enough to know his country's answer would influence his own opinion too much.

"Any guesses?" China prodded.

"Nope."

The Chinese man stared at him. Kangwon stared back, not breaking a sweat, knowing full well what he was trying to do.

"Learned that from your Countryhuman, did you?" China asked eventually.

'More like because of him.'

"I don't know what you're talking about," Kangwon said easily.

“Just like I don’t know what Korea thinks.”

China hummed in disappointment.

Thinking of something, Kangwon asked, “Did you change as a person once you got Tibet back?”

“I wouldn’t say I actually ‘lost’ him,” China replied. “Any more than I lost my other regions. They were under different management, but they were still China.”

Kangwon couldn’t tell if he was saying that as a true fact or a pride thing.

“For that reason, I don’t think getting my Taiwan back would answer your question, either,” the man continued. “But when my Hong Kong and Macau are safely in my loving embrace, maybe I’ll let you know if I feel a sudden craving for weak tea and dry crumpets. Or maybe I won’t.”

“Helpful,” Kangwon appraised.

China smiled. “I try. On that note.” He reached out for the juk, several red objects tumbling from his sleeve into the pot.

“Please don’t poison my patient,” Kangwon said mildly.

“Cored jujube and goji,” China explained. “But I’m sure you already knew that, clever little botanist.”

Kangwon had. Though he wasn’t sure how he felt about being called that.

“Thanks,” he said, stirring the fruits in. Both would boil down nicely into a slurry that he could easily tip down Korea’s throat. “To revitalize his gi and help him sleep better, right?”

“I don’t believe in things like that,” China dismissed. “Traditional medicine practitioners are quacks. China follows modern medicine now. I just put them in for taste. And because it worries me that I've only seen your Countryhuman eat a fruit once the entire time I've been here.”

‘Gi’ was really just a fancy way to say ‘energy.’ And jujube and goji actually did do all the things traditional doctors said they did.

“I think our nations have practiced traditional medicine for so long because it works,” Kangwon pointed out. “Modern medicine just works better.”

“Aiya, another Taoist,” China sighed. “In that case, if I ever find a pill of immortality, I’ll give it to you. Just don’t go drinking mercury before then.”

It wasn’t really Kangwon’s place to challenge him on that any further, even though he fully believed in the benefits of traditional medicine. And he was right that a lot of those ‘doctors’ were quacks, not in that they were wrong, but in that they’d been some of the biggest voices against modern medicine and vaccines, not wanting to lose their business. Anyone that put profit over lives didn’t deserve to be called a doctor.

Though that could be said about a lot of modern doctors, too. A couple weren’t happy to hear about the free healthcare plan, still stuck in the mindset that doctors should be as wealthy as possible at the cost of only taking patients that could afford them, instead of making enough to live comfortably while treating everyone.

That would change. The majority didn’t see it that way. And once the new system was firmly established, it would draw less of those that just wanted to be doctors for the money, and more than genuinely wanted to heal people.

“Well.” China finally moved out of his personal space. “I suppose I told you what I needed to. I’ll get going now.” Leaning back in, he said, “Unless you’ve changed your mind about feeding me.”

“Aren’t you just going to hide in the woods and watch the bunker?” Kangwon asked, stirring the juk.

China clicked his tongue. “Slander. I have far more important things to do.”

Kangwon side-eyed him, judging whether or not they were friendly enough for him to hum skeptically, then decided to go for it.

"You are all audacious little provinces." The Chinese man sniffed. "I'm recommending to your Countryhuman that he starts beating you."

"He already does that on a bad day," Kangwon said, remembering being slammed into the hospital door and thrown onto the floor.

"Clearly not hard enough." China walked away, heading towards the bunker. "Maybe I'll go bother that pretty cousin of yours," he mused, like he hadn't just said he had more important things to do.

Kangwon shook his head as he disappeared inside to annoy SH while she painted.

Eventually the juk was done, all the ingredients cooked into a nice porridge, thinner than usual to make sure Korea wouldn't choke. He plated some of it up in the bowl he was always careful to sterilize, then covered the rest with the lid. The cold would keep it good for a few days, which meant he wouldn't have to spend so much time here.

But he would still have to come, even though it was exhausting to add the bunker to the list of places he needed to visit. Korea was trusting him to feed him, not the others. He couldn't let him down, or he'd lose even that small bit of allowance.

He called in to SH, and she bustled from her room with a canvas under her arm, looking annoyed.

"Where's China?" he asked.

"Sleeping in Liaotung's bed," she said dryly.

"Sounds important."

"Mmmmmm." SH cast a worried look at Korea's door, then went to stand guard.

Kangwon slipped in, getting hit with the smell of sick immediately. It wasn't vomit or anything, just the thick, warm smell of illness that radiated off of sick people. Some of his cousins said they couldn't smell it, but he knew Korea could. He wished the room had a window to let fresh air in.

'Then again, if it did, he never would've agreed to sleep here.'

Kangwon sighed, kneeling beside his Countryhuman, taking his temperature and pulse as he waited for the juk to cool. Hot and unsteady respectively.

Flashes of his other patients crossed his mind, blood splattering from lips, burst lymph nodes like rocks trying to force their way through blackened skin, pulses beating beating beating then stilling under his fingers, never to beat again. And under it all, that thick, cloying smell.

The province closed his eyes, forcing the sensations away as he took a steadying inhale.

'Never think about another patient when treating your current one. They'd saved more people than they'd lost so far, and none of those that had succumbed to their illnesses had been his fault. Losing them didn't mean he wasn't capable of treating Korea.

When his lungs had just started to ache, he exhaled, his mind clear again as he eyed the bandages peeking out of the man's collar, wishing he could check them. The Premier had been here four days ago, and they definitely needed another clean.

But he'd keep his hands to himself. Korea would know if he hadn't. He was honestly probably going to accuse Kangwon of not listening anyways, just out of paranoia. If he wanted to successfully defend himself, he'd have to be telling the truth. And even if he didn't find out, it would still feel wrong.

When the juk was warm instead of scalding, he carefully sat Korea up in his arms, leaning him against his shoulder. His country stirred, eye fluttering open, gleaming with fever as it stared sightlessly.

‘Damn it.’

The Premier had said he was sleeping soundly when he visited, and Kangwon had seen it himself for the first three days. But when he’d arrived on the fourth, Korea had been restless, tossing and turning, his body rejecting the recuperative coma.

There wasn’t anything he could do for it. Hopefully the jujube would do what they were supposed to.

Kangwon used one arm to hold Korea steady, stopping him from moving, while the other picked up spoonfuls of juk, carefully sliding them between his lips, massaging his throat so they would go down.

He was careful to keep a light touch, but he could still feel blisters bursting under the bandages on his neck. And Korea’s laryngeal prominence stuck out too much. His weight was light in Kangwon’s arms.

This also felt a little too familiar. He could see the walls of the cave, fire flickering against the stone as he held the starving, wounded boy in his arms and tried to make him swallow just one more bit of painstakingly ground meat paste.

‘This isn’t that bad,’ he reminded himself.

Nothing would ever be as bad as those long nights spent by Korea’s side, hoping he’d wake up, that Kangwon hadn’t failed him after they’d just met, that those brief words under the nok tree wouldn’t be the only ones they ever exchanged.

Korea’s head lolled, and a bit of juk dribbled from his mouth as he made a low moaning noise. Kangwon quickly wiped it up with a cloth he’d brought just for this, knowing his country would hate him seeing that.

“Just a bit more,” he soothed, knowing Korea’s body was instinctively rejecting being touched while he wasn’t conscious.

He used the back of the spoon to crush the jujube in the bottom of the bowl, the red skin bursting and melting into the spongy yellow insides with a squelch. He scraped it up with the last of the juk, gently squeezing Korea's jaw so he'd open his mouth, placing it in and massaging his neck again, doing the same with a few gulps of boiled water.

The lump in Korea's throat bobbed under his hand as he swallowed, and his eyes opened again, one a dark hollow and the other white and feverish.

He rasped a name Kangwon pretended not to hear, knowing he'd hate that even more than him having to wipe his chin.

He placed Korea's head back on his pillow, arranging his bedroll around him, watching him twitch and shudder.

He jerked, eyes opening wide again, looking straight at Kangwon as he said with sudden clarity, "It's March First."

"It's March 11th," Kangwon corrected, gently closing his good eye, and pulling the bedroll back up. "March 1st was over a week ago."

"It's March First," Korea murmured, then called the name again, more desperately this time.

Kangwon's heart twinged as he pulled his legs up, resting his chin on his knees, the way he'd done over those two months, waiting to see if his Countryhuman would live.

His mind wandered to what South had told him about March 1st, 1919.

Two boys, one eager to go support their people, and one that was eager for them to succeed, but not to be a part of it. One that fought, and one that hadn't.

One that had left, and one that had stayed.

Two halves of a country, with the same people, the same life, already so different.

If South was sick, would he let Kangwon treat him? He thought he would. He'd wanted him to look at his burns in the POW camp, even though he'd turned him down. He'd wanted someone to take care of him, to care for him. Not like Korea.

Nine years of the exact same nurture. It sounded like they'd already been different, but since Korea never talked about it, he'd never know for sure.

But even if they'd been the exact same, that day, March First, had changed that. Why? What had Korea experienced that South hadn't? What had made someone that the Southern Korea seemed so sure would never give him up for anything, suddenly become the sort of person that would?

"It's March First," Korea rasped, finding Kangwon's face again, even though it was clear he couldn't see him.

"Korea." Kangwon leaned forward, the question coming out before he could stop it.

"What happened during the March First Movement?"

Korea stared blankly back, his shaking growing stronger as hope filled his eye, and he croaked that name again. His arms spasmed inside the roll as he started to thrash, a low keen leaving his mouth.

Kangwon immediately sat back, flooding with guilt.

It was wrong to take advantage of Korea's illness to get that answer out of him. He knew he'd never tell him if he was thinking right, so he couldn't ask it now.

Whether Korea had changed or he hadn't, whatever had made him and South end up such different people, Kangwon wasn't the sort of person to trick that answer out of him. He just wanted to make sure his country got better.

He softly closed Korea's eye again, murmuring with a reassuring smile, "You need to rest."

He gathered up the bowl and spoon, and stood, his vision fizzling black. He shook it away, gathering his resolve before leaving the room with his oil lamp.

He couldn't rest. He had lives to save.

In the end, it didn't matter why his Korea and South were different. They were, and they'd come to this. They just had to end this war before they became too different.

And then they would be Reunified. And Kangwon would help with whatever came with that.

He shut the door to Korea's room, hearing him say the name again, more a cry than a call.

'You'll see him soon,' Kangwon silently hoped at him, then went to go heal his country.

Clarification: China says at least 700 were killed by Japanese plague bacteria during WWII because this was the confirmed number at the time (plague only). It rose in the future as more evidence was uncovered. The total number of people thought to have died from biological warfare is up to 300000.

The chapter title is inspired by the movie Philosophy Of A Knife, which is a movie about Unit 731 that I would not suggest watching. To me I see it more as revelling in violence than portraying the suffering of the victims. And since others agree with me, I don't think I'm just being sensitive. 731 (Chinese film) is a better dramatized version. If you know Mandarin, CCTV has a 5 part series on YouTube called 七三一 (also 731). It seems a lot of people from countries not involved don't know that there were far more units than 731, such as Unit 100 and Unit 516. They all specialized in different fields, like chemical and biological weapons, but they all experimented on humans in awful ways. I feel like I don't have to explain that this is real. America denied it for many years because they didn't want anyone knowing that they pardoned Ishii Shiro and others, but even they've admitted by now that everything the Chinese and Soviets exposed in the Khabarovsk Trials and eyewitness accounts was real. Unit 731 was real, and evil. The only people that don't think that are certain people here. And they know it's real. They just don't care. So I hope mmmmm shouldn't say that. Anyway. Anyway. I encourage you to look into it and truly understand why it's not unreasonable for China to not want Japan to remilitarize. It wasn't just in the past. Abe Shinzo knew what he was doing with that plane photo. And if he truly didn't, that's almost worse. Denying Unit 731 isn't a fringe view in Japan- it's widespread, especially in the government. The past can't be forgotten when it threatens to be repeated.

In more joyful news, my shuba turned out amazing. Father enjoyed the amount of mayonez I put in it. Unlike certain other people who will not be named. My cooking skills continue to grow stronger.

https://news.cgtn.com/news/2025-07-30/Watch-Behind-Unit-731-1FqOsdHNPI4/p.html

https://youtu.be/fqoTolLwsy0?si=QlPwgTAtlJQB1W_g

https://inf.news/en/history/4d88deb2fef391f9e183ded123c5aae4.html

https://www.asahi.com/sp/ajw/articles/14988305

March First

North tossed and turned in a half-waking state, the words 'March First Movement' echoing in his head alongside a high-pitched ringing. Someone else might compare it to the sound you heard when a nearby explosion stole your hearing away, but the Korean Countryhuman knew what it really was. He had heard that noise before.

Who had been here? Who had mentioned March First? His fevered mind told him it had been his brother, the easy smile looking down on him. But that was impossible. If South were here he wouldn't be smiling like that. He would be distressed, distraught to see the effects of America's poison against him.

Or did he know? Would he in fact be smiling, but with sharp, pleased edges as he watched his brother fade in and out of murky consciousness, ravaged by an illness he had brought.

No. He wouldn't. He couldn't. South would stare at him with wide, concerned eyes, like when North had been dragged back from Pyongyang all those years ago. He would try to help.

'잘못했어.' 잘못했어, 잘못했어 jalmothaesso

Scenes and sounds flitted through North's brain, memories turned choppy and unreal by the heat in his body. He writhed in half-remembered anguish, dusty black boots meeting his ribs, the flicker of torches in the dark, keening as his people mourned their loved ones, a tachi trailing a hot line of agony down his chest oh-so-slowly over and over again, five thousand cuts for five thousand years of history.

A pair of chestnut eyes staring up at him from the dust, life fading from them as his head rang and rang and rang-

"What's that?"

North had to lean back in his chair as his brother thrust his face close to the papers in his hands, taking a break from attempting to read the characters on his own scrap of newspaper in order to sound out the ones on his other half's. North allowed him a minute to work his way through the first sentence, then pulled it back.

"If you're going to take forever to read it, just let me tell you." He sounded more annoyed at his brother's slow reading than he felt- the bite in his voice came from what he had read. "The Emperor is dead."

South's white eyes widened in excitement. "Japan's Emperor?"

"No, idiot-" North mustered the energy to whack him over the head with the rolled paper. "Don't you think I would sound happy about that? Our Emperor."

"Oh no." South ceased his playful attempts to snatch North's paper weapon, sobering. "What happened?"

"That's what I was trying to find out." North examined the newspaper again, reading the characters in his head before saying, "Cerebral anemia."

"A what?" South asked.

North didn't actually know what that was, so he instead deflected, "Does it matter? I bet that's just a lie. The Japanese probably did it."

North was less saddened by the news of 'Emperor' Gojong's passing than he was angered. The man had been weak-willed. Japan was the one who had annexed them personally in 1910, but the former Emperor had been the one to sign the Treaty handing the old Korea over several years prior.

But he had still been Korean, still been theirs.

"So it's over then?" South sighed, leaning back into his own chair in front of the tiny desk they shared. "That's the end of the Korean Empire."

"Don't be ridiculous," North growled. "We're still here."

Here, here, forever here in this tiny, dirty, lightless shack with those thousands of marks carved into the walls, counting days and months and years, a decade worth of here.

The overwhelming exhaustion that had gotten harder and harder to fight off rolled back over him, making the black-and-white page blur before his eyes.

"Yeah, I guess," South said, not sounding very reassured as he picked up his page from before.

North shook his head, giving one last look at the headline announcing Gojong's death, noting that it was from several weeks ago, and that the funeral would be taking place soon, on March 3rd.

He wondered if it would be worth sneaking out to attend, then dismissed the idea. Their last attempt to run away had been almost a year ago, when Japan had hunted them down himself and delivered a beating that had left South with a set of broken ribs and North unable to walk for a month. He had left them with the cold warning that the next time they tried to leave he would do 'something worse.' And while North couldn't begin to guess what that 'something' was, he knew that putting South through that kind of pain wasn't worth it for a man that had signed away their freedom.

He had promised, after all.

He sighed tiredly, feeling the numbness he'd tried so hard to push away today creeping back in, draining his will to practice reading.

What was the point when they were trapped in here? What was the point in anything? What was the point in even being-

Then another paper caught his eyes, one that differed from the thin pulp newspaper fragments. It was hidden within the pages of another newspaper, and was printed on sturdier stuff, lacking any identifying marks such as a date or the name of the one who wrote it. He plucked it up, slowly making his way through the words.

The writer used phrases whose meanings sometimes eluded North, and their tone was decidedly haughty, leading him to guess that they might be a scholar, but both of those things paled before what was being conveyed.

There was to be a protest on the 1st of March, two days before Gojong's funeral. One where the people of Korea would declare independence, following up on 'the measures and proclamations of the students abroad in Japan,' something that North hadn't heard of, imprisoned as he was.

The words got his pulse up. Now there was something worth risking a beating 'or worse' for.

For the first time in a long time, North felt... He felt.

"Oh come on!" South said, tossing down his paper. "The second sports page is missing again. I never get to know who won! I swear, next time..." He trailed off as he looked over at North. "Why do you look like you're scheming?"

"Because I am. Look." He eagerly shoved the paper towards his brother, who narrowed his eyes, lips moving silently. Impatient, North just dictated it to him instead.

When he was finished, South's eyes were glittering. "A mass protest? All over Korea?"

"I just said that."

"Yeah, but-" His brother laughed gleefully. "That's crazy! We could actually be independent?"

North hushed him, glancing at the door.

South took the hint, lowering his voice. "Just think about it, North- in three days, we could be our own country again."

"I know." North tried to contain his composure, but he couldn't help the excitement that coloured his words. "We should go."

His other self's eyes immediately widened. "Wait, why?"

"Because we should be there," North stressed. "It's our independence."

"But what if it doesn't work?" South asked nervously. "You remember what Japan said."

"Who cares about him?" North impatiently dismissed. "If this works, we'll be free."

"North..." His brother had that look on his face, disappointed, hurt. "You said no more escape attempts. You promised me."

North grit his teeth. And he had kept that promise for three-hundred-and-twenty-six days, even when the guards beat them, even when they were starved, even when his skin itched and he had to muffle the pathetic sounds he made as his brother slept.

"This is big, South," he insisted. "I bet most of our guards will be focusing on the protests. And you've been sweet-talking that Jap for long enough. This could be our chance."

"And then what?!" South cried. "We run away and live in the woods or the streets? At least we have a roof over our heads here, and we get fed most of the time now. And you know Japan won't just let us go. He'd hunt us and he'd find us and, and-" Tears welled up in his eyes as he gazed desperately at him. "You promised."

The fight went out of North, and his shoulders slumped. He had promised. And when South looked at him like that...

"Fine," he said quietly.

His brother sighed, relieved, but sorrowful. "Please don't mope. It doesn't have to be up to us to escape. You said it yourself- if this works, the people will free us."

And if it didn't... North dug his nails into his palms.

"I still think we should go."

His other half's eyes widened in dismay. "North-"

"Not to escape," he interrupted. "Just to see."

His brother still looked hesitant, so he sighed and added, "It's just a protest. We won't be in danger. And Japan will have bigger things to worry about than checking in on us. We can just go for the day and watch. If it succeeds, we'll be independent again, and if it doesn't, we can sneak back without the bastard ever knowing."

Hopefully.

South rubbed his arm, thinking, but North could tell he had won him over by the way his eyes twinkled.

"Alright," he conceded, excitement returning to his voice. "I'm in." His face split in a wide grin. "This is going to be so great!"

They spent the next three days carefully planning their escape and how their day would go.

On March 1st, North awoke at dawn, letting South sleep slightly longer before shaking him awake.

"Huh? What's going on?" his brother mumbled, blearily raising his head.

"It's March 1st," North replied, shrugging the second of his now two shirts on. "Get up."

"Oh, right." South said, a yawn splitting his face. "I'm up, I'm up," he quickly said as his other half glared at him.

When they were both dressed, they stood in front of the door, waiting for their plan to start.

"So," South said, clapping his hands together lightly. "Let me get this straight- I'm going to the Pagoda Park here in Seoul and you're going all the way to Pyongyang?"

North noted that his brother seemed markedly more nervous now that the day had come. "Yes."

It made sense that one of them should attend what had once been the old capital. And if only one of them should be late returning, it should be him. Let Japan think it had only been him that was responsible, that only he should be punished for it. Just like always.

"I could just come with you."

"One of us needs to be here in Seoul," North repeated as he had several times. He hated the idea of leaving his brother, but once they were out of the walls, he knew South would keep himself hidden. It was safer for him. "You'll be fine."

"But what if you're not?"

"I will be."

"North, you'll..." South rubbed his arm nervously. "You'll come back, right?"

North opened his mouth to say, 'Obviously I'll come back, idiot,' then saw the look on his brother's pale face.

"Of course I'll come back," he said, firmly rather than in annoyance. "I would never leave you here. It doesn't make sense for one of us to be free if the other isn't."

South grinned. "Aw, I love you too, brother." He went in for a side-hug.

"Like you said, Japan would just hunt me down, anyways," North muttered, embarrassed.

They both jerked to attention as a young male voice outside called, "Protestors are gathering en masse at the Pagoda Park! Way more than was expected. Chief wants all hands in attendance."

"What about these two?" one of their guards questioned. "We can't just leave 'em."

"I've been sent to watch them," the newcomer replied. When no one said anything else, he added impatiently, "What do you expect them to do? Break out? Get out of here before it turns into a riot!"

The guards apparently believed his urgency as the sound of heavy boots was heard clomping away into the distance. Soon after, the lock clicked, and a young man slid open their door.

"Pretty convincing, ne?" he asked, smiling nervously.

"I even believed it," South praised in Japanese. "Thanks, Toyama-san."

Toyama Ichiro was the newest of their guards, and the youngest at twenty-five years of age. North gathered that he had obtained the elite position as one of their jailors through some sort of family connection. The cold cruelty of his country had yet to infect his heart, and while loyal to Japan, he had frequently professed sympathy for the Koreas before. South had gradually made friends with him through brief conversations and traded jokes, something North had initially frowned upon before realizing how useful it could be, and then losing the will to care. And it had been- it was the Japanese man that was responsible for smuggling the newspapers and occasional snacks that were favoured by North and South, respectively.

And now he was here to help them sneak out.

"No problem," Toyama replied to his brother. "And I got these for you." He pulled out two long, roughspun brown cloaks. "So no one recognizes you."

"It is appreciated," North said grudgingly, refusing to speak Japanese. Regardless of how much the young guard was helping them, it went against his nature to thank one of his captors.

"Of course. And just to be clear, you're just going to watch, right?" Toyama nervously checked.

"Yep, we just want to go check things out," South soothed him. "And we'll be back before it ends. I promise we won't tell them you helped us."

The Japanese man breathed a sigh of relief. "Good. Because otou-sama would be furious if I lost this job."

North didn't tell him that if Japan knew he had helped them escape, he would lose far more than his job.

"Let's go," he said, pulling his hood up over his face.

Toyama escorted them to a tree far past their chopped down maple. Its branches nearly hung over the wall. In the absence of escape attempts, they had been allowed to grow, just as their jailors' guards had dropped.

North grit his teeth.

The Jap then left to divert the watchguard. When a short whistle was heard, the two Koreas scrambled up and over, reluctantly parting ways shortly after in an alleyway, South heading to the Pagoda Park and North heading for the rail line.

As he left, he cast a glance back at his brother, who was already looking over his shoulder. His other self grinned, waving, and North rolled his eyes, continuing on. Then he took one more look, catching South rounding the corner.

'He'll be fine,' North told himself gruffly. Though he still didn't like being separated from him.

This was the first time he ever had been. It felt like he had just chopped off a limb.

But he needed to be in Pyongyang. He could feel it, some ancestral pull from the times it had been the capital. And he knew that even if someone didn't have to be in the current capital, his brother wouldn't agree to take the risk of travelling so far. The more distance they had, the easier it would be for North to try and convince him to escape. And he couldn't.

He had promised.

As he walked through the streets of Seoul, no one called for him, and North suddenly realized that he was free.

He and South had made it out of the gates before, once, during their last attempt, which had involved stealing a gun during a beating. But the guards had been close behind them, Japan had unluckily been in the city, and South had been so-

They hadn't made it far.

But right now, North was standing in the capital of Korea without the sound of booted feet pursuing him or shouting in Japanese echoing over the streets. There was only birdsong as the sky lightened, and the sound of a distant gathering crowd. Toyama Ichiro had been useful indeed.

North wished he had been around sooner, before he had made his promise.

Because they weren't free. Not yet. Tonight he would return, crawling back into that run-down shed to carve another tally mark into the splintering walls and lie awake as the emptiness crept back in. And if these protests didn't succeed, then he would do it again and again and again and-

No. The protests would succeed. They had to.

Just as the sun was rising, he jumped onto a train that slowed as it passed through Seoul. He hauled himself up, arms burning, to toss himself into a covered cart full of grain.

His heart was pounding as he settled in to wait, but not from fear. No- he was excited. Today the Korean people would gather to announce that they would no longer be tolerating the indignity of belonging to a foreign nation. Once Japan and his officials saw the voices united against them, they would have no choice but to retreat back to their islands with their tails between their legs. Then this grain would be going to the Korean people instead of their Japanese overlords.

North's fists clenched as the train wound its way towards Pyongyang. His insides churned with unease for his brother, and anticipation.

Several hours later, he jumped out as they approached the city, and as he struggled up off the ground, he finally caught his first glimpse of the old capital of Joseon.

Built on the Taedong River, most of the city was constructed of small tile-roofed houses that spread over the shores. The occasional colonial-style Japanese building sprouted from the neat arrangement like an unsightly wart. But even those blemishes couldn't distract North from the large pavilions that towered over the city.

They were built of sturdy granite and stately wood with double-tiered roofs that curved gracefully over the bases. Taedongmun and Potongmun, the gates of the old walled castle that Pyongyang had once been. They were unmistakably of Korean architecture.

North knew from the knowledge that he had been born with that the city had once been much greater, before the Sino-Japanese War had destroyed much of it. But those gates still stood as a testament to the past and a sign that the city was still Korean. And one day they would build more.

'I'm surprised Japan hasn't had them torn down,' he thought bitterly.

North entered from the east, getting caught up in a flow of people that were streaming down the dusty road towards the city gate. Some of the pilgrims wore worn, but clean traditional clothes, and many even wore pure white in defiance of the Japanese effort to outlaw it. But the majority were clad in threadbare labourer's clothes with patches on the elbows, frayed hems, and straw sandals that had seen better days.

The crowd hummed with excitement as they streamed beneath the gate, shadows momentarily eclipsing them before they were spat back out into the hot sun.

Somewhere, a bell began to toll.

The procession marched through the streets, North getting swept along with them. He could see people in the windows of the houses they passed, watching with wide eyes as even more came from the open doorways, joining the river of people, swelling their ranks. There weren't just men, but women, too, and even children running amidst the feet of the adults, adding their voices to the chanting of "Japanese get out!" even if they didn't quite understand what was happening.

As the sun rose high above them, the march came to a halt in front of a school. The crowd swirled and eddied, settling into place as several men dressed in suits and one in the garb of a priest mounted a wooden stage. The assembly hushed as they began to speak, reading from a scroll.

The men on the stage launched into a grand speech about enduring oppression, of being treated like barbarians, of an unwanted union and of the desire to be their own nation again. They spoke of independence being the first step on the road to freedom and global peace. They proclaimed that the Japanese officials were chained to old ways and excesses and it had been that which had brought about the injustices that the Korean people had faced. They extolled that the relinquishing of Korea would save Japan from his path of evil and lead to peace and friendship in the East.

The words thrilled the crowd, sweeping through them like waves. They thrilled North alongside them, though when they spoke of blaming not Japan, but themselves, he couldn't agree. In what way had these people here been responsible for their enslavement? They had never signed a treaty or agreed to be Occupied, and neither had North and South. Their Emperor and former Countryhuman had done that for them.

"Behold!" the priest on the stage cried, sweeping an arm forwards. "A new world is before our eyes! The days of force are gone, and the days of morality are here." He made reference to the past being a time of freezing ice, but assured that they were in their spring. "Facing the return of the universal cycle, we set forth on the changing tide of the world. Nothing can make us hesitate or fear!"

Indeed, fear seemed to be the furthest thing from the minds of the gathered. Their eyes were bright, their hands clenched into palms or skirts. North found himself leaning forward, as if it would help him hear the next words sooner.

"We have arisen now!" the priest declared. "Conscience is on our side, and truth guides our way. All of us, men and women, young and old, have firmly left behind the old nest of darkness and gloom and head for joyful resurrection together with the myriad living things. The spirits of thousands of generations of our ancestors protect us; the rising tide of world consciousness shall assist us." His voice rose even louder. "Once started, we shall surely succeed. With this hope we march forward!"

His words echoed over the assembly, fading into a brief hush. The air crackled with electricity. Then someone broke it, screaming, "Long live Korea!"

The uproar that followed was loud and immediate. Men hollered and woman shouted, throwing their fists in the air, screaming and chanting, some for the independence of Korea and some demanding the removal of the Japanese.

But over time, one chant became dominant, the one that had started it.

"Long live Korean independence! Long live Korea!"

The officers on the edges of the schoolyard slunk away.

As North listened, the truth hit him like a hammer.

This was for him.

All of these people were gathered here demanding he and his brother's freedom. All of those years they had spent locked away, never once doing anything for their people, and yet they were still here, fighting for them.

He turned to the crowd and froze. A boy who couldn't be much older than six was staring at him, seeing him. He held his straw sandals in his hand, wearing nothing else but rags. His eyes were black as coal and alive with light and a strange, fiery determination. North knew that if he could see himself, he would find the look perfectly mirrored on his own face.

He took an inexplicable step towards the boy, but the crowd suddenly surged forward, separating them. North was swept away as the human river overflowed its banks, surging through the streets towards the Japanese government building.

The Japanese police were swept before them as they went, retreating from the protest.

North's spirit surged in elation as he joined in the chanting. "Long live Korean independence!"

They were doing it. It was going to work!

Then the shooting started.

At first North couldn't place the popping sound that was loud enough to briefly shush the crowd, but when the first person's screams changed from elation to fear, he knew. There were more gunshots and shouts of pain added to the chorus. Several people scrambled away from the commotion, but even more surged forwards, roaring with rage as they defied the bullets.

North was being shoved to and fro, people knocking against him from all sides and he knew all it would take was a few of those ahead of him retreating in a panic to crush him. He slipped from the crowd, pressing himself against the wall of a ramshackle house to catch his breath.

From here he could see the Japanese police lined up in the road ahead, creating a barrier with their bodies, guns in hand. Men on horses armed with swords rode swiftly towards the protestors, bearing down on them much too fast to flee. North could easily see where this was headed.

It was unfair. These people had been protesting peacefully, they weren't even armed.

A figure stumbled from the mass of people, heading for a sprawl on the ground before North caught them in his arms.

"Are you okay?" he demanded.

The woman raised her face, looking up at him. "Yes, thank-" Her jaw fell open. "Korea?"

Ssi-bal. She could see under his hood.

"Yes." He righted her.

"You're here?" Her brown eyes lit up, a victorious grin splitting her face. "Then we can't lose!"

As if he alone offset the guns and swords and horses that the Japanese commanded.

"You should get out of here," he said as more shots rang out. "It's not safe."

"What? No way." She shook her head stubbornly, swiping a strand of dark hair out of her face. "We're not leaving until you're free." She wrenched herself away from him, throwing herself back into the throng, screaming, "Long live Korean independence!"

North watched numbly as a man on horseback casually swept out an arm, the sword in his hand severing her neck. The young woman tumbled to the ground, head rolling away from her body. The people nearby screamed, scattering away from the grisly sight, some shouting epithets as they threw stones at the horse, but North couldn't hear any of them over the ringing sound in his head.

He couldn't look away from the woman's chestnut eyes. The light of triumph and life hadn't yet left them. She didn't look older than twenty. She had come here to fight for him.

And now she was dead.

He looked up across the street, where the priest who had been sermonizing earlier was standing with several of the suited men. They were watching the chaos with disappointed looks. One said something, lips moving soundlessly at this distance, and the priest shook his head sadly, picking up his briefcase and turning from the riot.

And all of a sudden, an emotion pierced through the thick haze in North's mind for the first time in three hundred and twenty-six days.

Rage.

Those men had been the ones to rile up the crowd, to make them think that freedom was possible, arming them with hope and nothing else. And now that things had spiralled out of control, they were just leaving. Walking away in their clean suits and shining shoes to their sturdy houses to eat a good meal, while the people they had turned loose fought and died in rags. This was all a- a business venture to them. And now that it had failed, they were washing their hands to try again another day.

The workers and the peasants and the embroidery girls couldn't wash their hands. Even if they could walk away, this was their life. They would never be free from it. Even if the Japanese were destroyed, as long as men like that priest and his allies or Emperor Gojong replaced them, these people would still be here in the streets, dirt and blood caked under their nails.

The screams of man, woman, and horse suddenly surged back as the high-pitched whine vanished with a pop.

And baring his teeth, North surged into the fray.

Another one I've been waiting eagerly to publish.

There's a story from the March First Movement about a woman who was waving a Korean flag, and her arm got severed by a sword, so she picked the flag up in her other hand and kept waving it. The woman with the chestnut eyes is spiritually inspired by her . If North could learn any name, it would be hers.

If you want to refresh on the events after this, it's A Tale Of Two Brothers in part one. ^^ Of course there is also... more to be revealed.

Also d on't let anyone tell you Japan is the Israel of East Asia. This is not true and I will not take this slander. We are the England of East Asia. Taiwan is Israel.

Sick Over You

The fields of Hwanghae spread out beyond the country road, green stems of winter wheat peeking out of the patches of snow still clinging to the land in some plots, while others were fallow, the earth in the process of being planted with the spring crop. The hour was growing late, and Hwang could see a group of diligent peasants just now leaving the fields, tugging a recalcitrant donkey with them.

The scene was peaceful, ostensibly. But the calm masked the turmoil. Even from this distance, he could see the rote way they looked upward at the clouds. And their own destination was a village of the ill.

Kangwon must have noticed his distraction. “I’m surprised you wanted to come with me.”

“It’s my province,” Hwang said, slowing his pace to match his. “It feels unfair to continue to send you to do the unpleasant work in it.”

The man was constantly ferrying off to their villages and towns to check the condition of the sick, reinforce quarantine, and assist with the sanitation measures. Hwang had started to feel a tad guilty at remaining close to Pyongyang, spending all day writing pamphlets and teaching lessons at the university. It was important work, but he couldn't help but feel that he needed to familiarize himself with his people's suffering more.

And with the leak gone, he could now follow his cousin to his province.

“I thought you’d want to be there when Hae wakes up,” Kangwon said. “From what you said, it'll be soon.”

“Gangwon will take care of her.”

Kangwon appeared pleased at his assessment, his brows relaxing enough that the furrow between them briefly vanished.

"Yeah," he said. "He will."

And North Pyongan would cover Hwang's Korea-guarding shift for the day they'd be away. It might give him time to pick up his poetry again. Out of all of their creatives, poets needed the extra incentive to direct their efforts towards the war.

"We'll keep her in the hospital for a couple days after she wakes up," Kangwon continued. "Just to recuperate."

"I'd prefer she was out of that environment as quickly as possible," Hwang fretted, remembering the sounds of anguish echoing in the sterile halls.

"She will be," his cousin assured. "But she's getting moved into the bunker after, and whoever's on watch won't be able to observe her all the time. I want to make sure her condition's stable before we discharge her."

"Alright," Hwang consented, seeing the wisdom in that. "I just worry about her catching something else while she's there."

"We're scrubbing the place down as good as we can," Kangwon said. "And Gangwon follows protocol. She'll be… fine."

His last words were interrupted by a large yawn. When his mouth closed, he blinked blearily.

"Will you be fine?" Hwang worried. He was liking the dark circles under his eyes and the way he was plodding along the road less and less.

"Just tired," Kangwon said through another yawn.

"Perhaps you should follow the advice you gave Korea and get some rest?" the glasses-wearer suggested. "I've heard the hardest patient to cure is yourself."

Kangwon shook his head. "I'm not trying to take up Korea's hypocrisy here, but this isn't really the time for any doctor to rest." His lips turned down slightly, grim. "We need every hand working full time."

"I suppose that's true." Hwang had been fairly sheltered from the efforts against the germ warfare in Pyongyang, despite receiving all the reports and death tolls. He knew it would be different witnessing it in person.

"And I know my-"

He'd probably been about to say 'limits,' but Sip Yung-su, his slightly high-strung bodyguard, suddenly barked, "Unknown approaching!"

Ri Il grabbed Kangwon, shoving him behind his barrel-chested frame, and Hwang allowed his own men to manhandle him into position, the four guards arranging themselves in a phalanx, firearms half-raised towards the field to their right.

Hwang peered over Min Hak-sol's shoulder to see a figure sprinting down a path between the fields of winter wheat, heels kicking up chunks of mud and snow. The person seemed to spot them, raising an arm as they redoubled their pace, calling out.

Kangwon- normally the first to spot something unusual in their surroundings- appeared to have recovered from his momentary befuddlement, and was scanning their rear, his guns holstered, but at the ready. Hwang slid his pistol into his hand, just in case.

The shouting became audible as the person neared.

"Help!" the man called, his voice raw. "Help, please!"

"Halt!" Ri Il commanded when he was several paces away. "Korean People's Army. State your business."

Hwang could see that the man's eyes were wide and panicked, sunken in their sockets like an American's.

He gasped for breath, choking out, "My pa and ma and- My family, they're not moving."

Kangwon stuck his head between Ri Il and Sip Yung-su, his voice urgent. “Are they sick?”

“It was- It was just the flu, I thought,” the man panted. “We didn’t think it was worth- But they’re- I couldn’t find a pulse, and my wife-“

His eyes gleamed desperately as he lunged forward, but Ri Il met him with his pistol raised.

“Maintain distance!” he barked.

“Please,” the man begged, heedless of the gun barrel pointed at his forehead. “Please, my wife is still breathing. She needs a doctor!”

“It could be a trap,” Hwang said to Kangwon.

“A trap?” The man’s face filled with dismay. “No, no, it isn’t a trap, my wife she-“

“It’s okay,” Kangwon soothed him, lowering his voice to say to Hwang, “I’ve got to go.”

“But-“

“I can’t abandon a patient,” he said firmly. “Especially if she’s in urgent need. Besides, what are the chances they try the same thing twice?”

“High,” Hwang supplied. “When it’s the only option they have, very high!”

“Please,” the man begged, tears starting to spill down his hollow cheeks. “I can’t lose her.”

Kangwon raised his voice, sliding from around his bodyguards. “If I can help her, I will.”

“Comrade Kangwon-“ Sip Yung-su protested.

“I’m a doctor,” he said firmly. “This is my job. If you want to run and notify someone for yours, go ahead.”

The man hesitated, then his jaw set, his knuckles tightening on his firearm. “If it’s an ambush, we’ll need a full complement.”

Kangwon nodded. “Once we reach the place, I’ll need one of you to go call for an Anti-Epidemic unit anyways.” Looking to the man, he said, “Take us to your wife.”

The stranger didn't need any more encouragement. He spun, taking off at full speed down the path, forcing the provinces and their bodyguards to charge after him.

Hwang could hear the man sucking down mouthfuls of cold air as he ran, the sound desperate and pained, yet he easily kept ahead of the more well-fed military men. Was it desperation allowing him to push beyond his limits, or was he not the starving peasant he appeared to be? Whatever it was, it encouraged the province to push through his burning lungs and aching legs. The months of being out of combat had allowed him to grow lax in his exercising again.

Kangwon, despite his exhaustion, kept up a steady pace as well, barely lagging behind him as they crossed the fields, heading for the speck of a farmhouse that appeared in the distance. Though it was worrying that he lagged behind at all.

As the building grew closer, Hwang’s anxiety only grew.

He thought the man seemed sincere in his panic, but he’d also believed Kangwon when he had said his sister was well. His cousin was much better at reading people than him, but he was tired, not operating at peak performance.

If this was an ambush, what did that mean? They’d been dropped off in Sariwon, intending to walk to the village to meet with the local authorities monitoring the quarantine. No one had been told where they were going, and those waiting for them didn’t know it was the Provincehumans they were waiting for.

It would mean they had another leak. That Choi Jung-nam’s efforts hadn’t been enough.

The idea almost made him as uneasy as the idea of being ambushed in the first place.

When they reached the small, thatch-roofed farmhouse, the man didn't hesitate to charge directly through the door, calling out, "Yeobo! Yeobo?"

Kangwon lurched for the house, then pulled up short, dropping his satchel and rummaging through it. Hwang swiftly did the same, pulling his protective suit out and hurriedly donning it.

From inside, the man's questioning calls turned to a cry of dismay. "Yeobo!"

A moan of agony, far worse than Hwang had heard in the hospital, emanated from the gaping doorway.

Kangwon buttoned up his suit, fumbling with the buttons. With a quick check of his protective gear, he shot inside.

"Stay back!" he ordered his bodyguards as they tried to follow.

Hwang forced his nerves to calm, making sure there weren't any gaps in the one-piece white suit before pulling the hood over his head, putting on his face mask, and adjusting his glasses. Then, cautiously, he approached the open door.

The house was a choga, of the sort they intended to phase out, long and low, one of those that was only a single room, the kitchen in a different building. The rays of sun had slid away from the small windows, leaving the place dark.

The space felt claustrophobic, the air inside uncomfortably warm, despite there being no ondol floor, and filled with the stale stench of blood and excrement, and something sickly sweet. Unlike the smell of fear, this was a very real scent.

Death.

The moaning was coming from the far end of the house. Hwang pulled his flashlight, switching it on.

The bright light hit those inside, casting enormous flickering shadows on the walls. He was relieved to see none of them came from armed reactionaries, though his heart sank at what he did see.

The moaning wasn't coming from the man's ill wife, but from him. He was crouched over a form on a futon, Kangwon kneeling with him, his fingers on a woman's slim wrist.

Making sure to give the 'all clear' to their guards, Hwang cautiously approached.

The man had his head in his hands. The woman looked several years younger than him, her hair lank and her face sallow. Yet despite her unwell pallor, there was an almost healthy flush to her cheeks. Her expression was infinitely peaceful, looking as if her eyes could flutter open at any second.

"I'm sorry," Kangwon said after a moment, softly laying her hand back on her chest. "She's gone."

The man's moaning ceased as abruptly as if his heart had stopped too. He raised his head, his eyes bloodshot under the flashlight beam.

"She can't be."

"She's starting to go cold," Kangwon told him gently, and Hwang caught the way he subtly shifted back, away from the man and his corpse. "It's too late to restart her heart."

The man looked lost. "What- What about them? Are they okay? Maybe I just… I didn't know what to look for. Maybe I was…"

His eyes slid to the girls tucked under each of the woman's arms. One was older, perhaps in her middling teens, her head resting on her mother's shoulder. The other was young, her dark hair still cut in the mushroom cut many girls received, and her limbs almost too stubby to reach around her mother's waist.

Kangwon pressed his fingers to each of the girls' necks in turn, then to their wrists. Hwang already knew what he would find before he repeated, "I'm sorry. You were right." The stiffness of their bodies had made it clear.

The man was no longer crying. He sat back on his haunches, devoid of all emotion as he gazed down at his wife and children.

"I thought it was just the flu," he said dully.

"We'll give you a moment." Kangwon stood, leading Hwang from the house.

Their bodyguards quickly swivelled, tense.

"Situation?" Min Hak-sol asked.

"It isn't an ambush," Hwang reported quietly.

He almost wished it was.

"Keep your distance from us," Kangwon advised, taking a step back that Hwang imitated. "These people definitely didn't have the flu. You don't want to catch it."

The men had already put on their face masks.

"Orders, comrades?" Min Hak-sol clipped.

Hwang looked to Kangwon.

"I'm going to need the fastest runner to head back to Sariwon," he said, keeping his voice low. "Contact the Epidemic Prevention Committee and get a full medical and sanitation team out here right away."

"I'm fastest," Pak Kong-sun immediately volunteered. None of the others protested. On the way here, he'd been covering the provinces' fronts with ease.

"I'm not comfortable with you not having a full contingent," Sip Yung-su protested, looking uneasily at the dark fields around them.

"Someone needs to maintain quarantine," Kangwon said, a tinge of reluctance in his voice.

Ah. Hwang knew what he was intending. It was regretful, but necessary.

"One of us could stay here, and everyone else goes," the anxious guard suggested.

"I'll be fine, Comrade Sip," Kangwon said firmly. "And I've got to stay here to find out what happened. Run fast, Comrade Pak. And tell them we don't know what it is, but it might be typhoid fever."

Typhoid fever. Hwang searched his mental files to find the one he was looking for. It was easy, as that was what they were heading to the village for.

Caused by the bacteria Salmonella typhi entering the body through infected waste, it sparked a high fever with symptoms that could easily be mistaken for the flu, before rising higher, causing delirium, internal bleeding, and, in some cases, rashes.

Hwang thought of the healthy flush on the woman's skin.

Pak Kong-sun saluted, sprinting off without another word.

"The rest of you should take up your posts," Hwang said, glancing at Kangwon to confirm.

The man nodded. "We'll be here for awhile."

They were an hour and a half's walk outside Sariwon, plus the time it would take for the units to mobilize. It was also unsure if they'd be able to commission a vehicle.

The two provinces loitered outside the door. No sounds came from within. The silence spoke volumes that no tears could.

After a long while, the man appeared in the doorway, as pale and gaunt as if he'd joined his wife while they waited.

"What do I do?" he rasped.

"This is going to sound cruel," Kangwon said apologetically, unobtrusively placing himself between him and the outside. "But until the medical team gets here, I'm going to need you to stay in there."

Hwang winced. He understood the necessity. They didn't know for certain what he had. They couldn't risk transporting him without proper precautions when he could be shedding bacteria into the fields around them, or onto their bodyguards.

But it did sound cruel.

He eyed the man, hoping they wouldn't have to resort to force to keep him inside.

But he just stared at Kangwon with dead eyes. "She's stayed with me all this time. I can stay with her a little longer."

"Thank you," Kangwon said, and Hwang echoed it, then asked, "Would you like my flashlight?"

The man's eyes dipped wearily. "I don't… want to see."

Hwang awkwardly lowered the light. Of course he didn't.

The man retreated inside, into the warm darkness with the corpses of his family.

"Can I ask you a few questions?" Kangwon asked, keeping his voice low. "If you're okay with it. It could help us figure out what happened."

"What's the point?" the man asked dully. "They're already dead."

"Anything we learn here could help us save more lives."

He didn't say 'your life.' If he had, Hwang suspected he might've received a similar answer.

There was a sigh from behind the door, and the rustle of clothing as the man lowered himself to the ground, leaning against it.

"What do you want to know?"

“What’s your name?”

“Choi Ki-tak.”

The name made Hwang’s heart twinge. This man could very well be some distant offshoot of the Hwanghae Choi clan, the same clan as Choi Jung-nam.

“And your wife?” Kangwon asked.

“Kim Kum-hyang.” The man said the name like it was an extraordinary flavour that he knew he would never taste again.

They received the names of the rest of his family- his father, mother, and two daughters.

“You have a nice farm going here,” Kangwon said, though Hwang was itching to learn whether this was really typhoid or not.

“We tried,” Choi Ki-tak said quietly. “We even managed to grow enough to donate sometimes.”

Kangwon had settled down a few feet away from the farmstead’s stoop, cross-legged. “When did you first start noticing symptoms?”

“Four weeks ago,” the man told him. “My father came down with a fever.”

“You’re supposed to report any illness to your local authorities,” Hwang reminded him, gingerly joining Kangwon on the ground.

His cousin placed a hand on his knee, and he realized that could sound like he was blaming him.

“I know,” Choi Ki-tak rasped. “But he’s always got sick easy, so we… didn’t think anything of it. Ma didn’t want to bother anyone for nothing. She was always like that.”

And it had killed almost her entire family.

“Ku- My wife was worried it might be whatever laid low the village,” he continued, tongue flinching away from the name. “But I was the one that was always making trips there, not him. And I was just fine."

Kangwon closed his eyes.

"A few days later, ma got sick, too," he said, his voice mechanical. "Then our girls. Then my wife. By the second week, I knew something was wrong. Everyone was blocked up, 'cept pa, and he was shitting everywhere. Couldn't stop. Everyone's bellies was all swoled up. 'Cept for me."

Putting aside his use of 'swoled,' Hwang reviewed that file again. Distended stomachs. That was from the spleen and liver swelling.

"When my wife took me aside to show me all those spots on her skin, I told her I'd set out to the village right away." He fell silent for a moment. "Kum-jin-" Their youngest. "Caught sight of 'em, said they were pretty. Like roses blooming all over her." His voice tripped for a second, before continuing on, numb. "But that night, I woke up with my wife shoving her away from her, shrieking fit to burst. The girl had been… picking at her skin while she slept. Tore her arm right open. Said she was trying to 'pick the roses.'"

"Delirium," Kangwon supplied. "The fever starts to affect the brain."

"Is that it?" the man asked listlessly. "I stayed the next day to help with Kum-jin. She'd stopped responding to us, and was just babbling to herself. I was just about to pick her up and carry her with me when pa started to do the same thing, but worse. He almost killed ma, shouting at her that she were a Jap spy, and she was making us all sick. I told him it was the Yanks, but he wouldn't listen. I tried to strap him down in the shed, but he was spraying his guts out, and I- I couldn't do it to him."

His voice was tight. "So I stayed to make sure they didn't tear each other apart. I was… I was hoping they'd get better. But… Ssi-bal. The only thing that happened was ma, Kum-hwan, and my wife got worse."

"The delirium?" Kangwon asked.

“Aye,” he said. “Kum-hwan and my wife never got violent. The girl just slept all the time, and my wife…” He let out a shaky breath. “She’d just sit there and hum, picking at her clothes like there was bugs in ‘em. But we never saw a bug. The Yanks never dropped a bomb anywhere near here.”

There was a dull thud, the sound of his fist hitting his wooden floor.

“So what was it?” he demanded, suddenly incensed enough to make Hwang eye the door warily. “If it wasn’t the damn flu, then what killed my family?”

A line in Hwang’s file caught his attention, a piece of knowledge he’d picked up from the medical text Kangwon had lent him. He scanned it, then quickly replaced it.

He couldn't suggest that. Even he knew it was far too insensitive.

“I can’t know for sure without tests, but it sounds like they had typhoid fever,” Kangwon said, a calm counterpoint to the man’s raw emotion.

“That’s what the village has, isn’t it?” Choi Ki-tak sounded no less angry. “But I told you I was the only one that went there. And I never got sick. I never got a single symptom, not the fever, not the shits, not the screwed up stomach or roses. If it was typhoid then why was I the only one that didn’t I get sick? Why am I the only one still here?”

Hwang removed his glasses, rubbing his hand over his face, forgetting he wasn’t supposed to.

What could Kangwon even say to that? If the situation was what he thought it was…

His cousin’s voice remained steady as he said, “Typhoid has an incubation period of a couple weeks. There would’ve been a period of time when you were visiting the village before it was quarantined when people were infected, but didn’t know. The Americans dropped a bomb near there, right?”

“Right,” he said bitterly. “Flies ended up in a well. But we have our own, and I’ve been keeping it covered since the second those Party fellers told me about this whole damn thing.”

“Typhoid isn’t just caught directly,” Kangwon explained, still in that calm tone. “If someone didn’t wash their hands correctly after using the toilet, then sold you something, or handed you money, that bacteria could end up on your hands, then in your mouth, however it happens.”

“Then I would get sick, not my family!”

“There’s something called an asymptomatic carrier,” Kangwon continued, making Hwang’s eyes widen. “Do you know what that is?”

Choi Ki-tak growled, “The only damn thing I know is that my family is dead."

“It’s when someone is infected with an illness, but doesn’t display any symptoms.”

Kangwon caught Hwang’s furrowed brows as he silently asked him if he should tell him this. His cousin gave a reassuring, but tired, smile.

“They have the disease, but it doesn’t affect them,” he continued. “It won’t kill them. But they can still spread it to others.”

Choi Ki-tak was silent for a long moment as the reality set in.

If he was asymptomatic, he would carry the Salmonella typhus bacteria inside of him, packed in his intestines, his blood, his internal organs. And even if you took the utmost precautions, when living with an entire family in one small household, using one toilet, one kitchen, one sitting room, that bacteria would spread. In their own chosonjip, every cold had been a shared affair.

And even if that had never happened, he had picked the bacteria up from the villagers in the first place. He was likely the one that worked the fields, harvesting winter crops like radishes and carrots with his hands, not thinking about cleaning them when his wife would wash the vegetables when preparing them anyways. But if she missed even a single speck of bacteria…

And by the time the father had started having diarrhea that his wife had likely been the one to clean, the family's fate was sealed.

All except for Choi Ki-tak.

"I killed them," he said, every drop of emotion wrung from him once more. "I killed my family."

"No, you didn't," Kangwon soothed. "You caught the disease that killed your family. You couldn't've known."

That was true, yet Hwang felt guilty enough over Choi Jung-nam's death solely because he'd given his consent to the mission without hesitation. To be told you were likely the one that had carried the thing responsible for the death of your entire family…

Frankly, it seemed like the sort of thing Hwang would divulge without thinking, not Kangwon using that relaxed, deliberate tone.

"But that's what happened, isn't it?" the man rasped. "I'm the one that infected them. I killed them. I killed my wife and she died alone in the dark."

"No," the province said firmly. "The Americans killed them. And I know that isn't comforting. I know it doesn't bring them back, and it doesn't make you feel any less like it's your fault."

Kangwon leaned towards the door. "But it's true. It isn't your fault, Choi Ki-tak. You did everything you could for your family. Even the mistakes you made were made because you were trying to protect them. You can't blame yourself for that."

There was another long silence, then the man whispered, "I need… some time to myself."

"Okay," Kangwon said easily. "We'll stop talking. But stay near the door. If I'm wrong, I don't want you getting too close to the bodies, in case you've just gotten lucky so far."

Hwang didn’t think he would have told him what he had if he wasn’t sure.

Kangwon scooched closer to the house, leaning back against the stones that surrounded the lower wall, and Hwang joined him, flanking the door. Neither of them said anything, staring out at the night. Hwang turned off his flashlight to preserve the battery.

Their guards were a safe distance away, stationed around the dusty farmyard like jangseung, watching the fields. Though this hadn’t been a trap, they were still vulnerable out here in the dark.

'Alone in the dark.' Crushed by that heavy air and surrounded by the stench of death, her mind slipping away from her.

Hwang didn't believe in an afterlife, but he still thought the words in his mind.

'Hope for the bliss of the dead.'

After a half hour, Kangwon started asking Choi Ki-tak questions, mundane things such as whether he’d fulfilled his harvest last year, and what sorts of crops he grew. Hwang nervously waited for the man to snap at him, but he interspersed them over fifteen minutes or so, and the farmer kept replying, his answers short and emotionless.

Even when his cousin was clearly swallowing a yawn, he asked whether the farmer had gotten to try the tractor-lending station.

He had. His daughters had been enamoured with the machine.

Hwang tilted his head at Kangwon, silently asking what he was doing.

It was hard to see his expression in the dark, but he thought his brows drew in. He had no difficulty seeing the way he patted the knife at his hip, then pointed inside.

Ah. This was a suicide watch. Though Hwang couldn’t help but think that would be less necessary if Kangwon hadn’t put the thought that the man was responsible for his family’s death into his head.

After an hour and a half had passed, his cousin had started to slump, his head nodding to his chest as his eyes grew even more heavy-lidded.

Hwang reached over to tap him on the shoulder, and he startled, before giving him an exhausted look, glancing between the spectacled man and the door.

'Can't do it anymore. Keep going for me.'

Hwang's eyes widened. 'Me? I don't know what to say!'*

Kangwon's lids slid closed. 'Sorry…'

His head slumped to the side, and he was out.

Hwang wrung his hands together. It was good his cousin was getting some rest, but he didn't know what to say to the man! What if he asked some question he thought was innocuous, and ended up making him spiral? Kangwon's question about the tractor had seemed innocent enough after all, but had still led to him speaking of the dead daughters he was currently trapped with.

Luckily, his cousin had asked about soil quality in the area just before he'd passed out, giving Hwang plenty of time to formulate a question.

Yet when fifteen minutes had ticked down, he found he'd been more preoccupied with counting the seconds, and no matter how he wracked his brain, he couldn't think of anything to ask Choi Ki-tak.

The usual questions of philosophy and religion could bring up too many unpleasant thoughts for a grieving man, and as useful as Kangwon's questions had been for sounding off and distracting the farmer, part of their success came from his solid, warm voice. It sounded like he truly cared about the answers. Hwang did care about them, but his more… clinical tone didn't lend itself to that. He knew the mundane questions would come off as unimportant nuisances in the face of the man's loss.

There was one question he wanted to ask. Would Hae ask it?

Thinking of Sincheon, of her careful questions, always posed with such a sincere expression, he thought she would.

But he knew with her innocent charm, she'd be able to. Even when she asked something that could be considered overly invasive, no one ever protested because she asked with such earnesty. Hwang simply didn't have that charisma.

But he knew what his sister wouldn't do. With Yang Jeong-nyeo, Ko Kuil-hwa, Dan Yeon-hwa, and many more, she had been, for once in her life, reluctant to ask them questions. Yet she had.

Hae wouldn't leave him alone with his grief.

So Hwang softly called, "Mr. Choi Ki-tak?"

The man didn't answer immediately, allowing him to shamefully hope that maybe he'd fallen asleep.

But after a minute, he asked, "What?"

"Could you tell me about your wife?"

Another silence.

Hwang quickly said, "Only if it wouldn't be aggravating a fresh wound."

"Why do you want to know?" he asked bluntly.

"I…" Reminding himself to keep his fingers away from his eyes, Hwang fiddled with the button on his protective suit. "It might make you feel better."

When he didn't respond, he used a Korea-ism. "And I'm your Provincehuman. I need to know what was done to my people so I can avenge it."

Losing his courage at the continued silence, he backtracked. "I'm sorry, it's obviously too soon to be asking that. It just seems like she must have been an impressive woman."

Underneath his grief, Choi Ki-tak had a gruff bearing. If Hwang had seen him on the street, and was pressed to make an assumption, he would have said he was a similar man to North Hamgyong-cantankerous and rough, not the sort to shed tears. Your typical stoic farmer. Those flashes of his personality seemed altogether different from the breathless man that had pleaded with tears in his eyes to save his wife.

For another long moment, the farmer still didn't answer, leaving Hwang time to curse himself. Had he just asked a question sure to hurt the man just to try and make himself seem less cold?

But then Choi Ki-tak said, "Aye, she was."

There was a shifting sound as he adjusted himself against the door. "I wouldn't ever say she was a warm person. But she was kind. Diligent. She loved our girls and wanted to raise 'em right. Wouldn't ever let me make them kneel on a rice sack when they got into the kimchi or broke a dish, how my pa did to me." He gave a snort. "Wouldn't let him do it either. And weren't those staredowns a sight to see."

"She does sound like a good woman." Beyond mere smacks on the wrist, Hwang found physical punishments for children abhorrent.

"She trained me right. Even got me standing up to pa." With an actual chuckle, he said, "Only took thirty-two years."

Relieved at the sound, Hwang asked, "How did you two meet?"

"Arranged marriage, believe it or not," he replied. "I'd spent too long screwing around trying to find my way, so pa handed over the family land, saddled me with a sixteen-year old wife, and ordered me to settle down. One of those things I couldn't stand up to him on."

Judging by his appearance, Hwang suspected he'd at least been in his late twenties when they were wed. It was how things had been before the Law on Sex Equality. He knew now wasn't the time to make judgements.

"I'm glad I didn't," he said quietly. "She was the best damn thing that ever happened to me."

He sank into silent reminiscence for awhile, as Hwang watched their guards perform light exercises to keep awake. Ri Il looked over his shoulder, spotting Kangwon slumped against the wall, and the Hwanghae raised his hand in an 'all good' gesture.

"You know, I thought she might divorce me when all those new laws were passed," Choi Ki-tak continued. "She was never the most affectionate. And I can't really blame her. I didn't see anything wrong with us getting hitched when we did, beyond being annoyed my pa had finally got me. But now that my Kum-hwan is…"

His voice faltered. Hwang was certain the weight of the corpses across the room from him had broken it.

"She was so young," he choked. "Too young."

Hwang reached to adjust his glasses, then stopped himself. "But your wife didn't divorce you."

"No," he managed after a shuddering breath. "I was pussyfooting around, waiting for her to do it. It's not like she couldn't have left. It would've been hard with the kids, but… She was always the type to power through. I'd tell her not to harvest the last field with the storm coming, that getting those last few potatoes wasn't worth her getting- getting sick. But I'd get back from town and there she'd be, peeling a dozen of 'em while the rest sat in the pantry."

"A model peasant," Hwang approved. Her name likely would've came across his desk someday.

"She was." The swallow from behind the door was audible. "I eventually got so paranoid that one day I'd come home to find her gone that I asked outright- 'Are you going to divorce me?' And you know what she said?"

"What did she say?"

“Looked at me cool as you please, and said, ‘Why should I?’ Then she handed me a chicken to pluck.” The sound he made was too grieved to be a chuckle, but too filled with love to be a sob. “God. Kum-hyang was a good woman alright.”

The next sound out of him was unmistakably a sob. “I’m going to miss her.”

Unable to clean his glasses, Hwang inhaled, mustering his next question.

“What were your daughters like?”

For the next two long hours, Choi Ki-tak told him about his family. How despite his father’s flaws, he’d done his best to get their household through the Japanese Occupation, and he could never bring himself to resent him for everything he'd done wrong. How his mother was a gentle woman who was always the first to offer travellers a place to stay in their woodshed. About how even at six years of age, it was clear Choi Kum-jin was just like him in all the worst ways, and was likely going to grow up to cause him the same headaches he’d caused his father, how Choi Kum-hwan had inherited her mother’s spine, but preferred softer pursuits to farming, such as poetry and mathematics, and how she’d dreamed of attending Kim Il-sung University.

Hwang’s chest squeezed. “She could’ve been one of my students.”

“Aye,” Choi Ki-tak said quietly. “It was one of the selling points for her. Getting to be taught maths by our province himself.” His words tightened in his throat. “She could’ve made it, too. She was sharp as a sickle, nothing like her pa. I spent so long worrying about how even if they’d take a Korean woman, I’d never be able to afford sending her to Seoul. When we heard peasant kids could attend the Pyongyang one for free, Jesus could’ve wept. She was so excited.”

His voice splintered, and Hwang could hear his clothes rustle as he drew in on himself.

“God, I wish I could have seen ‘em grow up.”

Hwang looked helplessly at Kangwon, but he was still fast asleep, face covered by his mask.

There wasn't anything he could say to that. But he had to try.

"I'm so sorry for your loss." His hand strayed to the edge of the door between them. "May I ask what you would have studied if you'd ever had the chance to enroll in school? From what you said of your youth, it doesn't sound as if being a farmer was your first choice."

Choi Ki-tak paused, as if the thought had never occurred to him.

Then he gave another teary chuckle. "I'm not sure if there's a class for it, but damn if I didn't fancy myself a poet, too. Spent all day travelling around the countryside, writing about streams and flowers. Even got myself a horsehair hat, too."

Hwang blinked. "That's unexpected."

"I'm not sure if I was any good at it, mind," the man demurred. "But maybe Kum-hwan picked up a little more of me than I thought."

He was quiet, and Hwang wondered if he was gazing into the dark corner where her body lay.

"She was a smart girl," he said, almost too soft to be heard.

Hwang coaxed more stories from him, about his father and his wife facing off over the children, of how his mother never protested when he was being punished as a child, but she did sneak him gangjeong as he kneeled on the bag of rice, of how Kum-hwan had been the one to figure out how the loaned tractor worked, and how Kum-jin had ran alongside as her father plowed the fields, not having to help with the work for the first time in their lives as the machine made it easy. Of how Kim Kum-hyang had still insisted on working a corner of the land by hand, but had written a letter of gratitude to the Party for the existence of the tractor-lending station despite it. And how she'd smiled after, leaning against her hoe as she watched her husband and children marvel over how quickly they'd gotten the work done.

By the time lights flashed in the distance, the man was speaking enthusiastically about his deceased family, chuckling more frequently and slapping his palm on his thigh as he recalled the way his father had fumed after young Kum-jin put salt in his tea. His words were still heavy and wounded, but the raw, bleeding edge had gone out of them.

Hwang didn't notify him of the approachers, letting him finish his story about how when they had first been married, he had thought Kim Kum-hyang was shy, until he had turned his nose up at the chicken juk she'd made and asked for jjigae instead, and she had coldly told him he would eat what she made or starve.

By the time he was done, the medical unit was hailing their bodyguards, the lights of their flashlights and lanterns illuminating the stone and clay walls of the farmhouse as they climbed from the flatbed truck they'd been packed into.

Hwang reached over, nudging Kangwon awake. It took long enough that he was starting to get worried. But then his cousin stirred, wincing as the light hit his eyes.

"Everything okay?" he asked through a yawn, blinking hard in lieu of rubbing his eyes.

"Yes," Hwang ventured, hoping. "I think so."

Choi Ki-tak didn't speak as the sanitation team moved in, all clad in white suits like the provinces, entering his home while Kangwon told the lead of the medical team what the situation was. One pulled an olive tarp from the back of the truck, exposing several corpse cloths, and it was these that the bodies of Choi Ki-tak's family were swaddled in.

Hwang watched the pale faces of his daughters pass, the mischievous Kum-jin cradled delicately in a woman's arms, frozen in a fetal position, the quiet Kum-hwan, the girl that could have been his student one day, carried between two men, her corpse too stiff to be held, and the kind and diligent Kim Kum-hyang, whom had loved her family, despite being forced into it.

Choi Ki-tak's eyes followed her, anguish etched into his face, raising a hand like he wanted to touch her.

Her face was serene, the red roses on her skin invisible in the silver moonlight, her eyes still appearing as if they could flutter open at any time.

But they remained closed, and she was wrapped in a cloth alongside her daughters.

Choi Ki-tak's hand fell, and he quietly directed the team to the outside door to the side room. In a few minutes, they emerged with two more bodies, and Hwang got his first glimpses of the stern Choi Ki-gun and timid Pak Ril-suk.

For all his fierceness in his stories, the man was thin and withered, his pate nearly as bald as Hwang's. The woman was rounder, her head still full of curly dark locks. Both of them wore tired expressions frozen on their worn faces. They, too, were tucked into body bags, and arranged in the back of the truck.

The medical team moved in, taking samples of straw, clothing, a carafe of water, and jellied bowls of simple juk that Choi Ki-tak had evidently been trying to feed his sick family, gathering everything they would test.

"If it's typhoid, I don't think we have to demolish the place," a member of the sanitation unit noted. "Just burn everything inside and douse it."

"Let's put a layer of straw down and burn that, too," another suggested. "Just in case there's any bugs."

Hwang thought to protest about the way they were talking about burning everything Choi Ki-tak had left so casually in front of him, but didn't. The men both sounded exhausted. This doubtless wasn't the first group of corpses they'd seen this week, or the first home they'd had to incinerate.

As the tarp was pulled over the shrouds, Choi Ki-tak suddenly cried, “Wait!” as he lunged forward. “Am I- Am I going to get her back?”

“They’ll need to be cremated,” Kangwon said gently. “For safety.”

He left out the other detail. The victims of germ warfare had to be autopsied, thoroughly dissected to find out what had killed them, to get the proof they needed to show the rest of the world what was being done to them.

Choi Ki-tak’s square jaw feathered. “Then can I see her, one last time?”

One of the medical team went to protest, but Kangwon said, “Go ahead.” Lowering his voice, he told the woman, “He’s already sick.”

The team shuffled back as Choi Ki-tak approached the truck, using a shaking hand to unwind the coarse cloth from his wife's face.

The hardworking farm woman he had described shouldn’t have a complexion so pale. The typhoid had leeched everything from her, staining her skin, hollowing out her cheeks, even robbing her of her mind.

But Choi Ki-tak stared at her like he didn’t see any of that, reaching out a trembling hand to cup her cheek, his thumb caressing across it. He leaned down, whispering something into her ear that didn’t belong to the rest of them, before pressing a kiss to her cold forehead. Then with a final long look at her face, he covered it once more.

When he straightened, his breath created a cloud of steam that jittered in the frosty air.

“You can ride in the back with her, comrade,” one of the medical unit said gently.

“’Ppreciate it,” the man rasped.

He was given a face mask to wear, and long gloves.

As he put them on, Kangwon said, “You’re going to want to keep blaming yourself. But you have to fight that. None of this is your fault. We can't blame ourselves for things that are beyond our power."

Choi Ki-tak gazed at the lumps under the tarp. "It's hard not to."

"I know." Kangwon's eyes dipped. "But you have to overcome that. Whether it's to live for your family or avenge them. You have to keep going. I'm sure your wife would've wanted that."

He hesitated, then placed a hand on Choi Ki-tak's shoulder. "And you didn't leave her to die. You went to try and save her. You did everything you could. That's what matters."

The man didn't answer, staring long and hard at the bodies of his loved ones.

Just as he climbed into the truck bed with the them, Hwang called, "Hold a moment!" his voice almost cracking.

Choi Ki-tak looked over his shoulder.

Forcing himself not to touch his glasses or buttons, Hwang said, "There are classes for poetry. Literature at Kim Il-sung University, and ones held by the Federation of Literature and Arts. If…" He gave in to the urge to adjust his eyewear. "If after you're released from quarantine you find the farm too lonely, you could consider that."

The man stared at him, then slowly nodded. "I'll keep that in mind."

Hwang hoped he would. If he truly was an asymptomatic carrier of typhoid, he could no longer make his living growing food.

As the medical team moved out in their truck, and the sanitation team moved in with their chemicals and straw, Hwang turned to Kangwon.

"Why did you tell him he might be a carrier?" he asked, having found no answer over the hours. "He wouldn't be in that state if you hadn't."

Kangwon looked back tiredly. “They’re going to tell him once they run his labs. He’d find out eventually, and think it was his fault anyways. And no one there has the time to tell him it’s not.”

Hwang was slightly humbled. His cousin truly wasn’t just focused on the present. He thought ahead that far to make it even slightly more likely that the man wouldn’t give in to grief.

“Come on,” Kangwon said, moving by him. “We’ve still got to get to that village.”

Work didn’t end, even after it felt like it should.

Hwang cast one last glance over his shoulder, the lights of the unit glowing from the windows of the farmhouse, harsher and colder than any of the oil lamps that had likely been lit there previously. He could almost see Kim Kum-hyang watching from the window as her daughters ran towards the open door.

‘Foolish thought.’

He turned to jog after Kangwon, leaving the farmhouse behind, as all those that had once lived in it had, too.

More people voted for keeping one long chapter, but the more I thought about it the more I feel like two is right. The break is natural. I’ll just hope really hard we don’t hit two hundred chapters on this one (she said, foolishly).

Choi Ki-tak and Kim Kum-hyang’s age gap- eleven years- is concerning because she was 16 and he was 27 when they were married (technically 17 and 26 because the New Year just hadn’t set their ages forward yet, but that’s literally no difference), but it’s not abnormal for back then (I personally think it's never been okay for a man to marry a teenage girl, or a woman to marry a boy. But that's just me). Just so you’re aware that I am not supporting that gap at all. I just like to explore different dynamics.

It seems like a good chunk of Americans are schizophrenic. But not in the way where they’re just mentally ill people deserving of respect. There seems to be something very, very wrong with a very large number of them. Lead poisoning, maybe.

Slipping Up

For the next day, Kangwon visited the small Hwanghae village, distributing precious antibiotics to the people hit by the typhoid the hardest, alongside rations, comforting the delirious, exhausted patients, and bringing the village People's Committee- down to four members with the others in quarantine- the news about Choi Ki-tak's family.

It upset a few of them. Apparently it wasn't just the State the Choi farmstead had donated their extra harvest to. They'd brought surplus in to give to families during hard winters even before Liberation.

The village had reacted well to the outbreak. When the nightwatch had heard the plane, and realized the bomb hadn't exploded the way it should, the villagers had immediately mobilized, combing the fields for insects, collecting the flies spread across the village by the handful, burning straw on their floors to destroy any fleas that could've made it inside, moving the livestock to different pastures, and killing every cat and rat they could find before willingly imposing quarantine on themselves, only leaving their houses when absolutely necessary.

But someone had left a well lid open. There wasn't any way to tell if it was malice or forgetfulness, but either way, flies infected with typhoid had made it into a main water supply. And like with the family from the night before, it'd spread from there.

Out of fifty households and just under three hundred people, more than sixty were sick. Typhoid had a fairly low fatality rate when the infection was caught right away, and the moment the first villager came down with a fever, the People's Committee had contacted the Epidemic Prevention Committee to handle it. Eighteen had been the casualty count Kangwon was given before he'd arrived.

He left with it at nineteen. When a young mother went to get her daughter so he could examine her, she wouldn't wake up.

She was still warm, so Kangwon flipped her over and started to press on her lower thorax with his hands, trying to force her heart to pump again, and when that didn't work, as a desperate last resort he pinched her nose, trying to breathe air back into her lungs and not think about bacteria.

But she remained still.

Kangwon pulled back, gently closing the girl's mouth. The woman knew even before he shook his head. He left her crying into her husband's arms, his eyes bleary and confused, not comprehending that the body on the futon was his daughter. Not comprehending anything.

He gestured for Hwang to stay with them, hoping he'd be able to offer some comfort the way he had last night, while he sprinted to the People's Committee headquarters, grabbing several bottles of chemical disinfectants from their supply, ordering the startled secretary inside to get him water as he mixed them together. It wasn't smart, but he couldn't stop imagining Salmonella typhi squirming across his lips and inside his mouth.

Despite his profession, Kangwon had never actually been a germophobe. But this was different.

He couldn't afford to get sick.

With his jar of water in hand, he poured the mixture of hydrogen peroxide, benzalkonium chloride, and ethanol into it, more drops than he'd even use for cleaning, making sure it was diluted before he raised it to his lips. Bracing himself and trying to tighten his throat as much as he could, he took a mouthful of the water, filling his cheeks with it, swishing it around to get every inch of his mouth and trying not to think about the fact he was using poison as mouthwash.

It burned, but he steeled himself, tipping his head back and relaxing his larynx enough to gargle the solution, getting it as far down his throat as he could before running outside to spit it in the snow. He repeated this two more times, then a third for safety's sake, before getting a cloth and rubbing the liquid on his lips, scrubbing until they were stinging and raw. Then he did the same to the area around his mouth, scourging any part of him that had touched the infected girl.

Only when the non-burnt parts of his skin were hurting as much as the burnt parts (and one of his burns was burning all over again with the disinfectants rubbed into it), did he stop.

He sighed, his mouth tingling as he returned the jar to the secretary, advising him to add stronger chemicals before using it to clean, so it wouldn't go to waste.

His mouth tasted bitter enough to be distracting, so he made it known that despite the restrictions on using grain to make alcohol right now, he'd really appreciate it if someone could get him something strong. Water wouldn't work, it would just spread the taste around even more.

In a half hour, a sealed jar of what looked and smelled like plain soju was delivered anonymously to the headquarters. Kangwon wasn't looking to find out who was illegally brewing. As a doctor, it was better if he didn't poke at things like that, in case it made people hesitant to let him treat them in the future. As long as the crime they were committing wasn't malicious, they were still his patients. Plus he liked being able to ask for disinfectant in a pinch.

The homebrew was strong enough that just the smell made his eyes water. He really hoped it was brewed correctly. The last thing he needed was going blind.

He deliberated until the stinging in his gums got unbearable, then took a swig, wincing.

'More ethanol.'

He used the first few mouthfuls to rinse, then took a few just to drink (inside, where no one could see him). He didn't have to worry about getting drunk- he'd had alcohol a few times during the Occupation, and unlike Korea, even strong stuff like this took more to affect him.

Kangwon sighed, going to wipe his mouth with the arm of his suit before remembering he'd have to scrub it again. He just put his face mask on, the mix of chemicals and alcohol on his breath making his eyes water more.

At least he felt clean again.

Hwang found him leaning against the desk inside the headquarters. The secretary had retreated to a back room.

"I assisted in transporting the body," he said, subdued.

Kangwon wordlessly held the jar of soju out.

Hwang looked around the empty room nervously. "It's not entirely good optics to be seen drinking illegal alcohol while on the job."

Kangwon didn't lower the jar, and after a second his cousin snatched it, taking several long gulps. After he lowered it, he realized the same 'wiping mouth' predicament his cousin had, but solved it with a handkerchief from his bag.

"There really wasn't anything you could have done," he said, refolding the cotton cloth.

"Yeah." Kangwon took another swig of soju, letting it irritate the chemical burns in his mouth. "I know."

After the jar was half empty, he sighed, pushing off the desk.

"Come on." He ignored the black spots fuzzing his vision. The couple hours' sleep last night hadn't refreshed him, just left him with a kink in his neck. "Let's go visit the other villages around here."

"We're not done?" Hwang asked.

"Nope. We've got to make sure the typhoid didn't spread."

This'd been supposed to be a one-day trip. But Kangwon couldn't leave without investigating first. There hadn't been any reports, but after Choi Ki-tak, he wanted to make sure no cases had cropped up from another asymptomatic carrier.

They went door to door in all the surrounding villages, checking temperatures, searching for any illness, isolating anyone they found. Kangwon thought the few cases were just the flu, but so had Choi Ki-tak. Knock on the bridge before crossing.

After, they commandeered a vehicle from Sariwon and drove out to all the isolated farmhouses, looking for anyone in the same situation as the other farming family. Kangwon performed check-up after check-up on dozens of people, reminding them to report the first sign of illness, no matter how small, and to clean, and never eat anything raw or not washed properly, and to close their wells tight, and cull any farm animals that didn't seem right, no matter how hungry they were.

Meanwhile, Hwang took the opportunity to ask if there was anything the peasants needed, any government decision they were dissatisfied with, or soldiers mistreating them. He also asked more personal questions, to Kangwon's satisfaction, like if they had any relatives in the army, and if they did, telling them they should send them a letter. And even if they didn't, that they should write one to a unit anyways.

He was still clearly going for the 'remind the soldiers what they're fighting for, and remind the civilians the army's fighting for them' angle. But it was progress.

Kangwon had been tentatively hopeful that they'd finish the survey without any more major cases. But it died at the final house.

It was large, with a tile roof and several outbuildings. But it looked lonely in a way he couldn't explain. It was the same way checking for a pulse was only rote for him. Just a glance was usually enough for him to tell when someone was dead. They looked…

'Empty.'

Kangwon didn't bother going inside. He went out to the edge of the fields, where several mounds rose, rocks stacked in elaborate cairns on top of them. There were fresher lumps of earth at the base, five of them, small, simple stacks of stone piled carefully on top.

There was only one hole. At the bottom rested a wizened old man in a white jeogori and pants, his hands folded across his thin chest. They were covered in lentigo spots, some darker than others where the skin had necrotized. One pockmarked his cheek, looking similar to Kangwon's burns.

'Scrub typhus,' his head diagnosed as his heart clenched. Caused by mites infected with Theileria tsutsugamushi.

Unlike a couple of the other diseases, this one was endemic to Korea. He'd seen it before. It worked fast, shutting down a range of organs in days, fast enough to wipe out a family before they could get help.

And unlike Choi Ki-tak's, no one had survived this.

"Should we… bury him?" Hwang asked, his eyes straying to the shovel with its blade stuck into the ground, like it'd been left there for that exact purpose.

'Probably was.'

The man's clothes were clean, not like he'd dug a grave in them. They were good clothes, the kind you'd pull out on Chuseok or Seollal.

He'd buried his family, then got dressed in his best outfit and laid down in his own grave, waiting for someone to do the same for him.

"We can't," Kangwon said regretfully. "His body needs to be tested so we know for sure what killed them."

And if it was safe to leave the rest of the family buried.

"Ah. Of course." Hwang looked uneasy at the idea. "But seeing as this is my province, may I make a request?"

"Go ahead."

"Could he be returned here after?" His eyes lingered on the frail old man. "If it's safe, of course."

"Yeah," Kangwon said with a small smile. "I'll tell the unit. But they'll be too busy to do it. If we get permission, you should come back and lay him to rest."

"Yes," Hwang agreed, his gaze still fixed on the man. "Quite so."

After four long days of surveying, they finally returned to Pyongyang, Hwang free to return to his writing and editing, and Kangwon back to the sterile halls of the Quarantine Hospital after he handed in his report.

Next trip would be to his province to check on the plague cases there. He wanted to visit the areas around Wonsan, too. Korea had ordered him to stay away from the city since it was such a target, but because it was such a target there were tons of cases in the villages and army units around it that he wanted to check up on.

But right now he just wanted to take a long nap so he'd be back in top condition.

Despite his aching body and still-raw mouth, concern drove him to head out of the city first, all the way to the bunker to check on Korea.

Before he'd gone to sleep, his province had made sure to ask who should feed him if he had to leave the city, and since absolutely zero of his cousins had received permission, it'd been left up to the Premier. But he was a busy man, and Kangwon wouldn't be surprised if he hadn't been able to make it every day.

Countryhumans didn't actually need food or water when they were in a recuperative coma. But it helped. Especially when you knew the person wouldn't be eating when they woke up.

SH was on watch, and thankfully told him that the Premier actually had been by every day with simple soups and jjigaes prepared by Kim Song-ae. She also told him, to huge relief, that Hae had woken up the day after he left, and Gangwon had had her transferred to the bunker to rest two days ago.

Kangwon poked his head into the women's bedroom. His cousin was sleeping, curled up on her cot with her blush compact clutched in one hand and a piece of paper in the other. He breathed out, the knot of tension that'd been coiled in his stomach for the past two months dissolving.

He didn't disturb her, going to Korea's room instead, feeding him the last of the plain sundubu jjigae left by the Premier, soothing his feverish muttering and trying not to think about the little girl picking roses in her delirium as he did.

His bandages looked fresh. Kangwon had to wonder what the Premier thought about the name his Countryhuman called out in his sleep.

He pretended he didn't hear him calling it again as he left.

It'd be another week and a day before Kangwon woke him up, unless something big happened with the peace talks (seemed unlikely). He wasn't looking forward to having to tell him about the spreading outbreaks, and what they'd taken from them.

He forced his feet to carry him to the isolated hospital, aware that Ri Il and Sip Yung-su were watching him like hawks, hovering close in case he collapsed. But he wasn't that tired.

'Yet.'

He was almost there when a militia member came out of nowhere, telling him a woman was looking for him outside the Military Hospital and at City Hospital One, frantically asking for a house call. Her name was Kim Sang-suk.

Kangwon's heart sank.

Sip Tal-sun's wife.

He hurried to the small house they lived in, built by the militia because a loyal veteran and his dependents couldn't be left in a cave. It was far beyond the city limits, hidden at the base of a hill across the Taedong, since if the Americans decided to bomb it, Sip Tal-sun's disability would make it too difficult to escape.

The older woman was waiting, wringing her hands in her apron, tears coursing down her face.

"Oh Comrade Kangwon!" she cried when she saw him. "Thank goodness you're here! It's- It's-"

"Was there a complication with his leg?" Kangwon asked, hoping that was it.

Kim Sang-suk shook her head, bound hair quivering, then pushed open the door to the two-room hut. The curtain that separated them was pushed aside.

Sip Tal-sun lay on a pallet in the corner. Blood stained the raised floorboards around him, and the rolled-up cuffs of his workshirt. Long ribbons of it ran from the gashes on his wrists, just starting to flake. A shaving blade gleamed next to him, the blade spotless, like it'd been wiped clean and neatly set aside after its purpose was served.

Kangwon took a long blink.

"I don't know how it happened," Kim Sang-suk moaned, clutching at her hair. "I knew he was unhappy, I knew he was- But I always did his shaving for him and hid the razor after. I've been burying it outside with the knives when I'm not using them! I don't know how he- I don't-"

"Eomma," a small boy appeared beside her. Her son. "Please don't cry. Appa was unhappy."

Kangwon helped the hyperventilating woman into a chair, coaching her to take deep slow breaths. Noticing the boy staring at his dad's body with wide, dark eyes, he swished the curtain shut, hiding it.

“It’s alright,” he soothed, even though it wasn’t. “It wasn’t your fault. If someone doesn’t want to live, they’ll find a way to die somehow.”

“I just…” Kim Sang-suk looked up, tears pooled in the corners of her brown eyes. “Why didn’t he want to live? I know he couldn’t walk or- or anything. But he was alive. He came home. My father didn’t, my brother didn’t, but he did. He had us.”

That wasn’t really something Kangwon could answer. He didn’t know why a man that had lost everything like Choi Ki-tak could seem like he was going to be okay, while a man that still had a house, had benefits and a family that loved him, had caved in to despair.

No one wanted to be told they weren’t enough. So Kangwon didn’t.

“He was sick,” he said instead, able to place a hand on her shoulder without worry now that he was disinfected and out of his suit. “And not with the kind of illness we could’ve treated. It’s called melancholia, or a depressive reaction. It can happen to people when they go through something traumatic.”

He didn't actually know if Sip Tal-sun had developed it, but he could’ve. Even as his body healed, becoming strong enough to let him leave his house with his wife’s assistance, he’d only seemed to be retreating deeper into his head, and that mindset Kangwon had feared.

He'd brought him books, valuable pencils and paper, sewing supplies, trying to suggest hobbies for him. But the man hadn’t even wanted to try. The idea of the needle and thread had only seemed to make him sink deeper. The head of the household, the breadwinner, a decorated soldier, reduced to a grandmother sitting in bed, sewing. He hadn’t listened to Kangwon’s assurances that he could use the skills learned in the army to bring in money, or mend clothes for other soldiers. He wanted to wear the uniform, not fix it.

He didn't want to move on.

“Your husband wasn’t thinking clearly,” Kangwon said to his wife. “There wasn’t anything you could’ve done.”

She wasn’t Korea. The lie comforted her.

It was a lie, Kangwon thought. He could still see the look in Sip Tal-sun’s eyes as he sat in that hospital bed, staring at the space where his leg had used to be.

Whether he’d fallen into a depressive reaction or not, Kangwon thought Sip Tal-sun had chosen to end his life. He thought he’d been thinking about it even before he left the hospital. It was why the province had sent Korea to him, despite his country not wanting to.

He shouldn't have. Now the burden would be on him, weighing even heavier than on Kangwon.

But he'd had to try. He'd had to try everything he could. Even when he knew it wouldn't be enough.

Now that she’d recovered slightly, Kim Sang-suk got to her feet, shakily crossing the room to push the curtain aside again. Kangwon followed, kneeling beside the dead man.

“He hated not being able to walk,” the woman whispered, brushing her worn hand across his short hair. “I always had to stop him from trying to stand on his own, and I kept coming back to find him sprawled outside from trying to chop firewood.”

Her eyes shimmered, the tears streaming down her cheeks again.

“He kept saying he felt useless,” she said softly. “But I never cared about that. I would’ve been glad to take care of him for the rest of our lives. I was just glad he hadn’t left me.”

Her voice broke as she suddenly pounded on the dead man’s chest.

“So why did you leave me?!” she cried, smacking her fist onto him. “Why did you leave me, you bastard?! You know I hate being alone! You know I-!“

Kangwon put a hand on her back, and she collapsed forward, burying her face in her husband's neck as she sobbed, clutching at his collar like she could drag him back across the border between life and death.

A shadow fell across them, and the province looked up, seeing the boy peering past the curtain. His eyes were fixed on the razor at his father's side, before they moved to meet Kangwon's.

There was something old in their black depths. Older than the last time he'd been here.

Kangwon looked away, rubbing Kim Sang-suk's back as she keened over her husband.

Had Sip Tal-sun asked? Or had the boy just been unable to stand seeing his once-proud father waste away?

It wasn't Kangwon's job to judge what was filial. His job had been to heal Sip Tal-sun.

And he had failed.

'There wasn't anything you could've done.'

He knew that. He had healed his body. Healing his mind had been something only the man himself could do.

It still ached.

Kangwon comforted the widow as much as he could, then left to arrange a pick up for the body. They couldn't afford to conduct the three-day funeral rites. Not when sanitation was already an issue.

He didn't share his suspicion with her. He didn't know if he was right, and it wasn't his place.

And he didn't want her to end up alone.

By the time he finally, finally reached the Quarantine Hospital, the sun was setting, and he'd almost reached his limit. His vision was bleary as he pushed through the doors. It took every last scrap of willpower he had to make sure he disinfected and wore his coat and gloves properly.

He staggered through the halls, denying the requests he was immediately flooded with. Too much work, too few hands.

But he knew he couldn't even be trusted to administer medication until he'd gotten some sleep. He wouldn't compromise his patients' safety just so he could try to prove something.

Stopping at the break room, he got one of the nurses, whose name he usually knew, to take a blood sample to test, like he did every day, making sure nothing was forming inside him, that he wasn't sick and wouldn't pass it on to his patients. He made sure to check with the woman that Hwang had been by earlier to get his tested like he'd told him, while she drew blood into her needle from his heavily-bruised forearm.

It was only a few dozen millilitres, but it left him feeling even more drained. When he stumbled back into the hall, he didn't know where he was going at first.

"Kangwon?"

The voice reached through his haze, and he turned to see a green and white smear hurrying towards him.

"Gang…"

He'd just slumped over when his brother caught him, yelping in alarm.

"Are you ok-kay?" he stuttered.

"Just… tired," Kangwon slurred, like usual.

"I'll get you to the room." Gangwon hustled him along, telling him that Hae had been discharged. "I hope th-that's okay. She doesn't like the hospital and-"

"'Ss'okay," Kangwon assured. "SH… told me. I trust you."

Gangwon flushed, leading him to Hae's old room.

"It's been cleaned," he assured him. "So you can sleep on the bed. Here, I'll help get your shoes off."

Kangwon slumped onto the cot as his brother unwrapped the gauze around his boots to replace them with hospital slippers.

"Sip Tal-sun's... dead," he wearily told him. "He killed himshelf."

Gangwon's fingers stilled on his laces, his eyes squeezing shut.

"Th-That's awful," he said after a second, subdued. "But you did everything you could, Kang."

Kangwon closed his own eyes. "I know."

Remembering something important he hadn't had the chance to tell him, he gathered all his will to move his tongue.

"Y'know… There's a good chance Ishii Shiro'sssh… involved in this. The germ warfare, not... Ship Tal-shun."

Gangwon looked up in shock. "W-W-What?"

"Mm." Kangwon blinked, trying to remember what he'd been going to say. "America has him. And he wassh… in the south last month. No, two… months. Yeah."

His brother's face flooded with anxiety as he put an arm around his ribs, guiding him into laying down. "Th-That's really not g-good. Where'd you hear that?"

"China… told me," Kangwon muttered just as he hit his limit, and his consciousness finally gave out.

He felt his brother stiffen against him, but he was already sinking into darkness.

—

Gangwon's heart pounded, familiar anxiety flooding his veins hard enough to make him tremble. He pushed away the thoughts that crowded in, the things that started to make sense. It wasn't his place to think about that. He was a m-medic. He just had to keep helping people.

He tucked his brother in, removing his face mask.

Kangwon hadn't said that, he decided. He was exhausted and half-delirious. That was all.

Gangwon hurried from the room, gratefully rushing over as a nurse called for help with a seizing patient, already trying to forget what he'd just heard.

Kangwon is the type of person to be transgender-accepting even in his early years not even because of his understanding of how people work, but because he Does Not Care about anything but health. You could tear out of your skin and reveal you were a biblically-accurate Ophanim, and he'd be like, 'Okay, but do you have flu symptoms?' If a werewolf came into his clinic, he would give them a rabies vaccine.

Did you know CPR wasn't invented until the late 1950s? I found this out when I was trying to see if it would be historically accurate for Liaoxi or Pak Ga-ram to use it on North Pyongan when he drowned. Breathing air is an old technique that fell out of practice in a lot of places, and there were several other resuscitation methods, such as putting a person facedown and stimulating their thorax, but the classic 'pinch nose, breath air, chest compressions' didn't exist until later.

A Change You Can't Stop

"Careful, we're almost there."

"Ah'm not made'a rice straw," Hae complained as North Pyongan guided her through the trees towards the bunker.

"I know," her cousin soothed. "But you are still recovering."

He was bein' all gentle with her, making sure the arm he had around her didn't press on her ribs or anything, even though she was all better.

Well, maybe she was a li'l to blame for that. She had made him carry her though all the cut down trees as soon as one of his guards had taken their borrowed truck to hide. But it wasn't 'cuz she was tired or anything. She just liked bein' carried, and no one but Korea had done it for a long time.

Remembering how he'd carried her out of the Southern One's awful camp made her skip a li'l, making Pyobu give her a disapprovin' look.

Oops, right. 'Take it easy,' Gang had said. That was the one thing she'd had to promise to get him to let her leave the hospital.

Thinking about Korea made her nervous and upset and mad. She was a li'l worried he might be disappointed in her for dyin', or for making Kang lie for her. Gang had told her he'd found out (of course he had, he was real smart), and even though her cousin said he wasn't that mad, Hae thought he might'a been doing that thing him and Kangwon did when they made things smaller than they were.

Despite that, she'd really been looking forward to seeing him. It'd been two months, the longest she'd gone without seeing him ever (after being kidnapped last last year). She had promised herself she'd never be apart from him that long again.

But now the stupid Southern One had gone and made him sick, too. Hae couldn't even hug him for another week and three days, accordin' to Gang.

'Bastard.'

She didn't say it out loud. SH was the only one that hated cussin' more than Pyobu, even though he almost never scolded her for it.

As they reached the clearing around the bunker, someone called, "Hae!"

Hae lit up, slipping out of North Pyogan's arm to charge forward.

"SH!"

Her cousin stopped running, bracing her heels in the mud, and Hae slammed into her. She'd lost a lot'a weight in her coma, so she didn't manage to knock the taller woman over, just make her stagger back.

She wrapped her arms around her ribs, squeezing, then squeaked as SH hugged her back even harder. Determined, Hae put all her strength into it, making her ribs creak, before she remembered she was all burned like her, and quickly loosened her grip.

She buried her face in her cousin's chest instead, nuzzling her happily.

"I'm so glad you're okay," SH murmured into the bandages on top of her head. "When I heard you died-"

Her long nails suddenly sank into Hae's shoulder blades.

"If you hadn't came back, I would have murdered America myself," she half-growled in a real scary voice that made Hae beam.

"Korea wouldn't approve," Hae told her, squirming under her claws. Her nails were always breaking, but SH somehow kept hers nice and sharp. They hurt, but not enough to escape the hug. "We're only supposed to kill him if he's about to kill us, not if we're already dead."

“Korea would fight me for the killing blow,” her cousin said confidently.

The idea made Hae happy, even though she knew if Korea and SH did something like that, it would get their country in trouble.

“I think you’re impaling Hae,” Pyobu said politely, and SH quickly pried her nails out of her back, apologizin’.

“It’s okay,” Hae chirped, just happy to actually be able to touch her family again. She’d hugged Gang real tight when he came in to find her awake, but then he’d been really busy for the two days she was in the hospital, so she’d only got to hug him again when she left.

She’d given Pong-ju and Man-won big hugs, too. Korea would probably tell her not to hug her guards, but he hadn’t, so it was okay. And they’d made her that card, and Pong-ju’s sister had sent her a cute bracelet. She’d hug her too the next time she visited.

“You should get inside,” SH fretted, looking around. “It’s too cold out here. And have you eaten today?”

“Gang got me breakfast.” It was her ration rice with a dried persimmon that he'd got Kang to buy with his allow- salary.

It’d been tasty, especially since she knew her cousins must have worked real hard to find one, but Hae’s belly was still empty. It made her a li'l ashamed, since she knew Kangwon would have gone through with feeding her while she slept. But even with all the rice and stuff he’d wasted on her, she was still so hungry.

Gang had told her she would be, since everything she ate while asleep just went towards her regen’ration, so she knew it wasn’t really her body’s fault. And Kang had said nothing he gave her was a waste. But…

Hae shook her head vigorously.

Nope! No more unhappy thoughts. She was all fixed up, she was out’a the hospital, and in a few days she could start helpin’ with sowing to make up for everything she’d ate. And then in a week, two days, and twenty to twenty-eight hours (dependin' on when Kang came to wake him up) she'd get to see Korea again.

She used the happy thoughts to drown out the achin' in her belly. She wasn't going to let it make her do something stupid again.

SH and Pyobu gave each other… bemused looks as she shook herself.

"Come on," North Pyongan said, putting a hand on her back, still all gentle-like. "Let's get you inside."

"You know," Hae said, lookin' at him with the biggest eyes she could. "Ah really am all better. Gang's all cooped up in the hospital, and Kang's out fixin' people, so they wouldn't even know if you just let me go help in the fields."

She didn't feel even a li'l bit sick anymore. Ayuh, she was all skinny and weak, but sitting around wasn't going to solve that. She tried that to tell Gang, but he'd been real insistent that she stayed in the hospital for that extra time, and that she took a day or two to rest now that she was out.

But Hae didn't want to rest. She wanted to get to work as soon as possible so she could get enough done that Korea would be impressed once he woke up, and maybe even praise her, even after she'd made Kang lie, and got sick in the first place.

But her cousins were givin' her that look, so she knew she was still getting banished to the bunker.

"Ah know," she sighed glumly before they could respond. "Ah'll go inside."

She looked up from under her lashes, giving one last hopeful look.

They both raised their eyebrows at her, unimpressed.

Hae sighed again, going to open the door. SH and Pyobu beat her to it, though, haulin' it open.

With Korea so busy, he'd had a spare set of keys made so the provinces could always get into the bunker, even without him. SH got to keep them. She didn't have to use them right now, but Hae still enviously eyed the pocket she knew she kept them in.

She could take care of the keys. Not when she was sick, obviously. But Korea had handed 'em over before she'd got cho-le-ra. Ayuh, sometimes she'd get distracted and forgot she'd put something down, or that she had meat over the fire. But if Korea told her not to lose the keys, she would guard them with her life.

"You're still not getting them, Hae," SH said, not looking over as she dusted her hands off.

Hae pouted. "Not even as a 'Yay, ah'm so happy you came back to life' present?"

"No." But SH didn't say it sternly, and before Hae went inside, she folded her in another hug, murmurin' in her 'ear,' "But I am so happy you came back to life."

Hae beamed. "Me too."

Head spinning, stomach cramping, tongue withering away in her mouth like dead wheat. Her body smacked into the floor, refusing to listen to her as she tried to make it move for the door that was so close and so so far away, like the hatch with the sky beyond it. 'Kang, got'a get to Kang so he can fix…'

Hae held tighter to SH, squeezing the memory away.

It wasn't the hole. She din't have to remember it. She just had to remember that 'Merica and the Southern One had made her sick, made their people sick, so she could revenge it.

She reluctantly let go of her cousin and let North Pyongan walk her inside. He didn't shut the door, but she still hunched, feelin' the mountain press in on her from above.

Maybe she wished Gang had kept her for a li'l longer. Even if the hospital had been full of that weird chemical smell she didn't like, and she'd been able to hear people in pain but hadn't been able to go make 'em feel better. At least it had a window.

“Kang always says fresh air is good for people,” she informed her cousin as he opened the door to her and the other women’s room.

He gave her a sympathetic look. “You can come stand watch with me in a few hours.”

“Is Comrade Liao Shī goin’ to be there?” Hae batted her eyes innocently.

His cheeks turned purple and pink, but he ignored her. “Just get some rest to recuperate from the drive first.”

Hae puffed out her cheeks. The drive here had been around twenty minutes. She hadn’t even been out of the hospital for an hour.

Their room looked the same as when she’d left it to go stand watch. Liao Juān and Liao Shī’s beds were made nice and neat, with lumps under the sheets where their spare uniforms were bein’ kept as warm as possible. SH’s was even neater, her bedroll and blanket folded instead of set up, but the bottom bunk was covered in paintbrushes, canvases, and papers that looked messy, but Hae knew she would notice immediately if something was moved (like her pink paint). Pyo’s bunk wasn’t made up at all, the blanket tossed over the edge, which Korea would scold her for if he saw, and the spare cot at the back had their summer uniforms, casual clothes, and others things they’d been given by people, like straw baskets and extra socks.

Hae’s bed was tidy, since she’d made it up before she left, in case she was out looking for Ppang until muster. But it wasn’t as tidy as she’d left it. The corner of her sheet was tucked under her bedroll, which she made sure never to do.

Maybe Liao Shī or Liao Juān had remembered her offer to let them use her blanket whenever she was away in her province for the night, and had finally taken it. The idea made her happy. They were livin’ with them, so they were sort of like family, which meant they should share.

Pyobu went into the room, but she remained as rooted as a rye stalk in the doorway. He looked at her, and she held out her hands, flexing her fingers.

He looked between her and her bunk, three feet away. “Really?”

“If you’re goin’ to act like ah’m a grandma, you’re goin’ to treat me like one.”

Her cousin shook his head, but turned around, crouchin’ to offer his back. Hae eagerly scampered onto him, locking her arms around his neck while he held her legs in place.

“How old are you?” he asked.

Hae *‘hmph’*ed. “An old lady, accordin’ to you an’ SH an’ Gang.”

Pyobu carried her to her cot (in two steps), and turned, crouching again so she was sitting on it.

“You know, if I was South Pyongan I would fall backwards onto the bed and crush you,” he pointed out.

“’Cuz Pyo doesn’t think ah’m a grandma,” Hae muttered, unloopin’ her arms from around his neck to cross them. “Or a kid.”

She usually liked her ‘little sister’ privilege, but not when it got in the way of farming.

“We aren’t trying to treat you like a child, Hae,” North Pyongan said. He crouched, looking up at her all earnestly. “We were just incredibly worried for you, so we want to make sure you recover fully.”

Hmmm. Hae guessed she had died. She’d been really worried when Pyobu died, and even though she hadn’t tried to keep him from doing his job, she had been careful when she hugged him after. And Kang had told him to take it easy for a few days after he was out of the hospital, too.

“Okay,” she chirped, patting him on the head. “You’re forgiven.”

Pyobu smiled, pushing his army cap out of his eyes. Then his lips turned down.

“Hae,” he said, then went quiet.

“Ayuh?” Hae prompted after a few seconds.

“Did you… see anything when you passed?” North Pyongan’s thumb rubbed across the back of his other hand. “Did you have any dreams or… anything?”

Hae tipped her head, considering. She had lots of dreams, and was pretty good at remembering them. She’d forgotten about it until she’d told Yang Jeong-nyeo about the hole, but she used to spend hours searching through the dark dreams to find one that wasn’t, like rummagin’ through piles of windfalls to find an apple that wasn’t rotten.

Once she did, she’d try and remember every detail about it to make her less bored when she ran out of common sense stories, trying to pretend the tasty food and sunshine that wasn’t just a sliver and the family her head made up were real. She’d stopped doing it after Korea had saved her, since all those things had became real, and better than she could’ve ever dreamed.

But she was still good at recallin’ them, and she felt like she hadn’t dreamed when she was dead. The last thing she remembered was the thing she didn’t want to remember, and the first thing she remembered was Hwang’s voice, and a bleary glimpse of his face, all teary-eyed and guilty. Between that… She had a few fuzzy impressions. But she felt like they came from later, not when she’d first passed out.

“Nope,” she said, shaking her head. “Ah think it was all just black.”

Not comforting black either, like the one behind her eyes, or the one with Korea in it. Just… nothing.

‘Not thinkin’ about that anymore!’ She’d never die again. She knew Korea and Kangwon were already going to be upset with themselves, even after what she’d told Kang in the hospital about not blaming himself.

“I see.” Pyobu looked sort of relieved by her words, but also sort of not relieved.

“Why?” Hae asked curiously.

He stood, brushing at his black pants. “I was just wondering.”

Oh. It was probably ‘cuz he’d died, too.

“Did you dream when you drowned?”

“No,” he said quietly. “But I wasn’t dead for long.”

“You know, we both died,” Hae ventured. “That sort’a makes us a club.”

North Pyongan shook his head like a horse shakin’ flies. “I suppose it does.”

“And club members share things.”

He eyed her. “Yes. They do.”

She blinked up at him. “So you’ll share your steamed fish with me when the war is over.”

A smile peeked out from the corners of his lips. “Is that a request?”

“Please?”

Her cousin sighed, but it was a good sigh. “Of course. Perhaps the next time I have a chance, I’ll go fishing and find a fish to steam before the war is over.”

Hae shook her head immediately. “Anythin’ you catch has to go to our people.”

“One fish wouldn’t harm anyone,” he said, then went far away for a second. “But you’re right. Our people are our stream, and we aren’t the only fish they need.”

She bobbed her head, pleased. Even though her mouth was waterin' at the idea of steamed fish.

North Pyongan went to the door, lookin' back. "Come outside once you've rested awhile. At least two hours," he added when she brightened.

Hae pouted again.

"And just so you are aware, Korea forbid any of us from going in his room while he's unconscious." He said it pointedly.

Hae crossed her arms. "Ah wouldn't."

His eyebrow lifted just a li'l bit, and she protested indignantly, "Ah wouldn't!"

Even though the thing she wanted most right now, even over sowing, was to wriggle into his bedroll and let him feel that her heart was beatin' again, she knew she couldn't.

Durin' the war against Japan, she could get away with inching closer to Korea as he slept, or sidling in between him and Kangwon (on the nights they were squished together and he couldn't sleep ten feet away). Even when he did sleep ten feet away, she could flop down next to him when she got off watch and only get a li'l scoldin' in the morning. So long as she didn't touch him, he wouldn't wake up. Even when she got clingy in her sleep (completely by accident), he never woke her up, so that meant he was okay with it.

But she'd crept into his room after they'd moved to the chosonjip and the lure of Korea had overcame her not wantin' to sleep in his windowless room, and curled up on the edge of his futon, even though he wasn't awake to tell her she could. And at some point in the night she'd woken up with him half on top of her, breathin' real heavy. Before she could say anything, he'd grabbed her face in the dark, squeezin' it all over like he didn't know who she was, before he got off, shoving her away and telling her to get out and never come into his room when he was asleep again, in the voice he used when he meant it.

Hae thought she'd probably got a li'l too close to him, and when he'd felt someone touching him when there wasn't supposed to be anyone else in the room, he'd woken up and attacked right away, like he would with an enemy.

She hadn't been scared, 'cuz it was Korea. But she thought he might've been. Not scared scared. But scared that he might have hurt her before he realized it was her.

So now Hae made sure to never snuggle with him without permission, and to always knock before she entered his room. She was workin' on that second one, but the first one was a serious order, so she never forgot.

Which meant she wouldn't get to see Korea at all until he woke up, thanks to the stupid Southern One and his puppet master.

"Alright," North Pyongan soothed her. "Rest well. I will see you later."

As soon as he left, she flopped back on her bunk, starin' up at the bottom of Pyo's.

She was bored already, just like she'd been in the hospital. Bored bored bored.

At least there she'd had the notes Hwang, Gang, and Kang had been workin' on about 'sign language' to keep her busy for a li'l bit.

Sign language was real easy. Hae didn't know why they hadn't taught her that back when she couldn't speak right. She'd picked up on it way faster than Choson'mal, Choson'gul, or Hanja. Then she wouldn't have had to speak Japanese at all.

Mm. Then again, she needed to know Korean characters to make the signs. Unless she could learn the signs without then, then learn the characters from the signs. That was confusin' to think about. She'd have to ask Kangwon or Gangwon about it. Or Hwang, once he got back.

She hoped it was soon. She wanted to thank him for bringin' her her blush, and tell him she loved him.

Anyway, she'd finished learning all the gestures they'd written down on the day she woke up, and gone right back to bein' bored. Gangwon couldn't even stay to talk after. Every time he came in, it was to gobble down his meal or take a quick nap.

As bored as she was, Hae had been real careful not to wake him up since she knew he was working hard to keep everyone healthy. He'd taken a few minutes after she woke up to tell her about all the nasty germ warfare the Southern One and 'Merica had used after they'd killed her, and even though he didn't have time to tell her everything, what he had told her she didn't like one bit.

Hae reached into the pocket of her uniform (which Gang had washed up for her while she was out), and pulled out a piece of paper, holding it over her face, warmin' up as she read the words (not that she was cold).

It was the message Gang had left for her, telling her she was in the hospital, and that he'd be back soon. There'd also been a milk candy on it that he said was from Kang (definitely him, no one else).

Hae hugged it to her chest, along with the card her guards had given her.

She liked Gangwon a lot, even if he was different than Kangwon. Kang was different than Kangwon, too, even if it was harder to remember sometimes 'cuz he looked more like him with his red-brown skin and his magnolia bein' green like his province shape had used to be.

She wondered why Gang was green and gold now. It wasn't 'cuz of the Southern One. He'd had those colours since that first day, when Korea had signed that stupid paper that 'Merica had made him sign, and Kang had *'poof'*ed into pretty gold dust.

Hae had been real nervous that the Division had killed him, or that it had made Kangwon not Kangwon. But after the dust had formed into North Kangwon and South Kangwon, and even Gang had looked sort of like Kangwon with his droopy eyelids and… Kangwon look, she'd been relieved. But she hadn't even got to hug him before those stupid reaction'ries 'Merica had sent swept him away.

But she'd got to hug him now, and eat with him, and be treated by him. He might be a li'l shaky, but his hands were still gentle like Kangwon's had been as he took her temperature and pulse.

Hae frowned. 'Were.' 'Had been' made it sound like the old Kangwon was gone. He wasn't. He was just two people now.

Anyway, she liked Gang. She loved him. And she loved Kangwon. She was glad Korea was keepin' them separate. Even if it was just for administrative purposes. Anything that made their family bigger made her happy.

She hoped it was just for administrative purposes, and not because he was worried about recombinin' them in case Gang made it so they couldn't operate anymore. That he wasn't just keeping them as two people 'cuz they worked better that way.

Hae reached back into her pocket, pulling out her blush compact, running her thumb over the tiger on it, hearing those words Hwang had said to her, comin' from what sounded like fields away, but sounding so small she'd fought through the fuzz in her head to respond.

'I want to be more like you. But I don't want to be merged with you.'

She was glad he'd finally said it, the one thought he'd never said out loud.

Hae opened the compact, lookin' in the li'l mirror at her face, picturing her features through the bandages and medical tape that covered them. She tried to imagine Hwang's mixed with hers. Her double lids and charming fat flanking his squinty eyes. Her crooked, twisty teeth behind his thin lips. Her pink freckles dotting his narrow cheeks. All laid out on their mountain magnolia, sunshine yellow or ice blue.

She wanted to be more like him, too, in a way. She wanted to be respectable like him, to be able to hold debates with people, and be smart enough not to do stuff like scarf down poisoned clams, and cynical enough that she never fell for an enemy trick ever again.

But she also wanted to keep her make-up and her farmin' and her hairstylin' and pink clothes. She wanted to keep the way she was able to listen to their people, and know when not to say somethin', and make them feel better. She wanted to keep her little sister privilege and the one that let her cuddle with Korea.

She wanted to keep her brother. She wanted to keep…

Hae snapped the compact closed, clutching it to her chest, her heart beatin' under it.

She knew she didn't have to worry about anythin'. Korea had said he'd think about it. And he always made the right decision.

But what if putting her and her brother back together was the right decision?

'Ah don't want to disappear.'

'You wouldn't disappear.' He'd sounded almost mad when he'd said it. No, not mad. Not exactly. 'You would be becoming who you were supposed to be.'

She wasn't trying to think about it, but the image still flickered in her mind. Korea, with his angled eyebrows and the groove between them, but long lashes that fluttered like hers as he talked. With his high cheekbones on round cheeks, his charmin'ly thin lips hiding teeth that were mostly even. With two eyes, big, round, and nervous.

Hae squeezed her eyes shut, even though the picture was inside her head, rolling onto her side.

Merging her and Hwang wasn't the right decision. Their province was too big, and Korea needed their skills. He needed Hwang's information work and teaching, and he needed her farmin' and her people work, and it was way more useful if they could do those things at the same time. Even if they worked better as one person, even if they were meant to be Hwanghae, it was the wrong decision. And Korea always made right decisions.

But Hae wasn't a kid. She knew some decisions weren't right because they were right- they were right because they were necessary. Like sacrificing Hye-sun or signing a ceasefire with 'Merica. Some decisions had to be made.

Even if they were wrong.

—

North Hamgyong trudged towards the air raid shelter, the stench of gunpowder and scorched earth choking his 'nose.'

North Pyongan was the one on duty, thank fuck. He couldn't take South Hamgyong today, even less than he could on a normal day.

"What are you doing here?" his cousin asked, surprised to see him so early.

"Yanks bombed the stretch of track we were working on," he clipped, not slowing. "Guy died. Foreman gave us a break since the miguk-nom aren't letting up."

North Pyongan's eyes flickered. "Who was it?"

"No one you know."

North Hamgyong wished he hadn't known him. Fucking Oh. The bastard had never shut up, always yammering away even six hours into repairing the rail lines, going on and on about his wife, and how his son was in school to be an engineer, too, and how he was studying to join the Worker's Party, and handing out the steamed buns and gaetteok his perfect wife made like they grew on trees and they weren't at fucking war.

He'd tried to drag him for one of the dug-outs strategically dug along the tracks as the planes soared in, but the stupid fucking idiot had torn away from him, sprinting back for the tools someone else had dropped when they ran. Then North Hamgyong's fucking bodyguards had damn near tackled him into the foxhole, pinning him down until there was a break in the strikes.

Oh'd barely looked like a person when the bombs were done with him. And he'd only been able to save a single hammer, hidden under his body. The rest had been turned to ash and warped metal they'd have to smelt down if it was going to be useful again.

'So what was the point?' What was the damn point?

North Hamgyong wasn't going to be the one to tell his wife or mother what'd happened to him. He'd already had to be the one to carry the corpse out of there since he couldn't trust anyone else not to drop it and run if the mi-chin-nom Yanks came their way again.

"Pray for the bliss of the dead," North Pyongan murmured, dipping his head.

"A lot of fucking good that'll do." North Hamgyong barged past him, heaving the door open.

"Try not to stomp around," his cousin said, clearly trying to sound polite but still pissing him off. "Hae has been discharged. She should be sleeping."

"Whatever." North Hamgyong left the door open for him to shut, knowing he'd just slam it.

Hae. He couldn't believe that bastard Kangwon had seriously fucking lied about her dying. Just to spare their fucking feelings, Korea's feelings, like if he didn't know, it meant it hadn't happened. And if she actually had died, would he have kept his mouth shut then, too?

He didn't get how the others could just move on from that, even Hae's own damn brother.

The province stormed into the room he shared with the other men and China, grimacing at the pile of electronics on one of the lower bunks as he tore his blood-stained jacket off. It was dog-cold in the bunker, but he didn't give a damn.

He rubbed at his mouth, swiping his tongue around his jaws as he tried to get rid of the taste of gaetteok.

‘Idiot.’

He should take a nap until Pyongyang wasn’t getting bombed-

‘I’d never fucking wake up.’

-but instead he stared at the door for a long minute, his hands clenched into fists.

Then he stalked out of the room and across the hall, slamming open the door.

Hae leaped up from the bed, already with that idiotic smile on her face, like she hadn’t just recovered from being fucking killed.

“Hambu!”

He stuck out a hand, and she smacked into it before she could get her crushing grip around his aching spine and ribs. He was pretty sure Ro had broken one in his struggle to keep him in the dug-out. The woman strained against his palm, but he shoved her away, making her stagger back onto the cot, pouting.

“Don’t call me that,” he ordered, even though she was never going to listen.

“You’re visitin’ me, but you aren’t goin’ to let me hug you?” she whined, widening her eyes in distress like the manipulative little creature she was.

“I’m not here to visit you,” he grunted, crossing his arms. “I’m on break.”

“And you came to torture me on it,” Hae said glumly.

“I can go.”

He turned around, but she jumped up, grabbing the sleeve of his grease-stained undershirt.

“No! Don’t leave,” she demanded. “Ah’m bored.”

North Hamgyong batted her away. Hae eyed him warily, but when he didn't try to escape, she nodded in satisfaction, jumping back onto her cot.

He glared at her. She smiled back, kicking her heels, seeming like she'd be fine to just sit in silence and stare at each other.

It'd taken long enough, but it looked like all her extra fat had been stripped away. One of her cheeks was hidden under medical tape, but the other was even hollower than when she'd been skipping meals to feed that damn dog. She looked smaller than usual, brittle like improperly tempered steel, like the first time he'd ever seen her, the malformed, malnourished little sack of bones and skin held together by grime that Korea had carried up out of the cellar with ease, even though he was barely bigger than her.

They shouldn't be keeping her in here. If she was healthy enough to irritate him, she was healthy enough to get back to work. Locking her up underground was just going to make her sick again.

"What do you want to talk about?" Hae asked eventually, still swinging her heels.

"I don't want to talk to you," he grunted.

"Okay," she chirped. "Ah'll talk to you then. Has anythin' happened with the talks yet?"

He guessed she already knew Korea was out, or she'd be asking about him first.

"That's still me talking to you."

"But ah'm askin' general to general," Hae said. "So you have to answer. Gang told me some stuff, but ah know he's not allowed to know everythin'."

Because he was a walking time-bomb. One that was getting in the way of the war ending.

Not that North Hamgyong thought they should hand him over. The Yank wouldn't sign the armistice anyway. They'd just be giving him information for his puppet to Command out for him.

"Yanks and Rhee's bastards massacred more of our POWs on Geoje Island a few days ago," he grunted.

It'd leaked into the news. It was the second mass shooting there in under a month. But nowhere near the second overall.

"They're trying to cover their asses in the negotiations."

It would work. The other countries were making a fuss over it, but only because they didn't have a finger in the labour camp pot. They could lay everything on the Yanks and act like that wasn't what this entire war was- nation-traitors handed guns by foreign bastards and using them to murder patriots- and that they wouldn't do the exact same damn thing if they were given the chance.

They would. The only thing stopping them was not having the wheel in their bloody hands.

The foreigners would cause a moral outcry about this, they'd pay lip service to an investigation, and might even conduct it, unlike the one for the biological warfare. Either 'nothing would be found,' or something would be, and then it would be swept under the damn carpet alongside the rest of America's corpses.

And then it would fade away, the war would go on, and the Yanks would murder a hundred thousand more people that the foreign nations didn't give a damn about because they didn't have to hear about it.

"Bastids," Hae swore, her brows drawing in.

"And the Yank is finally demanding Gangwon back," he added.

Hae's brows sprang up in alarm. "What?"

He ran told her about the Yankee's demands for the province to be turned over if they wanted a ceasefire, and her eyes widened.

"Korea's still not givin' him up, right?"

"No."

It pissed him off that the decision came from the bleeding heart part of their Countryhuman, but the decision itself didn't. Gangwon was a Korean province. They didn't have to hand him over to a damn Yank or a nation-traitor. It'd make them look weak and probably get the nervous wreck even more screwed up than he already was.

It didn't matter if he was a ticking time-bomb. He was one of theirs.

Hae relaxed. "Good. Ah don't want 'Merica and the Southern One to lock him up again."

She instinctively put a hand over her mouth, glancing towards Korea's room. She lowered it, but didn't correct herself.

At least one of his cousins understood that the Southern bastard was a problem.

'But not as much as she should.'

"Anythin' else?" she asked.

"No." He didn't want to talk about all the germ warfare shit. He heard about it enough, and had his own fake fever to put up with. And he didn't want to talk about the bombings, either.

Nodding to herself like she'd just checked something off a list, she asked, "How's Korea?"

North Hamgyong grit his teeth. "What was the first question you asked Gangwon when you woke up?"

"Um." She thought for a moment. "It wasn't the first thing ah said, but the first question ah asked was if he was okay."

Of course she fucking had. Even though she was the one that'd been unconscious for two months. Because she'd fucking died.

"Second thing?"

“Ah asked if Korea was okay,” she confidently announced. “But Gang doesn’t get to see him much, and Korea says we should always seek out as much information about a situation as possible, so askin’ Pyobu and SH wasn’t enough, so now ah’m askin’ you.”

She beamed, proud, for some fucking reason.

Lips thin, he asked, “What would you say to him if he was awake?”

“Ah’d ask if he was okay,” she answered immediately.

“And what do you think would be the first thing he'd say to you?”

“He’d probably ask if ah was fit for duty,” Hae chirped. “And then ah’d say yes, and ah’d get to go plow fields instead’a bein’ cooped up in here.”

She pursed her lips mutinously.

Losing the little patience he’d had, North Hamgyong snapped, “And you don’t give a damn that after he jammed his fingers in your mouth and made you throw up without even a damn apology, he wouldn’t even ask if you’re okay?”

Hae side-eyed him in a way that he’d call shrewd if he didn’t know better.

“You called me an idiot,” she reminded him. “And you never said sorry.”

“Because you were an idiot,” he shot back. “You ate a damn raw clam you found outside. Who the fuck does that?”

Someone who was starving like the rest of them, and had always had to be watched out for so she wouldn’t eat random shit.

Hae *‘hmph’*ed, not answering. “You also haven’t asked if ah’m okay.”

“It’s different,” North Hamgyong growled. “You don’t worship me like I’m a damn god.”

Hae scrunched her face. “Ah don’t ‘worship’ Korea. Ah love him. And he’d be mad if he heard ya say that.”

“He told you to make yourself throw up and you did,” he growled, frustrated. “You shoved your fucking fingers down your throat without a second damn thought.”

Korea hadn’t Commanded her, but for one moment, North Hamgyong genuinely thought he had. When he’d barked at her to 'throw up now,' her face had dropped into a mask of resolve, and she’d turned and plunged her hand into her mouth before anyone could even react. And then the first thing she’d done when she was finished upchucking was defend his fucking honour.

“Ah had second thoughts,” Hae sniffed. “But if Korea wanted me to do it, it had to be important. And it was. He din’t want me getting’ sick.” Her shoulders slumped. “Ah still did, though. Ah threw up my rice for nothin’. But that wasn’t Korea’s fault.”

She was always fucking like this, prioritizing their Countryhuman’s feelings when he acted like he didn’t give a damn about hers, doing whatever he told her, not even questioning it, justifying everything he did.

North Hamgyong bared his teeth. “And what if he ordered you to do something worse? You’d just go ahead and do it because you think as long as he wants you to, you should.”

Hae let out a sigh that was almost patient, and made his blood boil. “For the last time- Korea wouldn’t make me jump off a cliff. He wouldn’t throw me off a cliff. He wouldn’t boil me in a pot like a frog (not that you should boil frogs), and he wouldn’t make me kill anyone that din’t deserve it. Korea wouldn’t do anythin’ to hurt me, ever.”

“And what if he did?” North Hamgyong demanded furiously. “What if he locked you up or made you hurt yourself or hit you and told you it was right? You’d go and make an excuse for him, and tell yourself you fucking deserved it!”

Hae tipped her head, unbothered by him shouting in her idiot face.

“If he did somethin’ like that, then he wouldn’t be Korea.”

North Hamgyong grit his teeth, bloodied, broken nails digging into his work-worn palms.

Not even she fucking got it.

Hae looked down at her lap. Suddenly she asked, “Hambu. Would you still love me an’ Hwang if we were one person?”

Changing the damn subject so he’d stop talking about shit she didn’t want to think about. Whatever. Not as if he wasn’t fucking used to it.

“I don’t love you,” he scorned, teeth still grinding. “I tolerate you, and I despise your scrawny four-eyes of a brother.”

Hae didn’t flinch, looking up at him. “Would you still tolerate us if we were Hwanghae?”

He sank his teeth into the side of his cheek. “I wouldn’t tolerate you. I would tolerate Hwanghae.”

He glowered down at her, willing her to see past her refusal to believe things could ever change and understand.

She gazed back, then looked down at her hands. “Oh. Right.”

He knew she wasn’t as stupid as she pretended. She just wanted to bury her head in the sand like all the others.

North Hamgyong spun away without another word.

“Wait!” Hae called as he left. “Did Ppang ever come back when ah was in the hospital?”

He didn’t answer, slamming her door and storming across the hall, grabbing his blood-stained jacket as he left to find something to do to try and get rid of the tension in his chest.

He knew she was right. Korea was a merciless bastard, but he would never order Hae to do something that wasn’t in the best interest of their country. He'd never hurt her outside of combat training, never hit her harder than a smack over the head or with a shoe, or do anything screwed up to her, the way Joseon and the old Koreas had to their provinces. Korea wouldn't do any of that shit.

Their Korea wouldn't.

He knew he'd never get the chance to remove his Countryhuman's burden for him, and he knew none of his stupid, naïve cousins would do it if they had the chance, not even Hae, who hadn't been there for the vote and saw the damn truth of the eye-stealing Southern bastard. If the Yanks ever gave in, if they ever got an end to this damn war, if they ever got the chance to be Reunified, the decision on what to do with his burden was with Korea, and Korea alone.

And North Hamgyong knew the one he made could destroy everything they had ever worked for. He knew it could destroy them.

I love conversations that aren't about what they're about.

Also I think it's clear if you've read this far and understand how Hae works, but in Warring Pyongyang when that one certain thing that happens really upsets her, when she starts acting cheerful again, she hasn't actually recovered, and hasn't even at the end of the book. The fact that Korea stays in the bunker at the end when she runs off actually makes her worse. She just sets it aside because they have work to do. (Hae one-shot in future)(after promised North Hamgyong one-shot)

It is so static this winter. Every time I pet my cat, I end up shocking him and it upsets me so much. He doesn't understand why I have electricity powers that I only use to hurt him when we're cuddling. I'm so sorry son. Sometimes you understand why people used to slit their stomachs from shame so often.

Entrepreneurial Spirit

South Pyongan was starting to feel useless. Which after her whole thing with Korea where he'd told her she wasn't (not that she needed to be told that), was not making her feel great.

Yeah, it was sort of, kind of, maybe her fault for refusing to do anything that involved touching, standing too close, or talking too long to someone. But come on! She didn't want yellow fever or scarlet fever or fucking azure fever.

Actually if there was something like that last one, she'd be screwed. She wouldn't even be able to see the spots on her skin.

'Not that I could see the other ones.'

She glanced around, making sure she was alone in the sparse Anju woods before squinting critically at the hand mirror she'd got from Completely Reasonable Prices Kim (the merchant her and her brother had good-copped-bad-copped awhile ago) the last time she was here.

Carefully, she pried the edge of the medical tape over the side of her jaw up, revealing the gross, scabby burns. They looked normal. Well, for bloody, glistening holes and bumps all over her face.

General, she looked disgusting. She'd kill the Yank for that alone, let alone the fact that she despised the way the bandages clung to her skin, and her face mask chafed against the blisters.

She used a twig to scratch the edge of the burn, patting the medical tape back into place.

Safe for now. Probably. But how was she supposed to know when every single symptom of something was literally just the crap she had to deal with every day?

Rash for scarlet fever or typhus? She barely had any skin left for a rash to show up on. Muscle pain for yellow fever? Yeah she had muscle pain- the only thing she could do right now that kept her away from people was plowing fields and building houses for refugees. Itchy skin and blisters for smallpox? Her burns itched constantly, and once again- no skin. Swollen lymph nodes for the fucking bubonic plague? She didn't even know what a lymph node was! And forget about the hundred million diseases Kangwon had said the flu could be a sign of- the stupid sympathetic fever felt the exact same as the real thing. She wouldn't know if she actually had it until she face-planted into a rice paddy and drowned. Her one consolation that she wasn't dying right now was that she hadn't gone squirrelly like Korea had.

Gah, she missed when the only damn she'd given about being sick had been faked. Like 'Oh no, I'm tired and I keep sneezing and I get to take a rest day and have my brother/cousin feed me juk.' Yeah it sucked to have a leaky 'nose' when you didn't actually have one, and couldn't snot rocket it clear, and it'd been worse back during the Occupation when she couldn't afford to rest. But even then South Gyeongsang would always do her best to make hot soup.

Obviously if she caught something, she'd recover. Hae had taken one for the team (and the Yank was reeeeally going to pay for that one), so they knew for sure the germ warfare couldn't kill them. And South Pyongan was way too awesome to get taken out by something you couldn't even see without one of those microscope things.

But even if she recovered in a day, she could get stuck with some messed-up side effects. Smallpox left you with tons of scars, and not sexy ones. She'd seen survivors from the epidemic last year and no offense, but with the hundreds of pits and lumps in their skin, they looked gross. Which was fine for them, but if she wanted to be a politician she had to give speeches in front of people. And who would be able to focus on a lecture about economics or patriotism or working hard when she looked like a gnawed on corn cob? And tons of the diseases they were getting hit with left skin marks.

On top of that, dysentery could leave her with joint pain, encephalitis could screw her brain up, and the anthrax the Chinese had just had dropped on them could give her permanent lung issues. Even though it'd killed Hae, cholera wasn't even that bad, and it could still leave her with chronic diarrhea, which would lead to her dying because she would literally kill herself if that happened. Malaria could make her organs swell up permanently and leave her with fatigue, which would make her tired all the time and make it easier for her to catch more sicknesses in the future.

The idea that all it took was one speck of the wrong bacteria, something too small for her to even see, let alone stop, making it past her mask or gloves to cripple her permanently made her feel squirmy, like she needed to take a bath right now in water that'd been boiled for at least ten hours.

She blamed South for this. He'd been the one to force her to shoot herself, and if she hadn't done that, Kangwon wouldn't have told her about how hitting her xiphoid process could've screwed her over for good, which wouldn't have put the idea that she could be screwed over for good in her head.

But since she couldn't annihilate Korea's brother (well, she could, buuuut), she'd settle for smashing that Yankee's lame shades into his lamer face.

She blamed Hwang, too, for babbling on about all the medical textbooks he'd been reading lately. The bastard had came back and immediately started going on about 'asymptomatic carriers.' Apparently even if she didn't think she'd caught something, she still could've, and she'd carry it forever. Which meant she would literally have to be segregated from the others and probably never let back into the chosonjip again.

The idea of never being able to snatch food from her brother's chopsticks or steal his drink, or let Hae sleep in her bed at night, or put that bastard North Hamgyong in his place just in case she made them sick…

A shudder ran though her as she shoved the mirror back into her bag, crossing her arms as she looked out at the slope that led down to Anju.

Whatever. Her blood got tested every time she donated some to make sure it was safe to give out. She wasn't sick. She'd get tested again when she went back to Pyongyang tonight, and she still wouldn't be sick. South Pyongan province wasn't letting these epidemics get to her.

She could easily sprint back down the hillside in a half-minute without even losing breath, but she still meandered, weaving around the tree trunks in the most unbothered way possible as she returned to the people waiting for her at the bottom.

"Sorry about that," she said casually to the chairman of her Provincial People's Committee and the rep from the local Epidemic Prevention Committee. "Thought I saw someone creeping on us from up there. False alarm."

She hadn't, but she couldn't just tell them she'd sprinted away in the middle of their conversation because she couldn't stop picturing the itching under her medical tape as bacteria squirming into her open burns.

The chairman's eyes went wide as he glanced up the deforested slope. "We should make sure. I'll send out a militia unit later."

'Oops.' Right. The guerrilla trouble had died down a little after the raid on their headquarters, but hadn't died out. Even her false alarms would get taken seriously.

She nodded, not backing down. "Knock on the bridge, right?"

The exercise would keep the militia sharp anyways. And if they did catch a reactionary lurking in the northern hills, she'd get a bit of the credit for it.

"Anyway," she said, steering the conversation back into territory that she hated. "You were saying?"

Her chairman pulled his eyes back to her as the Anti-Epidemic guy- Yun Yong-il- reported, "There haven't been any further deaths in Balnam-ri, and the infected seem to be making a steady recovery. The quarantine needs to stay in place for now, but I think- fortune forbid otherwise- that the death toll's reached a plateau."

The news was good. But South Pyongan pressed her lips together.

"Give it to me."

The man's professional face didn't waver, but she could see the way his jaw tightened. "Thirty-one, comrade."

Thirty-one. Thirty-one people out of a village of six hundred taken out by something smaller than a grain of rice. And that wasn't even a quarter of everyone dead in her province.

"We'll make the Yanks pay for every single one," she vowed darkly, even as her fists clenched.

Not if the peace talks had their way.

She shoved the dark thought away. That was the soldier talking. What the Yanks had proposed yesterday didn't sit right with her, and neither did what Kangwon had said about the General wanting to keep Korea asleep despite it. But she couldn't do anything about that here.

When she went back to Pyongyang, on the other hand…

"And we'll make sure they have to pay for as few lives as possible," Yun swore. "The team around Sunchon did well in their clean up. There haven't been any cases there yet, which means we're in the clear for a couple diseases."

The town had flies dropped on them over a week ago. A Yank plane had circled overhead in the early morning and dropped four bombs. Only one of them had exploded, and since it'd been a weak detonation, everyone that heard it knew what it meant. Some of the Chinese army clerks in the area had even managed to recover the bomb- a four-chambered thing that had split into two halves. She'd stopped to see it on her way here, along with a few of the flies they'd collected.

She'd just have to believe them that there'd apparently been literally thirty per every under square metre because she was not watching the film they'd taken. It was Kangwon's job to investigate hordes of infected bugs, not hers. And it also wasn't her job to be told about those investigations, beyond what she needed to avenge.

"Keep monitoring the situation," she ordered the Anti-Epidemic guy. "First person that gets sick, isolate 'em."

Kangwon's crash course once he'd came back from Hwanghae had stressed that every single person in the north of Korea needed to know it was on both their Countryhuman's and Provincehumans' authority that even a cough or one single bug they thought was odd needed to be reported.

South Pyongan hadn't needed to be told that. She hated going anywhere near the outbreaks, but she'd been taking day trips to her province every few days to make sure everyone knew not to touch or eat weird shit, hand out Hwang and the Health Ministry's pamphlets personally, and remind people to either head to the nearest clinic or contact someone important in the area if they so much as sneezed.

She wanted this sympathetic fever gone, and she wanted her people healthy. They didn't deserve to get stuck with permanent skin conditions or lung problems just because the Yankee was a demented bastard following in the Jap's footsteps.

Ishii Shiro had deserved to fucking bite it, just like every single other one of those freaks. But instead he'd gotten away, just like they were going to let the Yankees get away.

She bared her teeth, not caring that the other two could tell she was even through the mask. They didn't know what she was thinking about. They'd just think it was the germ warfare.

"And shoot me a telegram if anyone gets pissy over quarantine," she added, a little too enthusiastically.

Okay, maybe it wasn't the most politicianly thing to want to beat up one of your people. But they were giving the quarantined food and antibiotics, so it wasn't like they were just locking them up to starve. Which meant anyone that wanted to break quarantine was doing it just because they didn't like to be told what to do. South Pyongan also didn't like to be told what to do, but even she'd lock herself up in a cave if being free could get people sick. So really, anyone against quarantine was sort of halfway to being a reactionary. Their Provincehuman beating sense into them could save them from going all the way.

No one had actually protested against the measures yet, because obviously most people didn't want to get their whole village sick. But she could hope for at least one.

Then again, she'd have to get close to beat them up, and risk her suit tearing. And just throwing rocks wouldn't release her tension the way a real fight would.

'Ugh.' Maybe she shouldn't have offered.

But her chairman and Epidemic guy were already nodding. She guessed she was committed. She'd have to make sure her throwing arm was sharp.

Yun left them on the edge of town (South Pyongan wasn't heading into civilization if she could help it) after he'd handed her the report to give to Kangwon.

She glared at it, pinched between her gloved fingers, not wanting to put it in her bag. Paper was one of the things you couldn't disinfect. After a second, she folded it up, tucking it into her ammo pouch. Magazines and clips she could put chemicals on, and then she could wash the pouch along with the clothes under her suit.

"Comrade South Pyongan," her chairman said as she adjusted her belts. "I wanted to thank you for diligence ever since the enemy unleashed their newest evil on us."

"I'm not really doing much," she pointed out. "Just popping in to tell people to wash their hands and food, and wear masks and gloves."

It was barely anything. 'Politics is just another battle,' Korea had said. 'Learn new tactics.' But there weren't any tactics she could use as a politician or soldier to fight this battle.

"Your visits still mean a great deal to us," the chairman told her.

“Especially when I’m sure you have to go through hardship to come so often.”

He eyed her full-body white protective suit, gloves, gauze-wrapped boots and hood, and face mask pointedly.

South Pyongan sheepishly winced. Hwang had told her it didn’t look good to always be wrapped up like she was going into the grave, since it’d make people nervous if she was wearing protective gear even when there hadn’t been any attacks or outbreaks in the area. But there was no way she was prioritizing image over not getting the plague. People should be nervous.

She wasn’t. Obviously. But they should be.

“No, no hardship,” she assured, totally convincingly.

Maybe she had to talk herself into leaving the safety of working in open fields and isolated ravines to head into areas with tons of people for just a little too long every time. Maybe.

“Regardless, I assure you all of our comrades are reassured to see you so often.” Her Provincial Chairman’s smile was warm. “I’m glad to see you’re keeping your vow. I knew you would.”

The man had gotten lucky. Not only had he survived the Yankee occupation, but he’d survived unscathed. Which meant he still remembered the conversation while they hid in the church shelter.

South Pyongan suddenly became very interested in the woman heading up the hill with a bucket of water in her arms.

“Yeah, obviously,” she definitely didn’t mutter. “I was already the best province, after all.”

The chairman dipped his head, hiding his widening grin. “I’m thankful I was born here, at least.”

‘Bleh.’ She’d changed her mind. The face mask and bandages were actually great and she was never taking them off, even when the war was over.

When the war was over.

Her mood darkened as her chairman left, and she kicked at one of the clods of mud that the snow not up on the mountains had mostly turned into by now.

She wanted the war to be over. She wanted their people to stop dying. She wanted…

South Pyongan couldn't want peace. Not yet. But maybe she wanted to learn how to want peace, how to be more than a soldier. And she couldn't do that when the Yankees were still turning their rubble into ashes, infecting their people, and demanding Gangwon back like he was theirs and not his own person, not Kangwon's brother.

When she looked around at the ruins of Anju, when she glimpsed those numbers on the biowarfare report, their people, her people, turned into casualties by fucking bugs, by germs bred in a lab by Yanks that had learned how from Japs, like Japan getting one last blow in, all she wanted was to destroy them, to make them regret ever turning their eyes on her country.

She knew it wasn't responsible. She knew there were more important things than revenge. But it was what she wanted, even when she knew they couldn't give America what he wanted.

'They want this war to continue, they want Korea to be torn apart.'

They couldn't let the Yank or his toadies do that. They had to make nice, they had to make concessions, they had to let them get away with their crimes so that they couldn't commit anymore of them, so they'd stop poisoning their people and burning their country alive.

And it was so damn frustrating.

South Pyongan looked out at her wreck of a capital, the urge to act bubbling in her. She couldn't stop whatever decision was made, she couldn't punch the germs targeting her people, but she had to be able to do something.

The closer to the river, the more ruined the city was from the Yanks striking their mills and bridges. Even Paeksang Pavilion, the old command post of the fort Anju had used to be, had been ruined. From where she was at the foot of the eastern hills, she could see the splintered pillars and shattered tiles cresting the artillery-scarred, bomb crater-pocked hill all the way over on the western edge.

She could still remember the first time she'd seen it, fleeing from North Pyongan province when she'd first met her brother. After they'd fled his province and made it to the coast in hers, the Japs had forced them to head inland, into her northern mountains. She'd looked back, trying to find the losers hunting them, and spotted the distant red-painted wood and curved roof, like the graceful wings of a hawk perched on the hill, guarding Anju (her brother's words when she'd mentioned it, not hers).

That had been her first real glimpse of Korean architecture (since she'd been a little preoccupied in Pyongyang, and missed out on the gates), and it'd stirred her common sense on the rest of it- open-air pavilions, arched gates, vaulted ceilings covered in carved murals painted with more colours than she'd seen in her short life, towering pagodas made of wood and stone. She'd been struck by how cool it all was.

And how she could totally make it cooler. Like what if the pagoda levels didn't get smaller as they went up, but alternated, or maybe even got bigger? Or what if they were shaped like spirals? Or what if instead of just using stone and clay for roof tiles, leaving them dark and boring, they found ways to colour them brighter?

She'd wanted to see Gyeongbokgung Palace so bad. A few years into the Occupation, she'd finally decided it was safe enough to take her brother near Seoul, just to Bugak Mountain so she could peer down at the complex, only to find out that out of the hundreds of buildings her common sense told her should be there, there were less than a hundred left, and work crews down below were in the middle of demolishing more.

They found out later that the Japs had been dismantling them and selling them off, building newer, uglier halls for the 'Chosen Industrial Exhibition,' showing off stolen Korean artifacts and stolen Korean architecture to wealthy foreigners. Rich Japanese had literally bought entire buildings and had them shipped to Japan to be reassembled in their own homes.

South Pyongan's blood had boiled so fiercely that she'd almost headed down the hill to teach the bastards what happened when you touched shit that wasn't yours. She would've, if her brother hadn't talked her out of it.

It had felt like soy sauce being poured right into the wound. Not only were they not allowed to have a house at all because of Japan, not only could she not build her brother a place to live or give him a comfortable life, but they weren't even allowed to have the empty buildings that they could have lived in if things were different.

Now South Pyongan dragged her eyes away from the pavilion, down to her city, to the clay and straw walls on the hastily-built huts pressed up against the hill like they were leaning away from the river, cowering from the Yankee's bombs, to the ropes hung between eaves to dry threadbare shirts, and the crude coverings some people had set up to try and keep their firewood dry outside, so it wouldn't take up more space in their already cramped shelters, and to the square holes dug into the face of the hill, where tunnels led down into damp, freezing dens with too many people crammed into them.

The Paeksang Pavilion was just the soy sauce. That was the wound, her people's ancestral tile-roofed chosonjips and newer concrete dwellings that they'd worked so hard to build getting decimated, driving them into caves like rats or shitty little huts like before Liberation. They'd finally been able to have the homes they deserved, and then everything had been taken away again, leaving them with scraps.

As her jaw worked, teeth grinding, her fingers dug into her pack, feeling the hard surface of her mirror inside.

South Pyongan paused, remembering what she'd done with the first thing she'd bullied off of the merchant- the perfume bottle she'd claimed.

As she looked between her bag and the worn clothes hanging on a wooden frame outside the gaping mouth of a dug-out, an idea started to come to her.

They'd be handing out more summer clothes now that it was going to start warming up soon. But it wasn't like the government could afford to get fancy. They were trying to improve living quality with local factories and crap, but right now, 'improving people's living quality' had to be about stuff they needed to survive without wanting to kill themselves out of sheer misery.

A tired-looking woman emerged from the dug-out at the base of the hill, checking the clothes she'd left to dry, making sure they weren't frosting over in the cold.

The chick she'd handed off the stolen perfume to as thanks for feeding a few of the guerrillas when they were hamstringing the Yankees had lit up like a firework, immediately testing it on her wrist. She'd acted like out of a week's worth of food and the shiny bottle of rose-scented spray, she'd gotten the better deal.

South Pyongan strolled toward the cave. "Hey."

The lady startled, eyes widening when she saw the white protective suit, but rubbed her chest when she saw the blue skin above the mask.

"Comrade South Pyongan," she said, bowing. "It's an honour. What can I do for you?"

"I picked something up recently that I don't really need." She dug around in her pack, pulling out the mirror. "I figured I'd hand it off to one of my people. Want it?"

It wasn't anything special. The handle and frame were made of cheap copper, and there were a couple moisture spots on the glass. She was pretty sure the merchant had looted it from someone's house (abandoned house, he knew she'd kick his ass otherwise). She hadn't even spent much on it, coercing him into a discount.

But the woman's eyes lit up when she saw it, just like the one she'd given the perfume to.

"Oh! I feel like I haven't seen a mirror in forever. We've been using some of the bronzeware we saved from our house." She laughed sheepishly, fluffing her puffy hair. "As I'm sure you can tell."

"Nah, you're looking great, comrade," her province assured her. "But with this, you can keep looking great."

She held out the mirror, and the woman half-raised her hand for it, pausing.

"How much do you want for it?"

Hm. That had sort of sounded like a sales pitch.

"Free," she told her. "I don't need it. No hair to check, y'know? And I already know I look good."

And she could bully the merchant into getting her another one.

The woman hesitated. "Well… It is my daughter's birthday at the end of the month. I suppose…"

"You know you want to." South Pyongan shook the mirror temptingly, and she laughed, giving in and taking it from her.

"Thank you," she said, admiring her reflection as she fixed a few stray hairs on top of her head. "I'll make sure my daughter knows where her gift came from."

"I won't be too mad if the credit gets stolen." The province winked, making the woman giggle, then sauntered off, glancing back to see her scurrying inside the dug-out with her shiny new mirror, forgetting about the clothes she'd came out for.

It was just a cheap mirror, but it'd made her day, and would probably thrill her daughter, too.

'Hmmmmm.'

Korea wouldn't approve of her plan, exactly. But he had said that thing about how she played fast and loose with the rules, and he admired that about her (that was totally what he'd said, direct quote).

Plus it would stimulate the economy, and make people feel a little more at home in their war-time suites. She'd seen for herself that the cane and wooden tiger North Pyongan had given to those boys had gone a long way towards helping them stop sulking about being exiled from their home. And while she couldn't take credit for it, with a little wheedling, she could also make sure it resulted in good publicity for the Party.

Not that she cared about that. But it might save what was left of her skin if Korea ever found out.

She'd have to go into the city, and- ugh- get within coughing distance of more people, buuuuut…

She weighed the pros and cons (and chances of being put up against the wall if discovered) then nodded decisively.

'Worth it.'

South Pyongan marched confidently into Anju, feeling her bodyguards- still as stone-faced and unable to take a joke as ever- following her. She knew the streets like the back of her hand (pre-ever-spreading burns) from the time spent playing cat-and-mouse with the Yanks and traitors in them. Even with all the piles of rubble and missing landmarks, she still had the basic outline in her head.

Ssi-bal. She'd probably seen more of her capital in those couple weeks than she had before the war.

But she was here now. And she was keeping her vow.

The province led the men into the middle of the ruined market district, stopping to pretend to examine a fragment of a bomb casing. She glanced over at them, standing near the old producer's co-operative front in the full-body suits she'd forced them to wear. They were scanning the crumbling buildings around them for threats. While they did, she slowly started to inch away, eyeing them the entire time.

Keuda (as she'd named the shorter one since they still refused to tell her their real names) suddenly met her eyes.

She froze, keeping eye contact as she slooowly kept shuffling away.

He didn't say anything. Neither did Jakda (the bigger one) as he looked over. They both just watched her inch to the edge of the square, then around the frame of a still half-standing building.

Out of sight, South Pyongan immediately turned to run. Then she pursed her lips, poking her head back around the crumbling stone wall.

The men were still standing there.

"I'm escaping," she notified them.

"Yes," Jakda agreed.

"Running away," she explained, arching a brow. "Vanishing into the streets, never to be seen again. Or until an hour later."

Keuda was scratching his ear. "Alright."

South Pyongan came back around the building, crossing her arms as she squinted warily at them. "You're not gonna stop me?"

Yeah, yeah, don't question free cold noodles. But if her guards had gotten so sick of her that they didn't even fear Korea's wrath if she almost got kidnapped on their watch, that was probably a bad thing. And she knew she could outrun them. Those muscles were back in top condition, at least.

She was still working on that other one.

"Is this because I said that thing about your mother?" she demanded. "Because that was me just trying to figure out if you were actually related."

They were. They'd both glowered at her.

Jakda glowered now at the reminder, but still said, "You're permitted privacy when you need it," and Keuda nodded.

South Pyongan blinked. "Since when?"

They didn't answer.

"Does that come from like, up top?"

"If you aren't back here in an hour, we come looking for you," Jakda replied seriously.

"Maybe an hour and a half," Keuda muttered. "On account of our mother."

South Pyongan smacked her fist into her palm. "I knew you had a sense of humour! Back in an hour and a half, promise Korea won't have to execute you."

She seized her cold noodles and took off, a little glow of (disgusting) warmth inside her chest like a taste of the summer to come.

She wondered when he'd given the order.

That almost made her pause. If it was to show he- Urrgh, she wasn't going to say it. But if it was, she didn't want to turn around and prove she wasn't worthy of that trust.

But she kept going. Korea had said he didn't mind if she skirted the law, so long as it was for their people, not her. And it was.

She couldn't build them manors with coloured tile roofs or spiralling pagodas, not yet. All she could do was keep building the bare minimum, enough so they'd have a roof over their heads, or at least so their caves would be more comfortable.

'You are aggressive, willing to skirt the law, and usually know how to get what you want.'

Well, what she really wanted wasn't going to happen right now. But at least she could get a little soy sauce out of her people's wounds and onto their shelves.

Or something. Look, she wasn't the poet in the family, she barely knew what a metaphor was.

So South Pyongan confidently set off to find Completely Reasonable Prices Kim. After hearing people weren't allowed back into Pyongyang unless they were essential, he'd set up shop outside Anju. He'd been complaining about not being able to travel for his business every time she'd seen him, so she knew he'd be an easy sell on the premise. It'd just take a little finesse to get him to agree to some of the finer details.

Negotiations, trade, supplying goods. Yeah, that felt politicianly.

She'd hammer this in, then head back to Pyongyang. She'd heard the news from the liaison, same as everyone else. If they were really going to make a compromise with the Yanks on this without even asking Korea, she wanted to hear why from the General, no one else.

And if she didn't like his answer, then she was waking their Countryhuman up herself.

Keuda 크다 and Jakda 작다 are the unconjugated forms of big and small. So South Pyongan is calling her shorter comrade Big and her taller comrade Small. Never wise to not tell her your name.

Clarification: In real life, thirty-six out of six hundred people died of the bubonic plague in Balnam-ri, with more being sick. I lowered this number slightly here for a reason that will become clear in the next chapter (long-awaited reveal coming!). And also because it makes me really upset to think about because I'm remembering this article about a North Korean man watching his father die of typhoid during the war. Once again, there will be one big author's note about the biological warfare in general later on, with sources.

They say South Pyongan is still masking from covid to this day (as we all should be). She is a firm long covid believer (as we all should be). She also threatened many people with violence during the height of the pandemic (six feet isn't far enough).

Someone once asked if any of the provinces were afraid of bugs, and I said South Pyongan wasn't. I'm revising my opinion slightly. She does love kabutomushi, as I said, but while she isn't afraid of bugs, she is disturbed by large amounts of them (she's also very anti-fly). She was the most affected mentally by the biological warfare (on a personal level; Kangwon was affected more on a societal level), and while if she sees a spider or an isolated insect, she can easily kill or ignore it (or toss it down your shirt), if she sees too many it freaks her out. As in 'needs to strip naked, scratch her skin, wash her clothes, and have a scalding hot shower.' Bug bites are also immediately taken to Kangwon. So it's not so much bugs she's afraid of, but the diseases they could carry. She, of course, pretends that she isn't freaked out by bugs or sickness at all, because that is entirely uncool and- SIX FUCKING FEET BUDDY I'LL SHOOT I MEAN IT.

My sink broke and someone had to come fix it. My cat was not thrilled to see a man that isn't Father (my father, my son has no father, I am a hard-working single mother).

Shared Blood

Kangwon didn't get up right away after removing his IV. He stayed on the break room chair, head in his hands, trying to stop the room from spinning.

'Shouldn't've given blood today.'

But he had to. He'd said it was their best line of defense against illness, but it was also their last line. So long as his test results kept coming back negative for any of the germs he was around, he had to keep giving. Especially since at any point they could come back positive, and he'd have to quarantine himself, stuck unable to help at all.

He opened his eyes and carefully climbed to his feet, vision going black at the edges as the floor suddenly seemed a lot less stable beneath his gauze-wrapped boots.

'Definitely shouldn't've given blood today.'*

He plucked the full bag from the IV pole, thankful as usual that their blood replenished fast enough for him to give every day, if he was careful. Though he should still probably be doing it every other day.

But he knew he and his cousins' blood, and China and the Chinese provinces', had already saved probably dozens of people. He didn't know where most of it went, but he'd performed transfusions himself in the first stages of the war that'd pulled soldiers with severed limbs and white phosphorus injuries back from the brink. And now that a lot of their blood was going to the Quarantine Hospital, he and Gangwon had both witnessed its effects on the sick.

With so many diseases not having real cures or any way to treat them, and their shortage in antibiotics and food, sometimes the difference between life and death could be one transfusion.

Kangwon hadn’t got the death toll back from Balnam-ri yet, but he knew whatever it was, it would be higher if South Pyongan’s blood hadn’t been being shipped out to it.

He didn't put his blood into storage. He went straight to the patient wing, deliberating as he joined the constant stream of nurses hustling along the halls.

Oh Tu-hun was elderly, and he was worse off. The encephalitis had swollen his brain, and kept giving him seizures. At his age, it’d rapidly weakened him. He wasn’t doing well. Kim Do-bom was healthier, his malaria didn't seem like the severe type, and it was also in the earlier stages, not wreaking havoc on his body yet.

But he was a kid.

Kangwon had a feeling if he explained things and asked the old man, he’d tell him to choose the boy. But that felt like trying to shift the responsibility.

After a long moment, he turned and headed for the ‘malaria wing,’ leaving Oh Tu-hun’s room behind.

It came down to prognosis. Encephalitis had no real cure. And both it and malaria could both have lifelong effects. And when it came down to it...

Do-bom had more of a life to live.

And he had to be treated early to prevent those effects. The sooner he got the province’s blood, the better.

Kangwon knocked on his door, rushing in when he didn’t answer, heart swooping into his stomach.

The boy was curled up on the cot, the sheets wrapped around him like a caterpillar’s cocoon. A cocoon with sides that expanded and contracted with his sleeping breaths.

Kangwon let out a breath, shutting the door. He worked quietly so he wouldn’t wake Do-bom up as he set up the IV, his hands steady even though his pulse was still racing from the scare.

He never thought he'd miss his field medic days. The aftermath of a battle- soldiers scattered around on dirt or their own jackets, the air soaked with the sharp tang of blood and gunpowder, or rot if they hadn't been able to regroup and rest right away, moans of anguish and grief echoing in his skull as he had to make lightning judgements on who needed treatment right away, who could wait, who was the worst injured that could still realistically be saved, having to calm the pleading of those that couldn't be as he walked by them to someone else, knowing he was leaving them to die, but also knowing that if he tried to save them, he could lose someone he might not otherwise- had always been the worst. Korea's Army hadn't been too bad, but that first major fight at Pochonbo...

But there'd been a simplicity to it, too. He'd liked being able to see everyone he needed to fix spread out before him, their need levels easily accessible. Even if he hadn't liked making the choice on who got his treatment first, it had still needed to be made. And he'd liked the medical barracks at the Secret Camp. It was comforting to be able to sit sentinel on a chair and know the second even one of his patients' conditions worsened, he'd be able to respond.

With real hospitals, you wouldn't know if a patient was suffering until a routine check, or if they managed to ring the bell in their room. And if they were seizing like Oh Tu-hun, they couldn't do that. It unnerved Kangwon sometimes, walking by the rows of shut doors, knowing that any one of his patients could be in the middle of a struggle he could help them win only if he joined it now.

Or that they could already be growing cold. Like Hae.

Kangwon shook his head as he straightened, his equipment set up.

The privacy of the hospitals was better for the well-being of patients, physical and mental. In the big Quarantine Hospital, they had the luxury of being able to separate patients roughly by disease type, and in separate rooms, and the villages were able to quarantine inside their houses. But in the field hospitals for sick soldiers and the clinics they'd set up to segregate the ill outside towns and cities, sometimes all they could rely on was fabric partitions. It was less sanitary, and the last thing a sick or injured person needed to hear was someone else dying of the same thing.

No one in there would choose that over a quiet, sterile hospital room.

He'd just have to keep opening every door he passed by on his rounds.

Gently, he shook Do-bom awake, and the boy blinked blearily.

"Dad?"

"Sorry, comrade," he said gently. "He's still off fighting for our country."

His voice was steady, like he hadn't just possibly chosen the boy to live over someone else. He was used to this, after all. He no longer made the choice in front of the dying, but he still did it every day.

"But I'll make sure to tell your mom you're doing well."

The boy didn't look well. His brown skin had taken on the yellowish tinge of jaundice, and he shook with the effort of sitting up in bed.

Malaria wasn't as common as other diseases, since it required an infected mosquito to pass it. And early March in Korea (when he'd gotten bitten) wasn't the best environment for mosquitoes. They shouldn't even be seen until May.

Do-bom had gotten unlucky, stumbling across a drop zone with mosquitoes still clinging to life in the snow. Being a kid with a interest in bugs, he'd picked some up to take them home.

And now he had malaria.

Luckily, unlike Choi Ki-tak's mother, his had brought him in as soon as she'd heard, and sent for the Epidemic Prevention Committee right away when the symptoms she'd been told to watch for had shown up.

"I'm going to give you what's called a blood transfusion," Kangwon explained to the boy when he was ready. "I'm going to put this tube in your arm, and put some new good blood into you to try and get rid of some of the bad blood. Is that okay?"

Do-bom eyed the needle on the end of the tubing nervously. “Th-The other medicine goes in my mouth. Can we do that?”

They had him on antimalarials, and a drug for fever. The pills and serums should work at killing the parasites inside him, but it would take some time.

Kangwon debated for a second whether he should tell a patient this, then asked, “You like bugs, right?”

The boy’s tired eyes lit up. “Yep!” Then he slumped. “Mom’s always telling me not to touch ‘em, though. She was really mad when she heard the mosquito bit me. But it didn’t do it to be mean,” he said defiantly. "It didn't know it was sick.”

Kangwon nodded. “But it was. And now you’ve got parasites in your blood.”

Do-bom’s eyes widened, thankfully looking more intrigued than upset. “Really?”

“Yeah.”

Kangwon briefly explained how malaria worked in terms a kid could understand- the mosquito had injected him with parasites that swam through his blood into his liver, where they grew until they released more parasites back into his blood, where they infected red blood cells and would continue to grow and reproduce.

“Whoaaaa,” Do-bom breathed, eyes glowing with morbid fascination. “Ew.”

“Ew,” Kangwon agreed.

He was never going to explain malaria to South Pyongan. She’d leave the country.

“And since those parasites are in your blood, flushing them out a little should make you heal faster.”

He didn’t have enough blood to flush his system out completely. But similar lies worked on adult patients, and after a second of hesitation, this one worked on the boy.

“Okay,” he said, still watching the needle like it might bite.

“Think of it like a mosquito proboscis,” Kangwon advised, showing it to him so he could get a little more familiar with it. “Did it hurt when it bit you?”

He shook his head of dark head. “Just stung.”

“Exactly.” Kangwon sat on the edge of the cot, making sure the boy was comfortable propped up on his pillow, before taking his arm.

He offered to let him look away, but the kid watched as he disinfected his antecubital fossa and inserted the needle into his median cupital. The idea of the mosquito proboscis had seemed to work.

Do-bom flinched when it went in, then flexed his fingers wonderingly. “It didn’t hurt.”

“Just pinched.” Kangwon clipped the tubing into place, and sat back. “This’ll take a few minutes.”

“Okay.” Do-bom snuggled back into the pillows. “Doctor, my head still really hurts. Is that normal?”

“It is,” he assured. “Headaches are common for malaria.”

And so was children infected with it developing permanent developmental disabilities.

“You can go back to sleep if you want,” Kangwon told the boy. “Get some rest.”

Do-bom didn't fight at all, closing his eyes, falling asleep in a way that was more passing out than drifting off. Kangwon monitored his blood as it drained from the bag, sliding through the tube until it reached the boy's vein.

He wondered if running a full flush of his system could get rid of all the parasites in his blood. It wasn't entirely viable when the infected blood would have to be ran through Kangwon's veins in exchange, and wasn't worth risking since the boy's liver would still house parasites, but it was something to think about. When they'd restocked their stores after the war, maybe he'd try treating any blood disease they had to deal with by draining the patient's blood from one arm, while running province blood through the other.

Would it be dangerous to completely replace a human's blood with theirs? He'd have to make sure it was a last resort, and that the patient knew exactly what they were agreeing with.

And maybe not tell Hwang about the idea.

As his blood seeped into Do-bom's veins, mingling with his, a bit of colour returned to his sleeping face, a flush spreading across his cheeks, making them look a little less yellow.

The boy woke up when the IV was being removed, blinking in the soft hospital light. There was a gleam in his eyes that hadn't been there before, like everyone else Kangwon had ever done this for.

"My headache's gone," the boy marvelled, more lucid than before as he put a hand on his temple. "Doctor, I think it worked! You cured me!"

"I'm afraid not," Kangwon told him regretfully. "You've still got parasites, and the headache will come back eventually. But this should help."

He hoped it would.

"Aw." Do-bom pouted.

"But enjoy being headache-free for now," the province advised, knowing he had around an hour's high before he'd want to cocoon himself again.

"Okay!" Do-bom reached for a sedge container by his cot, and Kangwon passed it to him, watching as he pulled out a pulpy notebook, flipping it open and starting to draw a mosquito with a charcoal stick.

The Provincehuman shook his head as he left, taking a last look back.

Do-bom looked like a normal kid again, smiling as he sketched, free of pain for a brief while.

Kangwon checked on Oh Tu-hun before he left, finding out from a nurse that he'd had another seizure. He was still alive, but clearly not doing well.

Maybe he should draw more of his blood.

No. He had to be careful. He knew he'd reached his limit on it for today, and he was more useful awake. And his brother had already given his amount for the day.

Kangwon peeked in on him before he left, finding him facedown on the pallet they'd set up in a storage room. He smiled, pulling the sheet over him, before going to get some air.

As soon as he stepped outside, Sip Yung-su shouted, "Comrade, incoming!"

Someone clicked their tongue from just behind him. "No fun."

Kangwon raised an eyebrow as China- who'd somehow slid in behind his back without being noticed- slunk around to his front. Sip must've seen him from his post on the hill beyond the corner of the hospital. It was comforting to know the Chinese country couldn't actually go invisible or anything.

"Can I help you?" the Korean asked, giving a grateful look over the man's shoulder.

His bodyguard gave him a thumbs up, pleased with himself.

"It's time for my ritual bloodletting," China informed him, which was an interesting way to say he was donating. "I came to get my favourite doctor to do it." He lowered his voice conspiratorially. "Between you and me, I'm not sure that mean nurse of yours likes me very much."

Yeah, Kim Yong-hwan definitely didn't. She had it out for smooth-talkers.

Kangwon had perked up at what he'd said, and China shrank back dramatically.

"What a scary reaction to my blood, Little Brother," he said, rubbing his arms. "I'm a little worried now."

"Sorry." Kangwon settled himself. "Just good timing. We should go to the Military Hospital, though."

They definitely didn't need him getting sick.

"Aiya, you Koreans love moving me to secondary locations," China remarked. "But luckily for you, I have a naïve and trusting heart, so I will follow."

Kangwon raised a brow. "Right."

"And also luckily for you, with your Countryhuman comatose-" China pulled something from his pocket, eyes squinching up above his mask. "I have the Jeep."

That actually was lucky for Kangwon. It felt great to have Ri Il drive while he caught a brief nap in the back seat, instead of having to trek all the way into the city.

They left his guards at the entrance, heading into the underground part of the hospital, using the outside entrance to access the tunnels behind the still-standing parts of the building. The tremors from the planes bombing the rail line to the south could be felt through the earth, and Kangwon would also prefer Korea didn't wake up to find out he'd gotten China bombed somehow.

Especially because he already wasn't going to be happy.

"Any news from your country?" he asked China as they made their way through the busy halls.

“I assume you mean biological warfarewise,” China said, sliding between two nurses. “More feathers dropped on Liaotung's Antung, and leaves. Eyewitnesses saw the bombs burst.”

Leaves. Kangwon felt a chill run through him.

China must’ve seen him shiver, since he said, “En. Now that spring is more or less here, I expect we’ll see more of those. My scientists haven’t identified what they’re infected with, or the corn. But I doubt it’s anything pleasant.”

Yeah. The corn kernels dropped on the same Chinese city a few days ago had apparently been visibly infected with fungus. They hadn’t gotten the results back yet, but they were pretty sure it was a corn smut they weren’t familiar with in China.

They’d had leaves dropped on them here, too, by Mount Taedok in Hwanghae last month, and just a few days ago near Chongju in North Pyongan. They were still testing them, but the leaf fragments found in Hwanghae seemed to be infected with anthracnose, a fungal disease that could either target cotton or a huge host of other plants, including fruit trees.

It wasn't too bad in February. But now that sowing season was here…

Kangwon had been so focused on the human cost of biological warfare that he hadn’t put much thought into the other things that could be infected.

His fingertips itched, and he shoved his gloved hands into the pockets of his medical coat.

“Any more anthrax?” he asked, trying to distract himself with a method that didn’t really work at all.

“Not since the 12th,” China replied as they went into the small room set aside for blood donations. They couldn’t use the break room in case someone walked in and saw the Chinese Countryhuman’s unnaturally red skin.

“Good.” Kangwon locked the door, just in case.

"Well, let's not get too hasty," the other man replied, perching on the edge of the chair in the corner of the sterile room. "We haven't found any new anthrax. That doesn't mean there hasn't been any."

"I'm trying to be optimistic."

Bacillus anthracis was a spore that infected animals and humans. Respiratory anthrax came with a fever and bloody fluid that filled your lungs and made it hard to breathe, and eventually caused shock, while cutaneous anthrax caused necrotized spots called eschars, and lesions that spread, rotting the skin, along with aching, sweating, and a deadly fever. The type you caught depended on how you'd contracted it- through skin or inhalation.

Both could cause hemorrhagic meningitis, causing the brain to swell and bleed, amongst other things.

Like with the leaves, Kangwon had mostly been thinking about the damage it could wreak on their people, just viewing the animals as a vector for it. But now that he thought about it…

They were encouraging livestock farming to make up for the meat shortages, and getting most of their imports from China and CCCP, with China being more convenient. Any animal that caught anthrax had to be culled so it wouldn't spread to the rest, and any infected meat couldn't be eaten. Anthrax was bad enough in people, but if it swept through their livestock populations at the same time as an anthracnose blight struck their orchards, or if a corn or soybean disease spread…

They'd have a famine.

"That's not a very optimistic face, Little Brother," China remarked, eyes piercing through him like he knew what he was thinking.

He probably did. There was no way he hadn't thought about it.

"Not to tell you what to do in your own country," Kangwon began, keeping his hands busy with setting up another IV. "But treat those anthrax cases seriously. And any positive tests."

China smiled, his face mask set aside now that they were alone.

“Only if you do the same.”

“Trust me, we will.”

With an effort, Kangwon both set his worries aside for now and dragged the chair (China refusing to move from it) out of the corner and over to the IV pole.

“Sleeve.”

Lazily, the Chinese man stripped off his outer coat, inner coat, and winter uniform, leaving him in his long-sleeved white undershirt. Which he definitely had another undershirt beneath.

‘Enough layers?’

As he rolled up his bell-shaped sleeve, Kangwon watched, but didn’t see anything out of the ordinary on the exposed inside, leaving him with no idea how he pulled so many things out of there.

Done, China presented his arm like a rare scroll, laying it on the armrest. “Do what you will with me.”

Kangwon shook his head, pouring antiseptic on a cotton ball.

“Big moves being made in the peace talks,” China remarked as he worked. “A glimmer of hope. Or I’m sure that’s what our mutual antagonist would like us to believe.”

The full story about the Geoje Island massacre on the 13th had recently came out. The right-wing prisoners from their army had been taken out and given guns, allowed to patrol the camps with Rhee’s men and discipline their former comrades. When some of the other prisoners had thrown stones at them, they’d mowed them down with their guns, murdering twelve and wounding over two dozen, if the reports weren’t downplaying it.

Their Supreme Command was furious, of course, and so was China’s. If they were doing that to the KPA, they could just as easily be doing it to the PVA. They'd been constantly seeking a formal explanation. It’d gotten so bad that Van Fleet had actually addressed it in a Tokyo newspaper, if only to say that the two hundred and fifty prisoners they'd killed in under a month wasn't anything compared to how Communists were handled in Greece, and heavily imply they should just be grateful they weren't all being shot outright.

According to the telegrams the Premier sent to keep the provinces up to date with Korea out, the other countries weren't exactly happy that the head of their 'United Nations' force was gunning down POWs. Even the Red Cross had concerns, and considering they'd said the Nazi camps in the World Anti-Facsist War had acceptable conditions, that was probably saying something.

The Americans couldn't exactly give them an excuse this time, because there wasn't one.

So they wanted to make it go away.

Yesterday, they'd used the same tactic they had before to tell them what they wanted, strongly hinting to their own newspapers that if Korea and China just dropped the massacre issue and went into secret sessions with them so the rest of the world wouldn't hear what they were talking about, they'd finally allow the POW issue to be settled.

It was disgusting to think that in order to make the Americans follow international law, and to get their soldiers back so they couldn't be tortured by Rhee, they'd have to overlook the torture being done now.

But today they'd taken the deal. The secret sessions would begin in four days, on the 25th.

China already knew everything about it, since he'd been at the discussions about whether to accept or not. So Kangwon had a good idea of what he was really working up to. But he played along as he finished dabbing his skin clean.

"You don't think so?"

China tipped his head back to the ceiling. "Even if the POW issue gets resolved, don't we still have the one of your nervous-looking brother?"

They did.

"Once we get the POWs and everything else handled, Gangwon'll be the only thing stopping the armistice," he replied, trying to find China's vein.

Even after the months of doing this, he wasn't as familiar with his as he was with Korea's. And he swore it was like the Chinese country's moved every time.

"Then maybe we can get a UN observer to come see him."

They couldn't come clean that they had him right now, since if America knew for sure, he might use it as an excuse not to talk about the prisoners of war. But he wouldn't have anything to fall back on once that was solved.

"He can testify that he's with us by choice, and since he's not technically a soldier in any army, it's not hypocritical to refuse to repatriate him."

There it was. Kangwon slid the needle into China's cephalic vein. He flinched aggressively, but was clearly overreacting.

"Not going to comfort me?" China asked in disappointment. When the province gave him a dry look, he said, "You realize any UN observer that was both convinced your Gangwon was here of his own free will, and honest enough to share that would only be accused of being paid off by our Soviet comrade, yes?"

Securing the IV, Kangwon said, "Then maybe we could invite the UN himself."

China laughed lightly. "I'm sure he'd just love to visit us." The corners of his lips lowered slightly. "A word of advice- the United Nations might want this messy war business over with before the blood splatters on his wings get too hard to hide. But he won't lift a hand to end it. He prefers his feathers bloodied to torn out."

Kangwon wasn't going to argue with that. The United Nations clearly wasn't working like it'd been supposed to.

"You're probably right," he admitted, sitting on the stool he'd dragged over before he passed out. "But if we could get even a few of the other countries to realize we aren't holding Gangwon hostage, they'd put pressure on him and America. I doubt they want to drag the war out over one guy."

"Placing too much faith in foreigners again, Little Brother," China chided.

Kangwon smiled tiredly. "Placing a bit of it with you and your comrades seemed to work."

"Ah, but I'm the exception," the Chinese Countryhuman reminded him.

"If they really don't care about Korea, then that just makes it easier," Kangwon said, unbothered.

He already knew most of the other Countryhumans didn't care. It was their people he was placing faith in.

"If they don't care about Gangwon, then we don't actually need them convinced he's not a hostage, just that if America gives up on him, we'll have a ceasefire," he patiently explained. "I'm sure they don't want to lose any more of their people over a Provincehuman who clearly doesn't want to go back to the south."

The edges of China's smile cooled. "You are, of course, assuming that Western countries actually care about their people."

"At least some of them have to." Not America. He didn't care about people like Adolfo or Jepp or the woman SH had mentioned. But some of the others must.

China's voice was low. "That attitude will get you in trouble one day, Little Brother."

It sort of almost had. That day in Taejon, Jepp could've shot him after he'd patched him up, or Adolfo could've turned on him in the camp, or refused to get medicine for Kim Mi-ju.

But they hadn't. If people in a country like America could be good, then so could other countries.

Kangwon shrugged. "If that happens, hopefully it's after the war is over."

China examined him for a long moment, then hummed, and finally asked what he'd been leading up to.

"Interesting that we've accepted such pivotal secret sessions with our enemy, and yet I don't recall seeing your Countryhuman at the discussion." His smile widened knowingly. "Almost like he's still asleep."

Kangwon looked at him steadily. "He is."

"Mm. Strange. I would have thought he'd want to be woken up if something occurred with the talks." China idly toyed with his IV line. "Especially something like this."

Kangwon gently tugged it out of his hands, straightening the tube. "Our Supreme Command decided this isn't important enough to interrupt his healing for."

"Supreme Command?" China's lips curled. "Or Supreme Command*er?*"

Kim Il-sung was the only one in their leadership that knew Korea was out, though him not being at the meeting had probably raised suspicions. And he was the one that wanted Korea to stay asleep.

As far as Korea would know.

"Aiya," the Chinese country mock-gasped when he didn't answer. "Don't tell me your Premier is going behind your Countryhuman's back to get the outcome he wants? How scandalous!"

Kangwon chewed lightly on the inside of his cheek, swallowing the urge to defend the man's honour. It wasn't really China's business, but he didn't like the idea of him thinking that was what was happening. He actually didn't really like the proposal the Premier had added to his in the first place.

But it made sense. Kangwon already had two strikes against him with Kim Mi-ju and Hae. Another one might lose him doctoring privileges with Korea for good.

Even if his Countryhuman gave that strike knowing that even if he'd been awake, the outcome would've been the same.

And since the Premier'd offered for Kangwon's own sake, he couldn't argue too much against it.

"It's the decision he made," the Korean province said neutrally, staring steadily at him.

China examined him with too-sharp eyes, and his smile grew sly. "I see. 'He' did, did he?"

At Kangwon's long look, he laughed lightly. "Don't worry. Your secret's safe with me. Probably."

"Reassuring."

The Chinese man gave him another laughing smile, then dropped his gaze to his arm, where the blood was working its way through the tube.

Kangwon really hoped that wasn't going to come back to bite him. But there wasn't really anything he could do to make sure of that.

He watched China's blood with him in silence for a couple minutes. The fluid glistened in the tubing, slowly filling the clear bag, swelling it like a ripening fruit. The bright crimson liquid didn't look any different than human blood.

But it was.

Kangwon chewed on the idea. Yeah, it was time. It should've been awhile ago, honestly.

"Can I ask you something?"

"You can ask." China looked back over at him, still smiling. "I can't guarantee I'll answer."

"Do you know about…" How to put it? "What our blood can do to our soldiers? Well, our people in general."

"That depends," China airily returned. "Do you?"

Kangwon gave him a wry smile. "I am asking. But yeah."

He'd performed a few blood transfusions on the members of Korea's Army back during the Occupation, men and women that needed emergency treatment and either couldn't wait for a hospital or couldn't be sent to one. That was how Kangwon had learned he, Korea, and his cousins were universal donors, along with every other Countryhuman and Provincehuman, presumably.

He'd also started developing a theory with Hwang, which hadn't been confirmed until they'd merged up with the KPRA, and Kangwon had started having to do transfusions more often.

"Our blood energizes people," he said to China.

It couldn't cure them or even speed up their healing to a Countryhuman's pace. But it revitalized them. It gave them just enough energy to pull them back from the edge so that they could eat or drink, or receive treatment that could save them, like he'd done with some of the more severe dysentery cases back in the American POW camp. Like he'd just passed over Oh Tu-hun to do with Kim Do-bom.

"I had figured you knew." China nodded to his arm, and the many track marks that covered it from elbow to wrist under his coat.

Kangwon sheepishly rubbed at them, tugging his sleeve farther down, even though they were already hidden.

He'd figured China had known, too. It might not mean anything if he'd just donated blood a few times, but he did it a lot, for their people and his. And every time Kangwon drew it, his eyes always looked amused, like he was laughing at an inside joke the province didn't know he was part of.

And the fact it was Korea he'd made the offer to give his blood to 'whoever needs it' made it feel weightier than if he'd gone to Kangwon first.

"It's not just transfusions, you know," their comrade said with a secret smile. "It works if they drink it, too."

Kangwon blinked. He hadn't known that. Of course, him and his cousins didn't go around feeding their blood to people.

"Not as well," China added, in the tone of voice someone normal might've explained traditional medicine in. "But it does work."

That was… just a bit disturbing. He guessed it made some sense. But it was still disturbing.

"How do you know that?"

China hummed disinterestedly. "That's a long, arduous story that I don't feel like telling. But tell me something- does CCCP know about this?"

Kangwon nodded.

He'd asked Korea if he could bring it up with the Soviet, wanting to know how universal the knowledge was, thrilled they could've possibly made a new discovery that could save more lives around the world. He'd had to wait until CCCP had withdrawn his troops after their official establishment, like he'd promised, but after, he'd been given the grudging go-ahead.

"He knows. He found out during his civil war."

Like them, the Bolsheviks had been working with limited equipment and high casualties. Sometimes the only one uninjured enough to give blood was an oblast, republic, or Countryhuman.

"He told me not to tell anyone else, though."

China nodded sagely. "Not every subdivision is with their country willingly, and not every Countryhuman has the freedom we do. I suppose if certain types of people heard that the blood of near-immortal creatures could rejuvenate them, they might start to wonder what else they could do with it."

"That was pretty much what he said," Kangwon confessed, not really liking being called a 'creature.' "Other Countryhumans probably feel the same way, too. Hwang had a few old medical textbooks from around the world, and a couple newer ones, and none of the sections about us mention it."

"If the other Countryhumans even know," China pointed out. "Do you think the mighty Ming or Joseon would have ever freely given their 'holy' blood to their people? Could you picture America doing it?"

Kangwon tried to imagine the American with his cold dog-grin cutting his arm and shoving the shunt of an IV into it, inserting the other end into the vein of a soldier whose face had gone pale from blood loss, and couldn't.

"No," he admitted.

"Neither can I." The Chinese man drummed his long fingers on his thigh, watching his blood flow out of him. "Though I suppose at least some of them had to have known. Places where they're into blood sacrifice and such. And my own ancestors had an interest in alchemy. But we could be the first to bring it to the world's attention."

"I'd rather not," Kangwon said. He hadn't even been thinking of stuff like that before he'd spoken to CCCP, but after he had, he'd very quickly changed his mind. "Not while there are places like Puerto Rico out there."

He couldn't imagine what Japan would have done to the Provincehumans he'd held- SH, South Chungcheong, the Jeollas, Hwang, Gyeonggi, Hae or even Korea and South- if he had known. How much of their blood would have been drained for the sickly Yoshihito or given to people like Ishii Shiro for sick experiments to make Japanese soldiers stronger? Kangwon didn't think their blood could do that, but CCCP had been right- someone would try.

“I suppose you’re right,” China agreed easily. “Once imperialism is no more, and we’re all as free as a lóng, then we can start unlocking the secrets of immortality.”

He smiled, making Kangwon chuckle. “Maybe let’s start with self-sufficiency first.”

“I like to think big.” The Chinese country tapped his chin with a finger. “I think our ancestors’ penchant for making our people regard themselves as divines is boring, but when the alternative to being worshipped as a deity is being cannibalized, I suppose I can understand why they did what they did.”

Kangwon propped his chin up on his fist. “What would you choose?”

It was kind of an odd question, but he was still trying to figure out how China worked.

The other man smiled slyly. “What would your Korea choose?”

Kangwon shrugged, though he knew. “You’d have to ask him when he wakes up. I wouldn’t, though.”

“En, I think that’s the kind of question that could end up with me being hurt.” He sighed dramatically. “Your Countryhuman is a very prickly man.”

Kangwon bit back a smile, unable to agree.

China tilted his head. “But since you told me about this, even though you don’t want it getting spread around, can I take that as meaning you trust me not to? Or to not experiment on my own provinces?" He smiled slyly. “Or does that mean someone else trusts me?”

Kangwon had been forbidden to tell him for awhile. But before he’d gone into his recuperative coma, Korea’d finally said that he could. Ordered him, actually.

‘Not that he couldn’t’ve done it himself at some point.’

He dipped his head to China, pulling an SH. “Your donations mean a lot to us. Especially since we both know how important they are.”

The man smiled, less menacingly than some of the others he’d given him today. “My Little Sisters and I are only returning the favour. Your blood was flowing in my soldiers’ veins for months beforehand, after all.”

That was true.

China’s smile didn’t change, but his eyes almost seemed to soften. “But Korea’s donations are also appreciated, as is every offer of generosity.”

He reached out, thumb caressing over the plastic tubing his blood was flowing through.

“Especially when China knows what it means.”

Kangwon let him muse in silence until the bag was full, then removed the IV from his arm, patting it clean again, and sticking a piece of medical tape over the puncture.

China held his arm out, his pout as petulant as his voice. “You’re not going to kiss it better?”

“Still not answering that, like the other three times.”

“Shame,” the other man said normally, rolling his sleeve down.

When he made jokes like that, it made Kangwon sort of… not really nervous. But they felt a little too pointed. Even though there was no way China could know.

Putting that aside as he put away the IV and got the blood ready for transfer, he asked, “You seem to know a lot of things you probably shouldn’t.”

“Definitely shouldn’t,” China agreed smoothly.

“Do you know where any of the blood we’ve donated to your soldiers ended up? Or where yours did?” Kangwon turned back to him, bag of life-saving fluid held carefully in his hands.

It was warm, like a crimson apple that had ripened in the sun until being picked at the perfect moment.

“You’re asking if the effects work on people that aren’t ours?” China tipped his head, smiling. “They do. Make of that what you will.”

‘Huh.’ Interesting.

China stood, stretching lazily. “Now let’s get you back to that stuffy Quarantine Hospital. You have a life to save, don’t you?”

Kangwon cradled the blood to his chest. “To try, at least.”

“I’m sure you’ll succeed.” As he passed him, China tweaked his cheek. “Clever little doctor.”

The province rubbed his face. Yeah. Still not a fan of that.

Thanks to the wonders of the Willys MB Jeep (and China seizing control of the wheel to speed), Kangwon didn’t have to do much to make sure the blood would be safe on the trip (besides firmly hold the frame of the vehicle so he wouldn't fall out with it).

“Thanks for the ride,” he said, hopping out at the entrance. China had insisted on getting as close as possible. “And the blood. I’ll talk to you later, comrade.”

He took a few steps away, then turned back, hesitating. China watched him patiently from the driver’s seat while he gestured his guards away to their usual posts on the hills flanking the hospital.

When they were out of hearing range, Kangwon lowered his voice. “Hey, do you think you could…” He almost bit his nail, but whisked it away in time. “Could you not tell Korea that drinking our blood affects people, too?”

China regarded him thoughtfully. “Are you asking me to lie to your country?”

“No,” Kangwon said, still feeling guilty. “You weren’t lying before.

You just didn't mention it to him. Just… keep not mentioning it. Please."

"Hmmmm," their comrade hummed in exaggerated thought, then lifted a single shoulder. "Alright. I suppose I'll keep not mentioning it. But only because I like you both so much."

"Thanks." Kangwon sighed in relief, padding away into to the cool depths of the hospital, hopefully to push Oh Tu-hun back from the edge.

He loved Korea, he really did. More than anyone.

But his Countryhuman was a hypocrite at his core. As much as he told Kangwon not to overdo it with the blood transfusions, the province knew that the only thing that kept him from draining his own blood dry for their hospitals was the time it took, time that he felt could be better spent elsewhere, seeking freedom so that their people wouldn't need the blood.

Kangwon really wished he could do something about that, but unfortunately, he was pretty certain Korea was aware that he was a hypocrite, which meant bringing it to his attention never worked. And he couldn't form a united front with his cousins because most of them had either accepted it as a lost cause or overlooked it, since his hypocrisy was always the selfless type.

But just because Korea was being selfless didn't mean that was always a good thing. There was a middle ground that Kangwon was probably never going to be able to get him to set foot on. And because of that, he didn't want his Countryhuman becoming aware of the ease of slitting your arm and pouring your blood straight into someone's mouth to help them that China had claimed.

After all, if it came to being worshipped or devoured, Kangwon knew which one Korea would choose.

Finally, the blood reveal I have been skirting around for over a hundred chapters!

It's basically as Kangwon says- Countryhuman blood can't magically heal people, but it does revitalize them for a bit. Modern day, because blood drives are popular and it's good publicity to donate blood, pretty much everyone knows countries/provinces/etcetera are universal donors. But because the blood isn't tracked (it's marked as O- and allowed to disappear intentionally because some people would definitely be weird about Countryhuman blood), no one knows about the revitalization effect. Most Countryhumans likely also aren't aware of this because outside of those drives, most wouldn't just give their blood to a human. The only ones who know for sure are a handful of Socialist countries, because they fought side by side with their people, and also have the mindset of 'everything for the people,' so they aren't adverse to sharing blood with a 'commoner.' North and China, their provinces (though it might only be two (now one) of China's, who knows), CCCP (now gone), Cuba, Vietnam, and Laos (told by Vietnam). These are the people who know for sure, and are aware that each other know. As far as they know, they are the first countries to ever discover this. There might have been or might be others in the world who are aware, but it's difficult to know for sure. The above people barely talk about it with each other, let alone non-Socialists. CCCP's children were never told. The Southern provinces haven't told South because they know it would get back to America.

During the war against Japan, many guerrillas that fought with the Koreans were aware of what the blood they were given did because Kangwon wasn't thinking about secrecy back then, but modern day the only human that knows is the President of State Affairs (because North is a tiiiny bit overprotective and has no other way to convince him to have a blood transfusion for a simple cold, or consent to one for his children (it's not actually a choice). North and the provinces donate frequently, but like in other countries, no one is told it's their blood. Kangwon just makes sure it's marked for use in severe cases, or handles transfusions himself. In practice, many nurses and doctors likely have at least suspicions about oddly-labelled blood, Kangwon advising transfusions for cases that usually shouldn't require one, and the patients' reactions once it's given. But it’s only ever talked about quietly, and no one ever asks. It works. For a healthcare worker, that’s often all that matters.

There are hints scattered throughout the story about the event that is the reason why China knows feeding their blood to people works, too. He's actually fed it to someone half-on page. If you're ever rereading, keep that in mind and tell me if you spot it. ^^

Because I have been researching so many illnesses, and because I have a VPN, ads think I am 1) in at least seven different countries, and 2) dying of multiple diseases, one of which has been eradicated. Every ad I have seen for the last week is for health insurance, and most of them are in a different language.

Saving Face

South Pyongan was back in Pyongyang, in the General's underground office for the first time, even taking off her mask so he'd see her face and know she meant business.

And she'd brought out the big gun.

"Thank you for taking time to meet with us, Comrade General." SH dipped her head to him as he sat back at his desk.

"Just comrade, please," he said, not for the first time. But SH was a stickler for politeness, so she wouldn't listen.

South Pyongan actually never really knew what to call him in private now. Calling him 'Chairman Kim' was weird when she wasn't in the Party (and Korea didn't like them calling him so casually by just his last name), 'Premier Kim' had the same problem and felt too stuffy and formal, 'Supreme Commander' and 'General' felt like she was waiting for an order, and unlike her brother and some cousins, she didn't like using people's full names every time she addressed them. Too polite.

Yeah, calling him 'comrade' would solve her issues, and she'd used to call him that during the war against Japan. But now it felt like if she used it too much, he'd start asking why she didn't just join the Worker's Party, too.

She usually settled for 'Ya.' Just not in front of others and never in front of Korea.

"Ya." She barged past SH to smack a hand on his desk. "We got that message about holding secret talks so the Yankees don't have to face up to killing our guys. What gives?"

Her cousin fluttered nervously, pulling her arm off the desk.

"What Comrade South Pyongan means," she began with an apologetic smile. "Is we reviewed the message we were sent, and we have some concerns about the idea of dropping the inquiry into the Geoje Island massacres, and entering secret sessions. It seems unfair to our comrades in the camps to allow the miguk-n- Americans to force us into silence on what's happening to them."

"They killed our guys." South Pyongan broke free from her cousin's grip to smack her hand on the desk again. "Like two hundred of 'em back in February, and now they're giving the traitors guns and letting them mow them down like caged animals!"

"And it's obvious that has to be just what happened," SH said, trying to pry her arm away again. "And there's probably more they want to hide. Otherwise they wouldn't want to talk in secret all of a sudden."

With a noise, she finally yanked South Pyongan back, linking arms tightly with her so she couldn't attack his desk again.

She smiled politely at him. "We aren't saying the decision made by our comrades is wrong, but after all the enemy has done, we can't help but think it's unfair to their victims to give up on seeking answers just to allow the enemy to save face."

"Yeah." South Pyongan crossed her arms, making her cousin adjust her grip. "All of that."

See, this was why she'd brought her. Without SH she'd probably just kick over Korea's desk in the corner and punch a hole in the (concrete) wall.

"South Hamgyong-do and South Pyongan-do just wanted to get clarification on the decision." SH bowed her head.

"Of course." The General dipped his back. "It is why you were notified. If it were up to me, you would have been involved in making it. We would all prefer to have our provinces involved directly in the war talks."

He didn't say why they weren't, but they already knew anyway. Korea and his paranoia about the Commands.

"It would be an injustice to let the enemy get away with their inhumane crimes simply so they can save face," the man admitted.

"So why are we letting them!?" South Pyongan burst out, feeling SH squeeze her bicep.

"Because it isn't about saving their face," the General said, not even blinking at her raised tone. "It is about saving our comrades. Does it reflect poorly on us to overlook the atrocities in the enemy camps in an attempt to achieve an armistice? Yes. We seem desperate to sign. We lose face ourselves."

South Pyongan grit her teeth. She hated to think of that Yankee lounging down in Seoul or Busan or wherever, smirking to himself, so sure they were weakening when they weren't.

"But our concerns aren't with face," the man continued. "They are with winning this war and putting an end to the hardship our people are being made to go through."

"But we aren't winning," South Pyongan snapped in frustration. "We're signing an armistice and letting them get away with all the shit they've done. We're letting Korea stay Divided!"

SH nails sank into her arm.

Oops. Maybe she shouldn't have said that out loud.

But it was true. The Yanks had talked about three months after the armistice was signed to pull out foreign troops and 'settle the Korean question,' but they'd also talked about thirty days until an armistice in November, a few weeks until one in July and October. Three months could be nine months, or three years, or-

And it didn't matter. It shouldn't be up to the Yanks. Their country should be up to them. They didn't need three months to decide to kick all the foreigners out. They wanted them out now. There was no 'Korean question.' They weren't one of Hwang's equations to be solved. There was only one question when it came to Korea, and that was 'Should they be Reunified?' And it was up to them to solve, and everyone, even the worst nation-traitor alive, agreed that the answer was fucking 'Yes.'

"It isn't a military victory," the General said, not flinching at her words. "But signing an armistice is a win. The enemy has been made to understand that they can't destroy us outright. The Korean people's fighting spirit overcame them. This is why they resort to their tricks."

It was like what her brother had said before she'd convinced him to vote against the ceasefire last year. But who'd been right? Her. The Yank had been scheming, he had used the time the talks gave to bring in more bastards, he had just flattened more villages, made up more lies, dropped more bombs and germs.

"But we will not fall to them." Kim Il-sung stood, and damn if South Pyongan hadn't almost forgotten he was taller than her. "We will force them into peace, and then we will bring to light their crimes."

He picked a paper off his desk, handing it to SH, who read it over.

"Someone escaped from Geoje Island," she said in surprise.

South Pyongan leaned over, skimming the typed report, catching words like 'beatings' and 'forced to renounce' before her brain prickled too much to keep reading.

"He says he was beaten, and the reactionary prisoners forced him to sign their blood petition to not be sent back to the north." SH's words dripped with a venom South Pyongan usually only heard when she was talking about her brother.

"A handful of prisoners have managed to escape," their General informed them. "They made their way through gruelling hardships to return to us and tell their stories of the barbarities they were made to suffer. But thousands more remain."

The news only made South Pyongan's blood burn hotter. "And we need to free them."

"We will," he said. "And then their stories will be told."

SH paused, setting the testimony back on the desk. "We drop the massacres for now, sign a ceasefire, get our soldiers back, and then we have eyewitness testimony on everything the Yan- Americans have done."

There was a faint smile on the General's face. "Five men may be dismissed. Five hundred are less easily."

"Or women," SH said grimly, and his smile faded.

"Yes," he said heavily.

SH's hold on South Pyongan tightened hard enough to hurt (someone else, not her). She squeezed back awkwardly.

Yeah, from everything they'd seen, and the shit she'd heard... She would not want to be a regular chick in a Yankee camp.

"To the Americans, we lose face instead of them," the General said. "They get to say that in our inability to continue the war, we grow desperate to end it, even putting aside the well-being of our own comrades. But the freedom-loving peoples of the world understand that we only want peace, and are sacrificing justice to win it." His eyes narrowed, just a little bit. "And we understand that the sacrifice is only temporary."

South Pyongan's gloves creaked as her knuckles tightened, Chagang's words from that same vote creeping in.

'The Korean people want peace. That is what we have been fighting for since the beginning.'

'The beginning.' Even before he'd been separated from her brother. And how many people had they lost fighting for that peace, people they'd never been able to avenge? How many people had they lost now?

"I suppose it would make investigating the germ warfare easier, too," SH mused. "If we aren't dealing with more active cases, and if our scientists and the Chinese Commission could work without all the interruptions from bombs, then maybe we'd be able to get enough proof to get justice for that, too."

But even she sounded reluctant.

Unable to help herself, South Pyongan burst out, "But it isn't justice! It wouldn't be justice! Even if they got charged or some shit, they'd get what? A few years in prison? And do you really think the Yank would let them serve their full sentence?"

Liaotung and Liaoxi had told them about the Jap scientists in America's hands. According to them, there was even a rumour that the bastards weren't even getting prosecuted, let alone executed.

"He sent Ishii Shiro to our country." South Pyongan pounded on the desk with her free hand. "And that pretty boy said he sent him again a few days ago. That bastard tortured thousands of our people, hundreds of thousands of Chinese, cut them into pieces in his sick fucking experiments and he's still walking around free and clear. Do you really think they'd lock up their own pasty fuckers? "

"Language," SH said tightly, even though South Pyongan's arm was wet where her nails had drawn blood through her suit.

"Even if they do, it isn't going to be enough!" South Pyongan cried, the desk shuddering as she pounded it again, then again. "Those bastards don't deserve a slap on the wrist or a few years in a cell! They deserve to die!

This wasn't like the idiot reactionaries that'd been tricked into fighting for Rhee, or the landlords that were cruel because of what they were, not who they were. These weren't people they could re-educate into upstanding citizens that loved their country and their people.

These were the bastards dropping plague on them, raping their women by the thousands, destroying their homes, starving them, arming Rhee's nation-traitors so they could slaughter hundreds of thousands of civilians, locking their people in cages and torturing them just like the Japs had.

The Japanese had never been punished for it. Japan had never been punished for it. He hadn't died in those bomb blasts, the scientists and doctors and war generals and soldiers hadn't either.

Fucking Hirohito was still alive, still the damn Emperor, even if he had a string around his shoulders. Japan was still there, the one responsible for all of it, the one that had annexed their country, torn down their palaces, taken away their names and culture. He was still alive, they were still alive, living the lives that they still weren't letting her people live.

And the exact same thing was going to happen to the Yanks. They were the reason this war was going on two years, they were the reason it'd started in the first place, all because they wanted to get one over on CCCP, because they had beef with a country that wasn't even Korea and couldn't stand them being independent, not another Yankee colony. And when they were finally forced to sign the armistice, they were just going to be able to walk away, leaving Korea to clean up the mess.

There was no re-educating the Yankee bastards. And even if there was, America would never do it because his soldiers and politicians were already doing exactly what he wanted.

"They should die," she fiercely decreed again, and SH let go of her arm so she could slam her palms down on the desk, unable to do anything else to get rid of the churning fury inside her.

"They should," her cousin agreed, and her voice was quiet, but simmering with a rage she'd never heard from her.

And even if they did, even if every single Yankee general and soldier responsible for ruining their country was executed by firing squad, America would still be out there. The one behind it all, the one puppeteering Korea's brother against him, would just get away with it.

Kim Il-sung looked at them both with dark eyes. He didn't give them some bullshit about how death wasn't always the worse suffering or justice didn't need to always be violent. He'd fought the Japs for damn near his entire life, and so had his father, and just like them, he'd had to watch the worst ones, the ones that deserved to die more than anyone else, get away.

"Sometimes we give up the right of true justice so that we don't need to seek more of it."

South Pyongan bared her teeth, lowering her head as her nails scraped at the hardwood.

If the war had ended when it should have, her tank crew wouldn't have died. If it ended now, thousands of their people in the camps might live. Their testimonies wouldn't be enough for the miguk-nom to be executed, but they would have their testimonies, they would have them.

Because they would be alive.

'We're getting married!'

South Pyongan squeezed her eyes shut, thumping her fist on the desk one last time, then spinning away. *"Damm*it."

The other two were silent. SH was staring at a painting on the wall above Korea's desk, one of hers, it looked like. That bird she'd painted after Liberation. She swore she could feel the dark energy coming off her, choking the room, a heavy shadow looming over them.

Or maybe South Pyongan was just projecting how pissed she was.

Her cousin didn't say anything about the General's words when she finally turned her head back to him. She just asked quietly, "And why aren't we waking Korea up for his approval?"

South Pyongan paused, looking over her shoulder. SH's face was neutral, but her eyes were narrowed and burning.

Was she... thinking about waking him up so he'd fight the decision?

The General sighed, sitting back down in his chair. "I've spoken with him about this before. In case Comrade Korea is absent for whatever reason, I have standing orders to do whatever it takes to get a ceasefire."

"He wanted to be woken up if anything happened," SH said, her voice icy. "But Kangwon says you told him not to."

The General gave a tired smile. "Of course. Our Countryhuman's criticism of me won't be so harsh."

SH looked like she'd put something together, and after a sec, South Pyongan did, too.

'Sly bastard.' It was definitely true that Korea would never go off on one of their people the way he did on them, let alone the General.

"It is my decision to let our comrade recover properly from his illness, and to move ahead on these talks without him, and mine alone," the man said, hands clasped on his abused desk. "We will work it out between us after he's rested."

He cut his eyes to SH. "Comrade South Hamgyong doesn't want to take this deal."

SH hunched, even though she was doing a really bad job at hiding it. "I just don't want..." Her fists balled at her sides.

"If we woke Comrade Korea up right now, what do you think he would say?" the General asked, not harshly. "Would he accept the secret talks for the chance that the enemy would finally settle the prisoner of war issue and sign a peace? Or would he reject it?"

SH's lips pressed together.

"He'd take it," South Pyongan said, and her cousin whipped her head around to her. "What? He would."

'I think every single person who has ever harmed any of our people for any reason should be lined up against the wall and have a bullet put through their skull. Landlords, capitalists, the Japanese, the Americans- I want them all dead.

'But we can't.'

"He wouldn't like it," she said. She didn't like it. "But he would."

This wasn't exactly the Party line. But it was the line their people needed. Peace.

Even if it kept him apart from his loser brother a little longer. Three months or three years, she knew he wouldn't let it be for good.

She could tell SH admitted it to herself when she swung her head away, closing her eyes. They did that freaky thing they did where they flickered really fast under her purple-stained eyelids.

Then she went limp.

"Yes," she quietly agreed. "He would take it. He would have to."

The General dipped his head. "And then it would become his decision."

"And he'd feel guilty about it, like always." SH hid her face behind her hand, holding it there.

The man didn't confirm or deny it. He just blinked slowly.

South Pyongan guessed he'd been freaked out by the way Korea had been acting after the Fifth Phase Offensive failure and accepting the peace talks in the first place, too. He probably didn't want him to start getting weird again either.

She got it now. All of it. She hated that she got it. But she did.

Korea would stay asleep. And they'd enter secret sessions with the Yankees, and let them save face for what they'd done to their comrades.

For now.

SH thanked the General, dipping her head, subdued as she headed for the door. South Pyongan told her she'd catch up, lingering.

"Hey," she said when she was alone with the man, totally not awkwardly. "Sorry for yelling at you."

She hated apologizing, but it was always smart to stay on good footing with the people running your country. If they weren't losers, anyway.

"If you or our comrades ever take issue with any of Supreme Command's decisions, you should always voice them," he replied. "Even if you can't participate in the initial discussions for now, our Comrade Provinces' input does still matter." The corners of his lips twitched. "And I appreciate my birth province's passion."

South Pyongan bobbed her head, pursing her lips. "Sooooo does that mean you won't tell Korea about this?"

Definitely smiling now, he said, "I don't see any reason to."

Hm. She'd been wondering if she should ask him if he approved of her entrepreneurial idea, so if Korea busted her, she could be like 'Well, the General said I could.' But maybe not. Even if he did, he was already covering for Kangwon, so she didn't want to cause any other issues with him and Korea. Or cause any issues with her and Korea if he found out she'd made the guy an accessory to... crime? Cronyism, maybe? Tiptoeing around the edges of it at least.

And she'd already decided to do it, so if he didn't approve, she'd be going behind their Premier's back. Not the best thing to do when they were supposed to be a united front.

She wondered if he would approve. Did he agree with Korea's 'skirting the law' thing? Did he know he wanted her to play dirty against the enemies in their ranks? Had he maybe suggested it?

Even though she was Kim Il-sung's birth province, and she'd known Korea longer than anyone but Kangwon, she didn't know how much they shared any more than the others. And she... wasn't a fan of that.

"Thanks," she said to him, pulling a gauze-wrapped box out of her bag before she forgot. "And tell Jong-il and Kyong-hui their favourite province says hey."

"Bribing my children," the General noted when he saw the sticks of sweet potato yeot inside that she'd bought from Completely Reasonable Prices Kim at a completely reasonably-priced discount.

"Noooo, never," South Pyongan denied, totally trying to bribe his children. She turned to head out.

"One more thing."

She looked back over at him, and he smiled.

"I'm grateful my birth province has learned not only when to show passion, but when to show restraint."

The words sort of sounded like they meant more than they did. She narrowed her eyes, that niggling thought that plagued her every time she had any sort of private talk with him coming back. It wasn't an anxiety because she didn't get anxious. But it was uncomfortable.

Just how much did Korea tell him? Had he told him about the beach? Did he know about the farmer whose head she'd bashed in just for being a greedy idiot?

His little mysterious smile didn't tell her crap.

"That's South Pyongan province," she said casually. "Always knowing what's best."

He kept smiling at her, and with one last suspicious look, she joined SH in the tunnel.

Her cousin was standing still, her eyes doing the flickering thing again. She didn't even seem like she'd heard the door open, and jumped when the other province slapped a hand on her shoulder.

"You good?"

SH nodded, smiling. The edges of her lips were tight. "Just... mad. I know it's right, but..."

"Yeah, no arguments here." If she thought about it too hard, she'd get worked up again. "Thanks for coming with. Even if we didn't end up leading a charge."

"Of course."

Her cousin's hands were still balled tight, blood welling up between her fingers.

She had even more personal beef with the Yank Supreme than South Pyongan had. The idea of him getting away with everything he'd done to them probably pissed her off even more than her. Which was sort of an unimaginable level of pissed.

She liked it. Her cousin had always been a word swallower, holding crap back to be polite or ‘ladylike’ or something. South Pyongan was pleased she’d been a little more open about when she was ticked off lately, like just now. Her big gun was getting a little more firepower.

'Still keeps trying to deep-clean the bunker, though.'

"Sorry," SH said, exhaling as she smoothed her tunic down, leaving a smear of blood at the hem. "I'm alright. Really."

"Want to punch a wall?" South Pyongan asked, gesturing towards the nearest one. "It might make you feel better."

SH eyed the white-plaster like she was actually tempted, making the Pyongan perk up, excited to see it.

Then some wrecker (emotionally, not politically) came around the corner carrying a telegram, and she tore her eyes away, shaking her head.

"I probably shouldn't break my hands when I have publicity pieces to work on."

South Pyongan sighed. "True. Come on. Let's go to the hospital and get our blood results."

"My ones from yesterday were-"

"Disease waits for no province!" South Pyongan wrapped an arm around her (her blood results yesterday had been clear), putting on her blindfold one-handed as she whistled for her bodyguards, who were just around the corner.

As they escorted them out of the complex, she tried to swagger as much as she could with her vision gone, like she wasn't bothered at all that they were giving the Yankees a chance to save face, like she knew their faces were so ugly there was no saving them.

There wasn't. America might escape what was coming to him now, but he couldn't forever. She knew her and SH weren't the only ones with grudges. She knew every single one of their guys that came back from the camps beaten and bruised, every woman that had to deal with a bastard she hadn't wanted to, and every single person that had to suffer through one of the Yank's diseases or watch their family suffer through them would want justice for it, just like they wanted justice from Japan. Korea would want justice for it.

And they would fucking get it.

—

Kangwon held the jar of water in his gloved hands, holding it up to the light, watching as the movement made the tiny bodies inside spin. Dozens of dead fleas swirled around, colliding into each other to form one thick, dark mass of glistening plates before disintegrating.

He held the magnifying glass up to his eye, squinting. He'd tried hard to make sure the glass container he'd poured the contents of the clay jar into remained clean, but even the distortion of clear glass made it hard to see.

But as one flea floated up to the surface of the water, and the light caught its flat body, he thought he could see a dark clot inside its gut.

"Comrade Kangwon?" Choi Ryong-so- chairman of the Kumsong-ri Epidemic Prevention Committee- prompted in a tone that said he was prepared for the worst.

The province set the jar down carefully next to the well, turning to him and the rest of the Kangso County and Kumsong-ri Epidemic Prevention Corps.

"Can't tell for sure," he said, not voicing his concerns. "We'll take a few back to the lab. Burn the rest."

The Epidemic Prevention Corps moved in to start separating a few fleas from the jar for testing, and give the area around the well another thorough search before moving on to burning the rest. They'd start around the epicentre, then spread out.

"Start directing the sanitation efforts," Kangwon ordered Choi Ryong-so. "And tell everyone in the upper village to keep an eye out for rats or cats even after they're carried out. Kill them and burn the bodies, and always take precautions when handling them. And make sure everyone knows not to eat them, no matter how hungry they are."

You shouldn't be able to catch the plague from eating an animal infected with it, just from the bite of a flea. But if one crawled off while the rodent was being cleaned, or contaminated fluids got into the cook's mouth, that'd be bad.

A few of the Kumsong-ri People's Committee members looked offended at the idea them or their neighbours would eat rats, but Kangwon wasn't taking chances. He'd eaten them before he knew how many diseases they carried, and Hae had eaten that raw clam. When people were starving, anything looked good.

Thankfully, Choi Ryong-su took it seriously, his square jaw set as he pressed his fist to his chest.

The epidemics had taught Kangwon that the best way to give health or hygiene instructions was to assume your patient was as dumb as possible, even when you knew they weren't. It made it so you wouldn't overlook instructions that were just common sense to you. The same thing applied to making sure your village was healthy and properly cleaned- you couldn't have too much respect for your neighbours. The chairman looked like he got that.

Kangwon left as the investigation began in earnest, traipsing across the sprouting grass of the field for the residential district, several dozen metres away from the well that served it. A man stood behind a simple chosonjip, wringing his hands as he watched the sanitation team spread out, and the Village People's Committee head off to muster the villagers into joining.

"What's it look like?" Pak Yun-ho asked as he approached.

He was young, twenty-six from the briefing Kangwon had got on the way here, and a peasant.

"We won't know until we get the results back," Kangwon told him. "We're just taking precautions for now. Would you mind telling me what happened? You don't need to be as detailed as you were with the investigators."

He'd been interviewed before Kangwon got here, and he'd already got the basics. He could read the full transcripts later. Right now he wanted it from the source.

"Not much to say," Pak said, his eyes flicking over Kangwon's shoulder. "I woke up last night around four to an American deathbird circling low."

The word choice made Kangwon wonder if South Pyongan was spreading her language through her province during her many visits. Kangso County was just east of Nampo, next to the main highway.

Which was why it made a good target.

"I laid awake, and it flew off eventually," Pak told him. "But I couldn't get back to sleep. So I got up around six, just as it was starting to get light, and went to wash up at the well." He gestured to the low ring of stone. "I'd left a full jar there last night so I wouldn't have to go to the trouble of drawing up more, but when I went to dip my hands in, I notice something floating on the surface. A bunch of black specks. When I realized they were fleas-"

He curled his lip with an instinctive revulsion, and Kangwon nodded in sympathy. He'd never had a problem with bugs before this (he actually thought they were neat), but a lot of people did. NJ had always looked a little sick whenever Gyeong would show her a beetle he'd caught.

Pak shuddered, shaking the thought away as he glanced over to where the investigators were combing over every inch of ground. "Anyway, I decided I didn't need to wash my face, after all. When I got back to the house, my neighbour, Song Chang-won- I think the Epidemic guys are interviewing him right now- was there. He'd wanted to talk farm, but I dragged him over to take a look, and make sure I wasn't seeing things. He's the one who brought up the plane the night before, and once we realized the Americans had probably left them there, we went right away to tell the People's Committee."

Kangwon nodded. "Good job. Can you remember if you saw any fleas on the ground around the well? Or were they just in the jar?"

Pak shook his head. "It was too dark to see at first. But I didn't spot any when the sun came up."

Kangwon and the others hadn't seen any either before he'd disturbed the scene.

"Did you hear any detonations last night?" he followed up. "Or anything weird?"

The man thought, which meant he wasn't just thoughtlessly repeating what he'd said to the investigators earlier.

"No," he said eventually. "I really can't remember anything but the plane. I wasn't too worried, since they're so damn- 'scuse the language- so common, so I wasn't paying close attention. But Mr. Song says he didn't hear anything, either. And he'd woken up at the sound of it, too."

Kangwon nodded, his fingers twitching.

They'd interview more villagers to find out who'd all woken up when the plane arrived to see if any of them had heard even a pop.

But considering there didn't seem to be any containers around, even China's 'eggshell' types, it wasn't looking good. Especially since fleas were hardy enough they didn't need a silk parachute to drift them down.

The Americans had probably been aiming for the well, which was why they'd circled low overhead for so long. Maybe they'd seen the outline of it, or the glint of moonlight off the water in the jar. It wasn't like they could precision-bomb a container that was barely fifty centimetres across, so they'd probably resorted to spraying, which would be easier from the low altitude, and using sturdy insects. Which meant the fleas in the water were just the ones that'd been unlucky enough to land in it and drown.

Which meant the rest were still out there.

Kangwon lowered his brows, his voice getting more serious to show this was important. "Comrade Pak. Think carefully- did any of them bite you? Are there any itchy spots or bumps on your body that weren't there before?"

The young man subconsciously ran his hands over the legs of his grey trousers and padded white shirt.

"I didn't feel any take a bite," he said. "And nothing itches."

"That's good," Kangwon said, even though he wasn't relieved.

Flea bites didn't always sting. He'd pet stray cats before, and hadn't realized a flea had snagged onto him and was drinking his blood until a street over. Animal fleas were different than human fleas, but not functionally. They also didn't always leave marks.

He still advised, "If that changes, go to the Epidemic Prevention Committee right away. Same if you have any of these symptoms."

He wrote down the common ones for bubonic plague in the notebook he'd requisitioned for his investigations, flipping through pages of patient names, eyewitness sightings of enemy planes dropping non-explosive materials, and a rough map of the northern half of Korea with symbols to mark which outbreaks were where.

He hoped he wouldn't have to add the plague triangle to Kumsong-ri after this.

Carefully, he tore the corner of the page off and handed it to the man.

"Headaches, weakness, fever, muscle pain, chills," he recited, and there was a proud tinge to his voice that made Kangwon think he was one of the peasants that'd only learned to read recently with the literacy program.

He nodded in approval. "Other symptoms should be reported, too, but those are some of the major ones. Don't just write it off as being sore from work, and hope it'll go away."

The man hesitated as he folded the paper. "It is sowing season. We're pretty busy."

"Being behind on sowing is better than being dead," Kangwon said firmly.

Though with how enthusiastically Hae was committing to 'The struggle for food is a struggle for the country and for victory at the front' now that she was free from house arrest, people might be tempted to think otherwise.

"You've got me there," Pak conceded, stashing the list of symptoms in his pocket. "But I do have work to get to today. Is there anything else I can help you with?"

"Just remember what I said."

As the peasant left, Kangwon looked back over at the well, the investigation team giving the area one last scan before they'd spread out the bundles of straw they had and burn them, hoping to scourge any fleas left.

The village had gotten lucky. Pak was the closest resident to the well, and he'd kept the cap on it tight. And without his jar of water being left out, they might not even know they needed to implement sanitation.

From the rows of village houses behind him, he could hear cries coming from the square as the villagers were worked up into a hygiene frenzy by the People's Committee and their Epidemic Prevention comrades, ready to protect their village.

Hopefully it'd be enough.

Kangwon exhaled, then went to grab the fleas.

He didn't stick around for the full investigation or mass sanitation movement, needing to get back to the hospital. But he volunteered to take the sample fleas with him, dropping them off at the closest lab to Pyongyang. From there they'd probably be transferred to Sinuiju. It was safer to do lab work there. The MiGs couldn't stop every fighter-bomber sneaking across the border to drop germs on China, but they could stop bombers from destroying the underground labs on this side of the border.

The bacteriologists were in a buzz, sorting and categorizing files and specimens, the few English speakers using any breaks they had to translate some of the autopsy and bacteriological results they had on hand, getting ready for the Oslo World Peace Council and the plea for an investigation.

The United Nations was still refusing to take their protest seriously, even with the Soviet Union campaigning for them. Everyone knew the best hope they had for a real investigation was at the council.

And that wasn't all. Kangwon hoped for the best in the foreign nations, but he wasn't naïve- he knew that any investigation carried out would be called fake by America. He'd say the investigators were paid off, and try to smother the final report. And a lot of the other countries, whether they were like America and Japan or just reluctant to not be 'right,' would want to let it be smothered.

Their representatives and China's weren't allowed in UN meetings. They were barely even allowed to speak the few times they were. The Republic of China was still seen as the one real China, and America was doing his best to get the world to see South the same way. They didn't have diplomats or ambassadors overseas to plead their case, only communiques sent to the UN, which could be read and thrown out, never seen by anyone else.

The Oslo Peace Council was the chance to change that. The World Peace Council had members from almost every nation, representatives from tons of parties and organizations across Europe, and even American affiliates. Kangwon didn't like to call any nation 'major' since it implied the rest of them were minor, but the Imperialist nations obviously had more pull than their colonies or former colonies. And almost all of them had people in it. People who were sympathetic to the anti-Imperialist and Socialist causes, and tended to be anti-war. Vocal people, who if they were convinced would go home and be vocal about what they'd heard, and try to convince the rest of their countrymen of what America was doing to Korea and China.

Even if their Countryhumans refused to admit they were wrong, or if they really were rotten all the way down, the way Korea's colonizers were, their people couldn't be. If enough of them heard what their homelands were part of, they would turn against the war, seek the truth, and refuse to let the report be swept under a carpet of leaf litter.

He wished Korea could go. Kangwon knew he could convince every single person in the room. He'd have them all campaigning day and night for the United Nations to acknowledge what was being done to their country before the investigation even began.

He was supposed to wake him up tomorrow, and the assembly wasn't until three days later, on the 29th. But he knew his Countryhuman wouldn't go. He'd always hated even crossing the border to China during the Occupation, so he'd definitely be against leaving the country now. And he wouldn't trust the idea of being around so many foreigners, in a country across the world, unarmed. That actually kind of sounded like his nightmare.

Kangwon wondered if when they were officially recognized by the UN, SH would have to pry him out of some dark corner like a cat to get him to go to the meetings.

As he dwelled on the upcoming council, he returned to the Quarantine Hospital, just to disinfect properly before seeing Korea, and to check on his patients.

Kim Do-bom was alright for now, even with his blood-high worn off. Kangwon had given him more yesterday. He was pretty sure they'd caught the malaria in time to stop it from becoming severe, so now he was just trying to keep his brain healthy, and hoping he wouldn't develop a permanent disability.

As he pushed open Oh Tu-hun's room, like he'd been opening every door he passed, he found it empty. Empty of its patient, anyway.

Gangwon was sitting on the neatly-made cot, head in his hands.

Kangwon knew before he looked up. His drawn expression only confirmed it.

"Did he go peacefully?" he asked heavily, sliding in and closing the door.

"No," Gangwon said, voice worn as he looked down. "He was seizing. I got here first to hold him down. I tried to hook myself up to the IV, but I was too s-slow."

"It's not your fault," Kangwon soothed. He didn't need to sign it. He knew his brother would know what he was saying. "You know he hasn't been doing well."

Encephalitis swelled the brain, putting pressure on the stem, causing symptoms like seizures, memory loss, and hallucinations. The old man had hung on for awhile, but he'd rapidly deteriorated over the last week, starting to lose his mental faculties. China's blood had given him a day of full lucidity, but after, he'd sank into his mind, forgetting who his nurses were, not even recognizing Kangwon and Gangwon.

"Even if you'd gotten the blood into him, it wouldn't've cured him," he told his brother, signing now.

Their blood could pull people back from the edge to allow them to be cured for real. But encephalitis had no cure. No matter how many transfusions they gave him, even if Kangwon had cut his wrist and drained all the blood on his body into his mouth, eventually the edge would be too close to pull him back from.

"I kn-know," Gangwon said quietly, with a deep exhale. "I know. I'm not going to let it make me spiral. I just..." He squeezed his eyes shut. "I hate this."

"Yeah," Kangwon said quietly, rubbing his back. "Me too."

He made his brother take a break, even though he didn't want to, before setting out to see Korea, subdued.

They needed that investigation. They needed to expose America. Even if the United Nations didn't do anything, maybe more eyes on Korea, more people who knew, would force the Americans to stop.

They had the proof. They had tons of it.

Houseflies should never been seen until May, let alone January. Stable flies shouldn't be until the same month. The anthomyiid flies also probably shouldn't be seen until then, and they'd never even seen its species in Korea before, just like some of the springtails and sun flies they'd found in China had never been recorded there. The locusts were early, the crickets were early, the mosquitoes were early, the human fleas shouldn't be found outside of human habitation, and the bubonic plague shouldn't be found outside its endemic zone with no chain of infection.

They had film evidence- the masses of insects when the Epidemic Prevention Committee had managed to get there in time with one of their rare cameras to record. They'd taken pictures of the fleas in the bucket and the scene as it was when they'd arrived. They had eyewitness reports and interviews, and even more captured American pilots that'd confessed. They had proof.

But they'd had proof last year, too. Not as much as this year, but enough to warrant suspicion, to warrant an international investigation.

And they hadn't gotten it. They hadn't been believed.

North Pyongan was on Korea-duty at the bunker, and he'd cooked his rations up for him- rice, like usual, but with small red berries in it. Liaoxi held a finger to her lips as Kangwon thanked them.

The Chinese woman's face was playful, but the Korean could see the sheen of sweat on her brow, even though it wasn't warm enough for it yet, and the dark patches under her eyes. She was feeling the effects of the sympathetic fever, like she'd told him a few days ago.

There wasn't anything he could do for her, just like there wasn't anything he'd been able to do for Oh Tu-hun. Or Sip Tal-sun.

Kangwon shut himself into the small, cold room with Korea, dropping to his knees next to him by the harsh white glare of his flashlight.

His Countryhuman was still tossing and turning, muttering to himself with his brows pulled in. Even after three weeks, his body hadn't given in to the recuperative coma.

But even restless sleep was better than none.

"You'd be able to convince them," Kangwon murmured, stroking a hand across his forehead as he took his temperature. The fever had broken, but he was still warm.

He knew there was no world in which his Countryhuman went to that meeting. He would if he believed it would actually do something, that some people would want to help them and actually be capable of it. He'd travel across the continents and speak to hundreds of foreigners, even if he didn't have his gun, if it would get them justice and peace.

But he didn't trust them. Even if he thought some of the people at the council would care, he wouldn't think the ones in their home countries would.

Kangwon's hand stilled on his country's brow.

As much as Korea's willingness to put himself in danger was exasperating as a doctor, it had also probably saved more lives than even Kangwon had, or at least made it so he hadn't needed to save those lives. His province wished his country's willingness to be 'devoured' wasn't so strong, but he didn't wish it didn't exist at all.

Because that was part of being a Countryhuman, wasn't it? The part that their old 'mighty' ancestors hadn't seen, or had rejected for their own sakes. If you wanted to serve your people, you had to be willing to let them devour you. You couldn't let them, but you did need to be willing.

And it was the same for a Provincehuman. Kangwon would never let himself run his body truly into the ground. Even if he gave too much, he wouldn't give more than he could. Even if he pushed himself too far, he wouldn't push himself past the edge. He couldn't, not if he wanted to keep saving people.

But he wanted to. He wanted to drain every last drop of his blood for the patients who needed it. He wanted to give up sleep and meals if it meant he'd be there for one more person, so that they wouldn't die alone on the cold floor, or wouldn't die at all. He would if he could.

If it would expose the germ warfare, if it would get justice for Oh Tu-hun, Choi Ki-tak and his family, Kim Do-bom, and every single other person affected by America's plagues, if it could end the war, Korea wouldn't hesitate to throw himself into the danger that the World Peace Council could be. The only reason he wouldn't was because he didn't think it would work.

But Kangwon did.

Korea made a low sound in his sleep, and his province pulled his hand from his brow. His fingers itched, and he busied them with feeding his Countryhuman, sliding the pale slurry of rice scattered with the blood red goji berries into his mouth, massaging his throat to make it go down, a practiced habit.

His cousins wouldn't approve. His comrades in the Health Ministry probably wouldn't approve. Gangwon...

'I'll go if you want me to.'

His brother might not approve. But he'd understand.

The Premier might not approve either, though he couldn't actually stop him. But Korea definitely wouldn't approve, and he could.

But not if he was still asleep.

He'd be mad. He was already going to be mad that Kangwon hadn't woken him up before the secret sessions started today, even with the Premier covering for him.

But maybe he could be mad while they were halfway to stopping the germ warfare, to bringing all of America's crimes to light. When the world knew for sure that biological warfare really was being used on Korea, they'd start to question the other atrocities that the Americans insisted were Communist propaganda, like the POW camp massacres, and Taejon. Maybe even as they dropped the issue here in order to get peace, the international community could take it up, and get their comrades the justice they deserved.

Kangwon knew that even if the majority of people wanted to be 'right,' they really only wanted to be good, and that was true for foreigners, too. They just had to show them that what they believed wasn't good.

It'd be hard. Their representatives had been ignored last year, and it would be even easier to ignore the doctors they were sending to the World Peace Council. But a Provincehuman would be harder to ignore.

Right now, Korea and China weren't allowed to have a voice.

Maybe Kangwon could serve as one.

'Nothing bad ever happens to the provinces!'

Michael Parenti noooooooo. >< I'm so upset. The world lost a good person. Read 'Blackshirts and Reds' and 'Inventing Reality' in his memory. And watch a Yellow Parenti speech. Actually this is a short clip. Please watch. He was really an amazing person. ㅠㅠ

https://youtu.be/eoxT1UwTM3I?si=gT8IIaZddYsHZSkd

We had a bad flea infestation in my childhood house. Amongst other things. I think this chapter maybe gave me flashbacks. But rest assured all the flea knowledge is firsthand. Sometimes you can feel when a flea bites (small sharp sting), but usually not. You just look down and your legs are coated in little black specks. (we had a BAD flea problem) And they often don't even itch or leave a mark. They just bite you, take from you, and you never know. Insult to injury. Okay yeah this definitely gave me flashbacks.

Anyway, I like to think that Comrade Kim Jong-il and South Pyongan were besties. He shows up at her Pyongsong house at midnight: 'I have an idea for a film.' South Pyongan, completely unbothered at being woke up, more excited than she's ever been: 'I want to be the lead.'
She's actually been in movies (usually playing Pyongan or the old South Pyongan in period pieces) but only while Kim Jong-il was alive. She's not actually a good actor.

Losing Heart

1915

The guards left, taking their lantern with them, and the shack was plunged into darkness again.

South was still too dazed to move, but he heard the gasp and scrabble as his brother heaved off the floor, dragging himself over to him, helping him sit.

"Are you okay?" North didn't give him a chance to answer before his hands were frantically roaming his body, searching for injuries.

His other half whimpered when he touched the side of his head, and his brother pulled his hand back like he'd been burned. South leaned into him, wrapping his arms around him to try and make the darkness stop swirling.

"I'm... alright," he made himself murmur, wondering why his brother was sitting so high on his knees when all he wanted was to rest his chin on his shoulder.

He tried to pull him down to his level, but when his grip on his back tightened, North stiffened, a sound escaping his throat, and South realized the shirt under his hands was soaked, wet and warm.

The shock made his head finally stop spinning like a top, and he quickly let go, distressed.

"North, you're bleeding!"

He shouldn't have sounded surprised, he knew that. North was always bleeding when the guards were done with them, nails torn from gouging at flesh and the floor, cuts where their knuckles had scraped his skin open, his lips burst, blood staining his teeth like when-

And of course he was bleeding now. Today's creative attempt to cover up the sound of North prying a board off the window with South's singing (which had worked), and use it to bash their guards' heads in while South ran (worked less well) had made the Japanese get creative, too. While the others were beating North with their batons, one went off and came back with a thick stick, like a tree branch covered with jagged stubs where smaller limbs had been hacked off, and used it to cane him.

South hadn't been awake for most of it. All he remembered was turning around to be dragged back in after North had been overwhelmed, and then his brother coming for the guard while the branch came for him.

The branch reached its target first. He'd woken up just as the guard with the crooked teeth was giving his brother one last kick.

"I hadn't... realized," North replied to his cry through gritted teeth.

South could feel his legs shaking where their knees were slotted together, but his brother didn't sit down, rising higher. The thigh South's knee was pressed against spasmed like it didn't belong to him, and North instinctively grabbed his shoulders, curling over him as his breath rasped.

South steadied his brother's hips, about to try and make him lay down, when he realized with horror that he could feel blood on his pants, too, soaking through any even slightly cleaner patches left on the coarse fabric. He thought of that brief, bleary flash he'd gotten of his brother before the room went dark, and realized not all of the blood dyeing his clothes had been from his back.

"North," he asked hesitantly, trying to hold him as carefully as possible. "How much of you did they cane?"

"I'm fine," his brother clipped, which wasn't what he'd asked. He released his shoulders and walked back on his knees, his teeth creaking.

"You shouldn't be sitting," South fretted, trying to crawl towards him again.

But the room spun, and he suddenly canted over, collapsing, his body thumping on the floorboards.

"South!"

There was a scrabbling sound, a sharp gasp, and then he was being sat up in his brother's arms. South blinked blearily up at the outline of his panicked face, and he almost thought he could see the taegeuk on his flag swirling round and round, even though it was way too dark for that. And also it shouldn't be able to get bigger, swallowing his vision.

'Pretty.'

He blinked hard until the emblem disappeared, then cautiously sat up. He tried to rub his throbbing temple, but yanked his hand away as even that sent a stab of pain through it.

"Don't touch," North said sharply, grabbing his hand.

South suddenly realized his brother had lowered himself to hold him, and his eyes widened as he jerked towards him, the small, dark room getting wobbly again.

"North, you've got to lie down."

His brother wasn't sitting. It felt like he was on his knees with them spread far apart. His thighs weren't resting on the calves folded underneath them, but hovering, keeping his butt from touching the floor by just a few centimetres. It had to be putting even more strain on his wounds.

"Come on," he urged before he could respond. "You need to get your clothes off so I can clean your back."

Even though the injuries weren't touching the floor, he knew he couldn't be comfortable sitting up. And it was hard enough getting the small bloodstains out of their clothes, especially since they didn't have much water. They'd only had these ones for a year, and they were already ruined.

He tried to unbutton North's shirt, but was met by his hands protecting the buttons as he leaned away.

"I'm fine," he said, and South could feel his eyes fixed on his injured temple, even in the dark. "You're the one with a head wound."

"We get head wounds all the time."

He hated the way they made him feel, sluggish and hot, turning every snort and chuckle from the guards recalling how they'd whooped them into a piece of steel being stabbed into his brain. And he hated when North got one, and he started to slur, or got that far-away look, like his body was holding South, but his mind had gone somewhere far inside where he couldn't reach.

It was scary. He couldn't fight like North. If the guards came in to hurt them again, there was nothing he could do. If they tried to do something to his brother like the guard he'd- he'd gotten rid of that one time, South wouldn't be able to stop them. He'd have to try, but he wasn't like his brother, and he couldn't- he really didn't think he could kill like him. But he also couldn't let him get hurt or... anything else.

South hated getting head injuries. But he'd rather he got them than North.

"That doesn't mean you can get used to them," North retorted.

He said that, but he had seemed to. He hadn't gone away inside himself in months, even after Japan had cracked his head into the floor over and over on the day he'd had killed that man-

'Six.'

-and the guards had pounded his skull with their boots after.

They must have felt like the Koreas hadn't paid enough for killing another one of their friends, or maybe they were mad at being injured by North when they'd caught them. Or maybe they just liked hurting them. Either way, even after everything Japan had done to North, they'd came to beat him, too, and South with him.

'It's unfair!' South had tried to tell them. 'Japan already punished us!'

But they hadn't listened, just dragged them away from the window and their last dream of light. So even though they were both already hurt, even though South hadn't been supposed to be punished because North had taken his for him, he'd still ended up getting beaten. And North had ended up...

Bad. It'd been bad. Even three months later, with their major breaks and sprains healed enough that they only twinged now, South could see the pain that tightened the corners of his eyes when he did the workouts he refused to stop. And when it was light out, he could still see the yellow-green mottling on almost every inch of his brother's white skin.

It'd be turning purple again. Fresh dark patches already blooming where the men's fists had impacted. He knew his back must look awful.

"I'm not used to it," he said, reaching for his brother's shirt again. "But it's not bleeding that much. Yours are. We need to make sure they don't-"

"I can take care of it," North interrupted, his shoulders hunching as his bloodied knuckles tightened around the fabric.

"You can't reach your- your own back." South's words almost slipped away as the darkness whirled again. "And it's not like I can sleep anyway."

He had to stay up in case his brain was bleeding or something. If it was, he didn't want to die in his sleep. He wanted to hear his brother's voice as he went, telling him it was okay, the way he'd so desperately craved over the week his throat had been healing. He wanted to go with North's hand in his.

His brother hesitated.

"Please," South begged, rounding his eyes even though he couldn't see him. "If you get some kind of infection, you might go into a coma."

Even if his other half being out might allow enough time to pass without causing trouble that they'd start receiving food and water again, South didn't want that to happen. If North going inside himself was bad, being stuck in here with his 'dead' body would be even worse.

That guard's glazed, accusing eyes flashed through his head, and he squeezed his shut.

"You won't be able to protect me," he whimpered.

"...Fine," North grudgingly gave in, the way South knew the words would make him do. He could hear his hands fall away from his buttons. "But I'm cleaning yours first."

"You're so stubborn." But South didn't argue, crawling to the thin futon, reaching under it to pull out the corner of their tiny blanket they'd used their teeth to painstakingly gnaw off (okay, mostly North's fangs; they really came in handy sometimes).

The scrap had... seen better days. You could tell even in the dark. It was stiff and ratty and almost black with all the blood it had soaked up. But it was better than nothing.

South went to grab the bucket, but North stopped him.

"No water," he said.

Right. Even before Japan came, they were probably going to lose it again.

South's stomach cramped with dread. If he'd though the limiting was bad, it was even worse to have none at all. It'd only been two days last time. But by the end, his mouth felt like it was stuffed full of cotton, his head was pounding almost as bad as now, and the only thing he could think about was how thirsty he was. When they'd finally brought the bucket back, he'd ignored North's warning and drank so fast he'd thrown up.

"Do you think they'll take it for even longer this time?" he asked in a small voice, remembering Japan's warning.

'The next time you act poorly, it will be three. Then four. Then five. Until you both learn your lessons.'

North clearly hadn't learned. The fact that they'd tried to escape today, the moment he'd decided they were both healed enough, proved it.

His brother didn't flinch. "If they do, we'll deal with it."

Easy for him to say. Besides making his pee smell awful, those couple days hadn't even seemed to affect him.

South pouted, and the northern Korea gently flicked his cheek.

"And I'll save you the last sip."

Then his other half cupped his face, using the crusty blanket scrap to clean his temple. His touch was feather-light, light enough that someone else wouldn't be able to believe he'd been using those hands to swing a board hard enough to bash skulls earlier.

But his other half knew. North could use his hands to plunge a knife into a man over and over until he choked on his own blood, to crack someone's skull on the ground like an egg, and to drive a nose so hard into a face that it went back into the brain.

But he also used them to rub South's back when he was sick, and to break the ice on their water bucket, and gently clean his wounds. He was the only one his brother was gentle with, and he was only ever gentle to him, even when they were play-fighting. It was why he lost so much now.

South's eyes half-slitted as North wiped his injury clean. It really wasn't bleeding that much. The part of the stick that caught him was smooth (thank God, or it could have pierced through into his brain), and it was more one of those wounds that definitely did more damage inside than out.

But it still felt good to have his brother take care of him.

North was meticulous, even though he had blood sheeting down his own back. When he was finally done, he leaned back, and South slumped forward, resting his forehead on his shoulder. His brother folded him in his arms, rubbing his hand up and down his back, like he did when they slept at night.

"I know what you're doing," South mumbled, his fingers spidering up his chest. "You're not gonna stop me."

North *'tch'*ed as he fumbled with his buttons. "Fine."

He gently pushed him away, undoing his own shirt, folding it neatly and placing it on the floor. South heard the floorboards creak as he laid down under the window.

The thin cracks of light that managed to get around the boards didn't show much, but the small glimpses they did show were enough to make South suck in a breath and want to cover his eyes again.

He managed not to. The spinning was always worse when it was just the darkness, like he was spiralling into some deep black void he'd never escape from.

So he shuffled forward, staying on this side of his brother so he wouldn't block the moonlight. Unsure entirely of what to do, he started with using his hands to map out his other half's back, trying to brush his fingers across it as gently as possible. North's muscles still coiled.

Just like South thought, his entire back was coated in sticky warmth. It was hard to find the places where the wood had punctured. As his hands moved lower, brushing the waistband of his brother's pants, he knew he'd been right.

That jagged branch had been used to cane his entire back, all the way from his neck down to his thighs.

"It's bad," he assessed.

He could feel his brother's glare. "No, really?"

"Yeah, really."

The sharp, jutting edges of his shoulder blades and defined knobs of his spine were normal, just like they were for South. But the coin-sized (South imagined, he'd never seen a coin) holes the protrusions on the branch had left when they pierced his skin weren't. And if South strained his eyes really hard, he could tell his brother's body was dark even in the places not covered in blood. If he could see him, his flag would look like it was purple-black and red instead of white.

"I think you should take off your pants, too," he suggested in concern. His brother wasn't going to be able to sit for awhile.

"I can handle that," North said stoically.

"I don't mind."

It'd be embarrassing if it wasn't his brother, but they were two halves of a whole, so it was different. And South was actually really worried about him getting an infection. Japan had said they wouldn't be separated, but what if North got so sick he had to be taken to a hospital?

Yeah, knowing Japan that... probably wouldn't happen. But it was still an option, and South didn't want to risk it. He'd rather have his brother comatose, so long as he was with him. Then he wouldn't be alone, and he could at least try to keep him safe.

"It's fine," North clipped. "I can do it, South."

Giving up, South muttered, "Stubborn," again as he started to wipe him down, trying to make sure his touch was as light as his other half's had been.

North had used to let him clean him up after their beatings with no problem, even the embarrassing places. But it felt like he was getting more reluctant lately. He had to be talked into it now.

It worried South a little.

"North," he asked hesitantly as he gently prodded his back for raw skin he had to be extra careful with. "I'm not doing anything wrong when I have to do stuff like this, am I?"

"No," North replied immediately, and his brother let out a breath of relief.

He knew if his brother said it, he meant it. He'd never shied away from telling South when he applied too much pressure or anything. And North never lied to him.

They'd be free someday. They would. And they could have real doctors do this stuff. They wouldn't need them in the first place because they wouldn't be being beaten for trying to escape. They wouldn't have to escape anymore.

It took a really long time, long enough that South was starting to get even sleepier, even though North had let him get a couple hours before their breakout attempt. But he made sure to be just as thorough as his brother was. Once enough blood was gone that his other half's skin looked a little paler, he started to probe out the tears in it by skimming his hand over the plane of his back, then focusing his efforts when he thought he'd found one.

He knew it probably wouldn't look great once it was morning, and they had a little more light. And their 'washcloth' was definitely done for since he couldn't wash it. But he hoped it helped at least a little.

South was pleased when North's breathing got a little raspier as he fell asleep.

He knew his brother wouldn't actually be mad if he just went ahead and cleaned the rest of him. But if South woke up with his pants being taken off, it would terrify him, and he knew it would scare North, too, even if it was just for a second.

So when he was as done with his back as he could be, he set the gross cloth aside and lay down on the floor, turning his face towards his brother's. He could just see his outline where the silver moonlight rimmed it.

He still wasn't used to not having a window. He didn't think he ever would be. It'd been nice back in February, when it had made it a little warmer than having just the open bars, or even the glass.

But now that winter was over, he missed being able to see the grass turn green outside, and the birds that perched up on the wall to sing their songs while they preened their colourful feathers. The maple tree was long gone, but sometimes tiny white flowers the size of his fingernail would pop up in the shade.

Now he couldn't even tell that spring was here, that the long nights were over and the world had started to be reborn. The only way left to tell which season was outside their walls was by how cold or hot it got. South wondered how long it would be before he forgot what the sky even looked like.

No, he wouldn't. He'd keep seeing glimpses of it whenever North led another escape attempt. But it wasn't really worth it when he'd just end up with head trauma so bad he forgot anyway.

He sighed in his mind, reaching across the small space between them to stroke his brother's bruising cheek.

He couldn't blame his other half for the window. He'd been trying to save them. He hadn't known Japan would do something like that, even though they'd been dreading it for awhile.

And he'd taken South's punishment for him. Even if South hadn't actually done anything, Japan hadn't seen it that way. And North had got himself hurt even worse to make sure he wouldn't pay for his actions. He'd taken the brunt of the guards' beatings after, too. And South knew he had him to thank for not waking up with his back caned today.

His other half traced his fingers over his sleeping brother's jawline. He couldn't feel it, but he knew his jaw hadn't set right after the last break. He knew his brother's face better than anything, it was as close as he got to seeing his own, and he could tell it was crooked now. Just a little bit, enough that no one but him would notice.

'Who else is there to?'

The guards never looked at them, except to sneer. And South bet they didn't even know what the Koreas looked like, besides them having the wrong flag. They didn't want to see them, just the damage they left on them.

And Japan never looked at anyone.

South wiggled close to North, until their brows were touching and he could feel his breath on his face. It smelled awful, just like his. Scrubbing their teeth with their fingers like his brother always insisted might keep them a little cleaner, but it didn't help with bad breath. But even if he teased him about it sometimes (and got teased back), the smell was a familiar awful, soothing. He could feel sleep dragging him down, and he wanted to curl up next to his brother's warm side and rest.

But they shouldn't sleep on the floor. Even if North got blood on the futon, it was better than being on the splintery wood.

South touched his finger to the knob that stuck out just belong his brother's neck, and ran his finger down the ridges of his spine. 'Bump bump bump bump,' all the way to the bottom. The second time he did it, North shuddered. The third time, he muttered, "Stop it."

South did it again, and he turned his face away, squirming against the floor. Despite his aching head, his other half giggled, releasing him from the torture.

"Got to get to bed," he informed him. "And you need to clean the rest of your... cuts."

North's shadow moved as he pushed himself up, hissing quietly. But once he was up on his knees, he helped South sit, steadying him as he swayed.

They supported each other as they shuffled to the futon, before collapsing in a pile of limbs, North making sure he landed on his front, half on top of South.

"I don't think you should sleep on your back tonight," the southern Korea recommended.

"Wasn't planning on it," North muttered into his neck.

South knew he should tell him to get cleaned up again, but he was warm and comfortable under his brother's weight. He wanted to wrap his arms around him, but didn't want to hurt him any more than he already was, so he settled for holding the sides of his arms.

"I'll wake you up if something starts happening with your head," North offered before he could ask.

South hummed happily, closing his eyes.

He knew there wasn't really any way for his brother to tell if his brain started bleeding. But it helped to know he was watching over him.

It was still dark when he woke up again. Usually not having North next to him would make him jolt up, but his head felt thick and muzzy, so all he could do was have his heart almost stop.

But then it restarted as he heard the rustle of clothes and little hisses North made as he wiped himself down.

'Good,' South thought blearily. He didn't know why his brother was getting touchy about getting tended to, but so long as it wasn't because of South, it was fine. And so long as he still cleaned himself.

North made an annoyed sound through his teeth as he pulled his pants back on, and his brother winced in sympathy. None of the ways he could imagine to put them on would feel great.

"Are you okay?" he mustered the energy to murmur.

"I'm fine," North replied quietly, keeping his voice low. "I'll be back in soon. Go back to sleep."

South lingered on the edge of dreaming, hearing the shuffling and scratching as his brother moved over to the foot of the futon, and started carving his next tally mark into the wall with the stone he kept wedged between the floorboards.

He never made the marks first thing in the morning. Always at the end of the day, and never until after an escape attempt had failed.

South thought it was silly. The longer he left it, the more time he had to forget. And the idea of that made him nervous. With the light gone, his brother's tally was the only thing that let him know for sure how many days they'd been in here, that there were still days and not just an endless blear of dim twilight and dark.

But North insisted. And he hadn't forgotten yet.

When his brother was done marking another day of captivity, he crawled back into the futon, twining his legs with South's, and resting his chin on his head. There wouldn't be any pressing their backs together tonight.

His other half knew when they cuddled like this, he liked sleeping on his back better, so that South could curl up to him. South liked that better, too. So he half-turned, making sure he didn't push North too far onto his injured back, and held onto his shoulders, burying his face in his chest, happy to feel a bit of tension drain out of him.

North's hand brushed the edge of his head wound, then stroked softly along his back.

"Next time," he murmured.

South pushed away the dread he felt at the thought, nuzzling into his other half.

"Next time," he agreed.

—

1952

South's house was on fire. It was burning him alive.

The cold winter had been blessed relief on his burns. He'd realized this year that all the time spent lying on his ondol floor hadn't actually been helping, just made him sweat more, making his burns sting and his bandages cling. The heat soothed his body, sure. But the cold numbed everything else, the way he needed it numbed.

When one of the remaining burns started to hurt again, the edges widening as America was forced to bomb the land he held in order to get rid of North's soldiers and the Chinese, he'd just had to press it to the cool wooden floor or edge of the bookshelf or climb onto the tile kitchen counter and lie still for a few hours until the chill made it go away. It'd worked for every major burn he had left.

Except for that unnatural gash. He didn't like touching that one.

Despite the little bit of relief, winter had been awful, too. The cold surfaces of everything inside were nice on his skin, but the rest of his body couldn't handle it. All the windows wide open, wearing light, loose clothes, having to toss his blanket off at night because that was when most of America's bombs struck.

It reminded him of the shack, of those long, freezing nights when the wind first rattled the windowpane, then wailed through the gaping hole left by North shattering the window, then the cracks in the boards that covered it, cutting off the outside world. It'd just been South and North and the dark and cold. And in that final year, there had been less and less of that second thing.

Now North had shattered the window again, smashed the glass just so he could make someone bleed, because there was a violence inside him and always had been and he couldn't stand to just behave.

And this time he wasn't even there to keep South warm.

It was like the cold inside the house leeched through the burns, that gash, seeping into his blood and marrow and heart, until he was numb, and he couldn't remember a time he hadn't been.

But it was still better than the fire. Here in Busan, the snow had all melted, leaving puddles on the road and the front yard a morass of mud that he never set anything more than eyes on. Spring was here, and soon summer would be, too. Soon South would be suffocated under that cloying heat as his wounds festered beneath moist bandages, burning all over again as his sweat soaked into the scabs and sores. The American nurses would come by to change his dressings more often, giving short answers when he spoke, never looking him in the eye, like they were bandaging an animal, like he wasn't even there.

It was unfair. North had started this, and his own burns had to still be worse than South's. He'd be covered head to toe, flayed open like South's back had once been. He was suffering worse, like he deserved to, yet South was the one being tended to by foreign women with clinical hands and attitude problems, while his brother was being looked after by Kangwon, with his warm smile and steady hands, and probably by Gangwon, too, the way he had been when he'd left South in the first place.

It was unfair. He was the one who'd started this war, he was the one that always got them punished, he was the one that had gotten South whipped, and he was the one that had left him behind. But still he was the one that got to be looked after by people who cared for some reason when South knew he didn't appreciate it, while he was always left alone in the cold and dark, patched up by people he didn't even know, who didn't even think about him when they were done.

He wasn't cold now. The ondol was on, filling the house with its insidious heat. America had told him to start a fire in it, so he could come over. He didn't like the chill, and he wouldn't let South go to his place because Grace was sick or something and it was so damn hot inside.

He shouldn't be cold now. But he was. His body was overheating, even pressed against the kitchen table, as far from the heated bedroom as possible, his burns were sweltering, the old sickening smell of cooking meat wafting up from the collar of the suit he'd put on so he'd look presentable. The house was on fire and he was burning, but his insides were still so cold.

He was always freezing or suffocating. Why couldn't he ever just be warm again? Why couldn't he just-

The front door slammed open and South scrambled off the table, wincing as he held the burn gash on his right side. He'd moved too fast, but he really didn't feel like being made fun of for his weird habits today.

"Hey, kid!" America called. "You in?"

Where else would he be? There wasn't any point in going outside. The grey city only got more depressing in spring, with the brown mud splattered all over it, traipsed in by the constant flow of soldiers and dirty refugees. The melting snow made everything feel wet and filthy and even grosser.

And there were too many eyes, fixed on his shoes or darting past him. He'd been practicing conversations all winter, and finally mustered up his courage to try and talk to a girl at the market last week, hoping maybe he could start trying to make people like him. If North could do it, he knew he could.

He'd thought he was doing okay. He hadn't been stuttering, and since it'd been cold out, he hadn't been hunching over or flinching from the burns, and he hadn't smelled like roast dog. He'd even managed to make a joke about the weather that had made her laugh a little, something North definitely couldn't have done. He'd really felt like someone might like him, or could. They could become friends, and she could come over to watch the foreign films he had, and she would see him, maybe even-

Then he realized she wasn't looking him in the eyes. She wasn't even looking at his lower face, like you would to be polite. Her gaze was on the turnips on the patchwork blanket spread out by her feet. The only time it rose was to look past him at his guards, or at the market square or the sky or anything else that wasn't him.

No. There wasn't anything for South outside. Not until the war was over. Until the war was won.

"I'm here," he called casually to America, his chest tightening with dread.

Not because of his friend. He knew he didn't have to worry about what he'd set up with the Communists. But because with every step he took down the hall, the air grew hotter and hotter, until he crossed the sitting room to enter his bedroom, and was smacked in the face with a wall of heat.

America was already sitting on the floor, legs splayed comfortably.

"Y'know," he said, tipping his head to look at him in the doorway. "I kinda get this 'sitting on the floor thing' you people do now. It's the only way a man won't freeze his ass off here. Thanks for warming the place up for me, by the by. You like it way too cold for this ole southern boy."

"Yeah." South smiled, reluctantly closing the door, trapping himself in with the heat. "No problem."

He didn't like it cold. He just liked the numb.

The heat of the ondol floor soaked through his house sandals as he crossed the small room. Last year he'd been annoyed that whoever had owned this house had a Western bed instead of a futon. What was the point of an ondol if it didn't warm up the place you slept?

Now he was glad for it. The elevated bed made it a little warmer with the heat off. He wanted to sit on it now, legs drawn up, safe from the heat emanating through the floorboards.

But America was sitting on the floor, and it felt rude to sit higher than him. Plus he'd probably still end up next to him.

'Oh, you think you're better than me, Southie? I see how it is.' South could just hear his friend saying something like that before he dragged him down to join him. He'd be joking, but the Korean would still feel a little bad. And be on the floor anyway.

South didn't want to feel bad anymore. He didn't need anything else to numb.

So he sat next to America, trying to ignore the heat that immediately enveloped him as he set the bottle of applejack and glasses on the floor between them. Men couldn't have serious discussions without alcohol, after all.

His friend snatched the bottle up to pour, laughing as he held it up to the orange lamplight.

"Started without me, kid?"

South flushed, looking away from the half-empty container. He guessed at some point he must have drank out of it. Maybe that was why the room had spun a little when he'd got up.

'And why your hands aren't shaking.'

'Go to Hell.'

He was already struggling with the heat. He didn't need the voice in his head, too.

"I have the other stuff you gave me," he said, half-standing, even the brief break of contact with the floor a relief.

America pulled him back down. "This should do. I've got shit to do after, so a clear head's fine by me. Unless you need your tongue a little more lubricated for our chat?"

He smirked, an eyebrow rising above his aviators.

"I'm okay," South said, feigning confidence.

No, it wasn't feigned. He could get through a conversation with just a glass or two. He knew he could.

Maybe it was just his imagination, but his bandages already felt wet.

America had taken off his suit jacket, tossing it onto the bed, so it was probably acceptable to do the same. He wasn't sure if he'd needed to be more formal for this or not, since it was the first time after that whole... thing that his friend was coming to him on his own volition just to update him on the armistice. It felt sort of like after he'd freaked out about him not telling him anything, he should show him he really appreciated this. He'd made sure to wear the 'Brooks Brothers' outfit America had got him.

South unbuttoned his dark blue, pin-striped jacket, but stopped before he could take it off. The white shirt under it had a moisture stain on the right side.

The Korean flushed in shame. 'That stupid burn.'

He didn't want America to feel bad that his pilots were hurting him, or pull his shirt up to ogle at it again. So it looked like he was keeping the stifling suit on.

Even with it unbuttoned, he had to fight the urge to squirm as the fire from the floor worked its way up through his body. The glass of applejack that went straight to his lips after his friend handed it to him only helped a little. The ice he'd added didn't get rid of the heat pooling in his burns, only made the cold inside spread.

"So-" America clapped his hands together after setting his glass down on the floorboards. "Let's get down to business. I don't have much to tell ya, just that the Reds accepted, so the secret sessions are startinggggg... tomorrow."

A little bit of anxiety sparked in South's chest, and he took another drink to soothe it.

"But I figured I'd come by myself, just in case you had any questions," the other man continued. "They actually accepted a coupla days ago. Sorry it took so long to share the beans. I wanted to make sure the commies weren't going to do something unsportsmanly like cancel last minute, y'know?"

South nodded. He'd been wearing holes in the floor ever since America told him about how he was going to ask for secret sessions that might settle the POW thing, but his friend had been sending someone over every day to reassure him that there wasn't any news yet.

He guessed technically there had been news, but he got why America didn't want to tell him until the talks were a sure thing.

"Any questions or concerns going into it, Southie?"

Running a finger over the rim of his glass, South asked, "Are you really going to let them get what they want with the POWs?"

America's smile was sharp. "What are you reeeeally asking, kid? C'mon now, don't be shy."

South inhaled, then turned his head to look him in the aviators.

"You're not going to end the war, are you?"

America swirled his glass, tipping his head at him. "Depends. Do you want me to?"

Swallowing, South said, "No."

His friend nodded, taking a swig, letting out a little sigh of satisfaction. "Then nope."

The tension went out of South's muscles, and he almost forgot about how his burns had started stinging again.

America must have seen his relief, because he laughed, reaching over to ruffle his head. "Come on, kid. I told you I'll always do what's best for you. And we both know that's not giving into the Reds and letting you get absorbed. "

South took another drink, just to celebrate, not because his mouth was already dry. "Yeah. I was just a little worried since North held out through winter."

He'd been hoping the season would finish his brother off, make the Chinese and everyone else being starved because he couldn't just give up turn on him, and make him finally accept that he had lost.

But it hadn't. And he knew North wouldn't see spring with the same dread he did. He'd see it as the end of hardship, just like the way he always had in the shack, like the end of winter meant nothing that had happened the previous year- none of the failed escape attempts, none of the beatings, none of the broken bones or hungry days- mattered anymore. Even when he'd been acting the way he had in that final year before he'd left, March First had brought something back to him, the thing that had made him leave him.

South wished Gojong had been born in winter. He wished the protest had been held in the darkest depths on the longest day.

If winter hadn't crushed his brother, then they couldn't count on him seeing sense in the green seasons. Which meant South would have to struggle though another long summer, another rainy season and grey fall, another few months of cold, lonely winter before he could Reunify with his brother.

But it was better than what would happen if they Reunified on even some of the Reds' terms. Better than if North found out about... everything.

America hand-waved his worry. "I'm not gonna give up just because he's holding on like a dog with a chicken bone. He's got a couple months left in him at most. And even if he runs past the end of his leash, his puppets can't. His little commie government can't hold together much longer." He raised a brow. "And you really think the chinks want to stick around for another winter?"

South shook his head. He didn't even know why they'd stuck around for two of them. The first one made sense since they were winning, and had even taken Seoul. But now it was clear they couldn't take it again. He couldn't see why China or whoever was in control would keep them here.

He wished they'd just go home. Then America's armies could crush North's, and he wouldn't have to worry about-

He wasn't worried. He trusted America.

But he'd still feel better if the Chinese were gone.

"Exactly." America nodded decisively. "And the fact that the Reds accepted these sessions means they're getting desperate."

South hesitated. He knew America knew more about politics and stuff than him, but...

"I don't think they are."

His friend cocked his head. "Oh yeah? Why's that?"

South took another drink. "North's planning something. He has to be. There's no way he'd let the whole massacre thing go if he wasn't."

Not when he'd looked at him like that after his eye had been taken.

America gave him a considering look. "You know, you never told me what you thought about that, Southie."

His friend had told him about the massacres before they'd hit the news. But South had had... a little too much to drink on those days, so he'd sort of found it hard to care. He'd mostly just grunted in acknowledgement and pretended to pass out until America left.

He knew by now that alcohol and talking about prisoners of war didn't mix.

Now he shrugged. "They're Communists. Just 'cuz they're not fighting now doesn't mean they couldn't again."

The more he thought about it, the more the entire concept of prisoners of war baffled him. It was weird that someone that had been shooting at you or your soldiers for months, probably killing dozens of them, was suddenly someone that had to be protected just because they'd surrendered or hadn't died when shot. And not just protected, but treated well. South had been shocked to learn that not only were POWs supposed to be allowed to receive letters, but to play sports and receive toiletries, too. Communists that had killed thousands and would kill even more the second they were returned to North were treated better than he'd been under Japan, even when his brother hadn't been around to get him in trouble.

"Besides," he said, trying not to writhe in the confines of his humid, moistening clothes. "The commies started it."

Who threw rocks at men with guns when you were behind bars? That was pretty much asking to be shot.

The way South saw it, every KPA prisoner that wanted to act out just to be defiant and got himself killed because of it was one less Communist to cause trouble once they were Reunified.

America grinned, his white teeth glistening. "I'll cheers to that."

He took South's glass, filling it, even though he hadn't realized it was empty. The ice in both of them clattered as they clinked rims.

"North would never see it that way, though," the Korean said after, wiping his mouth on his sleeve. "He'd never let it go."

Even though him- well, his army- and the Chinese had killed even more American prisoners, and probably South's.

"So this has to be a trick." There was no way North would agree to shut up about the killings if it wasn't.

What was it he'd said in that broadcast on his Foundation Day? We do not cower when our kin our killed. We take revenge.'

And would that have been enough for him, if Japan had killed South? Would he be able to tell himself that just because he'd killed some Japanese, it was fine that he'd left his own brother to die, so long as he got revenge for it?

'Not that he even did get revenge against Japan,' the Southern Korea thought bitterly.

America examined him, then bobbed his head, sighing. "I'll admit, great minds think alike. But I was trying to give you a little optimism to tide you over."

There wasn't much use in being optimistic when it came to his brother. After all, almost a year of good behaviour had let South start to grow optimistic that North really wasn't going to cause problems anymore, that maybe, just maybe, they might get their window back, or warm meals, or even let out to stretch their legs once and awhile.

And then March First had came.

"Thanks," he said. "But I don't need it."

"Hey, where'd my naïve little Southie who thinks North craps gold go?" America chuckled as he leaned over, ruffling his head again. "I'm just joking, kid. You're coming along great."

South lips curled. He took another drink, feeling sluggish and hot. His dress shirt was choking him, the collar constricting his throat like a damp noose.

America drained the rest of his glass in one swallow, then stood. "Any more questions before I go? Speak now or forever hold your peace."

The Korean shook his head. As relieved as he was that America was keeping his promise and keeping him in the loop, he didn't really want to know about most of the stuff going on. It just made him think useless thoughts there wasn't any point in thinking.

He just wanted it to be over. Really over. And they weren't going to get that unless America won.

His ally thumped his shoulder, slinging his jacket on and sauntering for the door. South had just got up when he turned back, his expression considering under the aviators.

"In the interest of making sure you're not sitting on another bomb that's going to blow up on me, I'm surprised you didn't ask about the whole 'biowarfare' thing the Reds are raisin' a stink about again."

America had told him about it awhile ago, and offered to get him some of their newspapers that denied the claims. But South didn't need to see them.

He shrugged, just wishing he'd go so he could start cooling off. "I know you wouldn't do something like that. North and the other Reds are probably just trying to get people mad at you like last year."

Even if America would do that, it was North's fault for driving him to it. If the normal bombs wouldn't make him give up, they'd have to start looking for stuff that would. It sucked that some innocent people might get sick, but there weren't any innocent people in the north left. Just Communists.

And he knew America wasn't doing what North said he was. It was flu season, after all. People got sick.

And North lied.

America nodded, looking pleased. "Righto. Y'know, I'm really glad we worked that 'China' thing out last year. Your trust really means a lot to me, Southie. Just so ya know."

He flashed a dazzling grin, and South's heart leaped. He couldn't have stopped himself from returning it if he'd tried.

"Me too," he said wholeheartedly, forgetting he was melting alive for a second. "And thank you for trusting me, even after... all that."

He ducked his head, embarrassed.

God, he couldn't believe he'd been letting what South Chungcheong told him drive a wedge between him and his friend for so long when he knew she hated him. What if he'd actually ruined their friendship or done something else stupid, just to find out she was a liar who'd only wanted to sabotage him and America's relationship for the enemy, for North?

His brother couldn't stand the idea that not only did someone like him, but the most powerful country in the world liked him. He was just a puppet to CCCP and Red China, but South was America's friend. And he was so glad his friend was understanding enough that he hadn't let him allow North to make him mess that up like he messed everything else up.

He needed him. They needed him. Everyone else just refused to see it.

"Watah and bridges, kid," America assured him cheerfully. "Watah and bridges. Don't bother getting up, I'll see myself out."

South was already up, but he sat back down as the other country's footsteps clomped down the hall and out the door.

'Still wish he wouldn't wear shoes inside.'

But that was just part of having a friend, right? It wasn't like people were perfect. There were probably things America didn't like about him, either. Even though if he'd ever told him any of those things, South would curl up into a ball and die.

He shifted uncomfortably at the thought of death, pushing away the images his mind tried to conjure of POWs being mowed down behind bars. He knew that was just his old naïve self that felt a twinge of... not guilt. It wasn't his fault. But a twinge of something.

As if echoing it, there was a sharp sting in the gash in his side. Realizing he finally could, South tore off the jacket and his dress shirt, releasing a sigh of relief as the air flowed across his skin, the cloying heat dissipating a little, taking the twinge with it.

The prisoners had been commies, and just as crazy as his brother for antagonizing guys with guns. South wouldn't even try that with his guards, and they were there to keep him safe. And he knew that none of the POWs would have felt guilty if he was gunned down.

'Korea, run!'

He shook the woman out of his head. She'd only wanted him to run so that he'd be captured by her comrades and taken back to North to be brainwashed like him, absorbed and turned into another Soviet puppet, another drone in the hive. She hadn't cared about him. None of them did.

So the Communists had gotten what they deserved. It was North's fault, really, winding them up, making them fight, refusing to ever give up and acting like it was because he cared about people.

If he really cared about them, he'd just accept America's current terms for the POWs, and accept that most of them didn't want to go back to him. They'd literally signed blood petitions that said they wanted to stay with South. Who cared if that wasn't how things had worked before? It would end the war. And it was how things should work. Why would they send the anti-Communist prisoners back when they'd just be executed?

North was just jealous that some people were finally choosing South over him.

The ice fragments in his glass clinked against his teeth, and he realized it was empty again.

With an effort, he climbed to his feet. The room didn't sway much.

Three-quarters of a bottle wasn't enough to send him stumbling anymore.

He felt a flicker of pride at that. That meant he was building a tolerance, right? Maybe one day he could drink with America without the threat of embarrassing himself or saying or doing something he didn't want to hanging over him.

Then again, it might also mean he'd have to drink a lot more to forget about the throbbing agony when summer came.

"I can't catch a break," South sighed, making his way to the kitchen to find the rum America had left for him. He'd used to hate the stuff, but any port in a storm.

At least this should be the last summer. North might be riding the high of getting through winter, but it would fade by the next.

'Are you sure about that?'

Those words echoed though his mind, the ones his brother had screamed out at an audience, and at him over the recorder. A thousand years of war, until everything was burned to ash.

South shoved both voices away, his brother's and the other one, taking a swig of rum from the bottle to make sure they'd stay silent.

He wasn't sure. He was the opposite. But it didn't matter.

Stripping down to his briefs, he crawled onto the kitchen table, sighing as the cold started to work its way through his body. He'd rather die than go into the stove room to kill the fire fuelling the ondol, so it would be hours until it burned down and the heat faded, allowing him to lay by the couch or in his room. For now, he'd stay here, curled on the burned side that didn't have the gash on it, bottle of alcohol clutched to his thin chest as he tried to sink into the deep black void behind his eyelids.

Rum dribbled down his chin as he drank at the awkward angle, but he didn't care. He was alone anyway.

There wasn't any use in being optimistic about North. But he could be optimistic about the provinces, and the northern government and people. No matter how loyal they were, how blindly devoted to him, once winter was looming again and his brother was still refusing to give up, ready to sacrifice even more of them just to win a fight he had to know he couldn't, they would realize how crazy the person they were following was, and how hopeless his cause was. They'd realize how crazy they were being and go back to being regular people that didn't need to be killed. They'd realize that South was here, that he cared, that he was the better option. They would all choose him.

The only reason the southern provinces, even South Chungcheong, were still so obsessed with North was because they hadn't seen him fail. But the northerners had. They'd all seemed so sure he could win when they were in the camp, but he hadn't. He'd let them down. How could South Hamgyong or Kangwon or even Hwanghae look at his brother the same when he was failing and when he would fail?

They couldn't.

That was why he needed Gangwon back. He knew he wouldn't be like the others. South remembered him as jumpier than Kangwon, but they'd been one person, so they had to be similar. Kangwon's friendly smiles and kind words, but without the five years spent being corrupted by Communism. Gangwon hadn't seen the hospitals or performances or political meetings. All he'd seen was war and failure. Even if he'd been with North willingly at the start, he had to have realized by now that he'd made a mistake.

South could save him. Even if the broadcasts never reached him, even if he didn't get him back until Reunification, he could save him, snap him out of North's influence.

'I have no intention of losing him.'

Kangwon was too far gone, just like South Chungcheong.

But Gangwon might not be.

Fun fact: this was supposed to be part of the last chapter. So the title would be Saving Face; Losing Heart. But then... things happened with the chapter length. As expected. Also if you're wondering why North still has bruises after all his bones have healed in the flashback, it's because Countryhuman bodies prioritize big wounds . If they're fully healthy and receiving enough calories, bruises will still heal first, but since him and South are constantly being starved and dehydrated, every single bit of energy is leeched from their systems to heal the major breaks, then the process drastically slows down on the smaller ones to avoid overtaxing them.

It has very feminist tones, but at the same time I feel like 'One of the Greats' by Florence and the Machine is such a good South song. Mostly the first half.
I crawled up from under the earth / Broken nails and coughing dirt / Spitting out my songs so you could sing along, oh / And with each bedraggled breath, I knew I came back from the dead / To show you how it's done, to show you what it takes / To conquer and to crucify, to become one of the greats / One of the greats Go listen to it, the South lines will jump out.

When I was designing the prison shack, I debated on giving it a dirt floor. But since Japan wasn't intending to make them as miserable as possible from the start, I didn't. Also after all their escape attempts he realized that if he removed the floorboards as a punishment, North would probably dig down through the dirt with his bare hands until they could tunnel under the wall. So the boards stay.

Anyway, something beautiful about the Chinese word for comrade (tongzhi) growing to also be how gay people refer to each other. <3 I'm sure China hates it, though.

Mistake

"You w-want to go to the World P-Peace Council?"

Gangwon's eyes went as round as petri dishes, shooting from the words on the page to his face in shock. Kangwon was impressed he'd only tripped up on two words.

"I am going," he corrected, writing it instead of signing, so his brother would get what he was saying right away. "I've already talked to Comrades Kim Il-sung, Ri Pyong-nam, and Pak Hon-yong."

The Minister of Health had been wary, but eventually agreed he should go. He wasn't on the ground as much as Kangwon was as a doctor, but he made sure to visit some places personally during investigations, and all the reports eventually made their way to his office. He knew the toll the biological warfare was exacting on them, and he knew the meeting was the best place to expose it.

Kangwon had expected the Minister of Foreign Affairs to protest, since he was putting himself at risk of capture by going, which would cause a political crisis he'd have to handle. But Pak Hon-yong had actually approved surprisingly quickly.

Kim Il-sung hadn't. He'd made it clear he didn't approve at all. But he'd told Kangwon he didn't have the authority to order him not to, like the province had known he would. The Provincehumans acted on their people's wishes and desires, but only under Korea's orders.

"Th-That's why K-Korea's still asleep," Gangwon realized.

"Yeah."

Kangwon had told him and their cousins he was leaving their Countryhuman in his coma until March was over. He was already going to be annoyed at not being woken up for the secret talk decision, so there wasn't any harm in making sure he got more recovery time.

None of them had even suspected it was really because he'd been planning on going to Oslo in a few days. Tomorrow now.

His brother sat back on the pallet in the supply room, looking baffled in the glow of the flashlight, muted by the gloves draped over it. "W-What about the others? Are they really…?"

He trailed off, and his lips twisted, a trace of the wry half-smile Kangwon could feel on his own face.

"You didn't tell them," he said, because the Kangwon they'd been wouldn't've either.

"Nope," Kangwon said, writing the words before he leaned back on his palms. "I'm only telling you now because you can't leave the hospital to let them know."

He knew his cousins would try to stop him if they did. It was why he'd only told the Premier and their ministers he was going yesterday. It gave them less time to change their minds, and it gave the General less time to decide he should tell the others, or wake Korea up.

Gangwon shook his head, his smile fading. "Kang, that's c-c-crazy. What if Am-America sends someone to k-k-kidnap you, or one of the other c-countries does, or-"

"Gang." Kangwon caught his hand, dragging it away from his mouth. He used his own free hand to sign out some of his words to make sure he got them. "I'll be fine. Norway might not be neutral, but he's only got medical workers involved in this war. And he's at least a little left-leaning right now."

The country was still a monarchy, and their Labour Party was filled with Social Democrats, who were known to be pretty useless when they weren't being outright malicious. But they were allowing the World Peace Council to be held in their capital, and they weren't as dangerous as right-wing Nationalists or hardcore America supporters would be. To progressive movements, yes. To him personally? Hopefully not.

“Y-You’re just trying to make me feel b-b-better.” Gangwon saw right through him, his other hand going to his mouth so he could chew on his ragged nail. “He’s in N-NATO, and he v-v-voted to label Ch-Ch-“ He squeezed his eyes shut, the scrap of nail he'd had left snapping off between his teeth. “China as an aggressor."

Kangwon gently pried his other hand away from his mouth, pinning it on the pallet. “Okay,” he admitted. “I was trying to make you feel better. But I mean it, too.”

Cautiously, he released his brother’s hands. They went right back to his mouth, but he picked up the book anyway, writing.

“This isn’t a UN meeting,” he said when he’d finished, holding the page up to the light for Gangwon. “It’s the World Peace Council. There’ll be Soviet representatives there, and comrades from other nations. Even if there are spies, they'll be outnumbered by people that are either on our side, or at least don’t want to see something happen to a foreign Provincehuman if it could happen to theirs, too.”

“What about N-Norway?” Gangwon fretted. “You won’t be in the meeting the ent-tire time.”

It was true he’d be on his own (well, with the other people going) from the airport to the meeting hall. But transportation was arranged, so it wasn’t like he’d be strolling through the streets. And he was making sure to cut things close. No one knew a Provincehuman was coming, only a ‘special representative’ from the DPRK. Ideally, he’d be arriving an hour before the meeting, speaking on the first day, and leaving the rest to his team while he went back home directly after, not getting a hotel like the others.

“Gangwon,” he said, taking his brother’s hands again to look him in the eyes, counting on his steady words and facial movements to get through to him. “I know it’s dangerous. I know I’m taking a big chance here.”

Even if Norway himself was a good guy, a good country, his government probably wasn’t. Given the choice between Communism and fascism, Social Democrats would always pick the second one. They were its moderate wing, after all. They had voted to label China an aggressor, and even though they didn't have troops in Korea, they'd voted as a non-permanent Security Council member to invade them in the first place.

Kangwon believed most people wanted to be good. But some of them weren't. He knew why his cousins would try to stop him, because he'd probably try to stop them if they'd tried this. This was dangerous.

"But I have to do it," he said firmly. "I have to try. We need to show the world what America's doing, no matter what. We need to try and stop it." His jaw feathered. "I need to do everything I can."

Gangwon searched his face, eyes piercing his in the muted light, the sheen on them wavering with uncertainty and fear.

But he was a nurse. He'd wiped down children covered in smallpox pustules that cried no matter how gentle he was. He'd fed rice slurry to the grandfathers and grandmothers shuttled into the hospital walls, doing more and more of the work of swallowing for them until they couldn't anymore, dying in a sterile hospital instead of surrounded by their families because they couldn't afford to make them sick, too. The weakest members of their society, the ones that should be protected, being laid waste to even by diseases a healthy adult could almost brush off. He'd rubbed the other nurses' backs as they reached their breaking point from sickness and death and curled up into balls in the empty rooms of patients they'd tried so hard to save. He'd seen the eschars and seizures and splatters of blood on sheets from coughs and diarrhea and rotting skin.

So his lips firmed.

"Okay," he said heavily. "Just p-please." He grabbed his brother's hands in his now, staring at him pleadingly. "Be safe. I d-don't want to lose you."

Kangwon exhaled as he understood, like he'd thought he would.

"I will," he vowed, squeezing him reassuringly. "And you won't.

Korea would kill me if I got taken.”

Gangwon half-smiled, more of a nervous twitch.

Kangwon went to sleep early, getting some rest for tomorrow. He had all his notes ready, from the investigations and treatments, and for his speech. He couldn’t command a crowd the same way Korea could've, but he wasn't bad at public speaking. He just wasn’t used to raising his voice the same way his Countryhuman could, rousing people into whatever emotion he needed.

Kangwon was more slow and steady, better at praising achievements and giving criticism than battle speeches. But steady would be good for the council. He was solid and assured, someone to be believed. His obvious exhaustion worked, too. He was a doctor worn out from his people dying, proof that they were.

Gangwon left at some point, off to do his night rounds. Kangwon twinged with half-asleep guilt, hearing shouting from somewhere deep in the hospital, filtering into the supply room through the thin walls, louder when a nurse crept in to get supplies under the watchful eyes of one of his brother's guards.

But he needed the rest. Looking tired was good. Being so tired he couldn’t think straight wasn’t.

Gangwon returned in the early hours, curling up next to him on the pallet, pulling his own blanket over him as he passed out. Kangwon felt his warm side pressed up against his, and before he sank back down into sleep, wondered if there was some way he could get a message to South from the council, something to let him know what his ‘ally’ was doing to them, what he’d done to his brother.

It was the kind of thought that made tons of sense when you were half-dreaming, but had too many obstacles if you were thinking with your whole brain. Still, he fell sleep for the final time that night with his brother’s light breathing beside him, rotating it in his mind.

He woke up early, maybe only an hour later, unused to sleeping for so long without being woken up to help triage an inpatient or check some new symptom. The light in the supply room was the same as last night, the hall lights filtering under the door.

Kangwon sat up, yawning as he stretched. When he turned, he found Gangwon already sitting up, looking at him.

"I'm going with you," his brother said, and it was his turn for his eyes to widen, his exhaustion blown away.

"No," Kangwon immediately denied, scrabbling for the notebook. "It's too dangerous."

"B-But not for you?" Gangwon didn't wait for his answer. "You're right, Kang. This meeting is the safest chance we'll g-g-get to talk to the rest of the world. It's the best chance I'll get to tell them I'm not a hostage."

"It's also the best chance for America to get you," Kangwon said, his fingers aching to be chewed.

Gangwon's eyes were wide and frightened as he said, "I kn-know. But we've got to take the chance don't we? Things are w-working out in the secret sessions, you said. I'm going to be the only p-problem."

His brows lifted slightly. 'I know.'

Of course he'd figured it out. Just like he'd figured out South was calling for him in the first place, and Kangwon had suspected his cousins were hiding America's demand for Gangwon from both of them at first.

"Korea wouldn't give you back," he told him. "He said he wouldn't."

"I know." Gangwon's grip on the blanket on is lap tightened. "And I don't want to go back. But I also d-don't want to be the thing that stops us from getting an armistice."

The talks were going promisingly. Both sides were revising their lists of POWs like theirs had suggested, and the Americans hadn't played coy for the last three days, but almost easily accepted the three main proposals they had. They'd had to make a concession, one Korea wouldn't like. But settling the POWs was looking hopeful.

The concession had only redoubled Kangwon's desire to go to the council. He knew it'd end with losing comrades. He had to save the ones he could.

But with it made, in a couple days there really could be just one thing left between them and a ceasefire.

His brother.

"If I go and t-talk, and tell everyone I'm not a POW, and I'm choosing to stay here on my own, America won't be able to use me to b-block the armistice," Gangwon said.

Kangwon pointed out, "He'd probably still try."

And then he'd know for sure he was here.

Gangwon's eyes dipped to his lap, then back to his. "Do you think the other countries would let him?"

"They might not have a choice."

"They would," his brother said, clutching at the collar of his workshirt. "They could believe me, or they could believe Americ-ca. Or they could believe me, but still do what he wanted. I don't… I'm n-not sure I trust them." His gaze bored into his. "B-But you said even if they don't care about us, they'll want to- to end the war. Do you really think they would?"

Kangwon wanted to. He wanted to believe that even if the foreign nations didn't care about them, they cared about their own people. They didn't want any more of them to die in an unwinnable war for America. That even if their governments were all just like Japan's, their people weren't, they weren't. He wanted to believe they did care about them, that if they saw they weren't the bloodthirsty dictatorship the American and South's representatives had said they were, they'd realize what was being done to them was wrong, and stop it.

He wanted them to be good.

“Yeah,” he said to his brother, quietly. “I do.”

It was why he was going.

“Then I have to go.” Gangwon’s fingers twitched, but he folded them into fists. “I have to do everything I can, too.”

Kangwon exhaled, holding his head in his hands. Through his russet fingers, he could see his brother, hands clenched so hard he was trembling, but still staring resolutely.

His brother had changed from who they’d been, and now from who he’d been. Whatever had made them the way they were when they were formed, this change was all his.

Could Kangwon deny that? What if Korea had denied them the right of changing when they’d followed him, or treated him in the cave? If he'd told Kangwon their hands were too shaky to disinfect his wounds or clean Bong-nam’s back, and it was better not to try at all… He didn’t think they’d be here now. He wouldn’t be who he was, he wouldn’t’ve saved all the people he’d saved.

But still, if the cost of his brother’s change might be him…

But that was selfish. And this was bigger than him.

“Alright,” Kangwon said, palms scraping his cheeks as he raised his head. “Then let’s get going.”

Gangwon’s guards almost didn’t let them. Hyon Jae-bom and Kim Pyeong-ung had both been in the KPRA, people they’d known personally as Kangwon, both of them former patients whose lives they’d saved. Korea had chosen the loyallest people possible to guard their secret Provincehuman.

It took a half-hour to convince them, Kangwon and Gangwon explaining the situation, how they needed to go. That Gangwon would never be alone unless it was to assure someone official that he really was with Korea of his own free will, and that that someone wouldn't be involved with the UN at all.

The two men had been guarding the Quarantine Hospital since January, witnesses to everything Gangwon had been. In the end, they grudgingly agreed.

"I'll be b-back," he promised.

Kim Pyeong-ung's thin lips pressed flat. "See to it. We can't lose you to the enemy."

"And that's a personal 'can't,'" Hyon Jae-bom added.

The men both saluted, and the Kangwons were released.

Gangwon blinked, unused to the non-artificial rich blue light of pre-pre-dawn. He was allowed out for brief breaks as long as he kept his ear slits covered, but he never took them. Too much work to do. Like Kangwon, if he got a moment's rest it was for rest.

He wrapped a blindfold over his brother's eyes, working with the face mask to hide his identity. Then he made sure he couldn't hear at all through the layer of gauze wrapped around his head and stuffed into his ushanka.

The spring breeze was mellowing, getting more refreshing than biting now. Soon it'd be the type of weather where their three Chinese comrades started wearing scarves instead of hats.

'Hopefully we'll have a ceasefire by then.' And they'd be on the way home, the war never having touched their country.

But that wasn't true. It already had. The Americans had bombed over the border before they'd even arrived, burning their peasants in their fields. They'd kept doing it now, blaming it on mistakes. And they'd brought the germ warfare to them, infecting the only people that'd really come to Korea's aid.

It was just another reason to go, to try and get at least a little bit of justice, for both of them.

Kangwon led his brother to the waiting truck, stopping at Jonsung complex to get dressed, grab his materials, and tell the Premier he was taking his brother with him.

The man's full lips pressed thin. But, “Be cautious. The enemy will strike at any weakpoint they can,” was all he said.

He knew that. But sometimes you had to expose a weakpoint to win the battle.

‘And save lives.’

Dressed in their high-collared black tunic suits (Gangwon’s borrowed from a Party member with a scrawny build like his) and crisp white medical coats to drive home that they were medical professionals, they emerged into the early morning sunshine.

They’d be driving all the way to the border with the Soviet Union, where a hastily-scheduled charter plane would take them to Harbin in China to meet up with the Chinese delegates and their own, who'd already headed over to Manchuria. Then a Soviet airline would take them to Moscva, and eventually Oslo.

Kangwon knew he probably could’ve got in contact with CCCP to get a private plane for their entire group to head straight there, but he didn’t need to add asking the Soviet for favours to the list of things Korea’d be pissed at him for when they got back. At least since the civilian airline was Soviet, he wouldn’t have to pull strings to get on. International travel with Provincehumans could apparently get complicated (he’d been asking around, avoiding Hwang, even though he probably had the answer), but within the ‘Soviet Bloc’ it was apparently pretty easy. CCCP wanted to encourage international solidarity with it, since subdivisions leaving their nations was something that didn’t happen much.

Kangwon didn’t think Korea would like hearing they were part of the ‘Soviet Bloc.’ But it was convenient. And hopefully he wouldn’t have too much trouble getting into Norway.

Even if they did, and he missed the first day of the meetings, so long as he made it on one of the next three, it should be fine. A speaking slot would almost definitely be opened up for them.

As they walked down Moran Hill towards the waiting truck, Kangwon was suddenly yanked back, a hand over his mouth as he was wrestled behind a rock formation, his back pressed to someone's chest.

His brother made a startled sound as his hold on him was torn away, and Sip Yung-su barked, "Comrade Kangwon?!"

"Get rid of them," a low voice murmured in his ear slit, and the province relaxed, sort of. He didn't ram his elbow back into his attacker's solar plexus like he'd been about to anyway.

"Just taking a toilet break," he called easily. "I'll catch up."

Footsteps pounded towards him, and his younger guard poked his head around the formation, gun drawn.

Kangwon smiled at him, now standing alone. "Sorry, should've said I was going. But it was sort of urgent."

Sip's eyes flicked over the barren slope, but even though it was still dark out, it was clearly empty. He coughed in embarrassment, holstering his gun. "Right, sorry."

"It's your job." Kangwon watched him go.

He probably should've taken the chance to go with him, but he was pretty sure he'd just be snatched again. With how early it was, he was pretty sure this wasn't just a chance meeting

"I don't have much time," he said, turning around. "What's up?"

China slid around the side of the formation, a slim shape in the shadows cast by the rock. "Where are you going, Little Brother?"

His narrowed eyes and soft tone said he already knew. Maybe he'd been inside the shelter, eavesdropping like he liked doing.

So Kangwon confessed, "Oslo."

China stepped closer, moving in a sinuous prowl that made him a bit wary. “And do you really think that’s wise?”

“No,” Kangwon admitted. “But I’m doing it anyway.”

“And taking your brother with you.” China took another step, slow and deliberate.

Kangwon held his ground, even as he thought about the foxes he’d watch stalk their prey in the woods, picking each paw up and placing it carefully down, right up until the kill rush.

“It’ll be a good opportunity to show the world we’re not holding him captive,” he said, echoing his brother’s words.

China echoed his. “And a good opportunity for our antagonist to snatch him up. A tiger cub is easy prey for an eagle.”

“Good thing we’re people.”

“Not just people.” The Countryhuman took another step, only a couple away now. “Provincehumans. I shouldn’t have to remind you what that means. But since you don’t seem to be using your brain right now, I will.”

One last deliberate footfall had him looming over Kangwon, staring down at him. Kangwon couldn’t see his mouth. But he got the feeling he wasn’t smiling.

“Even if you can both withstand torture, your Korea’s brother could still force your brother’s jaws open and take his secrets.” China watched him from above the mask, unblinking. “Secrets that I happen to have a stake in.”

“Gangwon doesn’t know about you,” Kangwon reassured him. He wanted to put some distance between them, but fought the urge. “And even if we were caught, he’d take himself out.”

He wasn’t sure if he could do it if it meant crippling him permanently, but he knew his brother could. And he was the important one.

The thought made him want to chew his nails even more than China's looming.

"For how long?" the other man asked. His voice was still cordial, but it didn't mask the energy he was radiating. "How long until he wakes up strapped to a cot, unable to disable himself again, and has everything he knows taken from him?"

Kangwon pushed the image away. "It doesn't matter," he said calmly. "The war should be over by the time he'd heal." If he did. "Then Commands won't work anymore."

"'It should be,' doesn't mean it will." China tipped his head. "And would he even need the Commands? Or would he fold the second America locked him in a dark room?"

Had one of them told him that? Korea wouldn't've.

Kangwon stuck his hands in his pockets. "I trust my brother."

"I don't trust our enemies," China countered. "And trust means nothing when it comes to Command."

He stepped forward again, and Kangwon had to give ground or else they'd be touching. When he spoke again, his voice was low.

"You are going to suffer for your trust, Little Brother. At the risk of sounding like our enemy, the Western countries aren't like us. Not because of something intrinsic, but because of time." China stepped forward again, forcing him back another step. "Do you know when this Norway was formed? 1814. He had no one to colonize his country and carve up borders as they pleased, no one to decide what his country should look like but him. For one hundred and thirty-eight years, he has been a kingdom, a king. He has never had to view the people he rules as people. He won't view you and yours as such."

"Maybe that's true," Kangwon said. Maybe all the time on the potter's wheel being molded by hands that saw him as above them had made the Norwegian Countryhuman similar to Japan and America. "But his people haven't lived longer than any other."

"But they've lived comfortably longer than us," China responded sharply. "You're a Marxist. You know the Europeans have spent generations as the subjects of kings and tyrants who let the blood they need from foreign nations. They don't see injustice in the boot pressing their head to the soil- they see it as their own crown. They don't know what it is to be the oppressed. Only the oppressor."

Kangwon opened his mouth, and he cut him off like he'd read his mind.

"Germany and his Hitler gave them taste. But it taught them nothing. Have you heard of the Sami?" The man didn't wait for an answer. "They're Norway's, his Indigenous people. And he and his Nordics have destroyed their villages, forbidden their languages, taken their traditions, cultures, names."

China's eyes slitted.

"Sounds familiar," Kangwon acknowledged. Very familiar.

"His government has torn children away from their parents and forced them into schools to 'Norwegianize' them," the country continued, tone still smooth, but eyes burning. "And Norway has allowed it, even after what they experienced. They've taken what the Nazis did and used it as a lesson, not in resistance, but in how to oppress. Do you know what Lebensborn was?"

Again he didn't wait for an answer. "Nazi soldiers 'recruited' women to bear their 'pure' children for them. They bred them like cattle. Do you want to know how those women are being treated now? Beaten, shorn, ran out of their homes, their children looked down upon and abused."

China leaned over, gaze burning down on him. "Some of our people might not look kindly on women who were made to bear devil-children. But we don't. And we change the minds of those that do. The Norwegians make no efforts to. They want it this way. They hate their women the same way our predecessors did."

"Our people didn't agree with it," Kangwon countered. Even if some people still held backwards views about women, it was less and less every year, especially with how hard women were working for the war effort. “They changed it. So-“

“Because even our men know what it is to be subjugated.” China’s gaze burned hot. “They know what it is to be humiliated and abused. The Westerners don’t. Anyone that would change Norway is outnumbered by those that wouldn’t because they profit from him staying the same. And those people are the only ones in power.”

The foreign country drew himself up, eyes flashing like knives. “You are heading directly into a country whose Countryhuman and his rulers are destroying their own people. And you think they won’t hesitate to destroy you?”

Kangwon’s jaw clenched. But he knew he couldn’t back down.

“Maybe they’ll try,” he said, meeting China’s eyes. “But you can’t really stop me from going.”

They narrowed again as he tipped his head, voice light. “Do you think so?”

Unbidden, Kangwon remembered his confrontation with America, the way he’d watched him like a wild dog.

But China wasn’t giving off the same feral feeling. As intense as his gaze was, his tone had remained smooth, with just a hint of ice under it.

Still, Kangwon’s body was telling him he was in danger. Not standing in front of a savage hound, but a pit viper coiled to strike.

“Korea wouldn’t be very happy to hear a foreign Countryhuman was ordering one of his provinces around, even if you’re a comrade,” he said, staying calm, but very aware of how much distance he had until he was out from behind the rock and in view of his guards.

China’s eyes squinted mirthlessly. “Did I say I was going to order you?”

“I don’t think he’d be very happy with one of his provinces getting detained. Or anything else."

"I'm not very happy at the prospect of my involvement in your war getting leaked," the man returned. "So I'll ask-"

He struck, and as ready as he was Kangwon wasn't fast enough. China's palm struck his chest, pushing him sideways into the rock before his hand was placed snugly up against the base of his neck. Pinning him lightly, not choking him, but with his fingers resting threateningly on his carotid, encouraging the province not to test an escape.

China's voice dipped low, freezing as the glacier breached the surface and he pierced him with an intense stare.

"Does your brother know that I am in your country? Is there the smallest chance that he even thinks I am?"

Pinned even more firmly by his gaze, Kangwon could tell he wouldn't just take a thoughtless answer.

So he thought hard, searching his memory for any chances Gangwon might've had to figure out China or his provinces were here. He tried to imagine what he would think if he saw masked people hanging around them, tried to remember when he'd first realized who 'Mao Zhilong' was.

He'd probably think they were high-ranking Chinese advisors who wanted to hide their identities from spies, or that Korea didn't want anyone knowing he was taking advice from foreigners. And he was sure Gangwon hadn't been around any of the three enough to see their white eyes or the colours of their flags. Kangwon had only seen because they were marching together through enemy territory, and China had to keep his ushanka higher on his head. And they still hadn't told him about the trial last year, so he shouldn't even suspect the Countryhuman could be here.

Since Korea had asked this same question, Gangwon hadn't even been in the same building as China or his provinces more than a handful of times. And they'd never been in the same room.

So Kangwon looked steadily up at China, his hand still on his throat, and confidently said, “No.”

The other man searched his face, narrow white eyes taking in every micromovement of his lips and brows, like he was reading him even deeper than his cousins and Korea could. It almost felt invasive, but Kangwon made an effort to try not to stifle any of them, letting him read that he was being honest, and hoping the fact that he could feel how his pulse didn’t match his tone didn’t make him think he wasn’t.

“I don’t want to risk your country or your people,” Kangwon added sincerely, his blood beating against China’s fingerpads. “You’ve helped us out a lot, and I don’t want to see you get hurt for it. If I thought he knew you’re here, I wouldn’t let him go.”

An armistice wouldn’t be worth it if the war just moved to their neighbour. The Chinese had been the only ones to come to their aid. China was one of the good countries for sure, even if he was weird and also maybe thinking about bashing Kangwon’s head off the rock behind him. He was just doing this because he loved his people, and the province knew he loved his people because he’d shared his blood with them. And none of them deserved to suffer for doing what was right.

“We don’t want to be reckless, comrade,” he told him, not dropping his gaze. “We just want to do what we can to end the war, so our people can all go home and live peacefully.”

China must’ve sensed his sincerity, or decided he really was telling the truth, because after a long second, his hand slid away, freeing him, even if he didn’t move back at all.

“You still shouldn’t go,” he advised, and he was back to sounding smooth and unbothered, like he hadn’t just been thinking about taking Kangwon out. “I doubt your Korea will be very pleased with you. And if he finds out I had a chance to stop you and didn’t, who do you think he’ll take it out on?”

It was true. If China tried to order him not to go, or did something to stop him, it would make Korea bristle. But so would letting him go. It was a lose-lose situation for him, but might actually work out for Kangwon. Given the choice between directing his anger at one of his provinces or a foreign country, he'd definitely choose China. And SH would have a better chance at stopping him from doing that.

Kangwon pointedly rubbed his throat, heart still pounding. "It's a chance I've got to take."

"Mm, admirable," China noted, actually sounding like he meant it. "And so very stupid. Korea will have lost a good doctor when you don't return. And a good nurse."

Kangwon's own fingers tightened around his own neck before he dropped them. "Good thing we will."

He looked up at the sky, the dark blue lightening by a few shades. It was around four. Time to leave.

"If you're done choking me out, I've got to go now."

China clicked his tongue. "Aiya, I didn't even apply any pressure. Would you mind telling me your route before you'd go? It might at least bring me comfort if I hear your plane crashed."

He was still antagonizing him, but Kangwon figured he probably should, so he wouldn't be sweating wondering if they'd been captured by the enemy if any planes were shot down.

He opened his mouth, then paused.

China was watching him, looking like he was smiling under the mask. But there was still an intensity to the eyes above it, like when he'd been giving that Norwegian 'current affairs' monologue. And Kangwon thought he knew why he'd been giving it.

China didn't have the authority to stop him. But his cousins did.

"I've actually got to get going," he said, taking a step back.

"So soon?" China asked, taking one forward. "I'd at least like to hear what you're planning to say. Maybe your flight path, so if your Korea wakes up in the meantime, I can reassure him?”

“My comrades already know it.” Kangwon took another step back, towards the edge of the rock. And as soon as the momentum of China’s next one ended, he turned and ran.

“You’re making a mistake.”

He wasn’t sure if the man grabbed for him or not, if he was committed to stalling with his words or willing to actually get physical. He just kept running, until he was far enough down the slope that he could see the truck waiting on the river road, and he knew the Countryhuman wouldn’t risk being seen by Gangwon.

Then he switched to a jog, looking back.

The few trees left clinging to the ridges of Moran Hill like solitary soldiers rustled in the crisp night breeze, spring buds swaying. Redstarts rustled their feathers as they waited for the sun, one even perching on the rock formation to preen its brown feathers. A drone came from over the hills. Nothing else moved.

Kangwon still hurried down to the base of the hill, jogging for the truck.

“Everything alright, comrade?” Sip Yung-su asked in concern.

“Yeah,” he said, jumping into the back with Gangwon. “But let’s hurry.”

Ri Il hit the gas on the GAZ-67, and they sped through the east checkpoint, on the highway to Chongjin and the Soviet border, hopefully before Liaoxi or Liaotung had reached the bunker.

China must’ve been prepared for this. Either he’d been lurking around Jonsung complex yesterday or picked up on something Kangwon was giving off when he’d taken his blood again after. He wasn't nervous, exactly, but he was filled with anticipation. And the Chinese man was scarily observant. If he really had been choking out Kangwon, he didn’t think he would’ve been able to filch the pistol at his hip the way he'd taken America's.

He rubbed at his throat again, deciding that he wouldn't tell Korea about that, if only to spare their alliance. His Countryhuman had a pretty firm 'I'm the only one allowed to throw him around' rule.

He also decided that one of his priorities in life was to never get pushed up against a wall by a foreign Countryhuman again. But with the way things were going, if he ran into Norway, it was probably going to happen.

'Better than anything else he could do to us.'

Gangwon cast him nervous looks as he kept peering around the canvas that covered the back to glance down the road behind them, prepared for a glimpse of the GAZ-MM or Chinese Jeep emerging out of the dark behind them.

Kangwon wasn't ready to get in a road race with his cousins, which meant he'd have to try and persuade them to let them go instead. Which would never work, especially if South Pyongan or North Hamgyong were there. Or SH. They'd try to talk him out of it, probably succeed at getting him to leave Gangwon, then resort to force to get him to stay. He knew they weren't above it. He'd tie one of them up if it would keep them safe, too. He'd tie up Korea to stop him from running off the way he did, even if his Countryhuman hated him for it. It would devastate him, but at least he'd be safe.

But they needed to do this. They needed to try.

He gave his brother a reassuring look, leaning back into the vehicle. There were only two seats in the front, so the provinces were sitting hunched up on the bench where cargo should go, safely hidden from any observers.

Gangwon pulled out his notebook, a fresh one Kangwon had bought with his own money, not wanting to take the one filled with their personal conversations out of the country in case something did happen.

"W-Why aren't we going to China first?" he asked. He'd gotten good at not talking too loud, but his volume crept up a little now, overcompensating for the fabric muffling him.

Kangwon balanced the notebook on his knees, writing, “The Chinese border’s got too many eyes on it. Plus it’ll be blocked up.”

Nighttime used to be the best time to cross the border, but now it was the other way around for a small section of the Amnok corridor. With the B-29 bombers limited, the day would be filled with supplies coming over, officers moving back and forth, the medical discharges being returned home, and stealthy troop movements (though most of them were still saved for the dark hours to disguise them from any reconnaissance planes that got too close). Kangwon had seen it for himself when making sure none of the villages in the area were infected (another thing he’d added to his notes- considering the Sinuiju area had a huge amount of traffic and Chinese soldiers stationed in it, it was weird that there were significantly less outbreaks than in areas beyond it, on both sides of the border)

Plus the Soviet border would have less of a chance for spies. Only slightly less, but Kangwon wanted to make sure they moved as carefully as possible. The amount of time they’d lose driving north was made up for by security and trying to limit the chance of Korea brutally murdering him when this was over to as little as possible.

“Get some sleep,” he advised, Gangwon straining to see what he’d written in the dark. “You were up late last night.”

He'd only got maybe an hour’s sleep. And they had a long road ahead of them.

His brother nodded, leaning against him in the cramped space, head cushioned by his ushanka. He closed his eyes, but Kangwon could tell by the way he picked his nails that he was too nervous to rest.

He held his brother's hands in one of his, stopping him from ruining what was left of his fingertips, and with one last backwards look, settled in for the drive, trying not to think about what China had said as he ran, not shouted in desperation, but calm, a solemn omen.

‘You’re making a mistake.’

Kangwon being the most calm, understanding, emotionally intelligent person alive:
Every Countryhuman within a ten-ri radius, including his own:
I need to slam him into a wall.

Also my cat was purring so loudly this morning as I aggressively rubbed his belly and face. I love him so much. <3

A Cruel Echo

It was ten hours from Pyongyang to the northern border, even with Ri Il driving as fast as possible, and Kangwon's identification card breezing them through checkpoints. They only stopped to refuel at supply depots, refusing to take toilet breaks until then, even though Kangwon had to bite down on the doctor's advice that it wasn't good to hold it.

As the sun rose, their country passed them by beyond the open doors of the GAZ. Rolling fields of freshly tilled and planted earth surrounded Pyongyang and Hwanghae, but almost no peasants tended them. Even without the B-29s, the other bombers were more than enough to keep most people nocturnal, the rising sun sending them scurrying into their holes. The few people Kangwon could see past the canvas worked quickly, never looking down for too long. Clusters of mounds dotted the landscape, dug-outs with people sleeping the day away inside.

As they reached the edge of Hwanghae, passing into Kangwon's province, hills rose up around them, scrub trees clinging to the muddy earth, still scarred from artillery from when the southern army had marched on the north. They passed empty villages, doors swinging on crumbling huts, where refugees had evacuated, heading for caves or anywhere safer than on a main road. Debris from the ruins that hadn't been so lucky lined the culverts, piles of brick, stone, wood, anything salvageable enough to reuse. Workers and volunteers surrounded some of them, piling them into carts and jige, headed for the local factories or depots, while others sat abandoned, not enough hands left even for something as important as not wasting resources.

Kangwon could feel his brother watching with him, getting his first good look at their country in over a year. His gaze filled with bone-deep sorrow as they passed a side road leading to a village, reading 'QUARANTINED. UNAUTHORIZED TRAVEL PROHIBITED BY THE MINISTRY OF PUBLIC HEALTH.' Militia men in face masks flanked it, watching them pass with shadowed eyes.

"It's why we're going," Kangwon murmured, squeezing his brother's hand as he showed him the words. "To try and stop it."

Gangwon's expression firmed, eyes hardening with resolve. "W-We will. And Korea will stop the war."

Kangwon squeezed his hand.

They didn't follow the highway all the way to Wonsan, turning on a mountain road that'd started being used more ever since their coasts were put under constant bombardment. Kangwon didn't need to see his capital to know it was just like those empty villages. He'd seen it from a distance on his visit to check on some of the rear units a week ago, the decimated swaths mirroring the burns on his skin.

As the mountains fell away again on SH's Kowon County, he looked west, across the plains. A patch of blackened earth spread at the foot of the hills, not even piles of rubble left to mark that a village had once stood there.

As bad as Wonsan was, it was still getting off lucky.

"W-Was that Yongpyong-ri?" his brother asked quietly.

"Yeah." Kangwon tore his eyes away. "It was."

Spring retreated the farther north they went, snow still lining the mountains around Chongjin and beyond. They finally reached Tumangang on the Soviet border around fourteen hundred. Sip Yung-su cut the engine, glancing nervously up at the sky. Kangwon joined him, making sure the fighters he could see off the coast were theirs before stretching out his compressed muscles, which he hadn't gotten to do since Chongjin.

"Let's hurry," his younger guard urged. "I don't like you being out in the open."

The area around the Tuman River was all floodplains and fields. The only cover was the buildings still standing in Tumangang Town and the dug-outs pebbling the ground around the border bridge. From here, Kangwon could see the shining surface of Sobon Lake to the south, fishermen crowded around it. And to the north he could see across the river into both China and the CCCP, where peasants in a distant village carried water from the riverbank, and workers worked on a rail line. Their countries all converged here, on the Tuman.

It was almost peaceful. The Americans weren't as brave about bombing up here, where every time they 'missed' their target, they might hit the Soviet Union. And though Ridgway had sent multiple raids claiming to be targeting troop build-ups, he still didn't seem quite as eager to do that as MacArthur had been.

But Kangwon could still see the craters where they had gotten brave, and the chunks missing from the border town. And he could see the American ships to the east, floating on the grey seas beyond the mouth of the Tuman, as close as they could get to the Soviet maritime border, waiting.

"Well," he said to his guards. "Here goes nothing."

"I still think we should come with you," Ri Il tried to persuade him one final time.

"You comrades know too much," Kangwon told him, also for one final time. "I know you're both capable, but no one knows if they're strong enough to resist torture until they do."

Which China had to know.

He glanced down the road behind them. "Comrade Kim Il-sung has a guard for us that we'll meet up with in Harbin. And you wouldn't be able to get on the charter plane anyway. I'm sure an hour from Kasan to Vladivostok won't kill us."

He smiled, but neither man looked reassured. They knew his guard wouldn't be able to go armed into a foreign country. Kangwon himself was feeling naked without his firearms and blade. The new comrade would be another pair of eyes at most.

"Just be safe," Ri Il said, obviously still reluctant.

"That's the goal." Kangwon sobered, looking up at them. "But if something does happen to us, Korea might execute you."

They both nodded grimly.

Korea didn't like executing anyone that could be re-educated, and he really wouldn't like executing someone that didn't even need to be re-educated. Ri Il and Sip Yung-su weren't being malicious- they were trusting their Provincehuman to champion the well-being of their republic.

But Kangwon was a Provincehuman. Which meant they weren't regular bodyguards. If he got hurt on their watch because they'd been too slow or not skilled enough, they'd probably be dismissed and held in a secure location until the war was over. But if he got hurt because of them, or because they'd let him do something they knew they shouldn't have, that was treason. If he was here for Korea to take his anger out on, it would probably save them.

But if him and Gangwon didn't come back, nothing would.

"I'm giving you permission to flee the country," he said calmly, the same thing he'd said to Gangwon's guards. "If I'm not back by April 3nd, you have a standing order to head to China or the Soviet Union."

He was doing this to try and help their people, and Korea. If he messed up, he didn't want his comrades getting harmed, or for his Countryhuman to do something he'd regret. It was his and Gangwon's decision to risk themselves- he couldn't ask his comrades to pay for it.

"If you don't come back," Ri Il said gravely. "Then we deserve to be executed."

Sip Yung-su nodded, jaw set.

With their decision made, Kangwon clasped arms with both of them, and they saluted as him and Gangwon headed for the border.

The guards manning the crossing watched them approach, and accepted their identity cards and travel papers easily, not asking questions, even though they were clearly curious. Pak Hon-yong had made all the arrangements for them, like the charter plane and the train to Vladivostok.

Kangwon's boots thumped on the wooden bridge, then on the dirt road on the other side, and suddenly they were no longer in Korea.

The air didn't feel any heavier. The breeze wasn't any less fresh or pine-scented. He didn't feel like he'd just been drained of energy or that something important had been taken from him. He was just suddenly very aware of the fact that he wasn't in his country, like he had been the few times he'd left it during the Occupation.

He wondered if it was mental or a Provincehuman thing. He knew at least some of his other cousins felt it, but then again, it could just be because they weren't used to leaving their borders. Maybe he'd ask China if he felt it, if they were still on good terms when he got back. Or his provinces.

Then again, if any of them did share the feeling (and didn't lie about it), maybe Kangwon shouldn't bring attention to it.

If it was a Provincehuman thing, what did that mean? Borders shouldn't really mean much, since country territory changed all the time, especially in the past. So if Korea annexed the ground he was standing on now, would he suddenly feel like it was his country?

Korea would never do that, but if he did, would he change? If their people did affect them in some subtle way, not just the way they treated them, but them, what would happen to him or North Hamgyong with the thousands of Russians living in Kasan now theirs? Would something in them change right away, or with time as they integrated and became their people?

Kangwon rejected the idea. As much as they all denied Japan's claim on them, Korea had been a Japanese colony. They'd been an official part of his empire for thirty-five years. If stolen land could change a Countryhuman, wouldn't some part of them have leeched into Japan, made him realize that what he was doing was wrong?

Wouldn't he have started to see them as just as much his people as the Japanese, and wanted to do what was best for them, free them?

...Was that why colonizers always tried to crush their colonies' cultures, or the minorities whose lands they conquered, like the Sami in Norway? To Norwegianize them, or Americanize Puerto Rico? As the years went by, did their stolen people start to leech into them, make them start to see things differently, so they moved to crush everything that made them see differently?

In the early years, Japan had kept their people distinct. They'd been forbidden from taking Japanese names, told they were subhuman. It wasn't until the thirties that he'd started to say their people were related, that they were cut from the same cloth, and began to force them to take Japanese names, to follow Shintoism and root out every last bit of Korean culture, even the ones he'd been lax towards until then. The treatment had only gotten worse, but the goal was different- not oppressing Koreans because they were 'lesser beings' that deserved to be oppressed, but doing it because he wanted them to become indistinguishable from the Japanese.

Had he done it because he felt himself changing?

The idea made Kangwon shiver in the truck to the Kasan rail station.

As open-minded as he was, it made him feel defiant, and uncharacteristically possessive. He didn't like to think that at any point, any bit of them or their people had belonged to Japan enough to affect him.

And he didn't like to think that if faced with seeing people they considered less-than as people, colonizers would choose to crush them over the threat of feeling empathy.

It was one of those uncomfortable questions he'd never get an answer to, so he pushed it away, watching from the window as they drove alongside the rail line that should connect them to the Soviet Union sometime soon this year, and the Korean border grew blurry behind him.

Their cousins hadn't made it in time. He could stop looking back. But he kept his eyes on it as the road curved, and so did Gangwon.

It wouldn't be the last time they ever saw their country. They'd be fine.

Still, as the train they were on carved a path through the Russian wilderness under the shadows of snow-capped mountains and deep blue lakes, Kangwon kept his eyes fixed behind them, on the grey line circled by tiny dots.

The Vladivostok peninsula was as far north as they'd ever gone during the Occupation, and they'd personally never gone into the city. Korea, SH, Chungbuk, and Hwang had, making contact with the people they needed for the March First newspaper. The town of Artyom was only familiar to them from a distance, and they still didn't see much of it as a Soviet-Korean drove them from the train station to the airport.

He'd been silent on the way, but as the Kangwons got out, he put a fist over his heart, saying in accented Korean, "Long live Korea."

Kangwon smiled, returning the gesture with Gangwon, who didn't need to hear to know what he'd said. "Long live Korea."

The Vladivostok Airport was a small cluster of buildings next to an airfield and a runway. Kangwon could only see one plane, a silver MIG emblazoned with Chinese markers, sitting on the bricks.

"Must not get a lot of people lining up to go to Vladivostok."

"What?" Gangwon asked loudly.

He sighed, signing, "Let's go find our ride."

But as they walked towards the terminal, a man jumped out of the MiG, scurrying their way.

"Ah, there are the comrades we have been waiting for!" the round-face man cried cheerily. "Come, come, don't try to escape Comrade Morozov!"

He grabbed Gangwon, whose eyes shot open, clearly terrified. Kangwon winced, but the Soviet only patted him hardily on the back before moving on to him.

Gangwon looked at him over his shoulder with alarm, signing, 'I thought he was going to kiss me!'

Kangwon had, too. Like Korea, he wasn't the biggest fan of the Soviet quirk. Well, he was probably more okay with it than Korea. But still not okay with it.

"When we hear very important Korean comrades are to be needing a plane, Artyom and I are volunteering right away," the man said in broken Korean as he pulled away. "Pavel Igorevich Morozov, for your pleasure. My accent is pretty good, Да?"

Kangwon looked past him at the man still leaning against the MiG, a cigarette in his hand, even though he had a scarf wrapped around the lower half of his face, aviator goggles over his eyes, and an ushanka on his head, completely stopping him from smoking.

He raised a brow. "You're taking us in a MiG?"

He'd expected a small passenger plane, or civilian monoplane.

"Of course, it is being said that such important comrades need to be seen safely to China. And now I am seeing why." Morozov eyed them, then flapped a hand. "Ah, but I am not here to ask questions, only to fly. Well, Artyom is."

He led them over to the plane, and the man with the covered face pushed off it. Morozov grabbed his cigarette, sticking it between his own lips.

"Artyom is not much for conversation," he said in Russian now. "But he had to come along. He wanted to see his namesake, you see." He laughed, elbowing the man, who didn't respond, looking between the Kangwons, then at Morozov.

Kangwon couldn't see his face past the scarf, ushanka, and pilot's goggles that covered every bit of skin, but he thought he looked displeased.

"Ah, Artyom is worried because we were told there would be only one passenger," Morozov said. "But is fine. It's not like Artyom hasn't done it with three people before, right, comrade?"

He belly-roared, elbowing his friend? again so hard he stumbled.

That... probably wasn't the safest. But Kangwon guessed it was sort of his fault for bringing Gangwon last minute.

"Well get in, get in." Morozov ushered them to the plane. "The sooner Artyom is back, the sooner we can return to shooting Yankees out of the sky like ducks."

Kangwon had only seen unwrecked planes a few times from close up while visiting their small air fleet from before the war. He'd forgotten how big they looked at this distance. He followed Artyom's gestures, climbing nimbly up onto the wing of the plane, and sliding into the second seat, already dreading the short flight as he tried to arrange his legs properly. Gangwon got up almost as easily as him, but had trouble fitting in. They had to shift around awkwardly, wincing as their burns were disturbed, until he was half on top of him, crammed into the seat.

'Yeah, we're not going to be able to walk after this.' He kept the thought to himself. Mostly because he couldn't sign with his arms completely pinned between his brother and the side of the cockpit.

The Soviet man slung himself into the front, doing his checks while the provinces tried to get comfortable.

"Good luck!" Morozov called cheerfully from below. "Artyom is an okay pilot! You will probably not crash!"

"W-What did he say?" Gangwon asked. He'd taken off the ushanka and ear muffler, since they were safe from broadcasts for now.

"He said enjoy the flight," Kangwon said as their pilot closed the cockpit.

As the engine roared to life, Gangwon flinched, crying out, and his heart stopped for a moment, too.

It was that drone he was so familiar with from every waking moment of his life, that had plagued them every step to the Raktong and every step back. That even if his brother couldn't hear in the sky anymore, he'd never forget, and could feel it vibrating through his bones.

It grew louder as the engine woke up, and Kangwon had to fight the urge to grab his brother and pull him down, or run, even with nowhere to go, as his body told him the jet was right on top of them, coming for the kill.

Gangwon was clinging to him, eyes squeezed shut, and he fought back his reaction, struggling to free an arm so he could rub his shoulder.

"It's okay," he soothed, heart pounding, still expecting the world to explode around them. "We're okay."

His brother nodded into his shoulder, taking deep breaths, still trembling.

Korea had once mentioned that they'd all learn how to pilot planes when they had time. Kangwon thought that might be harder than he'd first thought.

With Artyom ready, the jet started to taxi down the runway. Gangwon sat rigid, his bony frame pressing in close to Kangwon, his grip on his shoulder tightening as the wheels left the ground. There was a brief moment of weightlessness and then-

They were airborne, soaring into the sky.

Kangwon stayed firmly pressed into the cockpit for the first few minutes, while the pilot sounded off with the air traffic controller. But after awhile, he shifted, twisting himself into a slightly more uncomfortable position to look out the thick glass surrounding them, and almost immediately forgot about the droning.

The Russian SFSR spread out below them, a rippling banner of green and white, dotted with shining blue lakes, broad bands of shimmering water weaving them into the landscape like silver thread. Far below, just on the edge of what he could see, a train powered across the plains, smoke streaming from it in a long trail, the same one that had left Artyom Town, heading towards the next stop on its line.

Kangwon wasn't the most poetic person. The flowery prose had never really done it for him. But for a moment, he got why their visits to the top of Paektusan always sent North Pyongan to compose, and he was struck with a sudden deep longing to see Korea like this- the emerald valleys of Mount Kumgang, the gold fields of the Honam Plains, Paektusan and the sapphire waters of Chon Lake.

And their cities. Pyongyang and Wonsan and Seoul. He wished he could've seen them before the war.

He'd always thought maybe the distance made it easier. People could be like that. If it wasn't right in front of them, something they could see and touch, it wasn't as real. He'd thought maybe that was what made it so easy for the American pilots to wipe their villages off the map.

But up here, able to see the Soviet cities and towns and villages scattered over the landscape, little pockets of warmth in the vast wilderness, the people down below felt more real than ever. From so high up, none of the layouts looked unfamiliar, none of the houses looked strange. They could've been Korean, and so could the people in them. He couldn't see any of them, but he could see everything else- the roads and rails they'd built, the homes they'd carved into their country, the sort of lives they'd live inside, the same ones as his people. Nothing felt distant. Somehow, even though he was farther away from the earth than he'd ever been, he suddenly felt closer to everyone still on it.

Kangwon tried to imagine looking down at that tapestry of humanity and making the decision to wipe it out, to pull a lever and release fire hot enough to erase a village and everyone in it, or explosives to knock down the walls while families dined inside, or germs that would leave it nothing more than an empty shell. But he couldn't. It was too unthinkable.

So why wasn't it for the Americans?

"It's amazing," Gangwon breathed, pressed to the other side of the glass bubble.

"I wish Korea could see it," Kangwon murmured, knowing he couldn't hear him.

Artyom saw them looking, and he shouted over the jet's roar, "Welcome to the Motherland!"

His voice was different than Kangwon had expected. Raspy, but expressive. He realized he'd sort of been expecting him to sound like Chagang.

"It's amazing," he shouted back, leaning forward as much as he could. "But why do you call it the Motherland?"

He'd asked CCCP before, but he'd just said it was because one of the first 'Russias' had been female. He'd always wondered if his people had the same reason.

"Father is both Father and Mother!" Artyom shouted back, their plane curving. "He is our Parent."

Kangwon leaned back, content with the answer as he watched the land pass below, eventually shifting into the plains of northeast China as they took a wide curve into the country, Artyom identifying himself to more air control. The view was almost enough to forget about how bad his legs were starting to tingle after about an hour.

Almost.

But his body didn't forget. By the time they reached the Harbin airfield, Artyom had to pretty much lift them both out of the cockpit and down to the ground. Gangwon stumbled, hitting his knees as he moaned miserably, and Kangwon couldn't take more than a few steps, completely unable to feel his legs, paresthesia prickling from his thighs to his toes.

"It is a two-person plane," Artyom said sagely. "Glory to the peace-loving peoples of the world."

After being thanked, he left to refuel for the flight back.

Still half-dead, Kangwon and Gangwon hobbled to the terminal, escorted by a Chinese security guard.

Harbin's Majiagou Airport was busier than the Artyom one, but not by much. You didn't fly unless you had money. And coming out of a civil war, not a lot of people in China did.

Their representatives were already there, ready to get on the plane that departed in twenty minutes. They eagerly met them, introducing themselves. Kangwon had already met theirs- Ri Ki-en and his entourage- but was introduced to their guard- Kim Ju-bong, an impressively large man with a shaved head- and the president of the Chinese People's Committee for World Peace- Dr. Guo Moruo, a revolutionary and non-practicing doctor trained in Japan.

"We're glad to have you, comrades," he said confidently. "With your presence, I'm sure we can shine a ray of light on the dark deeds of the American Imperialists."

Kangwon had heard he was a poet, too.

"That's the plan," he said, hoisting the small case holding his notes. It had left an imprint a couple centimetres deep in his shin from the plane.

"I have to confess, I'm a bit worried," Ri Ki-en murmured as they boarded the plane, getting on with no problems. "Given our enemy's demands, I'm afraid it isn't wise to go travelling."

His eyes slid to Gangwon.

"We can't back out n-now," his brother said, getting what he was thinking.

He tried to sound confident, but the words came out around his fingertip.

"He's right," Kangwon said more firmly. "We're in this."

Ri Ki-en dipped his head, still clearly concerned, but didn't protest anymore.

This plane ride was way longer- ten hours to Moscow in total, not counting almost double in layovers- but far more comfortable. Their seats were wide and padded, and him and Gangwon sat with their guard at the front, given priority seating by the Soviet pilot on every leg. He gave his brother the window so he could talk to Ri Ki-en across their guard and the aisle, though they kept their conversations light since there were civilians on board. Not many, just a handful of Chinese and more foreigners leaving the country, and they'd all been seated away from them, giving them space. But Kangwon could see them watching him with open curiosity.

He looked back, catching the eyes of a pale brunette woman and an older Chinese man a few seats back. The province smiled, giving a small wave, and the woman's green eyes went wide as she quickly ducked back into her seat. But the Chinese man lit up, raising his hand in return.

Kangwon sat back, pinning his case with his feet, checking to make sure no green skin was showing past Gangwon's ushanka and face mask.

It was weird to be in the Soviet civilian plane. It was way bigger than the MiG, and he felt less like a passenger and more like he'd been swallowed by some large animal. An animal that had a bad smoking habit judging by the grey smog eddying inside, making him pull out his own face mask. He didn't know a lot about planes, but this one had had the word 'Aeroflot' branded on its side in blue, letting him exercise his Russian for the first time in awhile.

Kangwon felt a little guilty about it, but when they were offered meals, he took them, devouring the cold kolbasa, warm bread and buckwheat, and the little tin of black caviar, though he turned down the alcohol like his brother did. Kim Ju-bong watched the meals be put together (giving everyone else on the plane a free poison screening), and the price was included in the tickets, so there really wasn't any reason not to. And one of the stewardesses seemed to be really put out by how skinny they were, passing him and his brother extra buns as she held a finger to her lips. It was hard to say no to that.

Still, it felt a little like a betrayal to his cousins, who were going to sleep in the cold bunker with half-full stomachs and waking up to eat plain rice.

He was trying to eat without looking like he was starving, but he still ended up with a mouthful of black bread he couldn't swallow right. He looked away from Kim Ju-bong, silently trying not to choke, and met Gangwon's eyes, filled with the same guilt as his, his cheeks bulging with buckwheat.

Kangwon's lips twitched, and they both had to look away, now trying not to choke or break out into giggles that would single-handedly destroy their country's reputation.

The ride was smooth (metaphorically- physically they were being shaken around like the animal whose stomach they were in had decided to do star-jumps), the layovers in Chita, Novosibirsk, and the couple other cities weren't too long, and with their guard there, him and Gangwon could both get some sleep (though he only ever dozed, too interested in watching the endless tundra and settlements through the small window, intrigued by the fact that there were broad swathes of green and brown in it when he'd thought Siberia might have stayed snowy all year long). And eventually, they were in Moscva.

Well, outside it. Vnukovo Airport was a few ri southwest of the city. Sadly as hard as he squinted, he couldn't see the shape of the Kremlin against the distant skyline. He couldn't see much through the billowing grey banks of fog and the white glare of the spotlight bouncing off them. His ambiance was limited to the many windows and central tower of the looming terminal, and the large 'MOCKBA' sign over the doors that cast dramatic shadows down below.

Now the air did feel different. Thicker, maybe. They were halfway across the world, farther away from Korea than they'd ever been. Coming down to earth, he'd seen the differences in the buildings clearly- the angular edges of apartment blocs, the few twisting spires that had survived the World Anti-Fascist War, so different than anything in Korea. He'd seen similar uniforms to the ones on the Soviet soldiers smoking at the edge of the airfield on the comrades in their country after the Division, but the outfits of the people waiting below were definitely foreign- long, snatched-waist coats and huge fur collars on the women, slim jackets and thick, high-necked sweaters on the men, and more hats and headscarfs than he'd ever seen in his life on both. Crimson wildflowers sprouted from the bricks on the edge of the runway, and though they looked like peonies, he'd never seen their kind before.

Gangwon quailed behind him, shrinking back, and he guided him down the boarding ramp, sticking close to their entourage. The Soviets waiting for their friends and family to get off the plane were briefly distracted, watching him with wide eyes as they talked loudly to each other, either forgetting Provincehumans could understand all languages or just tired from being up so early waiting for the plane.

"Oh, that can't be a country. Whose republic do you think he is? Hungary's?"

"Look at the men with him. He's Asian for sure."

"He's very handsome, isn't he?"

"Спасибо," Kangwon replied to the last comment, smiling at the young woman with wheat-coloured hair that had said it.

She squeaked in embarrassment, hiding behind a laughing man as she buried her flushed face in her hands.

"I'm Kangwon province," Kangwon raised his voice to fulfill their curiosity and distract them from his brother. "From the Democratic People's Republic of Korea."

The words sent a rustle through the small gathering.

"Korea?"

"But they're still at war, yes?"

Then the rest of the passengers started to disembark, and the Provincehumans got the chance to slip away.

Away from the crowd, Gangwon peeked out from under his ushanka, looking interested in the world beyond the airport, even though he was still sheltering from the Soviets. "Kang, what's it sound like?"

Kangwon listened. Under the sounds of the onlookers behind them welcoming their loved ones back in Russian, Ukrainian, and a few other languages, he could hear raised voices from the terminal, distant engines, and the far-away whistle of a train from out in the pre-dawn. Somewhere a dog barked.

But there was nothing from the sky. For a moment, with no planes incoming or leaving, it was empty. The people around them were focused on the ones they were greeting, not looking up waiting for that to change, or hustling to get out of the light as quick as possible.

For the first time in twenty-one months, he was outside, and the drone was gone.

"Quiet," he said, and a tension he hadn't realized he'd been carrying left his shoulders. He placed his palm over his mouth for his brother.

Gangwon looked relieved, looking up at the white terminal building, red lights blinking on the top of the signal towers, then out at the vague shapes of the city beyond the edge of the spotlight.

"Do you think Korea would let us visit after the war's over?" he asked, intrigued.

Kangwon watched a brawny man get off the plane, running over to another man waiting for him. They passionately locked lips before slinging arms around each other, laughing boisterously as they headed off, asking how each other's wives and children were.

"Don't think so."

"Oh y-yeah." Gangwon side-eyed him, opened his mouth, then they both looked away awkwardly.

"Let's get inside," Kangwon suggested, starting for the terminal.

"Y-Yeah, inside." His brother scurried after him.

He was worried about getting on the plane that would take them to Stockholm, so at the final Soviet airport, the Spilve Airport in the Latvian SSR, he made sure to head to the gate early. But when he offered to show the Soviet security guard that patted him down his travel papers, he just waved his hand.

"No problem getting on the plane, comrade. Can't guarantee Stockholm or Oslo will let you in, but we can get you there."

"Thanks."

As the plane left Riga, Kangwon felt anticipation build in his chest. This leg of the journey felt... different. The Soviet Union was Socialist like them, full of comrades. If they'd ran into trouble there, if worst came to worst, he probably could've got CCCP to straighten things out. Now they were heading into a really foreign land- Sweden and Norway, two countries that were capitalist, and still monarchies.

'The Western countries aren't like us.'

He shoved China's words away again. Even if they weren't, it was definitely too late to back down now.

He didn't look out the window on the short flight over the Baltic Sea, focused on reviewing his notes, the death toll, his experience in the hospitals, the eyewitness testimony of finding masses of insects after American planes passed by, the insects he'd seen with his own eyes. Everything he'd collected over the past three months, all the proof of what was being done to Korea.

The Stockholm Airport didn't really know what to do with them, the security guards exchanging looks as they showed their identification cards and travel documents. They stared hard at Gangwon, hard enough to make Kangwon want to put himself between them. But he didn't want to make them think he was being protective because his brother was a hostage. And after a bit of discussion and thirty minutes alone in a back office, the Swedes decided that the best way to handle them was to pass the responsibility to the Norwegians.

The flight to Oslo was even shorter, just an hour. Now Kangwon stayed pressed to the window with his brother, looking out at the snowy hills, reassuring himself that the homes nestled between them looked just like theirs, and the Russians' and Latvians' and Swedes'.

As the plane began to descend, he sat back, heart fluttering inside his chest. Kim Ju-bong's jaw tightened so much he could hear his teeth grinding. Ri Ki-en clasped his hands tight enough that the knuckles went pale. Gangwon started to tremble, his breath coming faster.

Kangwon reached over, holding his hand in the privacy of the dip between their seats, and his brother's fingers tightened around his. He gave him a grateful look, and the russet province smiled reassuringly.

'We can do this.'

Gangwon took a deep breath, and when he opened his eyes, they were filled with determination.

'Yeah. We can.'

The plane shuddered and jounced as the wheels touched down, landing rougher than on any of their other stops before it came to a stop. Kangwon kept his breathing slow and steady.

This was it.

They left the plane last, heading down to the gate area. It was almost nine, but the slate grey clouds hiding the sun made Oslo barely any brighter than early morning Moscva. Snow still clung to the ground in sad, wet patches, and frost glittered on the blades of grass poking through in the fields around the airport.

"We made it in time," Kangwon remarked, pleased. He'd been worried about the many layovers making them late. He also wasn't sure he had a good grasp on how time zones worked.

"There's our driver," Guo Morou nodded his chin at a man holding up a sign that had his name in hanzi. "We should be at the venue with an hour to spare."

"Good," Kangwon said as their group made their way towards him. "I want to find an American delegate and give them a moment alone with Gangwon. I'll make sure I keep an eye on the room they're in, but I want-"

"Comrades," Kim Ju-bong cut in sharply. "Trouble."

Kangwon's stomach clenched as he followed his gaze towards the terminal, where a group of men had just emerged. They were clad in black tunics with matching black caps on their head, gleaming pistols on their hips. And they didn't look friendly.

"State Police," Guo Morou said tensely.

Like their Security Force. These were the people that handled serious threats.

And they had a Provincehuman with them. A tall man with navy skin, his broad frame straining against a black tunic like the others, but with gold epaulets, a royal purple sash around his shoulders, and a small bronze crown that almost looked like it was made out of blocks of stone on his head. The crest on his face was a man in armour, arrows in hand as he presided over two lions and a naked woman. It was hard to tell if she was reclining or about to be executed.

But it was easy to tell the province was feeling just as friendly as the officers.

Kangwon was suddenly very conscious that he wasn't armed.

"Keep walking." He casually put himself between the police and Gangwon, his eyes on the driver. "Might not be for us."

But they made a beeline for them, intercepting them before they could reach their getaway.

"What seems to be-?"

"Kangwon province of North Korea?" the lead officer clipped, his eyes like chips of ice as he cut Ri Ki-en off.

"Kangwon province of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea," he confirmed, keeping his tone friendly. "Can I help you?"

The Provincehuman- Oslo, he guessed- avoided his look, staring into middle-distance as he translated for the men, his voice as cold and deep as a fjord. He used 'North Korea.'

The chips of ice cut into the person hiding behind him. "Remove your mask and identify yourself."

Gangwon grabbed onto the back of Kangwon's coat, and he put himself even more firmly between them.

"Can you tell us why?" he asked casually, Oslo translating again.

He was ignored. "Identify yourself or we will be forced to identify you."

Gangwon was shaking, his eyes wide with confusion as Kangwon looked back at him.

"They want you to remove your mask," he said, trying to stay calm. He went to sign the words, but the Norwegian officer suddenly barked, "Now!"

Gangwon flinched at something he saw behind him, and Kangwon quickly pulled his ushanka off before the police could. Understanding, his brother removed his mask and gauze with shaky hands, squeezing his eyes shut.

Oslo examined his green skin and the gold province shape on his flag, looked at something in an officer's hand, then nodded, finally speaking his own words. "That's him."

Kangwon's heart sank.

The officer turned his icy eyes on him. "By the order of the Kingdom of Norway, acting under the authority of the United Nations, you are under arrest for the kidnapping and detaining of a Korean Provincehuman, and for the illegal invasion of South Korea."

His pulse almost stopped, but Kangwon didn't have a chance to be speechless, quickly translating for the others. Repeating the words himself didn't make them make any more sense.

"What?!" Ri Ki-en cried, outraged. "What illegal invasion?! The United Nations is the one that got themselves illegally involved in our civil war!"

"Be careful if you don't want to get charged with aiding a terrorist state," one of them men said coldly.

"Terrorist?!"

"Gentlemen," Guo Morou cut in, stepping to Ri Ki-en's side. "This must be a misunderstanding. Mr. Kangwon is a Korean Provincehuman. Even if the DPRK had invaded another country instead of responded to threats made against them by an illegitimate government, he can't be held liable for his Countryhuman's decisions without fair trial. And how can a Korean Provincehuman kidnap a Korean Provincehuman? If such a thing happened, it would be a civil matter for Korea to resolve."

"It is being resolved," the Norwegian said with finality when his province had translated. "Now step aside."

Ri Ki-en placed himself in his path. "We are a sovereign country," he hissed, eyes flashing. "Here to attend the World Peace Council. You have no right to detain our Provincehumans."

Kangwon saw the hand straying for his baton, and quickly pulled his delegate away from the man.

"Comrade Ri," he said, trying to stay calm even with his stomach turning in uneasy knots. "Don't give them an excuse. We need you at the Peace Council."

His comrade's jaw feathered. "But-"

"This is just a misunderstanding," he said, hoping Guo Morou was right, or he could at least turn it into one. "I'll try and work this out, and make it to the Peace Council tomorrow."

Ri Ki-en's fists clenched, the cords on his neck straining. He was usually a diplomatic, unruffled man, but Kangwon could see the fury in his eyes right now.

"Comrade," Guo Morou said, placing a hand on his shoulder. "We need a Korean at the council. You have the details of reports I don't have."

Kangwon nodded. "Our country needs to have a voice there."

Hopefully he could still be one. But if he couldn't...

Ri Ki-en looked between him and Gangwon, then sagged. "Fine," he spat bitterly, then rounded on the Norwegians. "But you and your country will be hearing from us."

"K-Kang, w-w-what's happening?" Gangwon asked, grabbing onto his sleeve.

Kangwon went to sign to him, but then the Norwegians were surrounding them, muscling them away from each other.

"Keep your hands off them!" Kim Ju-bong shouted, lunging forward.

"Don't," Kangwon called, struggling just enough to get his arms free, shoving his case into Ri Ki-en's arms, urgently telling him, "All my notes are in there. If I don't show up, use them. Don't let this distract you, focus on the biological warfare, we need-"

One of the hands grabbing at him suddenly wrapped over his mouth, yanking his head back. He tried not to fight back and give them another reason to persecute him, even as the cold steel handcuffs locked around his wrists.

Gangwon's eyes widened as they grabbed for him, backing up. "W-W-W-?"

"Don't resist!" an officer barked, hand going for his pistol, not his baton. "You are a foreign Provincehuman on Norwegian soil, any acts of hostility are acts of war!"

"He can't hear you!" Kangwon yelled in alarm. "He's deaf, he can't-!"

"Shut it," the man restraining him growled, grabbing his mouth again, muffling him with his pale hand.

Oslo didn't translate, watching with an almost bored expression on his blue face.

Gangwon backed up, eyes blown wide and white, darting between Kangwon and the men advancing on him, clearly wanting to run, but not wanting to leave him, and knowing he had nowhere to go. With his mouth and hands restrained, Kangwon had no way to talk to him, no way but begging with his eyes, 'Don't move, don't resist.'

His brother's thin chest heaved under his suit as he held his hands up, his breath coming in sharp gasps as he tried speak. "I-I-I'm n-n-n-n-n-ot-t- I-I'm n-n-not a- I'm- H-He's m-my- P-P-P-Please d-don't take m-m-me back t-to A-A-Am-m- A-m-m-m-m-m-"

His gasp shattered into a yelp as he was suddenly barrelled to the ground by one of the men, forced onto his stomach as they slapped more cuffs on him, Ri Ki-en, Guo Morou, and their aids making protests that weren't listened to.

Kangwon fought now, slamming his foot down onto the foot of the man holding him, taking the opportunity as his hand flew away to demand of Oslo, "If you're saying he's kidnapped, why are you handcuffing him?"

The man flicked his eyes to him, looking up and down, unimpressed. Then he looked away, like he wasn't worthy of an answer.

Realizing his brother was still gasping, so panic-stricken he couldn't get any oxygen in as the men bored down on him, Kangwon shouted in alarm, "He can't breathe! Get off him!"

At his words a blur shot past him, and Kim Ju-bong slammed bodily into the officers, sending the two men tumbling, freeing

Gangwon. Biting the bullet, Kangwon slammed his bent elbow back into his captor, breaking free and flying for his brother, skidding hard enough to scrape holes in his pants as he dropped to his knees on the merciless ground, trying to look him in the eye.

"Gang, it's okay," he quickly soothed, wishing he could help him up and rub his back. "It's okay, we'll get everything worked out, just breathe. Deep breaths."

His brother couldn't hear over the yelling, and his lips were moving too fast to read, but as he looked up at him, he calmed, his chest starting to rise and fall a little slower as he wrestled his lungs back under his control. Relief filled Kangwon a second before he was yanked roughly away from his brother.

"Assaulting a Norwegian officer," the man growled in his ear.

"He couldn't breathe," Kangwon defended, but wasn't understood by him, and was ignored by Oslo.

"Take him, too," the officer ordered, jerking his head at Kim Ju-bong.

"Gladly," the man growled as Kangwon told him what was happening, wiping blood from the nose of the guard he'd broken from his face. "You couldn't pull me away from my provinces if you tried, cunt."

"He'll comply," Oslo said, already leaving. "Handle them the way Norway said. I have other business."

"You don't have to do this!" Kangwon called after him, alarmed. He didn't know Norwegian, and he doubted it'd be easy to find a human that spoke Korean. "Let us talk to you! Please! I can prove Gangwon's with us because he wants to be!"

The Norwegian province didn't even look back, just brushed through the terminal doors and disappeared, the light glinting off his crown.

This was all going very wrong.

Kangwon and Gangwon weren't taken away by inconspicuously going around the building. They were taken through the terminal, right through the arrivals under the wide eyes of all the people that had been on the plane with them. One of the Latvian-Soviets tried to demand to know what was going on, but he was shoved aside, and everyone else just watched, a sea of pale skin and light eyes.

Kangwon flushed with shame. He was rumpled, Gangwon was still hyperventilating, and Kim Ju-bong was smeared in blood. He knew they looked like criminals. And now whenever one of these people thought of Korea, this was what they'd think of. His provinces being marched away by the State Police like terrorists.

Even if things worked out okay in the end, Korea was still going to kill him.

But they didn't.

As they were dragged back outside, the men holding Kangwon and Kim Ju-bong started hauling him for one sleek black cars waiting in the lot. And the men holding his brother started to take him for the other.

"Why is he getting in another car?" he demanded, but the men couldn't understand him, just like they couldn't understand Ri Ki-en and Guo Morou protesting. Even if they could, they didn't care.

"Kang, what's going on?" Gangwon cried as he was hauled for the vehicle. "W-W-Where are they taking me?"

"I don't know," he called frantically as his brother started to thrash.

"I d-d-d-on't w-w-ant to go!" he shouted, trying to break free. "I d-don't-!"

"Hold still!" a guard ordered, tightening his hold, and Kangwon yelled uselessly again, "He's deaf! He can't hear you! He doesn't know what's happening! Just let me-!"

"Gang!" his brother cried, terrified. "D-D-Don't l-let them take m-me please d-don't let them take me! Ic-c-c-an'tgobackIc-c-c-c-c-c-

Hyung!"

The word sent a desperate surge through Kangwon, and he slammed his head back into the man behind him, screw acts of war. He was too tall to smash his nose, but the impact still made him stagger, allowing Kangwon to kick back directly into his kneecap with full force. The officer let out an agonized scream, but he didn't care, tearing free and sprinting for Gangwon. Something in his face must've spooked the man holding him because he let go, fumbling for his pistol, and his brother got free, running for him.

"Hyung!"

"Hyung!"

They met halfway, colliding with each other, and Kangwon tried to lean over him, to shelter him from incoming bullets or batons. His hands were still bound, but he needed to hold his brother, needed to tell him what was happening and that it'd be okay, it'd work out. He bit down and yanked his hand up, feeling the metal cuff press painfully against his carpometacarpol. Gritting his teeth, he grabbed his thumb and yanked, snapping it out of place, sliding his hand free as pain lanced up his arm. Despite it, he wrapped his arms around Gangwon, and they buried their faces in each other's shoulders. He could feel his brother trying to free himself, but then meaty hands were on them, trying to pry them away from each other, the way he'd been taken by America and Rhee's men in the first place, before Kangwon had even got to know him.

But he knew him now, and he wasn't letting them take his brother so easily.

They clung to each other, Gangwon pressing as close to him as possible, trying to get as much purchase with his chin on his shoulder as he could, and Kangwon with his nails sank into his shoulder blades, blinding pain throbbing in his wrist. Kim Ju-bong and their delegates were shouting, demanding the Norwegians keep them together, and a crowd had started to form on the roadside, undeterred by the police telling them to keep back.

But the brothers didn't care, their eyes squeezed shut as they clung to each other, tried to do it with more than their bodies so they wouldn't lose each other again.

Then the officers finally overcame the scrutiny of the crowd, and a baton slammed into Kangwon's back. He grit his teeth, holding tighter as it battered his shoulders, until a powerful blow took him in the side of the head, and the shock was just enough for the men pulling at him to haul him away, separating them.

"HYUNG!" Gangwon screamed, lunging forward on his knees, but he was yanked back, too, dragged away from Kangwon.

North Kangwon resisted his captors, reaching out for his brother, almost managing to grab him again. South Gangwon lurched for him, eyes gleaming desperately, arms straining as he tried to reach for his hand.

But his hands were still bound. He couldn't reach. And Kangwon had to watch through the bars of his outstretched fingers as his brother was ripped away from him, jammed into the back of the black car.

"HYU-!"

The door slammed, cutting him off, and as Kangwon writhed and fought his own inextricable backwards pull, the vehicle drove away.

"You can't take him!" he cried, filled with a panic he hadn't felt in maybe forever. "You can't take him! He's my brother!" To the crowd of onlookers, he pleaded, "He's my brother!"

They all stared at him with wondering eyes, not even the Soviet man understanding, looking confused and curious and worried and foreign.

And then Kangwon was being crammed into the back of the vehicle with an unconscious Kim Ju-bong, blood pouring out of his nose, and they were driving away.

Away from his brother.

This chapter has influenced my opinion on Norway. Now it's time for the 'war with Norway' arc!

You have no idea the research I had to do to figure out the trip. Soviet flight paths, which airports existed at this time, types of planes (for the planeheads, the MiG is a MiG-15UTI which has two cockpits for flight training, and the Aeroflot one is an Ilyushin Il-12, the most common Soviet airliner at the time), how long does it take, types of airline food in the 50s. My brain can't wrap around the concept of time zones, it just starts short-circuiting. When I went to China I was literally an hour off from my usual time but I had to go ask a lady twice if my flight time was on my time or the time of where I was. If my electronic ticket says departure 16:00 is that departure 16:00 from where I bought the ticket, so departure is really 15:00, or is it 16:00 now? And the DPRK is eight hours off from Oslo so you understand how this might trouble me. But I think I have everything accurate. It is also very crazy that you used to be able to just get on a plane. Not even any ID, just show up a half hour beforehand, get frisked and get on. No wonder terrorist attacks used to be so common. It's like leaving unwrapped fruit at the market.

Also a clarification- if you're reading a future document about the biowarfare, Ri Ki-en and Guo Morou will come up in it (they're real people) but they're spelled Li Ki Ien and Kuo Mo-jo because of how romaji systems change. And a reminder that in real life, 'hyung' is only used for older brothers. You wouldn't have two brothers who call each other hyung. But because of North's 'no fighting over who's older, you're both hyung/ noona/oppa/eonni' rule (wonder why he had to come up with that), Kangwon and Gangwon both use hyung. Just so you don't get a misinformed idea of Korean.

Everything Is Up To You

"Are Kang an' Gang goin' to be okay?" Hae reworded her question for the fifth time since this morning, when Liaotung had driven into the clearing while she was on watch, and woken them all up with the news that Kangwon and Gangwon had left for Oslo.

Worry made SH's voice come out tighter than she'd meant it to. "I'm sure they'll be fine."

Her cousin looked down at the patch of earth on the edge of the woods, her gnawed-on lower lip trembling. "What if somethin' happens to 'em?"

'Darn it, Kangwon.' She couldn't believe he'd pulled something like that without even telling them.

Of course if he had, they would have stopped him. Darn him for not giving them the chance. And now-

SH ran her brush over the wall. It would be fine. It had to be. Kangwon and Gangwon would be home safe in a couple days, and she and the others could ream them out for acting like Korea then.

Trying to force a more positive tone, she said, "Well, we won't know until we know. Now come on- help me get this tarp on."

Hae glumly helped her pull the canvas over the little plot of land on the edge of the woods, protecting the seeds planted in the freshly-tilled earth from any late-season frost during the night.

It had been SH's idea, using seeds and tools South Pyongan had gotten her from… somewhere. She'd just winked when she asked, which was something to tell Korea about later, but was useful for now. She'd thought that the little garden could keep Hae from wearing herself completely to the bone by making her take breaks from organizing sowing in her province, like she had been ever since she got better. And they could have healthier meals, and donate any extra to the people they gave their rations to on weekends, or even to the front.

And she'd wanted to give Korea something nice to wake up to, not just the war talk and the secret sessions he'd still feel guilty over, especially now. She'd hoped it might make him feel a little better.

But if Kangwon and Gangwon didn't make it back…

An engine rumbled down the road, and her and Hae turned to watch as China's Jeep left it, lights off as it headed through the field of stumps towards the dark gap in the trees.

Hae looked up at SH, nervous anticipation painted across her face. Her cousin forced a smile, taking her hand, leading her in the same direction.

They had made it safely to Oslo. They'd be back in a few days. Nothing bad had happened.

SH knew she was wrong as soon as they emerged into the moon-dappled clearing outside the bunker. The rest of their cousins were gathered there with the Chinese women, China standing before them.

He looked over, meeting her eyes. Unsmiling.

When he'd finished telling them what happened, they were all silent. SH held her head in her hands.

They'd lost the Kangwons. Not just the two provinces who were able to save their people from the biowarfare, but the Kangwons. Kangwon who tried to work things out with her and her brother, and even if it was annoying because their relationship wasn't her fault, she always appreciated that he cared. Kangwon, who always made sure to check up on them, even with everything else he was handling right now. The only one who, even when she hated it and wished he wouldn't, tried to talk to her about her past, and had taught her the wall-painting method, the only thing she had to hold back the dark thing and keep her sane.

And Gangwon. She hadn't even gotten to know him properly, but she knew him from the old Kangwon, teasing her about her cooking, teaching her to sew, making her herbal tea when she got sick. He was so nervous and shaky now, but she knew he was still him. When she'd shown him the sketch of Seoul she'd made for Korea's birthday on the way to the Raktong, he'd smiled and seemed so pleased she'd kept up the talent she discovered after Liberation.

And now they were both gone.

It was Hwang that spoke first. "Do we know what happened after their vehicles departed the airport?" he asked urgently.

"No." China's voice wasn't as light as usual, maybe genuinely upset or maybe just rightfully thinking they wouldn't take kindly to him brushing off their cousins being kidnapped. "Your Ri Ki-en and my Guo Morou were only able to get in contact with us after today's council ended, and they did it immediately. They weren't able to find out any more information. And I am sadly lacking in Norwegian agents."

"So, what?" South Pyongan asked, anger colouring her voice as she jumped up from her log. "They're just stuck in Norway? We've gotta go break them out!"

"We can't just fly into Norway," North Pyongan said gently from beside her. "Especially when we have heard what can happen."

"Like hell we can't!" his sister cried. "Send me in if you're all too cowardly to go! If someone tries to kidnap me I'll fucking kill them. Man, woman, kid, I'll beat the fuck out of every single one of those yellow-haired snow-devils! If those Norwese think they can take my goddamn cousins, they have another thing coming. And that thing is me."

"Norwegians," Hwang corrected as she seethed. "And that would be an act of war."

South Pyongan rounded on him. "And stealing two of our Provincehumans isn't?"

“It is. But we can’t afford another front right now. Especially one we can’t even reach, lacking in an air force as we are.”

Despite Hwang’s clinical words, SH could see the way his hands trembled as he took his glasses off to polish them.

South Pyongan bared her teeth, then spun to kick the log, chips of bark flying, spraying North Pyongan and Liaoxi. “Ssi-bal! Those fucking bastards!”

“Sister.” North Pyongan put a hand on her arm, brows furrowed, and she thumped onto the log, roughly scrubbing at her masked face.

“Damn it. Fucking damn it.”

“What’s goin’ to happen to 'em?” Hae piped up, and the way her face crumpled in made SH’s heart pang. “Is Norway goin’ to send ‘em back to the Southern One?”

She opened her mouth, but North Hamgyong- of course, always him- cut her off.

“Of course he fucking is,” he growled, fists clenched. “He’s going to pack them up in a sedge box and send then straight to the Yank as a gift because Norway is his little bitch, just like the rest of the fucking Euros.”

“I tried to tell him,” China chimed in from the side. “He wasn’t very receptive to it.”

For once North Hamgyong didn’t seem disgusted by the foreigner talking to him. “He didn’t fucking listen because he’s a damn moron who thinks all everyone needs to hold hands and get along is a fucking lecture.”

He swung his head to SH, who started painting the wall reflexively, trying to put as many layers as possible between the dark thing and whatever he was about to say.

“I told you his bleeding heart was going to get him killed.”

Paint chips went flying, undoing all her work as the thing lunged at him.

"Is that all this is to you?" SH asked in furious disbelief. "A 'got you' moment? Kangwon and Gangwon are gone, they're in enemy hands, probably going to get handed off to America so he can torture them again, and you don't even care?"

"They deserve it," the person she was ashamed to call a brother growled. "They knew damn well what they were walking into." He looked her in the eye as he said it, making the dark thing tear at the wall in its struggle to get through. "They made their stupid fucking choices and now they're going to-"

"STOP IT!!"

SH startled, her own scream dying on her lips as they both startled in Hae's direction. She was up on her feet, hands balled at her sides.

"Stop fightin'," she ordered, doing her best to glare up at them. "Kang an' Gang are in trouble, and we need to get 'em back."

"Hae is right." North Pyongan moved to SH's side, laying a hand on her shoulder. "Let's all calm down."

SH took a deep breath, using it to buy time to paint a blue flower over the wall, dark blood dripping from its petals.

"You're right," she said, smiling, avoiding looking at North Hamgyong. "We need to figure out what to do."

When she got back from trying to catch up to the Kangwons with South Pyongan and Liaotung, the General had told her that all they could do was hope they succeeded, and if they did get caught that there wasn't much they could do. Neither them or China had diplomatic relations with Norway, and he hadn't even recognized Korea at all. Any negotiations between them would have to include the United Nations, and they all knew how that would go.

She wished the man would have told her what Kangwon was planning. She got why he didn't want to give them orders, but surely it wouldn't hurt for him to be hands-on with them at least once. He didn't even have to order him not to go- he could've just had someone restrain them until she could come smack sense into her cousins' heads.

"We need to act fast," Hwang fretted. "If they're still in Norway, we need to know. While their transfer to Korea would put them more within reach, it would also put them directly into America's possession."

"And then the Southern bastard gets to pump Gangwon full of Commands," North Hamgyong finished in a growl.

SH saw Liaoxi and Liaotung exchange worried glances. North Pyongan did, too, and went to sit next to the citrine-skinned sister.

"Comrade China," SH said, looking over at him. "I think it might be best for you if you returned to your country. At least until this is resolved."

North Pyongan nodded, looking at the Chinese with concern. "If Gangwon knows you're here, South could find out."

"And that means the miguk-nom would," North Hamgyong said grimly.

Despite the fact that he hated China, and had said that awful thing about turning him over, he still looked angry. But SH knew it wasn't out of any love for their neighbours, only hate for Korea's brother.

"Even if you won't leave permanently, perhaps just for a couple weeks?" North Pyongan suggested, the words directed at China, but his hand brushing Liaoxi's. "Just enough time that we feel confident America could not have Commanded that information out of him."

North Hamgyong glowered at him, and SH knew what he was thinking. America wasn't the one that could use the Commands.

"Oo, he doesn't want his girlfriend's country to get firebombed," South Pyongan teased, poking her brother's cheek. Then she said in a completely different tone of voice, "Sorry, not the time. Yeah, seriously, you comrades should get out of here."

The Chinese provinces looked at China. SH didn't see his face so much as move, but after a second, they both shook their heads.

"I do not believe your cousin knows," Liaoxi said. "And thus he cannot tell our foe."

"And when it's tortured out of Kangwon?" North Hamgyong demanded. "He does know."

"Hm?" Liaotung arched a slim brow. "Are you saying Korean provinces can't handle a bit of torture? Interesting."

He glowered at her, and SH quickly said, "It's only our suggestion. If our comrades are confident their secret is safe, then we're satisfied."

"And we're goin' to get Kang and Gang back before they get tortured or Commanded." Hae put her hands on her hips, full of confidence. "Somehow."

They all went silent, trying to think of what that 'somehow' was.

"We need to wake Korea."

SH looked over at the stove. Chagang sat on a stump in front of it, expression solemn as he gazed back.

The others all looked around at each other reluctantly.

"I was hoping we could get them back first," SH said delicately, adding with her slightly tight smile, 'So Korea doesn't drown them both in the river.'

"We need to," Chagang repeated, undeterred. "We do not have the means to travel to Norway. We do not have the military means to go to war with them. And we do not have the political means to negotiate their freedom. We need assistance."

SH thinned her lips. They all knew what that meant.

"We need to get our cousins back." For once, there was an edge to Chagang's voice- ice-cold anger.

It warmed SH's heart. She'd imagined he'd reacted to her and the others' capture by America before with stoicism. But it looked like she was likely wrong.

"As much as I understand why you would dislike what I believe you're implying," China began. "I think it might be your best course of action."

And it was one they couldn't follow without Korea. Even if that person might listen to one of them, they'd join the Kangwons in the river after for going to him.

SH scrubbed a hand over her face. She'd really been hoping to spare the brothers at least a little of Korea's wrath.

But his wrath was better than America's. Korea being disappointed in them might make them want to die. But America might really make them wish they were dead. Even though they weren't women, any number of other terrible things could still be done to them. It wasn't a question of if South would stop it- it was a question of if he'd ever even know they had been captured. Since Commands wouldn't work on Kangwon, the Yankee might take him straight to 'interrogation.'

And even if they protested, she didn't think South would investigate.

"Alright," she said eventually into the silent clearing. "I'll go wake him up."

As reluctant as she was, the decision lightened her. It had felt so strange not having Korea there in the morning to give them orders for the day, or at night to receive their reports. He'd been out before, but never for this long. Aside from her time in Gyeongmudae, this was the longest she'd ever gone without hearing his voice. Even when she had her itinerary planned for the day, she somehow still felt a little aimless carrying it out, no matter how important the work she'd set herself was. None of them had said anything, but she thought her cousins felt the same way.

But probably not North Hamgyong.

SH slid inside the bunker, off to finally wake up her Countryhuman, and hopefully rescue their cousins.

—

A jumbled mess of sounds, tastes, smells, sensations. Gentle hands he knew so well caressing his throat, some of the only ones that could touch him there without making it squeeze shut, warm slurry on his tongue, too weak to reject it, cotton in his head, sharp antiseptic, blood-

'Wake up.'

-clean cloth, sweat and desperation, a beloved warm voice telling him something he could only catch in snatches, the last spark of life draining from chestnut eyes, cool air on his burning flesh, cooked meat, his brother's wide, scared eyes looking down at him-

'Something's wrong.'

-fire lancing across his eye and his chest, over and over and over, cool hands lifting his head onto a lap, soothing his brow, warm liquid sliding down his throat, filling his senses with the scent of medicinal herbs, bitter and fever-breaking, a soft, low song threading through it all, the words foreign but somehow familiar.

It faded now, replaced by that high pitched droning whine, reminding him that it was March First, that it wasn't enough, that his people needed him.

North felt himself sinking again, and grabbed desperately for the light he could see past his lids, trying to cling to it, to drag himself out of the blackness trying to pull him down, his body trying to make him rest, to force him into a real recuperative coma when all he wanted was to

'Wake up!'

North lurched up, gasping for air like he was breaking water as he threw himself to the side, expecting an attack. He thrashed, legs tangled in the bedroll, and managed to free himself, hand going for the tiger knife, still where he'd left it when he went to sleep.

The room was empty. He stayed on all fours, panting, hand clenching reflexively around the silver blade.

His mouth was dry, he desperately needed to piss to expel the toxins his body had built up while he slept, and he felt like the fever had sweated at least five pounds off of him, leaving him soaked in sour sweat.

And he was awake, the thing he'd been fighting for for what felt like months. The pain from his burns flooded back like relief, anchoring him firmly this time, assuring him he wouldn't slip back under, and reminding him- it wasn't March First.

But his people still needed him.

And they needed him now. There was a pressure building inside him, every hair on his body standing on end. Something was wrong, he could feel it, the thing that had woken him up, let him break through the coma's grip. Something was-

The door swung open. SH stood in the doorway, blinking in surprise as she saw him kneeling on the floor, awake.

She was thin, a new bandage peeking out from her collar, but aside from that she looked unharmed, no worse off than when he'd gone to sleep.

Her eyes told a different story.

"Korea-"

He cut her off, his voice even raspier from disuse. "Something's wrong."

Her lips thinned. "Yes."

In a few minutes, he was dressed in his non-sweaty summer uniform and outside, filled in on what had happened.

"I'm sorry, Korea." SH lowered her eyes. "We should have driven faster. We should have cut them off."

"Don't blame Comrade SH," Liaotung said, standing. "I was the one driving. It was my fault, gege."

"Don't blame me." China sounded as unbothered as ever, even with the security of his country possibly compromised. Again. "I had nothing to do with it."

North ignored them all, his pulse racing.

Ssi-bal. Those stupid fucking idiots. He should have known.

North was going to kill them. He was going to peel all their skin off, scrub them down with raw salt, and waterboard them in soy sauce. He was going to cut off their feet at the calves so they could never leave the hospital again, and hang them around their necks like a dog with the chicken it had killed. He was going to make them both regret being formed, let alone going to fucking Norway.

But first he had to get them back.

How was he going to get them back? A Countryhuman couldn't just march into another country. It was hard enough for a Provincehuman. Norway had probably only let the Kangwons in to take them hostage. He'd have to be smuggled in, and find some way to smuggle them both out. It could take days, days he didn't have.

If he didn't get them back right now, they were going to be returned to America. He was going to make South Command Gangwon, find out everything he'd ever seen. What if North had slipped up and allowed him to see something crucial? What if he had seen China and just hadn't said anything? And he knew North was asleep, he could tell America his biowarfare had worked, he could tell his brother he was weak, that he couldn't-

And even if Gangwon didn't know anything but that, Kangwon did. And if America wanted what he knew, he wouldn't stop until he got it, tore it out of his province alongside his teeth and nails and who knew what else. If he had a human do it, he'd heal, and then he could do it all over again.

The thought made his chest grow tight, his jaw creaking.

His mind whirled, assessing his provinces while he tried to think, over and over, looking for any signs of harm.

They were all as thin as SH, but not enough to think they'd been taking advantage of his absence to donate more than they should. Chagang's bandages had moved from half of his face to two-thirds, only his eyes and an unburned portion of navy skin revealed. South Pyongan was in full protective gear, and North Hamgyong's hands were covered in cuts from working on the rails.

And they were all looking at him expectantly, like now that he was awake the problem was already half-resolved. Kangwon and Gangwon would be feeling the same way, waiting for him to rescue them like he had before.

He didn't want to resort to this. But there really was only one choice.

He drew himself up, squaring his shoulders. Anger over whose fault it was and who was complicit could come later. Right now, he had to save his provinces.

"I'm going to speak with our Supreme Commander." North marched for the Jeep, narrowed in on his goal, the thing he always detested doing.

"I need to contact CCCP."

—

1945

People marched through Pyongyang, men and women, proletariat and petite bourgeois, elders hobbling on shaking legs, leaving their futons for the first time in years, pulled out into the streets with the others, all dressed in choson-ot and black suits and rags and spotless white clothes that gleamed under the summer sun, no one left to strip them from them. Children ran underfoot, laughing, not understanding what was happening, but feeling their parents' joy, feeling that for the first time in their short lives, some unnamed heaviness had lifted off their shoulders.

Korea felt it, too. He watched the Korean- Korean, their white banner and crimson and sapphire taegeuk, flying for the first time without fear of the hand holding it being severed by a Japanese sword- flags wave over the crowd.

And another, too. The taegeuk, but rotated and without its black dashes, shifted to the left to make room for three red bands that crossed it horizontally. Not the flag of the exiled Provisional Government or the old Korean Empire. Lyuh Woon-hyung had said the Committee for the Preparation of Korean Independence was planning to use it for their People's Republic of Korea, but it wasn't theirs either.

It was their people's, the flag they'd willed into being before the exiles had set foot back in Korea, by setting up the People's Committees, by feeding their neighbours, by organizing and driving out the last Japanese. By governing themselves for the first time not only in thirty-six years but ever. No more monarchs, no more foreigners, just the people whose hands had truly built Korea.

And it was North's flag, too, appearing on his face with a strange tingle as he'd been embraced by their people in Seoul, the taegeuk swirling around his right eye. They'd stitched it for him when they'd heard their Countryhuman was coming, tearing up white sheets and shirts and pants, weaving threads with different hues of red and blue into them. They stuck out over the crowd, sloppy and hastily-stitched compared to the flags worked on in secret for years. But somehow, Korea felt his eyes being drawn to the patchwork People's Committee flags instead.

"Long live Korean independence! Long live Korea!"

The throng of people around him, the pulse of thousands of feet on the earth, the thrum of thousands of voices in the air, thousands of hands touching him, reaching out and embracing their country openly for the first time, finally theirs, was like that river of people from a lifetime ago, demanding independence, sweeping North along with them.

And now they had it. And he wasn't being swept along, he was flowing with them, guiding them, not to the old elementary school where that preacher had spewed his words and then walked away when it all went wrong, but to the government district, standing boldly in the center of the old capital, none of them rebels or criminals anymore, but presenting themselves as they had in Seoul and every other town and village they'd passed through, taking their place as Korea's Countryhumans.

For the first time that he had ever seen it, Pyongyang wasn't burdened under the weight of oppression and misery, but was light, just like Seoul, just like Korea. For the first time ever, he was light, too.

Or he had been.

North had stepped back, letting their people overwhelm South. He still had their old flag, for some reason, and it felt so good to see the face he'd missed so desperately smile, lighting up in a way that made his chest swell so much his heart could have burst.

He couldn't let it distract him. People still crowded around him, but he kept on alert.

And through the crowd, he spotted him, the person the Soviets that had been here for days had warned him was coming when he'd arrived this morning, their foreign voices boisterous, like he should be pleased.

"Long live Korean independence!" his people chanted in elation, many of them still with no idea of how short-lived it would be.

The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics made his way though Korea's people like a warship slicing through waves. North watched carefully, his body wound like a coil, poised to rescue his civilians from him if he so much as brushed against one too forcefully.

But while his path didn't waver, he didn't barge through, slowing his steps just enough to give anyone that hadn't noticed him time to get out of the way, and disentangling himself from the ones that reached for him, eager to welcome an ally in the war against the Japanese, instead of shoving them away.

He was conscious of his size then, used to his body obeying his commands. Good spatial awareness. North could tell immediately that the stories of him fighting in his Civil War and this world war were true. He had the bearing of a soldier.

His teeth grit.

"South," he warned, and his brother looked at him quizzically, then followed his gaze. His eyes went as wide as landmines.

North placed himself between his brother and the approaching country, running a threat assessment as he closed the final distance.

He was huge. Enormous. He towered head and shoulders over every Korean in Pyongyang, and likely even over his own soldiers. He had none of them with him. He could be overconfident or he could be feigning harmlessness with snipers on the roof. If it was the latter, their provinces were poised to take care of it.

And he was built of pure muscle, North could tell. His shoulders and chest visibly strained at the fabric of his high-necked grey sweater, despite the thickness of the fabric. He wasn't wearing a military uniform, just that, a long brown coat, plain trousers, and an ushanka, likely to lull him into a false sense of security.

It looked like it was true that Germany had taken his eye. A black patch covered the right one. But the other was sharp, serious. Even though it was fixed on the Koreas, North could see the way it flickered, subtly scanning his surroundings, just like him. The handicap wouldn't make him any less formidable.

North's observation dipped to the hands at his sides. Red, littered with pale pink scars and more recent lines of scabs. Thick fingers and clean, malformed nails. He couldn't see his palms.

It would be a hard fight, but North knew he could take him. The country didn't have a visible weapon on him, and it would take a few precious seconds to draw his hidden pistol or blade, seconds the Korean could use to strike. The foreigner might have the physical advantage, but North was better fed than he'd ever been, and his size would let him maneuver more easily. The only difficulty would be engaging him in melee combat long enough to allow his brother and people to put distance between them so they couldn't be used as hostages.

North didn't intend to eliminate the Soviet. If he hadn't killed Japan, he wouldn't kill CCCP, not when his troops had been so helpful in defeating the Japanese.

But depending on how this went, he was prepared for a fight.

The people closest to them had realized who was among them now, and drew back, expressions ranging from excited to confused and wary. The sea of people throughout Pyongyang continued to revel around them, but a hush fell over the center of the city square.

CCCP stopped before them on the stones, far enough away that North thankfully didn't have to crane his neck to look up at him.

"Korea," he said, his voice like rumbling thunder. His single white eye shifted to South, making North tense. "And Korea."

"H-Hey," South said nervously.

North wanted to tell him to stay quiet, but instead glowered up at the huge Soviet.

"You're here to divide us."

The foreign country dipped his head. "Yes. We should speak elsewhere."

Korea didn't want to go anywhere with him. He had no right to come to their country and make suggestions.

But they couldn't have this talk in public. If it happened, his people should hear it directly from him.

He nodded tersely, spinning on his heel. "Come," he ordered, not looking back at the Soviet, even though it made his shoulders prickle. South did look back, casting nervous looks at the foreigner as he scurried along at his brother's side.

North yearned to comfort him, but he had to be unflinching in the face of the interloper, especially since South wasn't.

He led him to a back alley, far from the city center. He could have commandeered an office from Jo Man-sik, but that would lend both him and CCCP a legitimacy they didn't deserve.

In the more quiet residential district, he stopped, turning in a way that made CCCP have to position himself under the eaves of a house. He was so tall he had to hunch slightly, pleasing North.

But not enough.

"We won't accept this," he declared, glaring up at him. "Korea has only just become free. We won't accept another colonizer."

"North?" South whispered, tugging at his sleeve. "Maybe let's n-not piss off the huge country."

"Shut up," North ordered, but it was too late.

CCCP turned his gaze on his brother. "I am assuming that you are to be the south, then?"

Ssi-bal, he should have told South to use their real name. They needed to reinforce their sovereignty in every way possible.

"We're both just Korea," North said at the same time his brother said, sounding oddly happy, "Y-Yeah. I'm South. I'm South."

North shot him a look as the Soviet directed to him now, "And you are the one I communicated with previously?"

It was one letter. North had only replied to be polite and secure assistance for his people.

"Yes," he said grudgingly.

CCCP nodded, his serious expression unchanged. "I cannot speak to America's intentions, but mine are not to colonize you."

"Yet here you are," Korea said coldly. His soldiers' boots in their former capital less than ten days after their Liberation, him in their country without even asking permission, just notifying them. An unstoppable force they could only accept, not deny.

"Yes." He met his eyes. "I will not pretend this is not beneficial to me, but my presence here is not entirely willing. I will explain the full situation later."

It had already been explained by one of North's guerrillas, speeding as fast as he could from the Soviet Union to announce that America and CCCP had decided to divide Korea and place them under a trusteeship, bringing that weight crashing back down onto his shoulders.

"For now, I want to assure you that I have no desire to chart your course for you, only to help you stabilize your country," CCCP was saying.

North wanted to remain professional, but he couldn't help the way his lip curled. "We don't need your 'help.' Our people are doing fine on their own."

"I saw," he replied. "It is impressive. I am sure that in a half a year, they would create a unified, working government capable of rebuilding what Japan has destroyed."

North knew they could do it in a couple months.

"Then leave," he growled up at him, ignoring the way South cringed. "We don't need or want you here."

CCCP let out a breath like a bellows. "If I do not step in, America will attempt to stake his claim to your entire Peninsula. He has set his mind on it. And when he wants something, he will not rest until he has it."

His eye flashed. It made North wary, shifting in front of his brother.

But it was also reassuring.

"Would that be bad?" South asked, peering over his shoulder.

“Isn’t America the one that beat Japan?”

“He only dropped the atom bombs,” CCCP said. If he’d sounded cold before, he was frigid now.

“It would be bad,” North assured his brother. America had been eyeing their country since even before the Japanese Occupation. “I’ll tell you later.”

CCCP inclined his head to him. “If you are a student of Marx and Lenin, as I am told, you will know of his ways, and understand how he works.”

He did. The United States of America had reached the highest bloodstained stage of capitalism awhile ago- imperialism. And he was always looking for new colonies.

Korea’s jaw feathered, and he hardened his gaze, drawing himself up to his full height as he demanded, “Would you steal our resources?”

“Anything I take will be with your permission, and will not leave you lacking.”

He’d known there was no way he’d take nothing. Every country wanted something from Korea. At least he was being honest about it.

“Would you try to take away our culture?”

“I will not touch your culture at all. That is in your hands.”

He could believe that for now. From what he’d heard, the CCCP was only restrictive of anti-revolutionary cultural practices in his republics. And North intended to be restrictive on those as well. Anything that hurt his people had to be rewritten.

“Would you let your soldiers do as they please?”

The Red Army might be Socialist, but the war had forced them to conscript those with less ideological education. And even the educated were still foreign men, unlikely to view Korean women as anything but easy prey. Korea wanted to get to the north as soon as possible.

"No," CCCP answered. "They will be under my and my representatives' observation. My military police will arrive soon. If any excesses have been committed before then, I assure you the punishment will be swift and severe."

The punishment for rape in the Red Army was death. So long as it was implemented, North wouldn't place full responsibility on the Soviet. Only half.

South piped up with his own question from behind him. "Are you going to lock us up?"

How suddenly small his voice was sent protectiveness surging through North, and he stepped forward, showing his fangs as he snarled, "If you try, I'll kill you."

"North!" his brother gasped, aghast.

He would. He didn't want to make an enemy so soon after Liberation, but if anyone ever tried to harm his brother, he would rend them limb from limb.

'Eighteen years.'

No one was locking his brother up again. No one.

"No," CCCP said, and it almost sounded like his glacial voice thawed slightly. "I will not lock you up. I am sure America will not, either."

South sighed, relieved. North wasn't.

"You deported Koreans."

He'd sent them away from the east because they could be spies for Japan. In the harsh conditions caused by the war, people had died.

"I did," CCCP replied heavily. "I will make no excuses other than that I was at war. The fascists were laying waste to my west. I could not afford the possibility of a fifth column in my east. I did what I felt I must. I am sure you have also made choices you would rather not have."

There were dozens of examples that could have crossed North's mind.

But instead, against his will, he looked over his shoulder, meeting South's eyes.

His brother gazed back, full of sorrow and…

It was in the past. He was with him now. And he wasn't letting go again.

"You killed my people," he said gruffly, looking back at CCCP. "I won't forgive you for that."

"I did not ask for your forgiveness and I do not want it," CCCP responded bluntly. "I considered every single Korean that was relocated as my own, including those that did not survive the journey. They came to me for safety, and my decisions led to their deaths. That is my burden to bear."

No answer would have pleased Korea, no matter how well he knew that a fifth column in the eastern Soviet Union would have destroyed him entirely. The Koreans sent to Central Asia weren't CCCP's- they were his, driven from their homeland by starvation and the Japanese.

But because he knew the Soviet couldn't actually see North's people as his, his cold, unapologetic attitude was more satisfactory than fake regret or begging for absolution he wouldn't receive. The foreigner didn't really care about Korea's people. Pretending he did just to get in his good graces would only mean he was trying to manipulate him.

His answers were all satisfactory. But none of them pleased him.

"We're going to protest this." North glared at him, challenging him.

“Ладно,” he agreed. “Though I would prefer you not make this more difficult than it need be.”

Korea would make it as difficult as he wanted to make it. It was his country they were carving up.

“And we will continue setting up our People’s Committees on our people’s basis,” he declared, watching him.

CCCP just nodded. “I will not interfere.”

Doubtful. He was being too easy, too agreeable.

North narrowed his eyes. “Good. We’re leaving now.”

The Soviet didn’t need to know where they were going or what they were-“We’re going into the country to see how the village committees are doing before we go to Seoul,” South volunteered before North could hush him.

His brother had a lot to learn about military confidentiality. Even if the military part of their lives was over now, they would need it for politics. Hopefully Korea wouldn’t get any of his light mouth in the Reunification.

It had been supposed to be soon. But now…

“May I accompany you?” CCCP’s question broke him from his clenched-jaw thoughts. “The Americans will be arriving soon, and I would prefer we met them together.”

His face darkened, his lip twitching in disdain. He could just be a good actor, but North was fairly certain he genuinely despised America.

Good. At least he hadn’t gotten friendly with him while working together in the war. North despised people that would set aside their morals for personal feelings. Especially when one of them might be presiding over half his country.

North did not want the Soviet following them around, looming over them while they met their people. And he didn't want him around his brother or provinces. It was why he'd sent them to guard the perimeter. He would have sent South, too, if he wasn't against letting him out of his sight ever again.

But he also didn't want to leave him alone in a center of power. Jo Man-sik might be a Christian Nationalist, but at least he was Korean.

"I would appreciate seeing how your committees will be set up, as my administration will be working with them," CCCP added. "Perhaps I could learn something beneficial for my own country."

He could learn something. The idea of showing the foreigner how organized and successful his people already were, maybe even leading to him implementing some of their ideas in his own country, was tempting.

That, his desire to not leave him unsupervised, and his need to interrogate him made North's mind up.

"Very well, you can come with us," he clipped, making it clear it was his decision. "But you will remain out of sight when I say to. And no interfering."

The man didn't lay a hand over his heart. He just said, "You have my word."

They would see.

"And you come alone," North added, observing his reaction carefully.

"Very well," the country said after a moment. Careful consideration or thinking how to get his people to tail them? "I will need to inform my comrades first."

Kangwon had eyes specifically on him. He'd find a way to overhear if he was ordering his men to follow.

"Hurry," North ordered, and the Soviet maneuvered his way out from under the roof, straightening to his full height as he walked away.

His footsteps were heavy, but still, after they faded North peeked out from the alley, glancing both ways down the dusty residential street to make sure he was really gone.

He was. It wasn't like someone of his size could hide.

"North, do you have to be so rude?" South fretted in a whisper, grabbing at the sleeve of his uniform. "What if he punishes you?"

"He can try," North dismissed.

He hoped he would. CCCP hadn't seemed to be emotionless like Japan. There was a temper in there somewhere, or at least strong feelings. If North could bring them out, it would prove he wasn't here with good intentions, and that Korea shouldn't be divided.

Or it would get the entire Peninsula put into America's hands.

But it didn't matter. North wasn't afraid of the American either. And he wasn't going to let the Soviet think he had any authority to 'punish' him just to avoid causing problems.

South's eyes widened. "North, he's literally huge! He's the size of a mountain! He's like-" He stretched an arm up, trying to display the other country's height. His armspan wasn't half as long. "Big!"

"And I have a gun." North held up his captured Nambu Type 94. "Several."

He was trying to teach his brother how to shoot, just in case he needed to defend himself from any Japanese or collaborator remnants. It wasn't going well. South had only shot a gun once-

Kang Kyung-nam. His wife was dead, but his children were grown with their own now. He'd have to take his brother to apologize for himself when they had the chance.

-and firearms made him nervous.

Ssi-bal, North couldn't believe the Provisional Government had him in an active warzone and hadn't taught him how to wield a gun. Had Kim Tu-bong been the only one with sense? He simultaneously wanted them to come back to Korea right now so he could chew them out, and never wanted them to return. Just because they'd been playing government in China and begging for money in America didn't mean they were all fit to govern their people.

A future problem. Hopefully there would be plenty of early-arrivers at the proclamation of the People's Republic so he could begin to sort out the useful elements from the ones that shouldn't be allowed within a ri of the halls of power.

Of course, he might not actually have a say in that.

South's brows furrowed at his words, and his hand moved up to his shoulder. The tension immediately left North's jaw.

He would. No matter what happened, he refused to let his country leave their hands again. Their people had their reins, not CCCP, not America, not anyone else.

South looked past him at the mouth of the alley, lowering his voice. "So, are we going to let them divide us?"

"No," North said immediately. Not yet anyway.

His brother's face- his face, still so familiar and still such a rush every time he looked over to see he was alive, he was alive and with him- was only semi-relieved. He chewed on the inside of his cheek.

"Maybe we should?"

"What?"

South winced. "I mean, it's not permanent, right? The guerrilla and Mr… Union? both said it was just until they can sort out a trusteeship, and then that's just until we get back on our feet. I don't like it, but it's not like we can stop them."

"If they intend to colonize us then we have to try," North responded, fists clenching. They had fought too long and too hard to just roll over for the next great powers.

“North, aren’t they both like, really strong?” his brother asked. “The Provisional Government was always talking about how tough Mr. Union-“

“CCCP,” North interrupted, the honorific irritating him. “Just call him CCCP. Even if he says not to.”

“How tough CCCP is,” his brother corrected. “And even if America just dropped those bombs… I mean, he dropped those bombs.”

He rubbed his arm anxiously.

Word from Japan had been spotty, brought by wealthier Koreans able to buy tickets home immediately. But it was all… Unlike South, North couldn’t see it as good. But for all his proletarian internationalism, he also couldn’t see it as bad, aside from mourning the Koreans that had been stolen away to Japan and met the same fate as their colonizers. But it was all worrying for someone whose own country was about to play host to the one responsible for it.

“It doesn’t matter,” North dismissed. “If they try to dominate our country, we will fight. And we will fight until we are Liberated.”

They were supposed to be already.

“But…”

“South,” he interrupted, grabbing his shoulders. “Do you really want to be separated again after I just got you back?”

His brother's eyes widened. ”You think they’d s-separate us?”

“What do you think dividing us means?” he snapped.

“I thought- I mean, they’re dividing the country, not us.”

North made sure only his fingers dug into his shoulders, not his nails. “We are the country. And they want to divide us.”

South grabbed at his hand, pressing it to his shoulder like he could pin it there. “No, I don’t want- I don’t want to lose you again, please.” Hope rose in his eyes. “W-What if we just asked them if we could stay together? Then we could hang out in Seoul until everything’s okay? Then we’d be together and we wouldn’t have to fight anyone and-“ “South,” he cut him off, and since they were alone, he cupped his face with the hand he wasn’t holding, gently keeping his mouth shut.

His brother had a new habit, rambling. Along with that little nervous stutter. It wasn’t like he didn’t know why.

‘Eighteen years.’ And eight more.

“I won’t let anyone separate us,” North said firmly. “So if they try, we are going to have to fight. I will,” he corrected, seeing fear fill his brother’s expression. “I’ll fight for us.”

He wasn't quite used to being called ‘North’ again. But it was easy to slip back into being it for his South. He’d never stopped, after all.

“Okay,” South sighed, relief washing over him as he leaned into his palm. “But can that be the only reason you fight? I don’t want Mr- Um, CCCP and America hurting you.”

And his brother had never stopped being South.

North’s fingers curled against his cheek, then dropped. “We are going to protest no matter what. But I haven’t decided if we should fight it or not yet.”

He wanted to. No matter what, he wanted to. They didn’t need a division, they didn’t need a trusteeship, they didn’t need two countries ‘looking after’ them, let alone four. This wasn’t happening to the Philippines or Indonesia or China or any of the other places Japan had sank his claws into. It wasn't even happening to Japan. Just Korea. Only them. It was unfair and he wanted to fight it, to rage against it until the last.

But their country was decimated. Just because the Japanese were gone, didn't mean their problems were solved. They'd destroyed the factories and harbours in their wake, left collaborators behind who would try and muscle their way into power to keep Korea as a different sort of colony, soldiers were returning from the war, from fighting against Japan and even fighting for him, willingly or not, disabled, broken, knowing nothing more than how to fight. Their peasants were still poor, landlords still owned all the land, and millions of people were unemployed and starving.

Korea didn't want more war. They wanted to rebuild, to solve their problems and craft the happy lives they'd deserved to live since the beginning.

"But if America and CCCP try to rule us the same way Japan did," he said to his brother. "Then we will fight."

"But…" His brother rubbed his arm again. "We've finally got a little peace."

"Letting them colonize us wouldn't be peace, South," Korea told him. "It would just pave the way to move violence, the same violence Japan inflicted on us all these years."

His brother's fingers dug into his own arm.

North's chest squeezed. "And if we don't act decisively and guide our people down the correct path, then we could just as easily return to the violence of Joseon."

Korea's Socialist revolution wouldn't come for years, but the Democratic one had to be carried out correctly to prepare their material conditions for it. They needed to build their resources and frameworks, reorganize society, clear out the cobwebs of feudalism and colonialism.

"We need to build a country for the masses, South," he said firmly, words coming faster as the excitement built. "Not for the Japanese or the Americans or the Soviets, not for the foreign companies or our own bourgeois and landowners. For the first time in our history, we finally have a chance to turn our country into a paradise for our people, to give the peasants their own land, to put the means of production into the hands of the people that work then, to build an army to protect our people instead of capital or the men who serve it."

He could tell his brother didn't entirely understand what he was talking about, just like when he talked politics and economics with the comrades on their travels. He had his common sense, but he hadn't studied their history in the same way North had, or read the theory and experienced the praxis.

No matter. He would have time to teach him. And then they would be one.

"We can't let either America or CCCP stop that," he said with finality. "This is our country, and it will develop on the path that we and our people choose. And if we have to fight for that, then we will."

His brother's lips curved as his eyes dipped. "Still so melodramatic," he murmured. "But okay. So long as you don't leave me."

The unspoken word lingered.

"I won't," North vowed.

Not again.

The proclamation of the People's Republic of Korea was in nine, in Seoul, so once North was done in Pyongyang, they headed out of the city to visit Anju and Sunchon, before working their way south to the capital, stopping at more places in between- Nampo, Sariwon, Haeju, where the people welcomed their two Hwanghaes and two Koreas with joy, and all the villages and farmsteads connecting them. Every place came alive like they had immediately after Liberation, people even leaving work and the fields to welcome their Countryhumans, something North had to bite his tongue against reprimanding.

They deserved this, that little bright moment of thinking they finally had real freedom before he told them what America and CCCP had planned.

When they asked, he only told them that he was going to speak out against the decision at the proclamation, making it clear that no matter what happened, Korea would be independent soon.

They had expected the Americans to be here by now, but by the time they reached the 38th Parallel, the place Korea was to be divided, they weren't. CCCP couldn't cross the line on the terms of his arrangement with America, and would be staying back with a few of North's guerrillas, that old Korea's Army core.

So the night before they reached Kaesong, in a small village outside Haeju, North slipped out of the chosonjip of the village chief he'd been spending the night in with his brother and their provinces, and approached the large figure standing by the low stone wall.

The glowing ember of the Countryhuman's cigar illuminated the eyeless half of his face, before he switched it to his other hand, away from North, and cast it into shadow.

"I have demands," the Korean announced, tilting his chin.

He hasn't managed to goad CCCP into violence yet, or even a raised voice. He had kept himself as unobtrusive as a country his size could be, not interfering at all with the Koreans' business, like he said he would.

It was suspicious.

The smoke left the Soviet's mouth in a cloud. "I will hear them."

"I want you to stay away from our People's Committees, even after the agreement is official."

North didn't care about the People's Republic of Korea. South thought it might be the thing that merged them in just two days, but he knew it wouldn't be. Lyuh Woon-hyung was a solid man and independence activist, if a bit centrist, but his Committee was only useful for coordinating organizing right now. It was just a name, and didn't represent the will of the people. Their grassroots People's Committees did. They had created them on their own, amongst each other, and it was the outgrowing of that that would turn him and his brother into the real People's Republic. He wouldn't let that be taken away from them.

"As I said, I will not interfere," CCCP said. "My administration will be centralized around the temporary capital. What happens on the local level falls to you and your people."

He'd believe that when he saw it.

"No more than one hundred 'advisors' in my country at any time." North wouldn't have the Soviets stocking the administration with themselves the way Japan had done even before the official annexation.

"I will not make promises I cannot keep." CCCP took another drag of his cigar. "If more are needed, more will be sent."

"No more than two hundred."

The Soviet inclined his head. "I will not make a hard agreement, but I doubt more than that will be necessary."

The number was too high, but North also had the grace to admit that even one was too high. In the end, two hundred was a small number for administrating a country.

More importantly, CCCP hadn't lied that he'd accept a paltry hundred or pretended that he would follow his exact demands.

North finished with his most challenging stipulation yet.

"I am going to carry out my laws as I see fit."

Regardless of what anyone said, this was a military occupation. The occupied didn't get to exercise their own laws under a foreign army.

Yet CCCP said, "So long as your laws do not harm your people, I will not intercede." He held up a hand before North could speak. "I am aware you do not intend to harm your people. The love you bear for them has been clear."

'Tch.' That was one of the many reasons he hadn't wanted the Soviet to come with them. He'd seen too much.

But more importantly-

"You're being too agreeable." North crossed his arms as he said it outright, planting his feet as he tried to look up at him without appearing small. "What do you want?"

"I want for us to be comrades." CCCP ground his cigar against the stone of the wall behind him, stubbing it out. "I am no Imperialist, and do not intend to colonize you. I want only to help you rebuild. As was said at the proclamation, the future of Korea should be in Korean hands."

"Yes," North clipped. "It should be."

The Soviet turned his massive frame to him, making the Korean fight the urge to stand on tip-toes.

"And I want you to be part of my family."

North blinked, before baring his fangs as he realized what that meant.

"Not a Soviet Republic," the other country clarified before he could snarl at him. "Unless you so wish-"

"I do not," North assured him frostily.

It didn't matter how even-handed CCCP was with his own republics. As he had said, the only hands Korea should be in were those of Koreans.

"Very well," the Soviet said evenly. "Then I only want you to be my son."

North was struck dumb for a second. It was unprofessional, but all he could say was, "What?"

“I want you to be my son,” CCCP reiterated, his gaze not wavering. “You do not have to give me an answer now, or ever. That is simply what I desire.”

“I see,” North managed after a moment because what the fuck was he supposed to say to that?

The large Countryhuman seemed unbothered by his reaction, staring out at the fields around the village, a few lamps casting pockets of light.

He wasn’t very expressive. North had never seen him make an unnecessary movement. South had said it unnerved him, that it reminded him of Japan.

His brother didn't get the same feeling. Japan had always quivered with restraint, even as his muscles never so much as twitched. There was the sense that he was holding something back, some great desire, whether it was violence or something else. The only time North had ever seen him otherwise was for a few moments on that day on Paektusan. But the Soviet simply seemed to have no patience for unnecessary motion.

CCCP’s formal, blunt speech was also different. There was more under it, in the way it coloured when he mentioned America, or grew more relaxed as he discussed politics. It had even warmed when North had interrogated him on Lenin. He wasn't blank in the same way as Japan. Just stoic.

It was tolerable. As was the way he’d avoided sticking his mouth out while they travelled, and how the Soviets in Pyongyang hadn’t started dominating the People’s Committee right away, only observed. It wasn’t ideal, but it was tolerable.

North lifted his chin again, still disconcerted by what he’d said, but with one more crucial demand. “Even if we don’t have elections yet, I want the Korean representative to be picked by me.” He knew elections would come later- they needed leadership now. But at least he could exercise the will of his people in their place. “I don’t want that Jo Man-sik in charge.”

He went to give his reasoning, then firmed his jaw. He didn't owe it. It was his country, that was all the reason he needed.

Shockingly, the Soviet almost appeared to smile. "My people had been considering him. But there is already a representative that has been selected. And while he was not formally elected, he was decided on by your revolutionaries still in my country."

Warily, North asked, "Who?"

"I believe you will approve. He goes by 'Kim Il-sung.'"

North's eyes shot open. He hadn't seen his comrade in years, since he and Kim Jong-suk had returned for the birth of their son, and they hadn't been able to get letters to each other in months with the chaos of the war.

"He's well? Have you met him?" Realizing how… intense he'd just sounded, he cleared his throat, asking more neutrally, "How is Comrade Kim Il-sung doing? If you know."

"He is well. Enthused to come home, and even more so at Japan's defeat. He wanted me to send you his greetings."

He was alive. He was well. North bubbled with questions that he bit down on. He could ask him himself.

"Of course they chose him," he said, starting to pace.

His comrade had only went on to make more of a name for himself among the Korean revolutionaries after they'd left for the Soviet Union five years ago. He'd even been a part of the Red Army, carrying on the fight against Japan.

And he'd survived.

'I will not die before my country is Liberated.'

And he hadn't. They hadn't. Just like all their other comrades that had to leave their homeland behind, he was coming home.

And it meant he'd accepted the Joint Occupation was going to happen. Ssi-bal, it would have helped to know that sooner.

He whirled to CCCP, not liking that he'd hidden it. "Why didn't you say that earlier?"

"I intended it to be a surprise," the country said. He looked vaguely amused in a way that would've made North bristle if his mind wasn't whirling.

Kim Il-sung was their representative. North knew for a fact that he wouldn't sell them out to the Soviets, and didn't contain any ultra-left or right deviations. He wouldn't just passively accept the occupation, but keep their own principles alive and enact the plans they'd talked about over all those years by torchlight. He'd been who North was going to choose, if he could, since Lyuh Woon-hyung didn't have the same backbone he needed, and Jo Man-sik was too right-wing. He just hadn't known if the man would return in time, or if he was even alive.

But he was.

"This is perfect. I need to tell my provinces."

And South. He was finally going to be able to meet North's comrade. He was finally going to be able to present his family to his General the way he'd presented his son to him. And the others would be thrilled to see him again, especially Hae. And SH would light up the moment she heard Kim Jong-suk was coming back.

He halted in his tracks.

There was a knowing note to CCCP's voice. "You are going to let it be a surprise?"

North *'tch'*ed, trying to sound flat as he said, "They just don't need to know yet."

"Does this mean the Joint Occupation will be accepted?"

North firmed his jaw, turning around to face him again, thrusting out his hand. CCCP went to clasp his forearm in a businessman's shake, but the Korean caught his fingers in a Western-style one instead, even though it made his skin crawl.

The pads of his palms were thick and worn smooth, like polished horn. Close examination showed his nails were cleaned, not clean. Calluses swelled where he'd wielded firearms and blades frequently, and from this distance he could see the red skin was mottled with even more scars than he'd thought, clearly put there by combat and labour.

North freed his hand, bracing it behind his back so he could unobtrusively wipe it on his uniform, his decision made.

"The Joint Occupation will not be accepted," he said, keeping his voice even. "Never again will we accept foreign hands on our country.

"But Korea will tolerate it."

He didn't want to drag them into another war. He didn't want his people to have to fight again so soon after they had thought they could stop. They couldn't launch directly into a fight against America and CCCP, or even one of them, not because they'd be hopelessly outmatched, but because Korea owed it to them to try the peaceful path first.

Which was why even though he had no trust for America's intentions, he had been hoping CCCP would at least be a true Marxist-Leninist.

From all their conversations, he thought he was. And neither his personality nor actions had set off any alarm bells that would have been intolerable. His administration could go against his wishes, but North didn't think he was lying about his own intentions. He would take resources, and he would do things Korea didn't like because this Joint Occupation was already something Korea didn't like, want, or need.

But he wouldn't take too much. And he wouldn't do anything that made his country have to take up arms again. If he did, Korea would simply have to be prepared to deal with it.

Prepare for war, hope for peace. Because that was what his people needed.

"I will still protest it at the proclamation of the People's Republic," he informed him, daring the Soviet to deny it. "Korea will make it known that the idea that we need a trusteeship at all is a false one, and that we will never again be subservient."

CCCP nodded. "I would expect nothing less."

"But I will make sure my people know that in order to move forward, we need to focus on creating a united front, not sowing division. More division," he was unable to help adding with a glower.

Many wouldn't like it. No one would like it. But if it was what they had to tolerate to get peace and real Liberation, then they would.

"Then we are at an agreement." The Soviet dipped his head. "That should make this more bearable."

Business concluded, he went to move by North.

The Korean clenched his teeth, then called, "Wait."

The other country looked back, waiting.

He didn't want to ask, didn't want to reveal another weakness. But he said, "Is it possible that my brother and I can stay together?"

CCCP considered. "America will not tolerate the both of you in my hands. And if you are to join him in Seoul, it will seem as if you are aligning with his capitalism over Socialism. It is unfair, I am aware. But it is true."

North knew that. Now that the international community was turning an eye to them, every little action they took would have greater meaning.

'And where were those eyes when we were being ground into the dust?' he thought bitterly. They were only looking now because they thought they could get something out of them.

Except for CCCP. He had sent that letter.

The Soviet observed him for a long moment, then said, “If you desire to join the other Korea in Seoul, I will not stop you.” At North’s suspicious look, he explained, “Your situation is unique. But if he is your family, then the choice is with you.” His eye darkened. “Tearing a family apart is the worst thing that can be done.”

North’s jaw worked. “I’ll think about it,” he said eventually.

“If you are separated, it will only be for a short time,” CCCP reminded him. “The suggested date to arrange the trusteeship is in December. And while I am sure America will be up to his tricks, I assure you I will attempt to hasten negotiations as much as I can.”

And once the trusteeship was in place, the division would be removed. Foreigners would still be attempting to control their fates and force their people down the paths they wanted. But North and South would be together, able to stop them.

“I’ll think about it,” North repeated. “And my decision will be my own.”

And until then, his brother didn’t need to know about this.

“Very well.” CCCP inclined his head. “This situation may not be ideal, but regardless, I am looking forward to working with you, Comrade Korea.”

Before North could respond, he placed his heavy, weathered hand on his shoulder, giving him another suggestion of a smile. Unnerved, the Korean batted his hand away before he could school himself.

“We will see.”

Whether it turned out CCCP was someone to be worked with or worked against, whether he decided to spend the Division in Seoul or Pyongyang, whether North stayed with South or…

Whatever he chose, one thing was for certain- he was not going to be the Soviet’s family. Korea had no father. Only a brother.

And for one small, shining moment, just like their people, they had had freedom. And they would have it again.

And no one, not even a veritable mountain of a country, was going to get in the way of that.

North describing CCCP the way bad yaoi and straight romance novels describe love interests: He was Large. He was Enormous. He was the size of a mountain. 'I am quite big,' CCCP said, largely.
(to be fair, North is 147 cm (4'10") at this point, and CCCP is 204 cm (6'8")

CCCP did keep their agreements. The People's Committees were left alone. There were never more than two hundred administrators. And while they did take gold and other resources from Korea this was later made up for by cancelling war debts. Ironically, North would dislike CCCP less if he hadn't kept to them. He'd hate him more, but he'd dislike him less.

Chapter title explanation because it makes me teary- part of the Soviet proclamation to Korea when the Red Army arrived:

'The Soviet Army and Allied forces have driven the Japanese plunderers from Korea. Korea has become a country of freedom. However, this is only the first step in a new era of Korean history. An abundant fruitful orchard is the result of man's effort and foresight. Therefore the happiness of the Korean people will only be achieved by the heroic efforts that you Korean people will exert. Remember those bitter days that you have suffered under Japanese rule. The very stones testify to your sufferings. You are all aware of the fact that the Japanese could afford to live in lofty spacious pavilions, well-clad, well-fed, despising Koreans and humiliating Korean customs and culture. Such a past of slavery will never be repeated. Like a nightmare, this humiliating past has now disappeared forever.
Korean people remember you have your future happiness in your own hands. You have attained liberty and independence. Now everything is up to you.'

Part of American proclamation to Korea: ‘All powers of government over the territory of Korea south of 38 degrees north latitude and the people thereof will be for the present exercised under my authority. Persons will obey my orders and orders issued under my authority. Acts of resistance to the occupying forces or any acts which may disturb public peace and safety will be punished severely. For all purposes during the military control, English will be the official language. In event of any ambiguity or diversity of interpretation or definition between any English and Korean or Japanese text, the English text shall prevail.’ (‘my’ being Douglas MacArthur diediedie)

I’m using the standard English romaji for Lyuh Woon-hyung for reference’s sake, so someone can look him up themselves. But while I admit to vibes-based romaji, I think it is a crazy way to spell 여운형. Even giving him the Northern spelling of pronouncing the rieul at the start- 려운형- would not create Lyuh to me. Unless I’m overpronouncing the English one. Still, I think there could be better spellings. Where does the ‘w’ come from?? (okay I looked this up and apparently it’s just to make the English spelling more appealing. So eye snot and nose snot, I guess). My vibes-based system would have him as Ryeo Un-hyung. I think that looks plenty appealing, and is a direct Korean transliteration. Alas.

Sons Of Sons

[image]

1952

Kangwon was screwed. Completely, utterly screwed.

He'd been taken away from the airport to a large villa in Oslo, in what looked like a wealthy residential district. They hadn't even blindfolded him, just kept guns pointed at the back seat so he couldn't jump out the car door.

He hadn't tried. He'd been busy trying to make sure Kim Ju-bong didn't choke on the blood pouring from his shattered nose. And he knew he couldn't catch up to Gangwon's car on foot.

The province held his head in the hand he hadn't dislocated as he looked out at the garden inside the villa walls. He could tell it would be lush in summer, but right now the beds were barren, and the trees had only just start to bud.

The window wasn't even locked. If he wanted, he could slide it up and jump right out. There were armed guards down below, but he knew he could evade them, and the walls half-hidden by the grey trees lining them would be too easy to scale.

But where would he go? This wasn't like the holding camp outside Seoul, where he knew almost every mountain ridge and river between him and getting back to Korea. He'd looked at a world map before he left, but that didn't help with navigating Norway. All it told him was that he'd either need to trek north across the entirety of it, or cross half of it, then all of Sweden and Finland, and cross three borders if he wanted to reach the Soviet Union, where someone might help him.

He knew there was a Soviet embassy somewhere in Oslo, but only in relation to the airport and the hall where the second day of the World Peace Council would be taking place right now. He didn't know how to reach it from here. He couldn't even tell if the woods he'd seen on the other side of the villa were on the edge of the city, or just a patch of private property. He didn't know where he was at all, which was a really unnerving feeling for someone who was used to knowing the terrain of his country as well as he did his Countryhuman's face.

He could escape. But there was nowhere to go. And he didn't know where to even begin if he wanted to find Gangwon.

Kangwon let out a breath, backing away from the window to throw himself onto the way-too-plush bed. He bounced, then sank into the mattress.

'Can't be good for your back.'

His holding cell was cushier than the POW camp had been, with glossy, good-quality wood furniture, several lamps, an adjoined toilet, and amber and white walls, the paper patterned with blooming vines and birds in flight. It'd probably be nice to look at for a normal resident. For someone who was imprisoned, though, it was just sort of ironic.

He'd expected to be brought to a UN office, not a vacation home or whatever this place was. It looked like a bourgeois manor, but the men in it didn't speak Norwegian- they spoke English. And there'd been an American flag hanging limp on a pole outside when he'd been brought in. He'd think it was their embassy, but the interior looked more like a regular house.

Well, the house of a regular capitalist. A foreign one, since Kangwon hadn't even seen the sort of glass-chandeliered, wrought-iron-railinged luxury in the chosonjip and manors the Japanese and landowners had left behind. But it shared that feeling of being more a display of wealth than a home.

As he'd been escorted up the marble stairs, past artwork hanging in expensive frames and decorative plates with gold inlays that glinted as they caught the light refracted though the crystals hanging around the lamps, China's words had slipped into his mind.

'The Europeans have spent generations as the subjects of kings and tyrants who let the blood they need from foreign nations.'

He was right. Whether this place belonged to Norway or America, it wasn't the house of someone exploiting one country, like the Korean capitalists and Japanese that came over. It was more like the manor of a capitalist in Japan, someone who held strings in nations across the world, draining the 'lesser' ones dry so they could pacify their own workers with benefits. An endless web of exploitation, all leading back to the smooth satin sheets Kangwon was spread out on, made by hands the people that owned this place would never even see.

He got up, heading back to the window, pressing his forehead and tender relocated carpometacarpal against the cool glass.

Maybe it wasn't time to be thinking about the Labour Theory of Value or commodity production. But it was better than stressing about Gangwon when that wouldn't help anything.

Kangwon gripped the bottom of the window frame, lifting it up slowly. The window could open, but the men outside hadn't been thrilled when he'd done it last night.

Frigid air rushed into the room, carrying the smell of snow and smog. Even in this quiet, upper-class neighbourhood, probably ri away from them, the stench was thick. It'd taken Kangwon enough time to get used to industrial smells in their own cities, and the constant fog of smoke and chemicals from the war.

But the snow smell was promising. He pressed his 'nose' to the crack in the window, sniffing. It wasn't just the wet, slushy smell of the spring melt, but the heavier, crisper scent of incoming snowfall, the one that always sent him scurrying to bring in his traps and forage anything else he could when he'd lived in the cave. The clouds looked grey, too, swollen with snow.

Maybe he should try escaping tonight. If it was snowing, he'd have a better chance at getting around Oslo undetected. And if they noticed he was missing, it might slow down a search. He probably wasn't getting out of Norway, but maybe he'd at least be able to find his brother before the United Nations came.

That was the only thing he'd been told yesterday, after he was thrown in here. That the United Nations would be coming in two days to 'sort things out.' And Kangwon knew what that meant- his brother would be taken back to America.

But maybe if they were together, Gangwon could prove he wasn't a hostage, and tell the organization what America had done to him. And Kangwon could plead their biological warfare case in person, try and reach the UN's heart, if he'd listen.

He... didn't think it would work. Like China had said, the UN wanted the war over with. Fulfilling America's demand for Gangwon would get them a little closer to that, without really lifting a hand. And if the reason he wanted the war over was to protect his image, then 'saving' Kangwon's brother would do that, too.

But it was their only option. Escaping might tarnish their country's reputation even more, but he knew Korea would want him to do it if it meant rescuing Gangwon.

A shout caught Kangwon's attention, and he lifted his head from his arms, looking out at garden. The men under his window turned towards the wall. He could just barely see someone on the other side, one of the guards waving his gun over his head.

He quickly pressed his ear slit to the gap, just catching, "-inside! Don't let them get out the back!"

The guards pivoted, looking up right into Kangwon's eyes, and he darted back, heart pounding.

'Them?' Had Kim Ju-bong woken up? He hadn't been taken out of the car with Kangwon, but maybe he had been after. Or Gangwon?

Maybe it was too optimistic to think his brother could've escaped from wherever he was and managed to make his way here to break him out. But Kangwon's heart still leaped, and he rushed to put on his medical coat so he'd be ready if they had to run. They hadn't taken anything from him, just roughly patted him down for weapons.

He heard a door slam somewhere downstairs, follow by muffled shouting, and the man outside his door muttered, "What the fuck?"

Kangwon waited by the foot of the bed, heart pounding.

His hope turned to unease as footsteps started to thud down the hall, heavy and moving at a brisk clip, rattling the painting of a snowy mountain on his wall.

His brother didn't walk like that.

He didn't need to check the room. He'd already picked out the best weapon last night. He lunged for a nearby lamp, one with a heavy brass base, and tore it out of the wall, wincing as he used his injured hand to wrap the cord around it before hefting it with his good one, just in case. He waited.

"H-Halt!" the guard cried.

The waver in his voice made Kangwon raise his brows. The American had been pretty burly. His grip on the lamp tightened as he wondered who could make an armed man tremble.

He got his answer a second later as a deep voice boomed, "Do not presume to order me, American."

He'd never heard him speak English before, but the thundering baritone that vibrated your bones was one he didn't think anyone could forget.

"You will move out of my way," CCCP ordered the American. "Or you will face the consequences."

Kangwon relaxed slightly, relief flooding him as he tossed the lamp onto the bed. Part of him wondered if he should open the door and take the guard out for him, but he figured it was better to try and resolve this without any more violence. At least violence Korea could be blamed for.

"This house is property of the United States government," the man said tightly, doing a better job at not sounding afraid now. "You can't touch me."

CCCP's voice turned glacial, seeping through the door like the outside air through the window. "I rose up against the tsardom and shattered every one of its laws. I destroyed every single person who attempted to chain me with them. I killed the Russian Empire. I carved his heart out with a farmer's sickle while he still lived, and crushed it in my grasp. And you think I would hesitate to destroy you? Move."

Kangwon didn't hear the Soviet do anything, but his door rattled as the guard slammed into it, then scrabbled away, like the word had physically pushed him back.

It didn't even take two hits. The first impact made the door bulge inwards, the sturdy wood cracking in half as CCCP plowed into the room shoulder-first.

This place was a residence, not an actual prison. Kangwon was pretty sure the door hadn't been locked.

The huge Countryhuman stood a few feet away from him, dressed in a slate grey military tunic embroidered with red, with several medals pinned on his left breast. His epaulets were gold, and so were the braids on his peaked general's cap. But the uniform wasn't decorative- it was clearly for active-duty.

He scanned the room, his eye coming back to Kangwon once he'd cleared it.

"Hey," the Korean said.

CCCP's expression was as thunderous as his voice. "With me. Now."

Kangwon didn't need to be told twice. But- "Guards at the window," he reported, snapping into military mode. "Orders to stop us from going out the back."

"We are not going out the back." CCCP turned on a heel, the medals on his chest clinking. "We are going out the front."

Kangwon followed him, passing the guard, who was pressed into the corner, his pistol gripped in his hands. He looked ashamed, but it clearly wasn't enough to risk taking a shot at the Soviet.

The Korean province followed him down the opulent halls, having to hurry to keep up with his long strides.

"My brother is-"

"Silence," CCCP ordered, and the way he said it made Kangwon decide to keep his mouth closed for now.

He'd never seen the man like this before. Usually he had a stern face, but a slow voice that warmed the more you talked to him, like ice melting off Mount Kumgang. Now he was like the Russian mountains him and Gangwon had flown over, still capped with white in spring.

"Look confident, stay behind me, and do not cease walking," the Soviet ordered in a low tone as they approached the staircase to the ground floor.

At the foot, between them and the door, were several Americans- a guard and what looked like three diplomats.

"Mr. CCCP," one of them piped up, sweat beading on his pale brow. "We allowed you in to confirm the province's condition. But we can't let you leave until we confirm with the United Nations that he really sent-"

CCCP didn't stop, just forged straight towards him like a locomotive, Kangwon in his wake.

"-y-you." The diplomat's eyes widened as he realized the mountain of muscle coming straight at him wasn't going to stop, and he dove out of the way just before the Soviet plowed him over.

CCCP didn't pay him any attention, just slammed open the front door. Kangwon slid out after him, keeping his head up and shoulders back, like he wasn't being walked right out of his cell.

He hustled after the Soviet as he strode down the long, curving driveway.

"My brother-"

"Do not speak."

Since Kangwon didn't think Gangwon was back in the house, he kept quiet.

When they reached the gate, it was shut, and two Americans stood in front of it, rifles in hand, not raised, but ready.

"Halt," one ordered. "We cannot allow you to remove an American detainee from American custody without explicit permission from Mr. America."

Kangwon would've argued that he wasn't an American detainee- he was a Norwegian one, and shouldn't've been put in American custody in the first place. He also would've pointed out that as a Provincehuman from a country with no diplomatic relations with Norway or America, the United Nations should be the only one able to give them permission to release him.

CCCP didn't do that. He just kept walking, then finally halted a foot away from the men. Even with how tall they were, the Soviet still loomed over them.

"Two hundred metres," he said in English.

The men looked warily between each other.

"That is the blast radius of my newest atom bomb, if allowed to detonate on the ground." CCCP's words were cold. "That is more than enough to destroy this embassy and a large chunk of this city. Imagine what it might do to the cities you hail from."

One of the men's throats bobbed. "That would be an act of war."

"Detaining a sovereign Provincehuman without cause is also an act of war," the Soviet said. "But Korea cannot fight back against that injustice."

He lowered his head, putting his face directly in the man's, his breath rolling over him like a fog bank.

"The Soviet Union can."

Kangwon could see the man's legs trembling. His breaths made short, sharp bursts of steam.

"I am not your Countryhuman," the Soviet man growled, his words rumbling in his chest. "I do not want war. But if you do not open this gate, then I will bring it. If I am not in Moscva in five hours, the atom bomb will be unleashed on Oslo. Do you think your country would recall you? Or would he leave you to die while he struck back?"

The guards exchanged nervous glances. One's knuckles tightened on his rifle. Kangwon shifted on his feet, ready to fight.

"You know as well as I do," CCCP delivered, and his lips peeled back from his fangs. "Now open the gate."

"Screw it." One of the men broke, scrambling for the guardhouse.

"He's bluffing!" his partner cried, taking the chance to put distance between him and the Soviet.

"Don't care, I'm not risking it over some gook."

The gate opened, and CCCP didn't waste a second in resuming his stride, Kangwon in tow.

"Tell your Countryhuman that the subjugated nations of the world are no longer incapable of fighting back," the Soviet delivered, not looking at the men. "And to not initiate battles he cannot win."

Kangwon followed him down the cloudy Norwegian street, into a car waiting a block over.

"In the back," CCCP ordered, opening the door for him. "Stay low."

"Wait!" Out of earshot, Kangwon couldn't stay quiet anymore, stopping him for shutting the door on him. "My brother, he's-"

"Gone," CCCP clipped. "I already made my inquiries. He was sent on a plane almost immediately after you were captured."

His stony expression finally softened, a bit of the frost leaving his voice.

"I am sorry, son. He is beyond our reach now."

And heading into America's.

Numbly, Kangwon's hand slid off the door, letting CCCP shut it. The Soviet climbed into the front, starting the car.

His brother was gone. Really gone. On a plane flying over a foreign country, all alone. Or worse, back in Korea already, where South would Command him, and America might lock him up again. Or do worse.

Kangwon took a deep inhale, then let out a slow exhale. If there really wasn't anything he could do, then he couldn't sink into despair over it.

"There was a guard with us," he said, keeping his voice even.

"He is in custody," CCCP clipped, back to icy. "If something can be done in the future, it will be. But you are the priority."

"Did Korea-?"

"Silence," the man ordered again. "I do not trust this vehicle."

So Kangwon stayed silent and stayed low, keeping his head below the window as they drove at a casual pace through the streets of Oslo. He could see CCCP tense occasionally, spotting a vehicle or something else that put him on edge.

The airport wasn't far. When they pulled up, the Soviet just stepped out, leaving the car on the curb. Kangwon didn't really care right now where he'd got it.

He followed the huge man through the terminal, people gawking just like before. Only this time they were definitely looking at CCCP, either terrified or impressed by his size. Or his presence. He didn't leave the Soviet Union often.

Out on the bricks, one of the planes- a small passenger jet- was surrounded by men in the black State Police uniform, having a stand-off with several Soviets in black suits. Snowflakes had started to swirl across the ground.

"We are on diplomatic mission," one of the Soviets- a man with angular eyes and high cheekbones- was saying as they walked up.

"A Countryhuman cannot visit another country without the express permission of that country," one of the State Police- the icy-eyed one that had been responsible for detaining the Kangwons in the first place- growled. "Which you do not have."

"The last I hear, a country cannot detain a foreign Provincehuman without notifying his country of origin on same day," the Soviet said, almost lazily. "But it is seeming you still have not notified Korea."

"Korea was notified," the Norwegian growled back. "South Korea was told immediately that two of his provinces were on Norwegian soil."

"Hmmmm," the Soviet hummed. "For country supporting American intervention in Korea, is strange you view both a province from North Korea and one from South Korea as having the same Countryhuman. Almost as if it is a civil war, and your presence there violates the UN Charter."

"Mm," another Soviet, this one with cropped blond hair, agreed. "But if both do belong to South Korea, then isn't it strange one goes home immediately, while the other can't until the United Nations meets with him? Interesting. And contradictory."

"It is not a contradiction," CCCP announced, making the State Police startle towards them. "It is a conflict of interest. Your masters are in disagreement," he said to the Norwegians.

Their brows lowered like they'd understood, and Kangwon made an effort to hear the language under the Korean he heard for his next words. It was Norwegian, a different dialect than the Norwegians, but intelligible. He was a little envious of his multilingualism.

"America demanded Korea's provinces to be captured and sent to him," the Soviet explained in his cold voice. "The United Nations desired to hold this one for longer, in an attempt to not delay a ceasefire while still heeding his orders and wounding Korea. Your country obeyed both like a dog."

The Norwegians' eyes blazed at the insult.

"But the tricks of all have been swept aside," CCCP declared. "I will be leaving. And I will be taking Korea's province with me."

The icy-eyed guard stepped in front of him, the others in a phalanx behind him. "That won't be happening."

Kangwon wished he could talk to them, to beg them to see that no matter how you looked at it, he'd been detained unfairly, that his brother had been taken away against his will, and that all of this was turning into a problem for Norway when he really shouldn't even be involved. He wanted to try and make them see that this was just another part of the war against Korea, a war that never should've started in the first place.

But they couldn't understand. Even if he could speak Norwegian, they wouldn't understand.

"You cannot stop me," CCCP told them.

The man's jaw feathered. "We will not be bullied in our own country by a tyrant. This isn't your dictatorship, Soviet."

"But you will let yourselves be ordered into doing America's bidding," CCCP growled.

Kangwon nervously watched his huge fists clench, the size of chamoe melons.

Korea really wouldn't like it if he got involved in a fire/fistfight with the Soviet and half the Norwegian State Police. South Pyongan would, but that was usually a sign you shouldn't do something.

"Maybe threaten to bomb them again?" he suggested. For the civilians of Oslo's sake, he hoped the earlier threat had been a bluff.

CCCP didn't look his way. But he also didn't swing on the man in front of him.

Instead he said, "The Nazis ruled you for five years. They stripped you of your rights and your dignity, raped your wives and daughters and drafted your sons to fight their war, and when they left they burned everything in their wake to ashes. When my soldiers entered Finnmark, your people clung to their coats and wept. Your soldiers were armed with my weapons and fought with my men to liberate your homes. They fought bravely, but the truth is that without the Soviet Union, you would have never been freed."

Some of the men looked down, their mouths tight with shame. On a few, it looked like resentment.

"I will not demand that you feel empathy when I know you will not, even with the evidence of this new Korean holocaust before you." CCCP stepped aside, showing them Kangwon in his medical coat, with his hollow cheeks and bandages, blood seeping through since he hadn't been able to change them. "And I will not demand you thank me." His jaw feathered. "I know you will not. My people saved yours from fascism, and you will never forgive us for it."

He bared his teeth, not in warning like Korea did, but in a grimace.

"But you could at least show me some respect."

The air was tense, crackling with energy as the snow started to whirl faster. The Soviets had lost their 'buying time' attitudes, and were flanking the plane stairs, staring down the men closest to them. Kangwon could see the Norwegians shifting, some hands loosening on their firearms. Others tightened. The fire in their blue and green eyes burned hotter.

He hadn't understood what CCCP meant by 'You'll never forgive us for saving you from fascism.' He got not wanting to thank a foreign country for their help (not personally, but he was used to observing it), but to hate him?

But they did. At least a few of the Norwegians whose nation would still be under Nazi control if it wasn't for the Soviet Union were staring at the Countryhuman whose army had freed them with a burning hatred. Not all. But a few.

Would they have looked at Germany like that? Would they look at America that way now, for all he'd done?

Kangwon didn't know the answer. He didn't want to guess.

"Stand down."

Everyone looked at the person that had spoken. To Kangwon's surprise, it was the icy-eyed man in charge.

He wasn't looking at anyone, staring at the gap between CCCP and Kangwon, his brown eyes fixed in middle-distance, as ice-cold as his expression.

"Sir-"

"Stand down," he clipped, and holstered his pistol. "I won't cause another diplomatic incident over something that has nothing to do with our country."

After a moment of hesitation, the other men lowered their weapons. Some of them turned their burning gazes on the commander, and there was enough disdain in them to make Kangwon blink.

CCCP didn't say anything, marching past the Norwegians, making them reluctantly shift out of the way. He sent Kangwon up the stairs first.

As the Soviet followed, the brown-eyed man called after him, the language under his Korean no longer Norwegian, "Thank you."

Kangwon saw something flicker in CCCP's eye.

Then he was inside, moving past him, his comrades on his heels.

"Hurry," he barked to the pilot. "We need to move faster than the storm."

Kangwon really hoped that was just for safety's sake, and not because atom bombs really would be dropped on Norway if the Soviet Countryhuman wasn't back in five hours.

'Maybe better not to ask.'

CCCP led him to the back of the plane, opening a door that led to a smaller compartment, the seats in it more spaced out, in pairs that faced each other. He squeezed into one of the chairs, and Kangwon sat across from him. Neither of them spoke as the plane taxied down the runway, then lifted with a jounce. After a few minutes of rough(er) turbulence, they smoothed out to the usual shaking.

A half hour later, CCCP's shoulders relaxed, and he exhaled, removing his general's cap and placing it on another seat.

"Are we out of Norwegian airspace?" Kangwon asked.

"Yes." CCCP's tone had thawed, back to the way he sounded when he'd visit Korea. Still blunt, but not cold. "I apologize for my bearing earlier, son. It was a fraught situation."

"No problem." Especially considering he'd just broken Kangwon out of Norway.

"But is that going to cause problems for you?" he asked.

A Countryhuman visiting a country without permission, threatening to use a nuclear bomb on its capital, entering and breaking (in that order), and probably some sort of airport violation to even touch ground. Those were just all the broken laws Kangwon could think of off the top of his head. And he still didn't know how he'd got that car.

"Yes," CCCP said bluntly. "But they will be handled. I could not leave my son's province in enemy hands."

Kangwon looked down at his lap. "The United Nations wasn't coming tomorrow, was he?"

"No," the man replied. "I did attempt to conduct your retrieval by legal means. I intended to visit alongside the United Nations. He informed me that his flight was to be delayed due to a possible snowstorm. I suspect the excuses would have continued to come."

The UN knew that if Kangwon was in America's hands, Korea would refuse to sign a ceasefire until he got him back, so he'd been trying to keep him in Oslo indefinitely to make him more eager to sign.

What he didn't know was that Korea would view him keeping his province there as no different than America doing it. He would've just been another POW not to capitulate over. Korea only would've doubled down once he learned about the secret talk concession.

And the longer Kangwon was there, the greater chance there was of Korea storming Oslo like a one-man army and really causing a diplomatic incident.

"Thanks for saving me, comrade," he said, since unlike his Countryhuman, he had no problem with that. "I'm sorry for all the trouble."

"It is no problem," CCCP dismissed, standing. "With my assisting capabilities limited by America, I will do whatever I can to help my children."

Korea hated when he called him or them that. But this probably wasn't the time or place to correct him.

"Did Korea send you?" Kangwon asked anxiously while the man disappeared inside a door at the back.

"Yes," he said back, muffled.

That meant he was awake.

The province dropped his head into his hands, ignoring how his wrist twinged.

Korea was going to kill him. He'd left him asleep, taken off for Oslo, embarrassed their country in front of a bunch of different nationalities, assaulted at least two Norwegians (something he would approve of usually, just not now), and hadn't even gotten to do what he'd went there for.

And he'd lost Gangwon.

He shook his head, trying to shake away the clinging guilt. He knew it wasn't entirely his fault. His brother had chosen to go.

It didn't make it any more bearable. Not for him, and it wouldn't for Korea.

Kangwon didn't know what he was going to do to him. But he probably deserved it.

"Food," CCCP said, emerging with a platter of dried meats, kolbasa, some sort of biscuit, chunks of some white thing, pickles, and a tin of fish. "You will eat."

He'd only been given two slices of bread with thin slices of unidentifiable meat between them since he'd been taken, and it was early this morning, when they'd came to take the handcuff off. Kangwon was used to being hungry, but the sight of the food still made his mouth water.

Still he said, "I... can't eat right now."

"Grief will linger." CCCP guessed his reason right away. "Hunger can be solved now. You will eat."

He was right. Kangwon picked up one of the kolbasa, taking a bite out of it, trying not to think about eating the airplane food with his brother just two days ago, chuckling as they tried not to choke.

The airplane.

Kangwon perked up, scarfing down the rest of the kolbasa while he patted his pockets with his good hand. Had he put it in his case...?

He found it folded in his suit pocket, pulling out a piece of paper. It was a postcard, one a Soviet stewardess had handed him when they'd got on the plane to Moscva. It showed the Red Square with the Soviet star perched on a tower in the background. He'd been planning to give it to Hae, since her small collection of ones CCCP had brought her before the war had burned with the chosonjip.

But maybe it could have another use.

"Do you have a pen? And could I borrow it if you do?"

The long, brown coat CCCP usually wore was draped over the back of his seat. He pulled one from the pocket, and Kangwon rested the card on the small table between them, scribbling out a small message. His handwriting wasn't the best, but he tried to make it as legible as possible. Luckily, it was his off hand he'd dislocated.

"Would you be able to do me a favour?" he asked, holding up the card when he was done.

Maybe he should've asked first.

But CCCP said, "If it is able to be done, it will be done."

"Is there any way you could get a postcard to the south?"

He showed the Soviet the letter, telling him what he wanted. After a second, he dipped his head, taking the card and tucking it away into his coat.

"My part will be done," he said. "But I cannot guarantee the recipient will receive it."

"I know." It was a longshot. But if he could try, he would. "Thanks."

"Eat," CCCP repeated, pouring a glass of what looked like milk out of a chilled bottle.

Kangwon took a sip, and yeah, it was milk. He'd never had milk before. Hopefully he wasn't intolerant.

He ate the food he'd been given, trying to stop halfway, but being urged by CCCP to eat all of it, leaving him full for the first time in... almost two years. It was all good, even the hard white chunks (which were apparently a healthier version of the canned 'cheese' some of his cousins had eaten from the American rations; he really hoped he wasn't intolerant to dairy), but he couldn't taste most of it. Wondering about where Gangwon was, what he'd be fed, dulled his tongue.

He tried to remind himself that South had been good to Hae when it came to food, bringing her those dumplings. And SH had apparently eaten okay in Gyeongmudae. Even when Korea's brother didn't think about their starving people, at least he'd been keeping the Provincehumans fed. Even Kangwon had got those yakgwa when he'd visited.

But after South had stopped visiting, him and Hae had been on small grain rations, the same amount as the other prisoners. And America had started to deprive SH of meals, too. And that was with South in the same place as her. And if the southern provinces were still locked up in separate buildings...

But South had been lonely. Hopefully he'd visit. Hopefully America wouldn't stop him, or he wouldn't stop himself. Hopefully one of the others could get through to him, someone less intense than SH and less convincing than him, to avoid scaring him away. Sang maybe. Hopefully since he'd Command Gangwon, he'd know that he was back, where he was being kept, and he wouldn't be locked up in an isolated cell again.

But even if it wasn't a cell, he was still going to be isolated.

"I hope Gangwon's okay," he said out loud, turning away from the window, not wanting to watch the Swedish houses their shadow ripped over.

He knew he was just looking for reassurance he wouldn't be getting from Korea. His Countryhuman would probably tell him it was all his fault.

Maybe he shouldn't be looking for it from a foreign Countryhuman, but... He needed to hear it right now.

"I am sure he will be." The words were ones Kangwon would have used for a patient, but the following weren't. "And if he is not, then they will pay."

Kangwon caught himself about to nibble on his fingernail, and tucked his hands into his pockets, glancing out at the sky instead, grey, but clear now that they were beyond the edge of the storm.

"If you are having trouble with nail biting, you may put lemon juice on them," CCCP said, apparently having noticed his struggle. "Or some other distasteful liquid when lemons are hard to find. Gasoline proved useful for Turkmenistan."

The joke(?) startled a chuckle out of Kangwon, as agitated as he was. It helped set his head a bit more straight. There was nothing he could do for his brother now but return to Korea and help Liberate their country. No point in stressing himself sick over it. Not when Korea was already going to go in on him enough.

And China. Kangwon didn't know if he'd keep dragging him into conversations now that Korea was awake. But he knew he'd at least give him a 'told you so' look.

He had. And he'd been right. Maybe not about some if it, but about a lot. Norway, the Norwegians, the UN.

And Kangwon had definitely made a mistake.

"Can I ask you something?" he asked after a long moment, and when he got assent, continued, "Do you think people are good or bad? In general. It's just something I've been wondering about lately."

The Soviet seemed to think about it as the plane rattled them around. When the turbulence lessened, he said, "I must believe that they are good."

"But are they?"

"They are." CCCP sounded more assured. "Those in my care are my children. If I am forever anticipating that one will turn on me, I will not be able to treat them how I must. I remain vigilant for those who would do harm, while believing that the majority will not."

Kangwon chewed on his inner cheek. "Can you do that? Be alert and see the best in people at the same time? How do you not get... paranoid?"

Korea tended to come off as suspicious and cynical, and when it came to foreigners, he was. But Kangwon knew it was still as shock to him every time a Korean committed some heinous act. In the past, he'd seen the best in their people and the worst in everyone else. Communist theory and the General had changed the latter a little, but neither had done much to the former. If he was on alert for Rheeites and traitors, it was because they weren't 'their people' to him anymore.

But they were. For better or worse, and everything that could mean for a Countryhuman. And they wouldn't just be able to get rid of them after the war was over.

Kangwon had once wondered if he should direct criticism towards Korea at a Party meeting over it, since he wouldn't listen to him personally. He'd thought about mentioning that he had too much of a rosy view of their people, considering that, in the end, they were all just that. He knew he couldn't say what he really wanted to, but maybe it could get through to him that way.

He never had, though, because it hadn't been as necessary before the war, and because he'd been worried about the consequences for their country. It was why he'd voted the way he had at the pre-criticism session vote over what to tell Korea about South- because too much faith was better than the alternative.

But Kangwon had had too much faith in Norway and the people in it, and look where that had gotten him. And yeah, it was different. But it still made him think that he was glad the vote had turned out the way it had, even if everything they'd said really had just gone in one ear slit and out the other. He didn't want Korea's faith to burn him.

But at the same time, he couldn't help but feel that the alternative was worse, even now. If there was a way to get Korea onto the middle ground he'd never touched in his life, to uproot the flower garden in his head and see people's flaws while still seeing the best in them, he wanted to know it.

Because he was still worried that this war might drive Korea towards that alternative.

"Those in my family would never betray me, nor the rest of their siblings," CCCP said to him. "And if they do, then they were not of my family in the first place. I watch for those who are pretending to be kin. I do not wait for kin to turn."

Kangwon fiddled with his fingers in his pockets. That didn't quite help their situation.

"Korea's kin did turn on him, though," the province couldn't help point out. "He took his eye."

"Да," the Soviet agreed. "But perhaps he should reconsider what 'family' is."

Kangwon lips twitched a little sadly. "I'm not sure he'd want to hear that."

"Which is why I have not said it to him." CCCP gave him a considering look. "You asked me that on his behalf, did you not?"

Kangwon sucked his teeth, then nodded. "Yeah. Korea probably wouldn't want me to say this to you, but... I'm a little worried that if he ever admits that half of Korea is complicit in the suffering of our people, it might make him... lose faith in our country."

CCCP shook his head. "I do not think you need to fear that. I know my son well enough to know he could never lose faith in his people."

Kangwon hesitated, then nodded. That hadn't been what he'd meant. He knew Korea would never lose faith in their people, their cause, or their nation.

But if his Countryhuman knew he had said even that little bit about him to CCCP, it would probably be the final straw in getting him beaten to death with a sandal, so he switched the subject back.

"But there are bad people," he pointed out. "Those outside of your family. What do you think makes them that way? Are they just born like that or-"

"No one is born how they are," CCCP firmly cut him off. "There is no such thing as a soul or fate. There are only choices and the humans that make them. Nurture can be overcome. Even one who is born with a mental impairment can still choose who they will be."

Though China's opinion had been a bit more cynically worded, Kangwon still saw a tie-in.

"So we need to guide our people towards the right choices."

He and CCCP probably had different ideas of what 'right' meant, but since they were both Socialists, they likely both meant fostering working class solidarity while eradicating class exploitation, poverty, sexism, and things like that. Comfortable, ideologically awakened people were less likely to make 'wrong' choices, such as exploiting others for their own gain or turning to crime. The disproportionate amount of war crimes committed by South's army proved that.

"Да." CCCP took a sip from his own glass of milk. "Our aim is to create a society where right choices are encouraged, and simpler to make. Unlike in capitalist societies, where those who make wrong choices become rich and influential, and those who make the right ones are neglected or even punished, we care for those who make the right choices, and we try to educate those who make wrong ones. And if that fails, we remove them."

Kangwon mulled over that, thinking about what exactly led someone to make choices so wrong that they became a tyrant. "What about America? Why do you think he's the way he is?"

He wasn't sure if he should bring up his questions about how much their people influenced them directly. He didn't actually know CCCP very well, if he'd be uncomfortable the way Korea would. Or catch on to part of what he'd meant before.

CCCP's thick brows drew in. "It does not matter why he is the way he is. It only matters what he is. He has made his choices. And he is one of those who must be removed. Just as was the Japanese Empire, or the Russian Empire."

That name again.

Kangwon side-eyed the Soviet country, remembering what he'd said about 'crushing the Russian Empire's heart in his grasp.'

There was a frequently spoken of topic among anti-Communists, one that had had multiple articles of propaganda and pamphlets written about it, both by them and by CCCP's own scholars and theorists, who hotly refuted the claim. Kangwon had read several of them written by the Japanese to turn Koreans against Socialism during the Occupation, since filial piety was so important to their people. But there'd never been a direct statement by the Countryhuman himself.

The Korean provinces, too, had whispered about it over the table while CCCP and Korea conferred during his monthly visits during the trusteeship, though none had ever had the chance (or courage) to get him alone to ask it, even Hwang. Kangwon had a chance now, though, and while he wouldn't want the glare the Soviet had given the Norwegians turned on him, he was fairly certain he wouldn't be thrown out of the plane for asking it.

"They say you killed your father," he said, as casually as he could.

The Soviet's face didn't change. "Да. Some do."

He made no further comment, so Kangwon prodded, "And did you? If you don't mind me asking."

The reply this time was immediate. "Нет. That man was no father of mine. He did not raise us as a father should. I was born of the people, not of an empire."

That was pretty much how the Soviet information workers said it.

"Then why don't you make some sort of announcement saying that?" Kangwon asked. "You personally."

"Because it does not matter. Those who support me would do so whether he was my father or not. And those who want to use the word 'patricide' to paint me as a monster would continue to do so, even if they knew it were not so. The truth is not important to them, only that I am seen with blood on my hands."

Kangwon bobbed his head at that. There'd been those who spread rumours over the last few years about things from the Agrarian Reform to the Soviet trusteeship to the Labour Law. When their claims had been firmly refuted, and they'd seen the truth, instead of changing their beliefs, many just found new tales to repeat. It hadn't been about truth or justice, but instead about casting a shadow on Korea and waylaying their efforts to restore the country.

Or maybe it was like China had said. Maybe they only cared about being right, and the concept that they weren't was too much to contemplate.

"And what would be more monstrous?" CCCP's voice hardened as his knuckles tightened around his armrests. "To kill someone with whom you shared blood, or to excuse his actions? To look away while he committed pogroms on the very people he was sworn to protect, to ignore the blood on his sword, simply because he could be called a 'father?'" He bared his fangs at the word.

"The second one," Kangwon said, both because he believed it, and because the Soviet had very sharp canines, and he would like to see them hidden behind his lips again. He definitely got why that guard had buckled.

He got his wish as the man relaxed, hands unclenching. "Exactly. So it does not matter what the Russian Empire was or why he was what he was. Only that he made his choices, and that he was punished for them. I and my family know I am no monster, and that my choices are different than his." His voice was glacial as he fixed his eye on Kangwon. "I am not him."

Oh yeah. That look- even if not actually directed at Kangwon- would've made him quake back during the Occupation.

It would have still made Gangwon quake.

"I don't think anyone would disagree with that," he agreed, mostly unquaking. "You're the country that saved Europe from a Nazi takeover. That really should put you firmly on the 'not-a-monster' list."

CCCP sounded grimly amused when he responded, "You would be surprised, son."

Right. He'd saved Europe. But some people would never forgive him for it.

When the plane touched down in Moscva, the Soviet didn't get out right away, looking at Kangwon with a more gentle look on his face.

"You are a good boy," he said fondly, making Kangwon flush. "And so is Korea. He believes strongly in what he is doing, and he has faith that his people do, too. That is what sets us apart from those such as America or the Russian Empire. He will be fine."

CCCP put a hand on Kangwon's shoulder, favouring him with a rare small smile. "You all will be."

If you read Safeway/Warring Pyongyang, you always knew it was going to end this way. Gangwon </3

The villa Kangwon is kept in actually was the American embassy at the time. It's called Villa Otium, and was built by a man who made his living exploiting Russian petroleum pre-liberation. The US bought it to serve as their embassy back then, buying out a piece of Norway. I thought it was fitting to use for this.

When I was firmly deciding when Kangwon realized he liked men, I was thinking about having CCCP being his awakening. Because he's probably done that to a lot of men . But then I decided it was more in character for him to have been just formed knowing he was gay. He didn't even have to meet a man to be attracted to. He just knew. And he never cared. 1910s Korea and Kangwon was perfectly accepting of the fact he's not straight. Zero internalized homophobic for him.

[image]

I got mixed up because I posted the last chapter while editing this chapter, so I added the image to the wrong one. ㅜㅜ So here is the redraw of CCCP propositioning Kangwon in a car (not what's happening). Except now it's in a plane. But that's still not what's happening.
Canonically he's sitting across from him. But you try drawing Countryhuman side profiles.

The Price We Pay

Kangwon was sent across the Soviet Union while CCCP stayed in Moscva to handle the trouble he'd caused for his country. He took non-stop military trucks, monoplanes, and trains through Siberia and into the east, accompanied by Soviet men to guard him, the trip taking days before he finally arrived at Kasan once more.

As the train rolled under the shadows of the Russian mountains and into the station, all he could think about was heading this way with Gangwon just days earlier, so in awe of the scenery. He'd been so sure…

It was one of their Security Forces comrades that picked him up, not in a vehicle, but walking him all the way from the train strain to the bridge across the Tuman.

Or where the bridge had been. Only splinters remained, wooden wreckage floating in the river, fetched up against the low banks. It had to have been recent if it wasn't fixed yet.

It was bold to bomb the Soviet border directly. Kangwon knew in his heart it was America's way at getting back at CCCP for getting to him before he could.

He had to cross over a temporary pontoon bridge farther down the shore, bidding the border guard farewell. If he wondered why he'd been escorting one of his Provincehumans over from the Soviet Union, he didn't ask, just saluted.

Kangwon's stomach churned with worry, thinking of Kim Ju-bong, Ri Il, Sip Yung-Su, and Gangwon's guards. He hoped Norway would just send the first man back. He hoped Korea hadn't done anything he'd regret.

Despite everything, something in him eased as he crossed back into their country, either something intrinsic or just the sense that he was home.

He hoped his brother could feel it, too, even if he was terrified.

As he walked towards the dug-out mounds, thinking he'd be waiting for a ride, someone climbed out from one, turning his way with the sharpness of a blade.

Kangwon's steps almost faltered, his chest immediately growing tight as the spring afternoon cooled.

Korea.

His head was lowered, glaring up from under his eye at his province as he approached, perfectly motionless. It was his tiger-look, the one he gave when he wanted to pounce on someone and tear them to shreds, or when he was going to.

Korea had been mad at him before, with Kim Mi-ju, with Hae. Usually always for hiding something from him because he knew it wouldn't do any good to tell him.

But he'd never looked at him like that.

Kangwon kept walking, trying to look casual. But his own head was lowering, his shoulders hunching up around his ear slits, in shame instead of predatory intent. He stopped in front of Korea, making an effort to look him in the eye.

He opened his mouth to apologize or explain or beg for forgiveness.

But what came out, sounding smaller than usual, was, "They took Gangwon."

Korea's gaze didn't flicker. He just turned on a heel, marching off, leaving Kangwon no choice but to follow.

He kept his mouth shut, knuckles firmly pressed against his lips. He didn't need an order to know talking wouldn't be wise right now.

And he'd known he wouldn't be getting any comfort anyway.

He followed him off the road for a tense hour, into the hills west of Tumangang, where the GAZ was waiting hidden under a tarp. It rustled, and someone slid out, charging straight at him.

"You bastard!"

He braced himself, taking South Pyongan's punch on his shoulder, feeling his burns crack and burst under the force. Not holding back, she punched him with her full strength again on the other side, then started to rain lighter blows all over his back and chest.

"You stupid sneaky bastard!"

She grabbed his shoulders, going to double him over and knee him in the gut, when North Pyongan wrapped his arms around her, pulling her back.

"Leave him alone," he said, casting a worried at Korea, who just stood there, expression stormy. "He has been through enough."

"Not nearly enough!" South Pyongan strained against him. "Let me at him, I'm gonna beat the sense into his stupid round head!"

Since she wasn't breaking out of her brother's grip as easily as she could've, Kangwon stopped preparing for another blow, then was almost knocked back as Hae plowed into him.

"Kangahmissedyasomuchahwassoworriedwhy'dyougoareyouokaywhatwasN

Hae leaned back, still holding his sides, and looked around, her brows crinkling.

"Where's Gang?"

Kangwon opened his mouth, then shook his head.

South Pyongan went limp in North Pyongan's arms, whose eyes closed. "Shit," the female Pyongan cursed.

The others were all there, and had heard.

Dismayed, SH put a hand over her mouth. “Kangwon, I’m so-“

“None of you are ever going to leave this country again.”

They all turned to Korea, taken aback. The look on his face was like being plunged back into the Norwegian winter.

Hwang’s brows furrowed. “I know it’s not common for Provincehumans to leave, but within the Communist Bloc-“

“I don’t care.” Korea’s voice was flat, but they could all hear the tension simmering under it. It made North Pyongan take his sister back a step. "None of you are ever setting foot over these borders again.”

SH frowned. “But you said we could try going to the World Art Festival once-“

“And now I’m not!” Korea snapped, rounding on her. “It is never going to be safe! Even once this war is over, the other counties are still going to try and destroy us. They will do anything to cripple Korea, to tear us down and make us pay for not submitting to them.”

“Korea.” Kangwon made himself speak. “CCCP helped-“

Korea twisted his neck to him. “You shut up.”

He didn’t scream it. But his low, dark tone made Kangwon clack his jaw shut instantly.

The Soviet helping only made it worse anyway.

“CCCP only agreed to fetch you because he wants me on his side,” Korea growled. “If he didn’t want an American puppet on his doorstep, you would still be in Norway, or being tortured like your brother.”

“Korea-“ SH tried.

He didn’t even hear her. “That is the only reason he and the other Socialists help us. That is the only reason China is helping us.”

North Pyongan frowned at that, but they all knew not to interrupt.

"We can't even trust our allies, let alone America's puppets." His eye swirled, blown wide open. "Any of them would do what Norway did if it would benefit them, they'd do it even if it didn't benefit them. They would take you hostage and tear you apart just to get to me, to destroy our country. We can't trust any of them. Do you understand me?"

Kangwon had been worried about this. That Norway's capture of him might end up undoing all the progress their General and Marx and Lenin had made.

"Do you understand me?!" Korea snarled, and they all jumped.

"Yes, Korea." Some of them said it more reluctantly, but they all knew they had to say it. At least right now. Sense could come when their Countryhuman's chest wasn't rising and falling so sharply.

"Then why couldn't you understand earlier?" Korea rounded on Kangwon. "Why did you have to get Gangwon stolen?!"

"Korea, that's enough," SH said disapprovingly. "He just lost his brother."

Korea bared his fangs at her, then took a deep breath, straightening up.

"None of you are ever going to leave Korea again. And that is final."

He turned, marching for the truck, tearing the canvas off it with a violence that said he wished it was Norway or America or maybe even CCCP.

The provinces lingered awkwardly. Kangwon could feel them looking at him, unsure of what to say.

"We should go," he said, trying to keep his voice steady. "He'll leave us here if we don't."

He walked past them, heading for the truck. His cousins followed in silence.

They all piled into the bed, even Hae giving up the chance to sit next to Korea. She curled in against Kangwon's side instead, wrapping around his arm, for once not even interested in finding out what was in the paper-wrapped package he had. The others packed in around him, like they were trying to make sure he couldn't jump out.

"We were hoping if we came with him, it might take some of his edge off," SH explained with a smile that faded fast.

"It did succeed," Hwang said, pushing his glasses up. "Kangwon is still breathing."

They all gave quick, tight smiles. All of them knew Kangwon's punishment couldn't be over yet. Gangwon was gone. A ten-hour drive wasn't enough to even make a scratch in Korea's fury.

"What's goin' to happen to Gang?" Hae asked quietly as the truck started up. "Is he goin' to be okay?"

"I'm sure he will be," SH said, giving Kangwon a sympathetic smile. "And we'll see him again soon."

At the back of the truck bed, North Hamgyong's jaw feathered. Chagang winced.

"I take it Korea's filled in on the secret talks?" Kangwon asked.

SH's smiled faltered. "Mm. He's forgiven the General for…" Her eyes flicked to the front of the vehicle, silently finishing, 'Your scheme.'

"But he is still displeased with us," North Pyongan sighed.

"And he is pissed with you," South Pyongan added, leaning over her brother to punch him again. "And so are we."

Hwang nodded emphatically. "You offered us no chance to dissuade you, which means you were well aware of how ill-advised your trip was. You left us incredibly worried, and you risked… far too much."

His eyes lowered. Kangwon's did, too.

"I'm sorry," he said. "We really thought we'd be able to get an investigation, and maybe show the world Gangwon isn't- wasn't a hostage."

It felt foolish now, with the truck feeling one more person short.

"And now he is one," North Hamgyong growled, ignoring the look SH gave him. "Are you happy now? Your fucking 'trust' got him handed over to the Yank."

"Don't blame Kangwon," his sister shot at him.

"Why not? It's his fault." North Hamgyong glared at the russet province. "Do you get it now? Korea's right- we can't trust the other countries. They're all like the Jap and the damn Yank."

"They aren't," Kangwon said tiredly. "It's a class thing, not a foreigner one. We were just too hopeful that Norway wasn't one of the bourgeois."

'But you said even if they don't care about us, they'll want to- to end the war. Do you really think they would?'

"I was too hopeful." He picked at his nails. "I was wrong."

"They're all part of the bourgeois," North Hamgyong growled. "If they weren't, they wouldn't be the fucking Countryhuman in charge of a capitalist country. How is it that you're the damn Marxist, but I'm the only one that gets that? They're all slavers and colonizers and puppets. They're all corrupt. And if a Countryhuman is corrupt, then the entire damn country is. That's why-"

He slammed his jaw shut, narrowing his eyes at the front of the truck. At least he got that some things really shouldn't be overheard.

"And you're just sitting there," he growled before Kangwon could say anything. "Acting like Gangwon's going to be fine, like it isn't your bleeding heart that's getting him mind-raped right now while the Yank watches. That is your damn fault."

SH had slammed her eyes shut at the one word, her lids flickering as she did the painting method he'd taught her, but now they blazed as she turned on her brother.

"Can you shut up!?" she snapped. "I know you wouldn't care, but Kangwon just lost his sibling. He doesn't need to be told it's his fault."

"So Korea can say it, but I can't?"

"Neither of you should say it!"

"Comrades," Kangwon cut in. "Cut it out. It is my fault." He looked at North Hamgyong. "And it's Gangwon's fault, too. He knew it was dangerous, and he still wanted to go. It wasn't like I talked him into it. And blaming myself can't rewind time. It doesn't bring him back." He gave his cousin a tired smile. "Blaming him wouldn't change anything either."

North Hamgyong got what he was saying, his jaw bulging. But Kangwon could tell it hadn't gotten through to him. It never did.

"Whatever," he grunted, sitting back as he crossed his arms, turning away from them.

"He'll be alright," Kangwon said, hoping it was true. "America didn't torture us last time. Even with everything he did to SH. He wouldn't do it while South could Command the truth out of them."

"And he won't win the war," SH said firmly, hands clenched in her tunic. "Since we'll be… negotiating the Reunification, there won't be any chance for him to do anything."

North Hamgyong grimaced. Chagang winced again.

"Yeah." Kangwon mustered a reassuring smile for Hae. "Gangwon'll be fine. Even if America puts him in solitary again, it's like Korea said during the temporary retreat- He's capable. He handled seven months. He can handle a few more."

Hopefully without undoing all of the progress he'd made in recovering.

"And just maybe he can even inform the South of the fact that he was imprisoned at all," Hwang said. "He could finally shine a light on that crime."

North Hamgyong scoffed. "If the Southern bastard even cares."

"He'll care," Kangwon assured.

He hoped he would. South hadn't been a bad person. And being imprisoned was something he should be empathetic towards. Maybe it wouldn't be enough to get him to rebel against America. But maybe it could help him see his 'friend' wasn't the person he thought he was.

"Kang." Hae raised her big eyes to him. "Can you never do that again? Ah hate when Korea runs off. It makes me feel awful an' scared, and ah don't like it. Ah don't want you to start doin' it, too. If Gang an' you hadn't come back…"

Her voice broke, stabbing through his chest, and he put an arm around her.

"I won't," he said, rubbing her shoulder. "We can't leave anymore anyways."

She didn't smile at the joke, just pushed her lower lip out and buried her face in his side.

The rest of the journey back to Pyongyang was quiet, filled with just the sound of the engine, half-hearted attempts from SH and South Pyongan to lighten the mood, and the crackling aura of Korea's rage. They reached the city in the middle of the night, as bombs were falling on the rail lines to the south, taking out the bridge over the Taedong again.

But instead of heading to the bunker, Korea took them into the dark, rubble-strewn streets with their lights off. They only stopped once they reached the Party Foundation Building. Then he stopped the truck, tossing the keys to Chagang.

“Return to the bunker,” he ordered, just as frigid as he’d been earlier, not even slightly calmed. “Not Kangwon.”

Some of Kangwon’s cousins hesitated, shifting uneasily.

“Return to the bunker,” their Countryhuman growled, and they moved aside, letting their unlucky cousin climb out of the truck.

“From CCCP,” he said quietly, passing the package he had to SH. “Cured meat and tinned fish for Korea.”

“I’ll make sure it gets donated,” she sighed, tucking it away.

They both knew it was what he’d order. And knowing CCCP had done that little extra for him would just fan their Countryhuman's fury.

Just like Europe would never forgive the country for saving them from fascism, Korea would never forgive him for not being the tyrant he expected.

Chagang caught him before he could walk over to Korea.

“He is more scared than angry,” he intoned. “So is North Hamgyong. And I’m sorry Gangwon was taken from you.”

Kangwon blinked, but his cousin was already climbing into the driver’s seat. The GAZ pulled away, leaving him and Korea facing each other on the cracked stones under the looming shadow of the office building.

Yeah, he didn’t know about that. Korea definitely looked angry. And he knew most of it came from fear over what could’ve happened to him, and what could be happening to Gangwon.

But Kangwon also knew when his Countryhuman’s anger came from fear, it was far more dangerous.

Korea’s eye went to his bloody wrist, and Kangwon watched his face somehow darken even more.

“Did they hurt you?” he growled.

His expression twisted into something murderous, and Kangwon decided not to tell him about how the State Police beat him with their batons.

"No," he managed after a second, holding his wrist. "I did it getting out of my cuffs."

It was a good thing the Americans had taken the other cuff off him. If he'd came back with a chain dangling from his wrist…

They didn't have atom bombs or an air force. But he knew Korea would want to find some way to make Norway pay. And since he'd know he shouldn't, it would just be one more thing on his shoulders.

Korea's eye was still fixed on his bloody hand. The cords in his neck strained. "Give me your report."

Kangwon looked around at the empty street, shuddering under their feet as bombs fell not too far away. "Here?"

Korea turned abruptly on his heel, leading him into the hallway of the Party Foundation Building. The lobby was dark, barely illuminated by the moonlight coming in the shattered windows. Kangwon didn't have a flashlight, and his Countryhuman didn't turn his on.

He inhaled, then told Korea about everything that had happened in an even, militant tone, skirting around the beating he'd got, and leaving out his talk with CCCP. When he told him about Gangwon getting torn away from him, he could hear his teeth creak.

When he finished, he stood silently in the dark. Korea was glowering at him, waiting for him to cave. He could feel his disappointment like a physical thing, seeping into his bones.

"Is Comrade Kim Ju-bong going to be okay?" he asked eventually, wanting to find out before he could go in on him.

"No," Korea clipped. "He was sent back to the south yesterday morning. He will likely be tortured and killed by Rhee."

Kangwon closed his eyes. He knew he wasn't just trying to get to him. He was right.

"Are Comrades Ri Il and Sip Yung-su okay? And Gangwon's comrades?" He held his breath.

"They should be executed."

"Korea, they were only following my orders." He kept his voice calm, not wanting to set him off. "Please hold me responsible, not them. I had to convince them all to let us go, and they didn't want to."

"That is the only reason they are still breathing," Korea said coldly. "That and their transparency with South Hamgyong when she encountered them while pursuing you."

Kangwon barely had time to breathe a sigh of relief before he continued, "But they will be detained until the war's end. They clearly can't be trusted to keep you safe."

Kangwon didn't argue. That was the best he could hope for.

"Thank you."

Korea's eye flashed. "I did not do it for you."

Kangwon looked down, his stomach swirling. "Right."

CCCP's anger had been more terrifying, solid and cold, impenetrable ice, unlike the fires that raged under his country's. It'd been unfamiliar, and so unpredictable. But Korea's was worse because it was familiar.

"You lied to me," Korea accused when he didn't speak. "You told me you would wake me up if something happened in the talks, and you didn't. I don't care if it was the General's idea. I know damn well he wouldn't order you, and I did order you to wake me. And now those forty-four thousand people won't make it home."

That was the concession. In exchange for their other proposals, their side had had to give up asking for the return of the forty-four thousand ‘reclassified civilians,’ the people who might be reactionaries sent into the north as spies, or their own guerrillas that had been taken. And they knew some of them were their soldiers.

“And our comrades who have been cut down by Rhee’s puppets and America’s butchers won't get their justice.” The heat in his voice started to build. “And you said you would wake me up after three weeks, and you didn’t. You left me sleeping so you could run off and get yourself kidnapped. And for what?”

Kangwon could’ve told him that it didn’t matter if he left him sleeping. They both knew he would’ve made the concession anyway. They both knew he would’ve agreed to drop the massacre inquiries because that was what it would take to end the war, and they both knew he’d blame himself for it. They both knew he’d needed the rest, that the heavy shadows under his eye and his emaciated frame said he needed even more.

But he knew he wouldn’t listen. Kangwon had hoped to spare him the guilt of being the one to make the decision. But he could tell that now he just felt guilty he hadn’t made it.

“I didn’t want this to happen,” he said quietly. “I just… wanted to help.” His lips wavered, and he pressed them together, taking a deep breath. “We both did.”

Korea didn’t say anything, but he could feel his stare drilling into him, burning the way ice did. It made him want to curl in on himself.

Kangwon swallowed. He should just get down on his knees and start begging for forgiveness. But he had to know.

“Did we get an investigation?”

It was April 4th. The World Peace Council had ended two days ago.

After a long moment of silence, his Countryhuman said, “Yes.”

The province closed his eyes, heart clenching. “Good.”

"Gangwon is gone," Korea snapped. "There is nothing 'good' about this. Even if your notes helped persuade the Council, you could have just handed them off. Instead you went at the cost of our nation's dignity, at the cost of us looking like a Soviet puppet, at the cost of your brother. And for fucking nothing."

"We didn't know it would be for nothing, Korea," he said, fighting to keep his voice steady. "We just wanted to save our people."

"You didn't need to go yourself!" Korea took a step towards him, voice ringing in the night. "What did I tell you about sacrificing yourself? What did I fucking tell you?"

Nothing Kangwon hadn't tried to tell him. But he knew he wouldn't take that well. His shoulders hunched against his will.

"You told me you wouldn't do it again, you told me," his Countryhuman hissed. "And there weren't even lives involved this time!"

"There were Korea," he said, not able to look him in the eye. "Every day America's allowed to drop germ bombs on our country is another person that suffers or dies from illness. And every day the ceasefire draws out is one our soldiers die on."

"Then that just means you didn't heed your criticism." Korea bared his teeth in his face. "I told you you are important, I told you Korea needs you, now more than ever with the germ warfare being waged against us. You are our best investigator, you are the one that makes sure the Chinese team and ours are communicating properly, and you are the one that's able to work around the clock without resting to save our people, not in Norway, but here. But because of you we could have lost our best doctor. And we did lose one of our best nurses."

Not even his praise was enough to overcome the grief that struck Kangwon at his last words.

He lost the battle, wilting in on himself as he wrapped his arms around his chest.

“I’m sorry, Korea,” he murmured. “I just… I’m sorry.”

His Countryhuman didn’t soften at all, merciless as he delivered, “You should be.”

“What are you going to do to me?”

The provinces had all been joking when they said he was going to kill him. But Kangwon knew he couldn’t escape this unpunished. At the very least, he could expect being exiled to his province after the war, unable to see his cousins or Korea, or his brother, maybe even for a year.

The idea made him uneasy. If Korea was Reunified with South, he needed to be there to help him adjust. He knew he couldn’t tell him that, and he knew he couldn't ask to not be punished at all, but-

“Korea,” he ventured. “Please don’t say I can’t treat you anymore. Please. I get if you don’t trust me enough to rest again-“ And he was going to be kicking himself for that forever. “But please don’t let this be a strike. You need someone to take care of you. Please don’t stop me from doing that.”

He knew Kim Yong-hwan could try to do it. But he wanted to. He was the one who had nursed Korea back to health in the cave, he was the one he trusted at least enough to watch over him while he healed. He wanted to make sure his country was well taken care of with his own hands, like he’d always used to let him. He couldn’t lose that, and he didn’t want Korea to lose that.

Korea’s voice was icy. “You are right. I don’t trust you enough to rest. You are never going to trick me into a recuperative coma again.”

“I wasn’t tricking you, Korea,” Kangwon said, heart sinking. “I just wanted you to get better.”

And he’d never even allowed himself to sink fully into the coma.

“I was fine,” his Countryhuman growled, even though if he was, his province never would’ve been able to get him to even lie down.

Kangwon's fingers twitched, and he pressed his knuckles to his mouth as he pleaded, "Please, Korea, please don't cut me off. I wasn't trying to trick you, I wasn't trying to spare your feelings-" He had been, but he didn't need to know that. "I just wanted you to get better. I just wanted to try and get some justice for our people, and try and get America off of Gangwon's back so you could get us a ceasefire. I just…"

He took a deep breath, trying to keep it from shuddering.

"I just wanted to help save our country." His words almost came out smoothly. "Punish me however you have to for that, just please, don't punish yourself, too."

Kim Yong-hwan couldn't convince Korea to let her take care of him the way Kangwon could, especially when his Countryhuman could just tell himself she had more important things to do with the war, and see how exhausted she was. He knew if Korea forbid him from taking care of him, it was the same thing as refusing to let anyone do it.

Korea drew himself up, putting his face in shadow. "You lost your brother. He was taken by the enemy because of you. He will be Commanded and imprisoned because of you. He may be being tortured right now. And that is all because of you."

Kangwon pressed his lips together, hiding his nails in his palms.

"I will get him back," Korea swore. "But whatever has been done to him by then will be your fault."

His eye glared coldly at him out of the shadows.

"And there is nothing worse I can do to you than that. You have paid your price."

He spun on a heel, marching for the door, his voice lowering, but not softening. "Now get back to work."

The door shuddered in its frame as he left, leaving Kangwon alone in the office building as the bombs shook its foundations in the earth.

He exhaled shakily. His legs were suddenly weak, and he crouched to bury his face in his knees.

He'd gotten off light, he tried to tell himself. But it didn't feel like it.

He couldn't be upset at Korea for trying to force guilt into him over his brother, just like he couldn't be upset at North Hamgyong for it. He knew why they said it, and he wouldn't let it get to him.

It wasn't just on him. And even though part of it was, he couldn't carry that around with him and obsess over it. It had never changed anything for them, and it wouldn't change anything for him or Gangwon or Kim Ju-bong. Both provinces had made the wrong decision, and he'd… been too trusting. Or too optimistic.

But they'd wanted to do good. He couldn't blame himself for that. He hoped Gangwon didn't either.

He'd paid his price for taking a chance. But it was the same one that Korea had. And even if his Countryhuman had failed back then, he never would've been able to blame him for trying.

But just because he was managing to keep himself from being wracked with guilt didn't mean he wasn't churning with anxiety.

Something else Korea had said at that criticism session, where his province had promised to 'work on' himself like he was a machine so that he wouldn't sacrifice himself unnecessarily ever again, kept running through his mind. What he'd said about America.

'I don't trust that if you were captured again, he wouldn't hide your existence from South, execute you, and find some way to blame it on me.'

Even if it hadn't been his fault at all, Kangwon didn't want to lose his brother.

Finally exhaling, he picked himself up off the floor. He needed to go disinfect his wounds, bandage his hand, and get back to work. His notes had helped get their investigation, even if he hadn't been there to present them, but it would take time to organize it. Until then, he had lives to save.

He knew it was too late for their comrade, but Gangwon would be fine. America wanted war with China, so he'd definitely have South Command him to find out if he was here. And since he didn't know he was, the only thing that would come of it was South knowing Gangwon was there. He couldn't be executed or disappeared and have it blamed on them.

But he could be tortured, and America could say they'd done it. Kangwon… He didn't think the Norwegians would deny it. Even the man that had let them go.

No. Like they'd said, he wouldn't do anything to him while it could be Commanded out of him. And an armistice was just an agreement to stop fighting, so the three months to arrange a real end to the war wouldn't allow it to happen either. And then Kangwon and Gangwon would be back together, and so would Korea and his brother.

South wasn't very confident. He didn't have much of a spine, and Kangwon was worried about America leading him further astray than he already had. He wasn't a bad person, but Kangwon was worried about him making choices that would make him one. Because he agreed with CCCP- no matter what influenced them, their people, nature, nurture, in the end, everything came down to choices.

But South was half of their country. He was Korea too, even if some of them didn't like it. And maybe Kangwon had had too much faith or placed too much trust in foreigners, or at least foreign countries, and maybe he wanted to criticize Korea for the same thought. But South was theirs. He was Korea's brother.

So even if their other Countryhuman never received his letter, he would try to trust that his brother was safe with him.

And try not to let it consume him if he wasn't.

—

North stormed down the street, trying to ignore the burning in his veins. But it was growing, spreading throughout his body, meeting with the burns on his skin to turn him into a ball of fire that yearned to properly ignite, to turn everything around him into ashes.

But there was nothing to consume, just the remnants of his city, already burned to the ground. The ones that had done it flew high overhead, safe from him.

As the small pieces of rubble on the ground clattered with the impact of another bomb just streets over, North couldn't take it anymore, reeling into an alleyway that had once been a street, and now wasn't anything but a narrow path between piles of rubble.

He braced his palms against a charred wall, chest heaving as he tried to remind himself that Kangwon was here, he was okay, that the barbed wire constricting his chest every day he'd been gone, unsure if he was being tortured or if his plane had crashed or if his train had been hijacked could unwind. His province was back, he was fine.

But Gangwon wasn't.

North snatched up a chunk of concrete, heaving it at a fallen wall with a snarl, watching it explode into a shower of grey shrapnel, a recreation in miniature of the blast that had decimated the home it had once been part of.

He immediately felt childish and unsatisfied, the burning unabated. It wasn't enough. He wanted to scream, to rage, to march south right now and tear Gangwon back out of- America's bloody hands before he could get his province's on them. He wanted to head across Europe and drag Oslo back here, to show Norway what it felt like to have one of your provinces taken from you. It had been too long since the European nations had had to fear that threat.

It was unfair. It was unfair that they could do whatever they wanted, violating as many laws as they pleased to detain Kangwon, to hold him, to ship Gangwon out while North couldn't even respond to an invasion and Liberate his country without it being a crime that needed to be put down by the entire damn international community, it was unfair that they hadn't even notified him, like he didn't even exist, like the only Korea that mattered was the Korea they recognized, the only laws that mattered were the ones they wanted to, the only people that mattered were theirs, it was unfair that Kangwon, Hae, North Pyongan, his provinces that had still been able to keep what he couldn't for so long were having that taken from them by this war, it was unfair that if it hadn't been for CCCP, if it hadn't been for what he wanted from North, Kangwon would still be in Norway, that America almost certainly would have gotten what he wanted sooner than later and taken him, too, holding him over his head just like his captured soldiers and the forty-four thousand unlisted, and that North would have been the unreasonable one, the one who wanted to keep the war going, if he hadn't bowed his head and accepted it, unfair that any foreign country thought they should have anything to do with their Reunification, unfair that him and his brother had been Divided in the first place, unfair that Gangwon was going to pay the price when his only crime had been being loyal to his country, unfair that this war should have been over two years ago. It was unfair unfair unfair unfair.

North pressed his mouth to his sleeve, fighting the urge to sink his fangs into his arm to muffle the useless scream bubbling in his throat. They itched in his gums, the same furious itch in every inch of his body, telling him to do something when there was nothing to do, there would've been nothing he could do.

A plane buzzed low overhead, one of the F-86 fighter-bombers, and he cracked his neck up, watching its shadow fly overhead, machine gun rounds spraying over several streets. It wasn't a route Kangwon would have taken to get to the hospital, but that didn't ease the tension in his chest, spilling into his throat. There were other people in the city, essential workers and others, huddling inside buildings with no roofs, living in bunkers and dug-outs hidden amongst the ruins. His people, reduced to the most pitiable of living conditions, already made to suffer more than they ever should have had to again, but still the Yankee pilots felt the need to make it worse, to strike fear into their hearts, to make sure they would never live to be happy again.

North took off running, pounding after the plane. It was faster, but they still reached the same destination- the rail bridge over the Taedong. The new one was partially submerged, but the visible tracks were interrupted by craters that still sent trails of smoke into the sky. The anti-aircraft guns boomed up at the sky, and North could see wreckage floating in the river where an American plane had already met its end. Their own MiGs were up there, targeting the B-29s, but it wasn't enough. It wouldn't be enough until every enemy plane was torn down and its pilot made to pay for what he'd done.

North skidded into one of the dug-outs by the shore, where several of the aircraft hunters were hunkered down, injured, reloading, or waiting to replace their flagging comrades. They startled as their Countryhuman came sliding in, rounds peppering the ground behind him.

"Comrade Korea?" a man said, blinking as his country shed all his weapons except for his pistol and blade.

"Give me that." North didn't wait for an answer, tearing the captured M20 Super Bazooka from his hands, along with an 88.9mm rocket that he took off his tunic to wrap it in, before leaping back out into the night.

He didn't need a loader. If he went down for this, he'd go down alone, like always.

The old rail bridge still clung to the shore, its skeletal frame decrepit, burned by the Yankees and dismembered by his own soldiers to build and repair the new one. North headed for this, charging past more aircraft hunters, just catching the call of "Comrade Korea?"

He didn't stop, clambering up onto the rusted metal with the rocket cradled in one arm, scaling one of the broken spans that had once made up the arches, until he was sitting high up in a jagged nest of twisted steel. He unslung the bazooka, balanced it on his knees as he loaded the single rocket into it, and stood. The moon was three-quarters and bright, making his white undershirt glow. Even if the pilots couldn't see who he was, he would make a tempting target.

Proving him right, an F-86 started to wheel in mid-air. North had to shoot it before it finished turning if he wanted to survive this.

His prickling insides stilled as he lifted the bazooka onto his shoulder, carefully aiming. Time had slowed down enough that he felt almost unhurried. None of his provinces or people were in danger right now, none of them would suffer if he screwed this up. Just him.

'THOOM.'

The rocket roared from the muzzle with a blast that made his ear slits ring. North refused to scramble out of the way in case he'd missed, watching as it shot straight at the plane.

Just as the F-86 turned and its machine guns started to rattle, the rocket took it directly in an external tank. There was an immediate explosion, and the fighter veered sharply, spiralling down over the shore, where it crashed, lighting up the night with a fireball, a twin one blooming in the river's reflection.

It was a lot of fire. Like North had thought, the tanks had likely carried napalm.

Ssi-bal. He hoped the pilot had survived. He had wanted to tear him from his cockpit with his own hands.

He made his way quickly down the bridge before another plane could target him, jogging down the bank with the heavy bazooka jostling against his back, rubbing the burns there raw.

The wreckage of the F-86 was spread out over the riverbank like entrails. It had landed on its wing and almost tumbled in a sideways somersault, leaving parts of itself behind in a trail of destruction. North gave a the fuselage a wide berth, in case there were bombs left to detonate. He skirted the patches of fiercely burning gasoline jelly as well, making his way to the smashed cockpit, finding it also ablaze, the napalm having latched onto it when it caught in the air.

The pilot was still alive, ash-streaked and bloodstained. His fingers scrabbled weakly at the damp soil, like fat, pale worms trying to burrow into the earth, in an effort to drag himself away from the liquid fire eating its way towards him. But his leg was caught in the innards of the plane, twisted at an unnatural angle and pinned between the mechanisms.

As North's boots stopped before him, he looked up, face contorted in fear.

"Help," he rasped, breath rattling in his lungs as he desperately stretched out a hand.

North's fingers twitched at his side, but he curled them into a fist.

This man had been here to drop that napalm on his people. To send his soldiers careening into the river with their clothes ablaze as the skin melted from their bones. North could still smell the stench of burning hair and flesh as the gasoline jelly rained over them on the way south, and he could see the children staying in the Kaesong neutral zone, bodies twisted and lumpy, like badly molded clay. He could see the ones that had burned.

This man had been here to do that. He had likely been responsible for attacks in the past. For the men and women in the hospital wards, eyes unable to close, bodies unable to move, only able to suffer until they died, while the pilots flew back south to smoke and brag and rape his women. They didn't care until it happened to them.

North didn't drag the man out to end him with his own hands or shove him into the fire. He wasn't like America or the Americans. He didn't enjoy this. He just stepped back, and watched as the hope faded from the Yankee's eyes, made dark by the night. As he started to beg and plead in his guttural language, as the heat from the flames brushed over him and he began to writhe with a desperate primal terror, as he slumped to the ground, the napalm stealing all the oxygen from the air, making North's own lungs tight. And as the jelly burned through the frame of the plane above him and he woke again, clawing at his clothes as the sticky fire ate through skin and muscle and sinew, and the fire reached him, howling and gibbering as it burned him up, not like an animal, but like a man.

North watched, feeling little and wishing he felt less.

If you were willing to inflict pain, you should be willing to receive it. He had never done anything to his enemies that he couldn't imagine happening to him. Or that hadn't already happened to him. He knew the cost of every bullet, every knife to the heart, every man he did his best to tear open. He was ready to face it if it happened to him. He was ready to burn.

The Americans weren't. They thought they could get away with all the suffering they dealt without it ever coming back, just like the Japanese that had once kept the Koreas trapped in their prison, so stupidly shocked when he ended their cruelty, convinced right up until the end that none of what they did to others could ever be done to them, like everyone that wielded violence to keep someone 'lesser' in check.

They couldn't. Not anymore. Korea might need CCCP to fight their battles on the world stage for now. But they wouldn't always. If America and the UN and Norway and every other Imperialist thought they could treat them this way after the war was over, they were wrong. They didn't have a monopoly on violence anymore, CCCP's atom bomb threat proved that. And if they tried to burn Korea again, then they had better be ready to burn too.

And if America hurt Gangwon any more than he already had, if he hurt any of Korea's provinces more than he already had, then he was going to be razed to the ground. Not his people. Him. Because Korea wasn't like them.

Korea watched as the flames consumed the plane and its pilot, until the bombers overhead retreated, and the anti-aircraft team came to congratulate him, clapping him on the back and cheering as the fire cast flickering shadows on them.

Before they could move him away from the pyre, North slid a hand under the star over his empty socket, nails scraping at the scar there, thinking of SH dragging herself back to him on missing toes, covered in bruises, Hae's missing tooth and the way she'd touched her cheek when telling him America had slapped her, the faint mark still on Kangwon's head from where it had been slammed off the wall in the POW holding camp, and Jeju's broken whisper in the woods. And of course of the way Gangwon had been during the temporary retreat, shaking and pleading with him not to send him off, tears in his eyes when Kangwon had never cried before. How he'd came back to him with ruptured ear drums, choosing permanently crippling himself over being returned to the south.

His brother had better take better care of their province this time.

Eeeeeee anticipated chapter next. Frothing at mouth. Also yes China is likely watching from the shadows somewhere panting in excitement. It's what he does.

I was thinking and I wonder if the reason that America tends to have a very individualist, 'I don't care about anyone but myself and family' mindset (I'm not saying this doesn't exist anywhere else, it just seems very prevalent in America) is partially because of the sheer amount of suffering their nation inflicts on others. Obviously there are cultural reasons, too, because the basis of their society is built on more selfish European cultures, and also the amount of propaganda they're inundated with. But also when your country is constantly involved in bloody wars and genocidal sanctions regimes, if you want to keep believing it's good and you should be proud of it, you sort of have to say 'well I don't care about anyone else at all. This is good for us, so why should I care?' And then their propaganda just reinforces that. 'They deserve it, this is keeping your freedom and way of life, don't think about it, look how happy you are.' If they cared about other people they'd have to accept that they're part of the machine that causes endless suffering to those other people, which would make them unhappy. Very small minds.

Hmmmm. Topically, Norway's monarchy has close ties to the American government's pedophile ring, and the princess' son has several rape allegations. And yet the Parliament voted to keep them, and they have a very high public approval rate. Is Norway an inherently evil country? Much to consider…. (Sorry to any Norwegians. I am joking. Most likely. I don't think you're evil anyway.) I swear one of the themes of this story isn't 'Europeans are evil.'

No Choice

[image]

The lump in South's throat was making it hard to breathe.

As he stood in the sitting room of his house, Gangwon trembling nervously in front of him, he knew he had to speak. He was running out of time.

But every time he swallowed, his saliva only built up, unable to be choked down. When he finally managed, it actually hurt.

"Gangwon-"

The province lunged and South stumbled back, raising his hands in fear, ready for him to fulfill his brother's directive and-

He was running, sprinting for the hallway, darting out of sight. After a second, South followed, sandals pounding on the carpet.

"Gangwon!" He couldn't escape, he had Commands-

He didn't go for the front door, slaloming off the walls of the hall, careening around the corner and into the kitchen, slamming into the counter at full speed, yanking open drawers of plates and spoons and-

South's eyes widened as he came up with a knife, wickedly sharp under the white glare of the lights. His eyes gleamed with a desperate- was that really hope?- as he turned it to his face, opening his mouth wide.

Horror almost stopped South's tongue before he could save Gangwon's, but he just lately found his voice in time to shout, "Gangwon! Stop!!"

The province's hand froze in mid-air, fear flashing across his eyes as he stuck out his tongue, straining to get it even an inch closer to the gleaming blade.

His arms trembled in exertion, until South panted, "Gangwon, drop it."

The province didn't move, and he remembered what the guy that had delivered him said about his physical examination. South repeated the Command louder, adding, "And don't move."

The green fingers opened, and the blade clattered to the floor. Gangwon gazed at it in desperation, the shaking moving to the rest of his body, vibrating hard enough that the vase of wilting dogwood flowers on the kitchen table shook with him.

South darted forward, safely returning the blade to the drawer before turning back to the other man.

"Why would you...?" He trailed off, sighing and leaning against the cupboard.

He didn't really need to ask. For the same reason he'd ruined his hearing, for the same reason South Hamgyong had killed a man and fled into the frigid wilderness, for the same reason that woman in Pyongyang had gone back for her friend. For the same reason his brother was still fighting.

Because Gangwon was a Communist. And he was crazy.

His final hope that maybe he was different, that maybe he could finally have a province that loved him the same way the others loved his brother, him, not North or Korea but him, flickered and died.

Of course it did. His own brother hadn't even loved him enough to stay. Why would someone else?

Now all that was left was the panic that had sparked inside him when he'd heard Gangwon had actually been captured.

There wasn't much time.

With the province safely immobilized, South took a deep breath.

He didn't want to ask, didn't want to know. It didn't matter anyways, it didn't-

"Gangwon. Tell me- is Red China here in Korea?"

Gangwon's eyes widened, the white engulfing his face. The tremors moved up the wall, the bowls lining the shelf clattering like they'd fall.

"Gangwon," South repeated, louder. "Tell me- is China here in Korea?"

Gangwon's jaw feathered, the cords in his scrawny neck standing out, a vein over his eye bulging as his teeth clenched so hard that South could hear them creaking.

"Gangwon!" He lunged at him, grabbing him by the bony shoulders as he shouted, "TELL ME IF THE CHINESE COUNTRYHUMAN IS HERE!"

"YES!" The words tore themselves from Gangwon's mouth against his will, and horror overtook his expression. But they didn't stop. "I t-t-t-t-think so! There's someone that wears a mask and was with Korea and there's women and Kangwon s-s-s-s-said-!"

His jaw suddenly clamped shut, and South watched in repulsion as his teeth guillotined down on his tongue, blood immediately staining them red. He was ready to Command him not to bite it off, but the man's mouth didn't open again. He only shook harder, his hands twitching in place.

Emotions that South knew well filled his face. Pain, guilt, shame.

Fear.

That made two of them.

He released Gangwon, taking a numb step back.

America had been right. China was here. Not just his army. Him.

He couldn't fathom why. Was he really puppeteering North since CCCP wasn't allowed to? It had to be something like that. It was illegal! He could get more embargoed, or, or-

Or punished.

"Starting without me, Southie?"

The voice behind him almost made South scream. When he turned to see America looming in the doorway, the urge welled within him again, blocking his throat.

His friend was smiling. It turned to a smirk as he looked to Gangwon, bloody and shaking.

"Looks like he wasn't being so cooperative. Colour me surprised."

If South felt like he wanted to scream, the province looked like it. He was pretty sure if it wasn't for the Command, Gangwon would be hiding under the table.

He wanted to.

He shouldn't. There wasn't anything wrong. He trusted his friend. America had said he didn't want war with China. He just wanted to know if he was here so Red China wouldn't get away with breaking the law. He'd said he'd never lie to him and he'd never leave him and South trusted him.

"So, what'd he say?" America strolled in, standing too close to Gangwon. "Did he see the chink?"

'Speak, South. Speak.'

America was going to notice how quiet he was. He was going to know something was wrong. And then-

'Speak, idiot.'*

South spoke.

"No," he said, hoping his voice sounded as easy to his ally as it did to him. "He says he doesn't think China's here."

He couldn't look at Gangwon, couldn't bear to see what expression he was making, if it would give him away. He could only stare up at America's blank aviator-stare.

America stared back, still grinning. "Is that so?"

"Yeah," South replied, his heart hammering even harder than it had that night in the warehouse. "I Commanded him."

The other man nodded congenially, stuffing his hands in his trouser pockets. "Why don't you ask him again?"

'Don't swallow.'

Trying not to sound like he was choking, South smiled at America. "What, don't you trust me?"

He said it lightly, half-jokingly, like his ally always did. But without the threatening undercurrent.

America grinned at him, his teeth perfect and white. "Of course I trust you, South. But commies can be tricky. And you're not the brightest bulb on the tree sometimes, kid. No offense. But you remember the whole 'escaping provinces' fiasco. Amongst other things." He arched a pointed brow.

South laughed sheepishly. "Okay, yeah."

'Don't stutter.'

"I'll ask him again."

He turned to Gangwon, tucking his hands into his pockets like America so he wouldn't grab his own arm.

"Gangwon. Tell me- is China in Korea?"

Gangwon stared at him, his eyes wide and confused, still shaking.

'Answer answer please answer please.'

"Oops," South said out loud, still sounding sheepish. "Sorry, I forgot you're deaf. GANGWON." He felt sick. "TELL ME- IS THE RED CHINESE COUNTRYHUMAN IN KOREA PERSONALLY?"

Gangwon still stared, and South could feel his heartbeat in his head.

*'Pleasepleasepleaseplease oh God please-'

Gangwon's panicked gaze darted between him and the still-smiling America before he blurted, "No!"

South could have cried. His legs turned to meat jelly.

"N-N-N-No!" Gangwon repeated, babbling. "I d-don't think so, I've n-nev-ver seen him and K-K-Korea writes h-him let-t-ters, I d-d-don't-"

"Gangwon," South said loudly, before he could screw up. "Shut up."

And because it was a real Command this time, Gangwon's jaw clacked shut.

South turned to America, smiling up at him. "See?"

America gazed down at him, grinning like a shark.

Did he buy it? Did he know something was off? Was South too nervous, his voice too thick? Could he hear his heartbeat? How long had he been in the house before revealing himself? Had he heard Gangwon earlier?

God, South wished he could see his fucking eyes.

Eventually, America spoke. "Yeah. I see."

He saw that South had told the truth? Or he saw that he was lying to his face?

"From what the provinces told us before, North lets them in on a lot of stuff," he said, trying to sound nonchalant instead of terrified. "And he's way too overconfident. I bet if Red China was here, Gangwon would know."

America stared at him for another long few seconds. South's bandages were sticking to his skin, and his pockets were starting to fill with sweat. He wanted to wipe his palms on his legs, but resisted.

'Relaxed, relaxed. Or the sheep will start looking for a new shepherd.'

"Yeah," the man said finally. "You're probably right."

South made himself frown, trying not to let his lower lip tremble. "Are you okay? You look a little disappointed. But... this is good, isn't it? It means you really don't have to like, go to war with Red China or anything." He laughed at the inside joke.

America's grin shrank a little, and he tipped his head like a hound.

Had South said too much? Had he given himself away?

"Yeah, kid." The American's hand descended on his shoulder, and South tensed before it lifted again. Not a vise, just a pat. "It's great."

He looked away. He actually looked away.

South felt his eyes burn, tears wanting to fill them. He had done it. He had actually-

"Well," America said, with his gaze fixed on Gangwon. "I guess it's time to teach him his lesson then, huh?"

The relief that had rushed through South's body froze, iciness filling his insides. Gangwon's eyes widened.

"W-What?" South couldn't hide his stutter this time.

America's grin was brighter than ever. "Well, you might be telling everyone he was kidnapped by commies, but we know the truth, don't we? It's pretty clear." He gestured at Gangwon, blood still staining his lips. "Didn't I tell you you had to be ready for this someday?"

His smile fell, his brows crinkling. "Are you having trouble remembering things again, Southie?"

He didn't have memory problems. He had been trying to forget that on purpose.

'When Korea is yours, you're not going to be able to just talk them out of being commies. You know what I'm getting at, right?'

'...Yeah. I think I do.'

'So- do you think you'll be up for it?'

'Yeah, I'm up for it.'

South had only agreed because he had to. He'd been tipsy and hurting and confused from talking to Kangwon. And he knew America wouldn't take 'no' for an answer. Just because he'd said he was up for it at the time didn't mean he'd actually have to do it-

As much as he tried to fight it back, the voice seeped in, whispering, 'Yes it does. And you knew that.'

South's fists clenched.

He had. He had known he'd have to. Because America wanted him to. And if he said 'no,' then the punishment might be his instead.

"I remember," South said quietly, unable to look at Gangwon.

"Good." America clapped him on the back, perky again. "Then let's get him down to the station."

South's eyes stayed firmly focused on the ground as it changed from kitchen tiles to carpet to stone walkway to dirt road to pale wood to concrete floor.

The interrogation room.

He hadn't heard any voices in the police station. America had just led him and Gangwon- freed from the Command to stand still, but not the one to shut up- into the empty building. Had he cleared it out? Did he have the authority to do that?

'Of course he does.'

South finally looked up and realized that the building wasn't empty. The provinces were here, watching him with wary eyes.

Had they ever looked at his brother like that?

Gangwon went straight to North Chungcheong, who sheltered him behind his broad frame, seamlessly accepting him back without question, even after he'd abandoned them.

"What did you do to him?" the violet man demanded. "Why are we here?"

Jeju trembled like a leaf, her gaze fixed on South's hand.

South stared at them, unsure of how to answer. He looked to America and realized that he was alone.

Ah. Right. His friend had helped him before, with Jeju. He couldn't now. His Military Government wasn't in control anymore.

A sick urge to laugh almost brought South to his knees, but he pushed it down down with everything else.

"Because you're all Communists," he said, and couldn't hear any inflection in his voice.

"Bite your tongue," South Chungcheong said haughtily, poised like a crane in the corner.

Like she had any right to talk. Like she wasn't one of the worst ones for making him think she wasn't, that maybe, just maybe-

"And..." South couldn't bring himself to finish, and Gangwon was opening and closing his mouth desperately.

"Gangwon," he said, hoping he wouldn't regret it. "You can speak."

"S-S-South, please!" The man rushed him, clinging to his shoulders like South had to his earlier. "P-P-Please d-d-don't, d-d-d-d-"

"Gang, deep breaths," South Gyeongsang advised with concern.

The green-skinned man sucked in a breath, then rushed, "Back during the Military Government, when I was caught fighting with our guerrillas, America had me locked up. He kept m-me in a cell for s-s-seven months all alone with no light and he did it on purpose!"

He stopped, panting, searching South's face for something.

Trapped in a dark, windowless cell. Alone.

It pushed at the edges of South's mind, the cot, the dark, the stinging of his back, alone, alone for the first time ever.

"I'm so sorry, Gangwon," he said, his voice tripping as he looked down at the shorter man.

Hope welled in the province's eyes, his grip slackening and a tentative smile twitching at the corners of his lips.

"But you kind of deserved it."

His smile turned confused, then vanished. "No. N-N-No."

Gangwon clutched at South's suit, shaking him violently. "N-N-N-No, K-Korea told me to say- t-t-told me to t-tell you- He s-s-said-said you would-" Tears started to flow down his green and gold cheeks. "They killed Bong-nam!"

"Gangwon." North Gyeongsang darted forward, pulling him back, eyeing South's right hand warily.

South had never deserved what had been done to him. He hadn't deserved to be locked up or whipped or isolated for so long in the dark, just because his brother couldn't stop causing problems.

He hadn't deserved to be left behind.

But Gangwon was a Communist. He had fought with them, killed with them. He had willingly stayed with North for over a year.

And he had called him 'Korea.'

South looked down at the thing in his hand that the provinces had all been staring warily at.

He didn't know when, but at some point, America had handed him a sleek leather whip. It sat heavy and slick in his hand.

"You fought with North," he said to Gangwon, trying not to look at the many tails. "You purposefully deafened yourself so you wouldn't be able to be Commanded back to me. You stayed with the Communists of your own free will. Unless..."

Maybe he didn't have to do this. Maybe there was a way out.

"Tell me you didn't." He looked at the man, at all of them, unable to keep the pleading note out of his voice. "Tell me North forced you. Tell the world that. He Commanded you, he made you. Taejon was his fault, the war was his fault, and you had no choice but to help him. It wasn't your fault."

His hands were shaking as he looked from face to face. They were all looking to Gangwon, trembling in the middle of them.

He realized it, looking up at his cousins, his expression helpless and terrified. Then it smoothed, and he looked back at South, dead in the eyes, and didn't stutter.

"No."

"No way," North Chungcheong immediately agreed, crossing his arms.

"No," the Jeollas said together, clutching each other's hands tight.

"No," North Gyeongsang said, and South Gyeongsang echoed him, after mouthing what looked like a prayer.

Gyeonggi's eyes were rounder than ever, but he, too, said, "Nope."

"No," whispered a quiet, broken voice.

South's heart sank.

"That's all of us," North Chungcheong said into the silence that followed. "South Chungcheong has nothing to do with this. She's not even a Communist and she never fought with him the first time."

"I do not need your defenses," his sister hissed.

"I'm trying to fucking help-"

"All provinces," South interrupted. "Stand still."

They all froze, eyes turning to him.

Unable to look at them, he Commanded, "Gangwon, come here."

The man's glistening eyes opened wide, but he set his jaw, walking towards him, shaking, but not fighting the Command.

"Kneel," South choked out.

Gangwon knelt, his back to him.

"Stop!" North Chungcheong barked. "Do me, not him! I'm the number one commie here, I have a secret Worker's Party membership card, I helped them out even before the war! That agent before was mine! Punish me instead!"

South hesitated. North Chungcheong was bigger and sturdier. Gangwon had far more burns and was thin from being with North, and clearly exhausted. He'd feel a little less bad if...

"Gangwon is the one who stayed with North longest," he said calmly. "He's the one who fought with the guerrillas directly and stayed to help the Soviet puppet government. That's what he's being punished for." And he knew he was lying about the agent. "I'm not going to punish you for what someone else did."

All those times North had messed up and South had been hurt for it, too. He'd trash talk their guards, try to escape, kill the Japanese, and South would be made to bleed for it to just because he was there, because he was his brother.

"I'm not Japan," he said firmly.

North Chungcheong's jaw set hatefully. "You could have fooled me."

He wasn't. Japan had locked them away for no reason, and he'd hurt South for no reason.

South had a reason. He needed to teach the provinces a lesson. He had seen that look in Kangwon's eyes as he rambled on about the Worker's Party and responsibilities and Kim Il-sung and North North North.

They were brainwashed by his brother, who was brainwashed by his General and CCCP and Red China. They wouldn't see reason through anything but force, just like all Communists.

And he could tell that America hadn't fully believed him earlier. But if he did this, if he showed him he could do this, it might convince him.

Gangwon could survive a few lashes. But if America abandoned him, South would not.

The arm holding the whip raised. At its apex, it paused, time seeming to slow, the looks of shock and disdain and hatred on the provinces' faces a frozen tableau that made him want to curl up and die.

From the depths of South's mind, a voice tried to speak. Kangwon's.

'I really don't think you're a bad person. But there's only so many bad choices you can make before that's what you become.'

But South had to do this. If he wanted to Reunify with his brother, if he wanted to win, wanted to live, then he needed to do this.

'I have no choice.'

The shock of the whip up his arm was sudden and alarming, just like Gangwon's cry, echoed by his cousins', and South felt an inane urge to apologize.

He didn't. You only apologized when you had something to be sorry for. South didn't.

Gangwon did. They all did, really. Even South Chungcheong. Especially her.

South hit him again. And again. When the black suit the province had been wearing tore under the lashes, he realized that he should have made him take off his shirt.

Was it too late to ask now? It would be kind of awkward. And the suit was already trashed, anyways.

And it hadn't even been that nice, anyhow. It had a Communist cut. It was actually probably good South had ruined it.

Plus, remembering how he had felt when Japan made him strip and kneel shirtless in front of-

No. He wasn't thinking about that. He couldn't remember how it had felt to be small and helpless as his knees ground into the floor and the whip cut lines down his back.

He couldn't take Gangwon's pained cries or the protests of the others anymore. He Commanded them quiet, not looking at them, or at anything.

They would understand when this was over. Once they were unbrainwashed, they would get that North was never going to have won and that this was necessary. They'd forgive South and thank him for helping them see the light, for saving them.

How many lashes was he giving the province? He felt like it was supposed to be a hundred, like had been done to-

'La la la.'

His arm was getting tired, so he switched to the other one, his long-forgotten left-handedness working like muscle memory.

How had North not seen that knife coming? South had used to complain about being wrong-handed all the time, and his brother had always nagged him for focusing so hard on learning to use his right hand instead of what he was writing.

He probably shouldn't have thrown that blade out. America had given it to him to carry out his plan, after all. He hadn't said anything, but it was still rude to throw away a gift.

Gangwon's awful choking noises as his body tried to cry out in pain were honestly worse than the screaming. South unmuted him, and he started making sharp, short gasps that echoed in the dead silent room.

This wasn't that hard, really. Yeah, it was tiring, but it was rhythmic, too, like warm-ups for dancing. South actually found himself getting bored, lulled by the repetitive up-down motions of his arm, only interrupted by having to switch hands again. Even Gangwon's cries all started to sound the same, blurring into the white noise of the room.

South wasn't keeping count, but around when he thought he had reached a hundred, he kept going for another ten. Better too many than not enough. He'd bet America was right outside, listening in, after all.

When his arm finally came to a stop, he realized that a strange noise was reverberating in the hushed room. At some point, he had started humming.

'My love, if you abandon me, your feet will be sore before you go ten ri.~'

Gangwon was curled up on the floor, his head pressed to the ground between his knees. The back of his suit was flayed open, and so was his actual back. The black fibers were threaded into the open, bloody wounds.

South felt vomit surge in his throat, but choked it down. God, had he looked so gross back then?

Now that he had stopped humming, the only sound was Gangwon's quiet whimpers as he shook, not raising his head.

What was South supposed to do now? What did you do after doing something like this? Just... leave?

'The subject has taken his punishment. If he is wise, it will be the last.'

"I... didn't want to do this," he said, trying not to cringe as the provinces' gazes shifted from Gangwon to him, sharpening into something other than worry.

"But..." South forced himself to look up, not at them, but at a point on the wall behind them, trying to blur his eyes like he was drunk so he wouldn't see their expressions. "I had to. Gangwon had to be punished. And if any of you ever do anything to help the Communists or North again, I'll have to punish you, too."

He wasn't sure he was speaking loud enough for Gangwon to hear. He guessed it didn't matter. He must have learned his lesson. South had.

"North can't win this war."

He was only telling them what he had known from the start, from the day that commie guerrilla had come to tell them they'd be cut in half. They had no right to look so mad at him.

This was their fault. Did they think South wanted to hurt them? He didn't! He never had.

They had made him. If they had just kept their heads down and been good like him-

"I'm going to win," he said firmly, finally meeting North Chungcheong's narrowed eyes. "Me. And then we're going to be happy. You'll see."

They didn't understand that he was trying to save them, and himself, and even North. But they would.

"Everything's going to be okay."

He released them from the Command to stand still, and repeated the one to not attack him. Still, from the way North Chungcheong quivered, he knew he was trying.

The others went to Gangwon, clustering around him, Gyeonggi touching his hand and South Gyeongsang cradling his tear-streaked face.

Gangwon didn't know how lucky he was. South hadn't had anyone to hold him. Just himself.

He turned to leave, then called over his shoulder, "All provinces. My brother's name is North and that's how you'll call him.

"Call me Korea."

He didn't bother looking back, knowing he'd just see more ungratefulness on their faces. Whatever. One day they'd smile at him like they did at North. He'd be the only one they could smile at. So what if it wasn't today?

He left them muted. He'd drop by their houses later to undo it, and interrogate Gangwon fully. He just didn't need to hear any commie-talk right now.

He shut the door on them.

America was leaning against the counter in the empty police station, under the crest of the Republic of Korea's police force. The outstretched golden wings framed him, and South wondered why whoever had designed it had to choose an eagle. A familiar grey box sat on the counter next to him as he idly spun a wire around a reel.

"Hey, kid," he said, grinning. "All done?"

"Yeah," South said, lifting his lips back. "All done."

His friend nodded in satisfaction. "Good. How do'ya feel?"

South shrugged. He didn't feel great, obviously. But he didn't feel as bad as he thought he would, either. He didn't even really feel like crying, which was really shocking.

Mostly he just felt numb.

"Pretty good, I guess," he replied, then realized his palms were sweaty and his mouth dry. "I could really use a drink, though."

"A' course, a' course, I'd say you've earned one, kid." America tilted his head to the room. "I'll send someone by to take the troublemakers home. Might want to think about paying off whoever you get to treat the example, though."

South shrugged again. "Why? I'll just tell them the Communists did it."

It might as well be true.

"Smart kid." America ruffled his head. "And hey, Southie."

He bent down, taking his shoulders as he looked him in the eyes.

"You can act all tough, but I know that was hard for you, kid. No one wants to do that kind of thing. But you know you had to, right?"

"Yeah," South assured him. "I know. It's why I did it."

"Good." America squeezed him reassuringly, standing up. "I'd hate to see you let yourself get torn up over a coupla commies. But if you did a good enough job with him, then they probably won't be for much longer."

He laughed and South laughed, too.

"Oh. Here." He held the whip out to America. Its leather thongs glistened wetly in the artificial station lights.

America waved him off. "Keep it. You might need it again."

South coiled it up, tucking it into the waistband of his pants, arranging his jacket over the smear of red it left on his white undershirt.

"Can we get that drink now?"

"Yep. I'll treat you to the top shelf stuff." America picked up his wire recorder, not even bothering to try and hide it. The spool was already safely in his pocket.

South didn't bother saying anything. There was no point.

They left the station, leaving the stifling windowless room behind, along with the provinces. But South carried Gangwon's gasping cries with him, just like he had Jeju's.

He looked over at America, who was strolling along in the fresh spring morning, the broad grin on his face almost as bright as the sun reflecting off his void-shaded eyes.

South should Command Gangwon not to tell him about China. He didn't know why the province had gone along with him before. But if he was anything like Kangwon, it was probably to make South think he was on his side so he could get into his head with North's words. And now that South had done... that to him, he might try to rat him out for revenge.

America might find out someday. Maybe Gangwon would tell him after the war, or if Red China survived, he'd come clean.

But South doubted it. He was a Communist and a Soviet puppet, just like his brother. And since Gangwon was a commie, too, he could just tell America he was lying.

And besides, so long as it happened far enough in the future, the American might not even care. People didn't care if you found out they were lying after everything was over.

And Korea would be one by then, anyways.

America saw him looking, and turned his solar smile on him.

And South smiled back.

The bar was dark and empty. Another place America had bought out. Glass after glass of different liquids were set before him and South drank them all, scouring his throat with alcohol that could have been top shelf or made in a clay jar in a peasant's backyard.

He didn't really care anymore. He just wanted to drown out the smell of piss, stale liquor, and sawdust that had soaked into the wooden floor and claustrophobic walls of the bar. And the blood that had soaked into his hands.

Blisters had popped on his palms, and the chill of the drink was the only thing that soothed them. His burns had broken open, too, that ugly gash weeping scarlet tears that soaked his shirt. Wasn't a whipping only supposed to hurt the person being punished? South bet Japan hadn't got any blisters from lashing him.

"Y'know, kid, you can be a little impressive sometimes," America praised, the words going straight to the Korean's head along with the whiskey in his glass.

"Thanksh," he slurred, fumbling for the bottle. America helped him, filling his tumbler again.

"You can really put your drink away. Of course, you still don't hold it quite so well," he added this as South's sixth glass slipped from his hand, shattering on the floor.

"Someone'll clean it once we're done," the American said flippantly, fetching another glass from the bar, refilling it.

"Jusht like in Chingching, Chongjing, Chong-" South gave up on the Mandarin name, weakly flopping his hand. America didn't care anyways.

"Sure thing." He bobbed his head. "You were pretty impressive in the station, too. To tell ya the truth, I thought you might not be man enough for it. Thought you might come crying to me."

"I had to do it," South murmured, resting his forehead on the edge of the cool table. "Did you really... lock Gangwon up?"

"My guys did," America said off-handedly. "You said it yourself- he was fighting with the commies. And clearly solitary wasn't a good enough lesson since he went off and did it again."

He leaned forward. "But after what you did to him, I'm sure he'll know better next time. Not that there'll be one."

"He won't even think once," South murmured, making the other man chuckle.

"Righto. Here, have a cigar, kid."

Something that smelled thick and cloying was pressed into his hand, and South clumsily sucked on it. The smoke filled his lungs, sweet and sickly, and made him cough until his vision went black. America laughed, slapping him on the back until the boy fell face-first onto the table, the cigar burning a dark spot into the wood.

Silence fell, the only sound the whirring of the wire recorder behind the bar. It didn't matter. It had heard worse. And South knew America would never release something that had his voice in it, too.

South tipped his head up to see America watching him with his flat, dead aviators.

"You know, it's a good thing you weren't shaken up by all that," he said causally. "Because you're going to have to do it again."

The words reached through South's comforting brain fog, trying to drag him back to sobriety. It was only half-successful, which was half more than he wanted.

"What?" he asked, and he couldn't sound anything but tired.

America grinned, sharp and alien. Had he always had so many teeth?

"I told you before, didn't I? Once the Northern provinces are yours again, you're going to have to teach them a lesson. And their brains are so deep-cleaned that cherry-picking a martyr won't work this time. It will have to be all of them." He tipped his head to the side in a way that raised hairs on the back of the Korean's neck. "Do you think you're still up to that? Or will you chicken out now that you've seen for yourself what it means?"

There was an edge of disappointment in his voice, like he'd thought South was better than that. And he was, wasn't he? When he had boldly declared that he was up for it that night in Gyeongmudae, hadn't he already seen for himself what it meant? Hadn't he been there when Jeju had been soundlessly screaming, tears running down her face like the blood from her back as America had stripped the flesh from it with each lash of the whip? He had known that one day, he would have to do that, too.

But it had been easier to say he was up for it when seeing was all. Now, he had held the whip in his hand, he had been the one to bring blood to Gangwon as he cried out over and over again, just as South once had. He would have to do that to Kangwon, to Hwanghae, to all of them.

He had been naïve before. He hadn't known the true extent of what he had to be prepared to do.

He knew now.

South's hand clenched around the handle of an invisible whip, his back stinging.

For the country, for stability, for peace.

For his brother.

"No." His voice was firm as he looked up at his ally. "I'm not backing out. If it gets my country back under my control, I'm up for anything."

Not that it ever had been or ever would be. But he would be alive. And free.

"That's just what I wanted to hear!" America laughed loudly, clapping him on the back. "That's my boy! We'll have you turned into a real powerhouse yet."

"Thanks," South slurred. "I can't... ever pay you back."

The words didn't come out right. They tasted bitter, staining his lips, and he washed them away with more of whatever was in his glass now.

America chuckled, the sound hammering into his skull like nails. Like the impact of a whip. "Oh, I'm sure I'll find a way to set us even. Until then, what's a li'l debt between friends? But really, kid, don't get too hung up on it. I'd help you out anyway." He grinned widely. "And why...?"

South thought about it for a moment, then- despite everything- chuckled in realization. "Because we're pals."

"Exactly!" America cried, raising his glass. "Because we're pals! I'll drink to that."

He did, and so did South, washing away the guilt that throbbed in time with his blistered palms with the smooth American whiskey. He told himself that it worked.

This had been too far. He knew it. There had been a line, and he had crossed it. North would never forgive him now.

But North had crossed the line first when he had crossed the 38th Parallel. He had crossed it when he left him. He was the one who had made this necessary. South only had to do it because of him.

He knew his brother wouldn't accept that. He'd always been allergic to sense.

This had been necessary, just like everything else. Like Jeju, like killing the prisoners, like burning Seoul.

America was selfish. He was narcissistic, careless, cruel, self-serving, manipulative, and violent. He was a liar.

And he was South's only friend.

He would never give up on Korea, especially now that his plans to start a war with China had been foiled. He would keep trying with his planes, and his bombs, and his soldiers, just like he had been trying ever since before North and South had even existed.

It was too late for South to end the war. Maybe he could have, back at the Raktong. Maybe if he had chosen differently, if he had went with North back then, America would have shrugged his shoulders and gone home. Maybe he and his brother would be Reunified by now, and Korea would be free.

But he didn't think so. This, too, was necessary.

'There's nothing that can stop me now,' his friend had once told him.

There never had been.

"Y'know, Southie," America sighed, kicking his boots up on the table. "You really are one of the good ones."

"Yeah," South said as he took another drag on the cigar, managing not to cough this time.

America was his only friend. And it was better to be his friend than his enemy. It was the only way to come out of this alive. North would see that. When they were Reunified, he would see.

"I know."

I have been WAITING to write this. You can see the line and you have no choice but to cross it, but you're the one choosing to keep walking forward.

Behind the scenes production fact- it was originally supposed to be North Chungcheong that got whipped, as he'd volunteer for Gangwon and South would accept. But then I realized it was far more in line with both Gangwon and especially South's development for Gangwon to not want to hide from pain, and for South to, well, not want someone else to get punished for someone else's actions.

When people act like the DPRK is irrational for not allowing all foreign media (they do allow a lot of foreign media, including American, for the record), I just think about the three S's. Chun Du-hwan's regime used Screen, Sex, and Sports to turn people towards entertainment and away from organizing and civil issues. This is 'just a conspiracy theory,' but most of the South Korean leftists I've seen online are convinced it's real, and it is also an objective fact that places like the US use entertainment to distract. Japan does purposefully invest money in the anime industry to export it and build soft power, and South Korea does the same with K-pop. Like whether or not Chun Du-hwan did it intentionally, intelligence services and capitalists do do it intentionally. There are emails in the Epstein files where it seems Epstein had a hand in microtransactions in Call of Duty because it 'prepares children for the economy,' goods and services for money, no other way. Sex is genuinely addictive, and provocative and sexual media has an effect, turning people away from societal issues to focus on their bodies, and turning women into just another commodity. Even for more progressive things, like gay rights, they get more caught up in sexual freedom over real freedom or societal progress. Sports give a nation a false sense of 'unity' while also providing an enemy, something to rally around and someone to hate. 'We might be rich, we might be poor, but at least we all support the Swallows, unlike those filthy Giant supporters.' When we focus on divisions like this, especially when an addictive aspect is added to it in places that allow sports betting, we don't focus on the real division of class. And Screen is the most insidious because it's both of these and more. Think about Hollywood shows that mention Israel in a casual way (there's lots of them). These are supposed to be humorous, 'harmless,' but they slip in that normalization of a genocidal settler state. Or the fact that if an American movie wants to have the US military assist with supply for it, they have to get their scripts approved by them (Forrest Gump had to cut a plot point about mentally disabled soldiers being sent to Vietnam specifically to kill them off, which is something that actually happened, Project 100000 for more), and weapons contractors frequently fund films. Why would the DPRK want to show a film that is paid for by a company that desperately wants more war to sell more weapons, or is overseen by the military that genocided over twenty percent of their population? Even if a movie producer doesn't mean to, they are reinforcing their own worldview, one that is steeped in the propaganda they grew up in. 'Be the bigger person, don't fight back, you don't need to do anything about injustice because karma will work one day, rich people are just like us.' I've mentioned this before, but think about the amount of shows from any capitalist country that are supposed to portray a poor, struggling person, but they live in a huge apartment, never have food problems, and hang out with attractive people at fancy parties (Love Alarm as an example). Or the anime that have a cozy, slice of life feel when that is not the reality of being poor in Japan (Hitorigurashi no Shougakusei as an extreme example). If you showed those to someone from a poorer country that didn't know the truth of the nation it came from, they would think 'That's how their poor live??' And that's not at all true. There are people in the Seoul outskirts that don't have steady electricity. Most salarymen in Japan are miserable. And this is backed up by real proof- there are North Korean defectors that went to the South because of the media they saw, and when the reality isn't anything like it, they want to go back, and can't. Or think of all those shows about the British monarchy or rich wealthy families. It makes us sympathize with the rich, to think 'Oh, they have problems, too,' when their problems are nothing like ours. The amount of people that watch the animated Anastasia and say 'Oh that poor girl, she should've been able to go back to Russia and become queen,' and don't think about the millions of children that never got to grow up under her parents' rule and wouldn't get to grow up under hers. The shows and movies that glamorize wealthy lifestyles tell people 'this could be you! Look how sparkly and happy you could be!' and make them want to pursue that lifestyle, without showing the exploitation of working people that is the only way to attain it, and that less than one percent of people will ever achieve. 'Don't focus on the problems in society or how they could change, focus on how your life could change, how you could be like us. Or just forget about your problems and consume this.' Ironically, the DPRK's production of mostly 'propaganda' films (ignoring the fact that all media is propaganda of a sort) is actually less 'brainwashing' than the media production of capitalist countries. Their media usually contains the message of 'revolution and revolt are good,' they all bring attention back to 'we got here through fighting.' Even if it's in support of their system (and most media is in support of the system it's made in, even just passively), it also instills the values of resistance and fighting for change at all costs. While media in South Korea, America, Japan, the imperial core in general is very carefully crafted to keep people from fighting, to distract, to make the audience idolize lifestyles they'll never attain and that don't truly exist, and to indulge in fictional worlds and their problems and forget the real ones. Fiction does affect reality, and the people in power know this. That's why they spend trillions of dollars to make sure artists make the media they want.

The DPRK let Shrek in as Shrek is a superior film with nothing but good messaging. You thought this was a pro-DPRK paragraph, but no. Pro-Shrek.

Backstage Helper

[image]

So long as SH kept busy, she'd be fine. She wouldn't think about how America was definitely going to keep stretching out the peace talks even now, or how smug he must have been to get his greasy fingers on Gangwon again, or how he was saying he'd been with them against his will, or what her cousin could be going through right now or how North Hamgyong didn't even seem to care-

She slapped her brush into the wall until it made the shape of a bucket full of the chemical water she'd used to scour the bunker clean and that she'd been really tempted to shove that stupid man's head into when he'd said she was 'trying to be a woman again.' Like it was only a woman's task to make sure none of the bacteria from Korea's fever stuck around, and that they were all healthy. Like she wasn't a woman.

He was just an idiot and she should know by now that everything he said was just to get a rise out of her. But it still made the dark thing rage. If Liaotung hadn't been there to interrupt…

She painted the chemical water acid green, like it could melt skin from flesh. Not exactly realistic. But satisfying.

In the dressing area, SH slid off her choson-ot, the red, gold, and green one she'd wear for the May Day performance at the end of the month. She always tried not to look at her body when she was naked, but her province was being hit hard today, and as she gave her bandages a cursory glance, she couldn't stop her eyes from flicking to that little circle just above her collarbone.

Because of her unnaturally white flag base, she didn't scar the same darker brown-pink colour her people tended to. The scar was a light silvery-pink instead, like a blush-coloured rose blooming in snow.

But the comparison was too pretty for it. It was an ugly indentation in her body, the edges crimped and wrinkled, her pores erased by the smooth, shiny scar tissue. Just another mark on her body left by a man.

Her fingers traced over it, the wall indenting like her flesh under the force of the thing that slammed into it.

"Comrade SH?"

SH startled, yanking her hand away as she looked over to see Pak Yun-hui watching her, already changed out of her practice outfit. The province realized she was lagging behind the other women of the Song and Dance Ensemble and swiftly shed the rest of her choson-out, pulling her uniform pants back on over her slip.

"I'm sorry," she said, laughing in embarrassment as she reached for her undershirt, draped over a folding screen. "I was just lost in thought."

Yun-hui looked away, her cheeks dusted pink. But her eyes were pulled back to SH.

"I've noticed that scar before," she said, gaze fixed on it. "Where did you get it? Ah, if Comrade SH doesn't mind sharing."

Yun-hui obviously knew that she'd been used as a weapon against their own people by America (and South, someone might deny), from when word had been spread about the Commands making her harm people against her will.

But she wasn't supposed to talk too much about how North Hamgyong had been the one to put a stop to her. That hadn't been spread at all. If it was just him not wanting people to judge him for it, that wouldn't have stopped her. But it came from Korea. And she did grudgingly understand that painting another province in a negative light was bad for their cause.

'He probably wouldn't even care anyway.'

Instead of letting her lips press flat, SH smiled. "The enemy," she answered, buttoning her undershirt up over the scar.

North Hamgyong would probably be proud if people were upset that he'd shot her. They shouldn't be upset because he'd just been doing what he should- removing her from America and South's arsenal. And what she had wanted him to.

But she knew that wasn't why he'd be proud.

No. That wasn't the right word for it. He'd be smug if their people disliked him for shooting her, because he just loved when someone couldn't stand him. It was his life's mission.

But he wouldn't be proud of failing.

'I wish I hadn't-'

"Well," she said brightly, loud enough that Yun-hui jumped. "I'm going to go put up posters now."

The woman brightened. "Does Comrade SH want help?"

Usually she'd love to say yes, to invite her and a few other comrades so their chattering would drown out the dark thing's growling.

But it was too loud today. She just needed to paint.

She didn't see the underground theatre or the stone steps or the posters lining the lobby as she left Moranbong Theatre. Only the streamers of maroon and old glory and snow that she covered up with splatters of scarlet and brown- America's flag, trampled into the mud.

Once the war was over, her and North Hamgyong would be busy in their own provinces rebuilding, then with their courses. She might never have to see him outside of Supreme People's Assembly plenary sessions, where they wouldn't have to talk. And since he wasn't in the Party, she wouldn't have to see him at congresses either. If she was lucky and resourceful, she could go a year or two without having to speak to him at all. Joint meetings between the Ministry of Light Industry and the heavy industries he was involved in might be an issue. But usually those didn't need every single person involved. And it would be nice to see him seethe over being forced to be polite to her if they were.

And after the 4th, they were closer to the war being over than ever. Well, in almost two years.

'It's Yeongsan! We're almost there, Korea!'

'Look out Busan, here we come!'

Painting. Painting painting painting, trying not to let the brushstrokes form gold magnolias with their petals torn off by striped fingers.

As absorbed as SH was with the wall, she still saw the woman loitering at the foot of the cracked stairs outside, the only thing left of the aboveground theatre, and the way her head turned like she'd been waiting for her.

She was a bit shorter than SH, and older, with light wrinkles etched at the corner of her pretty deep brown eyes, but hair that was still as dark and silky as magpie feathers. And she was dressed in a blue blouse and trousers with a medical coat over them. The province recognized her from the few times she'd ran into her at one of the Yankee drop zones in Pyongyang, looking for fresh insects with their team and the Chinese one. And the one time China had introduced them.

"Comrade Zhao Jingjing," SH said politely, looking around. "Can I help you?"

She didn't see any of the men from her lab team, or China (which didn't mean much).

"Comrade South Hamgyong." The older woman dipped her head. "I hate to cause you any problems, but I'm afraid I've got myself a little lost. Our Comrade Mao said if that ever happened, we should head to the Moranbong Theatre, and the lovely Provincehuman that performs there sometimes might help us."

SH puffed out a breath. 'China.'

She didn't actually perform enough for it to be mentioned. May Day would only be her third time, and that was counting playing Korea's assistant on Foundation Day. But he kept insisting she was an actor.

It was good advice, though. Even if she was working on sowing in her province (which she should be doing now, if Korea hadn't refused to let any of them leave the capital area until he was more sure America and Norway weren't going to try anything; it was a good thing she'd planted that garden because Hae was turning in circles over not being able to finish up planting in Sincheon), there was a high chance Hwang, Kangwon, or even China himself might show up.

"I'm afraid I'm not allowed to know where the labs are," SH said regretfully. And most of them were across the Chongchon, she was pretty sure. "But I'm sure I can find someone to take you."

"If you get me to the bend in the west river, I can find my own way back," Zhao Jingjing assured her with a pleasant smile.

It was nothing but friendly, and her eyes were warm. But something about her voice rubbed at her the wrong way. It was rich and throaty, and the province could tell if she raised it in song, she could make an audience weep. But there was something in the refined way she spoke, lingering for a beat after SH had finished talking, like she was savouring her words, that put her hackles up.

She made an effort to smooth them. She hoped she wasn't letting Korea's paranoia get to her. She still wasn't so sure she trusted China's intentions, but she refused to mistrust any of the women or men that came here to help them. Especially when Zhao Jingjing was putting herself at risk of getting sick with her work.

"Alright," she said, making sure her own tone was pleasant. "Follow me."

They set off into the city ruins. The bend in the west river- where a bridge had used to cross the Pothong and sometimes still did if you got there before the newest air raid- was past the Mansudae area and the old missionary area turned schoolteacher's residences turned smoking hole in the ground. They could have went southwest, cutting through the city center to save time, but SH took the Chinese woman straight west instead, through the outskirts.

Social order had been restored to Pyongyang for awhile now, and there weren't many people left anyways, plus now that her toes had 'healed,' she was confident she could keep both of them safe. But she still decided to be careful while she had the foreign woman with her. Even though it would feel good to put down any reactionary man that tried something, it would cause problems for Korea.

"Comrade Zhao Jingjing," she began politely as they crossed the remnants of the trolley line. "Was it your germ warfare investigation that brought you out here?"

"Call me Jingjing, please. A comrade of Comrade Mao's is a comrade to me." She smiled, her eyes squinching up. "And I hear I'm not much older than you."

SH didn't mind getting familiar with women so quickly, even if it was a little sudden, so that didn't bother her. But the way she didn't interrupt her immediately to correct her made her realize she had been avoiding interrupting earlier, too. The little pause before she spoke had been her waiting to make sure she was really done.

It wasn't like SH got interrupted often (outside of her family, a certain person especially). Even where a man might speak over another woman comrade, her being a province usually got her enough respectful silence. But it felt strange for a woman so eager to drop formality to be so polite in that way.

"In that case, you can call me SH," she returned. "So is it your investigation that brought you out here?"

Jingjing laughed sheepishly. "No. I was visiting the Quarantine Hospital, then got turned around when I came back to the city. I'm not used to Korean layouts."

"Not that this makes it any easier." SH gestured to the shell of the old Weather Bureau building, and the residential area beyond it.

Her fingers curled in, nails stabbing into her palm, and she painted a typhoon on the wall, one big enough to wash away the entire continental United States and everyone in it, to leave every single one of their cities in the same condition, to make anyone left have to be careful in their own homes.

"So how do you and Comrade Mao Zhilong know each other?" she asked brightly before Jingjing could say anything.

She had overcame her own fear of interrupting people a long time ago. Plus Korea would want her to sleuth around for more details on China's backstory since North Pyongan wasn't frisking Liaoxi anymore.

"We've known each other for awhile," Jingjing answered as they skirted the flattened residential district, waiting for supply trucks to pass on the road north before they crossed. "Since I was a girl."

"Oh?" SH prompted.

"Mm," Jingjing said casually as the convoy passed. "We met at a party. I was a whore."

SH stumbled on her own feet, almost falling into the road before catching herself.

"Oh," she said after a moment, turning her face away as she hurried across the street.

Jingjing didn't seem bothered by her reaction, catching back up to her side. "En. He took me home, and we've been… close ever since."

SH felt a creeping dread. "When you say you were a girl…"

Jingjing stopped, her lips twisting in thought. Then she sighed. "He'd want me to be mysterious about it, but I don't want you thinking badly of him. It wasn't like that." Her expression turned a little wry. "He's far weirder than that. But in a good way."

SH had been going to protest that there wasn't much weirder than 'that,' before realizing that men like that were probably too common to be considered ‘weird.’ Despicable and deserving of a slow death, but far too common.

It was a bad thought, and she painted over it. It wasn’t the majority. Just too frequent. And as their society progressed, it would get less and less frequent. Or else.

“Of course, there were a few years where I was dreaming that he’d sweep me off my feet and steal me away from the brothel to get married. Silly little thoughts from an unhappy girl.” Jingjing said it with a smile, fond for her foolish younger self. “But he made it clear that was never going to happen. He’s been a brother to me for much longer.”

SH… believed it. Even from their brief meeting before, she could see that China treated her differently than his provinces, almost leaning protectively towards her. And Jingjing acted younger around him. Her lisp was lighter now, and she suddenly didn’t seem like the type to giggle the way she had when they’d been introduced. It wasn’t something she was used to her with her family, but she’d met plenty of women that were mature on their own, then either turned shy and quiet or filled with childish enthusiasm around their older siblings. SH wasn’t sure if it was because of how family dynamics worked in a normal household, or if it was just because those women actually liked their older brothers. Not that North Hamgyong was older than her.

But she couldn’t imagine what else a man would want with a child… prostitute. Knowing China, it probably somehow was weirder.

“I wasn’t always in the brothel,” Jingjing said, continuing to walk and also unfortunately continuing to talk. “But my mother died, and my father sold us to it. The old story.”

“Where were you from?” SH asked, trying to distract her.

“A little village,” she answered as they neared the riverbank. “But the brothel was in the city.”

Before SH could ask which city, she looked over.

“Have you heard about what our Communist Party is doing for prostitutes?”

SH tried not to wince. “No.”

Jingjing smiled. “The Beijing brothels were all closed in March, in a big wave, before our People’s Republic was even founded. They were taken to reform centers, given free examinations and shots, and treatment for the sexually transmitted diseases they caught.”

SH couldn’t hide her wince now.

That was another threat that had loomed over her in the cage. She knew some of the men that paid for her had been sick. She could smell it on them, and see it in the fluids they left behind before she fled to the bath, scrubbing and scrubbing even though she knew she couldn’t wash where she needed to. Her disjointed common sense hadn’t let her know at first that her biology would protect her from disease, but Japan had. And since he knew, it didn’t matter how sick the men were. The only thing that mattered was if they could pay.

Even after she’d been able to fetch that scrap of common sense, she would still run her hands obsessively over her skin, far more often than her pregnancy checks, searching for a wart or sore that hadn’t been there before, waiting for the same pungent smell of disease to start seeping out of her, for the body around her to start rotting like theirs. She hadn’t known how it would work, if she would revive after it killed her only to start rotting again, if she’d be trapped in that cycle forever and-

The dark thing growled, and she punctured the memories with a painted needle, long and thin.

“They sent in specialists to teach us things, too,” Jingjing continued far too casually. “Not just household skills to find us a husband, but life skills. I had a little boost, since Comrade Mao taught me to read, and I’ve been secretly studying for years, but I’m not the only one that ended up going into school to become a doctor.”

She looked around, then whispered, slightly abashed, “Though between you and me, there might be a little nepotism involved with me getting a learning experience like this.”

SH could imagine. At least China’s nepotism got a woman into a job that would give her future prestige, and not a man into power.

“The other brothels were closed a little later, but they should be gone now,” Jingjing proudly explained. “I’m sure it will take a few years to stamp private prostitution out everywhere, but the Party is committed to it. And so is Comrade Mao.” She tipped her head, long braids sliding across her shoulders. “Both of them.”

“I’m glad,” SH managed.

She was. It was great news for Chinese women, and they’d done a lot of the same things here. Though they weren’t so open about it. Most Korean women just wanted to go back to their families or start new lives, and forget.

So she was glad. She just wished Jingjing would stop talking about it.

“Me too,” the older woman said, and her smile died a little, her eyes drifting to the slate waters of the river as her feet came to a stop. “I was in there for most of my life. My sister and I had death contracts, since our father didn’t have any money, and I had no one to buy me out. I should have been thrown out once my value faded.”

‘Thrown out.’ Like Jingjing was a silk robe whose threads had started to fray, and whose owner had no problem tossing her into a garbage heap.

SH had been eternally young and fresh, unable to conceive a child or contract a disease. Her value could only fade if one of her ‘clients’ did something to make it. She had been the perfect… She had been what most pimps or madams dreamed of.

But it didn’t take much imagination to know what happened to most women when they lost their looks. With no skills, no connections, and the only thing that gave them ‘value’ gone, they were forced to turn to the one thing they knew, now alone, without the threat of being fined hanging over a man’s head to stop him from going too far or taking too much.

Like Eonni.

“But Comrade Mao had taught me well,” Jingjing continued, not looking at SH as she painted. “I could read and write, and knew proper tea ceremony. I could perform. So I was kept around to teach the younger girls, to raise their price.”

Younger. SH’s heart squeezed. As young as she had been, she knew she was above physical age for many girls that were sold to brothels. They were better at it when they were taught young.

“It was good for them,” Jingjing said, more to herself. “They would have been where they were anyway. At least I was able to make sure they’d be kept around longer, and give them someone that loved them.” Her dark eyes shadowed. “But it was still worse than all those years I was being sold.”

“You’re being very open about this,” SH said, her heart pounding unsteadily, politely trying to tell her to stop.

If Zhao Jingjing had needed someone to vent to, like the women violated by the Yankees and reactionaries, she would have let her. It didn’t matter that she was Chinese- she was a woman and a comrade.

But she didn’t sound ashamed or distraught. Just vaguely sad, like it was a far away memory, even though she could’ve only been out for three years, less if she wasn’t from Beijing.

“I’m not ashamed of it,” Jingjing said, looking back to her. “Most of my choices were made for me, and the ones I did make weren’t really choices. It’s not like I can change what happened. And in the end, I’m luckier than most. I had a brother and sister that loved me, I’ve got to raise dozens of children even when I can’t have my own, and now I’ve lived to see my country free, and have the chance to fulfill my own dream.”

She smiled, her eyes squinching in a way that made it look like China's, if he smiled with more honesty.

"You're not mad at all?" SH asked quietly.

Jingjing laughed. "Of course I am. I'm furious that happened to us. I'd track down every single man that ever walked through those doors and kill them with my bare hands if I could. Though maybe don't tell my medical school that." She shook her head. "But I can't, obviously. So I'll just follow the Party and help them take away the right those men had to buy women, and the right of other women to sell them, and make sure they never can again.

"My body and my past might not have belonged to me," she said without even a trace of regret. "But my mind and my future do. And I'm not going to let the people who took those things away from me take that, too."

SH opened her mouth to respond, and was horrified when a sob came out instead. She clapped a hand over her mouth, her eyes burning as tears started to well in the corners, and she turned away from Jingjing, trying to hide her reaction as her chest convulsed.

"Are you okay?" the other woman asked, concerned and a tinge guilty.

"I'm- I'm fine," SH managed to choke past her palm. "I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I just- I've been helping women who were- who were abused, and- I'm sorry, I think it just caught up to me all at once."

She'd worked so hard to never let the tears she wanted to let out fall last year, with Jin-suk or any of the others, holding them back to give them the confidence and comfort they needed. Now it felt like they'd all welled up at once and were trying to force their way out in a flood.

Jingjing softly patted her shoulder, then pulled her into a gentle hug, stroking the back of her head, careful not to disturb the bandages. It wouldn't look good if anyone saw their province being comforted by a Chinese comrade, but for a moment, SH leaned into her, hands pressed over her face.

She didn't want to cry, she still didn't. The dark thing was unnervingly quiet for a moment, but she still closed her eyes, painting burning buildings and men labouring away, forced to make up for their crimes of using women as commodities, until her breathing steadied.

"I'm alright," she said, stepping back with herself under control. "Sorry about that."

She said it as chipperly as possible. Jingjing's eyes saw through her.

"That's good," she said empathetically, though she didn't know that's what it was. "I didn't mean to upset you."

"I'm alright," SH assured her again, injecting more cheer into her voice.

"I hope you will be." Zhao Jingjing looked down the river, then back at her. "I can find my way from here. Thank you so much for your help, comrade."

She smiled, bowed her head, and strode off down the riverbank, her white coat flapping behind her.

SH fretted, hoping she hadn't made her feel awkward. She'd been the one to bring up a topic most people wouldn't consider appropriate with a near-stranger, but SH still should've been able to control her emotions better.

Then again…

SH wanted to linger to see if Jingjing would cross the bridge, like she suspected she would. But she knew if she did, she'd start thinking about little girls sold off by their fathers, growing up raised by women who had once been sold off by theirs, forced to groom them into perfect commodities if they wanted to save them from rotting away in an alleyway, the way they had been groomed, all of them trapped in a cycle they'd had no choice in, that men and women who had betrayed their womanhood had forced them into. Their earnings, their bodies, their futures, their lives all wrapped up in someone else's hands, who only cared how much money they could make them or how good they-

Work! SH couldn't stand around, she had to get back to work. Not hanging posters, she needed to paint, to quiet the dark thing with a bloody armistice paper on the wall, and burgeoning fields and hardy peasants on real canvases for the April sowing.

She cast one last look at Zhao Jingjing, making her way along the river with a spring in her step, then returned to the theatre, already desperately painting.

—

Pak Yun-ho had died. At oh nine hundred on April 2nd, he'd woken up weak, with a headache, fever, and chills. Following Kangwon's orders, he'd gone straight to a doctor. Two days later, at twenty-three thirty, as Kangwon was almost back to Pyongyang, his body temperature had plummeted, and he had passed. The autopsy a couple days later found the effects the illness had on his body were consistent with secondary septicemia after a bubonic plague infection. Pasteurella pestis had been found inside of him, just like in the guinea pigs the lab had infected with the fleas retrieved from Kumsong-ri.

It had just been him. The sanitation efforts in the rest of the village had been enough to keep everyone else safe, even his sister who lived with him. A flea must've bit him on that first day after all.

Kangwon knew he couldn't have done anything even if he was here. Despite what Korea had said, he didn't have any capabilities that their other doctors didn't, besides more experience and perseverance. And that was a more needed quality for a patient than a doctor.

But still…

He sighed, rubbing a hand over his face.

The investigation was coming soon, but not soon enough. The Executive Committee of the World Peace Council had to find enough doctors and scientists from around the world that could be trusted by both them and the other nations to be considered neutral for the International Scientific Commission. Their quality couldn't be low, and they couldn't rush. It could take a couple months.

'Just have to keep going.' It was all he could do.

They were handling the epidemic well. He had to keep reminding himself of that. For a country that'd just left feudalism, had all their sanitation measures and hospitals destroyed, and were being actively attacked by biological warfare, they were doing really well. A few hundred dead out of a few thousand sick was great. And only a few thousand sick was even better.

He was just too close to see it that way. Just like he was too close to…

Gangwon was fine. He would be fine. Kangwon just had to keep believing that.

The door slid open, and he looked up, expecting SH and whoever she'd brought tonight to use as an emotional buffer between them while he took her blood.

But surprisingly, it was just her.

"I'm not used to seeing you alone," he said. Usually she brought either Hae or Hwang, someone to keep him talking to them.

"I'm smart enough not to drag Hae out of the fields while she's planting," his cousin replied.

She sounded so low energy he had to ask, "Are you feeling okay?"

"Just take my blood, please," she sighed, getting comfortable in the chair. "If I'm not infected."

They were in the military hospital lab, but he'd looked at her results earlier.

"You're clean," he assured her. He'd already set up the IV while waiting, so all he had to do was slide the needle into her skin, careful to avoid the new blisters. Her province must be getting targeted today, too. “And your blood looked great.”

Things like dehydration or starvation could make blood darker than it should be. Korea’s was always a little too dark for comfort, but not enough to keep him from using it. SH’s sample this morning had been a red even brighter than her flag’s magnolia. She kept her body well taken care of, at least.

“Vampire,” she murmured.

“I still don’t know what that means,” he said sincerely.

“Neither do I.” Her brief smile faded.

She must’ve seen him opening his mouth, because a second later she asked brightly, “Has North Hamgyong been by for his donation?”

“Yesterday,” Kangwon confirmed.

“And did he say sorry?”

He gave her a wry smile, leaning back in his chair. “What do you think?”

SH shook her head irritably. “I’ll say something to him.”

“I’d rather you didn’t,” her cousin said. “I’ve already got to deal with the germ warfare. I don’t need any injuries we can’t let other doctors treat.”

She glowered at him. “I’m mad at him, Kangwon, not planning on maiming him.”

He didn’t know about that sometimes. For either of them.

But he still said, “Sorry. Just a joke.”

She huffed, looking at her IV. Kangwon eyed it, too, watching her blood flow faster down the tube.

"I really don't mind," he told her. "I know he didn't mean it. And I know he cares about me and Gangwon."

"Then why doesn't he say it?!" SH burst out, the words having definitely been fermenting. "How can you be okay with him being so terrible?"

Kangwon shrugged. "That's just the way he is."

"Why is it the way he is?"

Her cousin raised his brows. "Why are you the way you are?"

"Kangwon," she said tightly. "Please don't start."

Since he didn't want her to rip her IV out and waste her blood, he dipped his head.

"It's just so annoying," she seethed when she felt like he wasn't going to 'entrap' (try to help) her again. "He acts like just because we're supposed to guess what he really feels, it's perfectly fine to be awful to us."

"You know, usually when North Hamgyong says you'll accept something from Korea but not him, he's comparing nonsense," Kangwon began delicately. "But he was kind of right about that one."

SH glared at him. "He wasn't. Korea's never awful. He's just… harsh."

"Very harsh," he agreed.

'Whatever has been done to him by then will be your fault.'

His cousin huffed. "You know what I mean. I don't like it, but he's only like that when he's… you know."

She vaguely waved a hand.

Yeah. Kangwon knew.

"North Hamgyong is like that all the time," she stressed. "He's not just lashing out because he's- angry. He's just like that. Especially to me."

Kangwon couldn't argue with that. North Hamgyong was a blunt person that didn't care how you felt about him saying something most of the time. If he did, he wouldn't apologize once it hurt you. During his bloodlett- donation, he'd just shifted around, then muttered that Kangwon was an idiot before they'd gone on to talk about the probing actions at the frontline. That was as much of an 'apology' as he'd ever get. If he tried to push for a real one, his cousin would just get more offensive. That was just how it was.

But they could have normal conversations. Before the war, they'd gone surveying for factory locations and talked about sports and industrialization and whether or not Kangwon could take down a tiger the same way he took down deer (their verdict had been yes, but he never would because they were a treasured Korean animal, and their populations were already declining).

North Hamgyong didn't have those conversations with SH. Even during the Occupation, when things between them had been way less tense than now, they'd only ever spoke with the others around, almost always bickering. Rare private conversations usually ended in both of them storming back, the male Hamgyong glowering darkly and the female with a fixed smile on her face.

Kangwon wasn't sure they talked at all now. And even their conversations in front of the rest of them were pointed jabs.

"You know he doesn't mean the stuff he says."

"Why is it on me to know that?!" SH demanded, fingers throttling the chair armrests. "Why is on me to guess what he's thinking or pretend I know what he feels when everything he says and does is completely to the contrary? If he really cares deep down, then why can't he just say what he means? Why can't he just be nice?"

Kangwon didn't really have an answer for that. The same reason he wanted to die when Korea looked at him in disappointment, or Hwang's lips pressed together when he was talked over, or SH herself would rather yank her tongue out than get help. None of them had made the choice to end up that way, but it also wasn't just how they were formed. Their people couldn't be blamed for those parts of them, he didn't think. Their 'nurture' could.

His cousin looked down, her jaw feathering. "He wasn't always like this."

"What was he like?"

SH and North Hamgyong never talked about their pasts. SH had told them she'd set out from Hamhung to find the other Hamgyong right away, and how they'd stayed in Chongjin, then moved to Hungnam. But nothing else. They never reminisced or told stories about that time that would even let him guess what they'd been like. And Hwang had told him recently that he hadn't been able to get an answer out of either of them about it.

Neither did Kangwon.

SH stared at the linoleum floor, then shook her head. "What does it matter? He's not like that anymore. He's just terrible. Am I supposed to act like he isn't just because he didn't used to be? Am I just supposed to just keep on shutting my mouth and accepting it because he's a- my brother and I'm supposed to know he 'doesn't mean it?'"

"No," Kangwon admitted, because it would be unfair, especially for SH. "Shutting your mouth and pretending you never had any problems is just making your reaction now worse." He leaned forward a little. "But you two stabbing at each other doesn't help either."

"What else am I supposed to do?" SH asked, tossing her hands a little.

Kangwon adjusted her IV, giving her the same advice he'd tried to give her brother. "Talk to him, maybe?"

"I try." She thwacked the chair lightly. "But every time I do, he just insults me."

"And you insult him back." Kangwon had the benefit of hearing the siblings out frequently (SH might hate talking about her trauma, but she could complain about her brother for hours, the same way North Hamgyong could complain about her), so he got the absolute best and worst depictions of both of them. He felt like it left him with a pretty neutral view, plus with what he'd witnessed for himself on top of it.

"Because I'm not just going to let him think he can say whatever he wants to me," she snapped. "Even if you all do."

Her blood bag was full, so Kangwon got up to remove the line, moving slow so she wouldn't be able to run away too fast.

"You can't work out your problems honestly with him if you can't be honest about the ones with yourself," he said, knowing he was treading back onto unsteady ground.

"Kangwon," she warned.

He held up a hand. "I'm not getting into it. But it's true. Neither of you are the most well-adjusted people-"

"I am perfectly well-adjusted," she hissed, clenching her fist so hard that blood spurted from her arm before he could put the patch on it.

A biohazard he'd have to clean before he left. Nice.

He ignored her. "-and when you both refuse to work on yourselves, you can't work on your relationship. Sorry, cuz." He shrugged as he wheeled the pole away. "But it's the truth."

Especially when their personal problems were so wound up in their problems with each other. Kangwon didn't need to know the specifics of their pasts to know that.

"Then I guess things are always going to be like this," she said icily.

Kangwon sighed inwardly. Outwardly he said, "And I'll make sure you both get good medical care when you eventually beat each other half to death."

SH narrowed her eyes at him, then slumped back in the chair, rubbing her arm. "Sorry. The bombings are bad today. I didn't mean to use that tone."

"I know," he assured her, holding the bag of her blood. "And you do know North Hamgyong doesn't mean the things he says."

Her eyes fell. Her lips parted, then touched again.

Kangwon patted her on the shoulder, and she straightened up, getting to her feet.

"Sorry," she said, back to being peppy. "I think the bombs and blood loss are getting to me."

"Make sure to drink lots of fluids," he said, accepting her explanation.

In the end, he didn't think North Hamgyong's reason for lashing out was any different than Korea's. Chagang had been right about their Countryhuman, and he was right about their cousin.

'He is more scared than angry.' Korea was just better at hiding that fear, most of the time.

He knew SH didn't want to hear that. And she was right- her brother could be awful, especially to her. Just because Kangwon could understand the cause and accept it, didn't mean she had to.

"I will." She didn't leave right away, her mouth twisting. "Can I ask where the labs are?"

"Need-to-know basis," Kangwon answered.

"Just vaguely," she assured. "Are any of them over the Taedong or on the south side of the city?"

"We've got a few over in our provinces, so I guess that's over the Taedong."

“Within walking distance?”

He shook his head. The couple Pyongyang labs- not counting the ones in the hospitals- were either in the northern or western hills. The areas east and south of the capital were mostly plains, leaving no good place for the kind of security they needed.

SH squinted. “So theoretically, if someone visited the Quarantine Hospital, they wouldn’t have to come into the city to get back to the labs?”

“Not unless they had to. You know how hard it is for most people to get travel passes to get into the city right now.”

It was too dangerous. To keep people safe, they had to keep to the hills. The provinces had a lot of freedom in that regard. They needed papers to stay overnight in private residences or get transport like everyone else, but as long as they had their identity cards, they could get into their civilization centers. And if it was an emergency, they could still get rides, so long as they reported it after.

“Hm,” SH hummed, and he asked, “Why?”

“No reason,” she said brightly. “Do you want me to bring your rations for you tomorrow?”

“Please don’t,” he mildly requested.

Under the order from Supreme Command for the KPA to economize as much as they could, everyone from officers to soldiers stationed at headquarters were down from a kilogram of rice a day to eight hundred grams. Only active soldiers got more than that. The provinces were special- SH’s garden had thrilled Korea (as much as something could), and once it bore fruit- well, vegetables- they’d be down to six hundred and fifty grams.

Basically Kangwon was saying he didn’t want the little bit of food that kept him running to be poisoned.

“I think I’ll bring your rations for you tomorrow.” SH smiled, walking away.

He'd just have to trust she wouldn't want to waste food, and it'd be North Pyongan making them.

"Hey, SH," he said before she could go.

Reluctantly, she looked back. Her mouth was still curved, but her almond eyes were wary.

"I'm not bringing it up," he reassured her, wishing he didn't have to. "Just wanted to say however you comrades used to be, I'm sorry it changed."

He'd got to experience growing closer to his brother. Now that he had, he hated to imagine the opposite.

She crossed her slender arms over her chest. "Maybe it didn't. Maybe you're right, and this is just the way he is. Maybe it always has been."

"I don't think you believe that," he said gently. "I know your relationship is a lot more complicated, but I miss my brother a lot. And I know when you got taken to the POW camp, North Hamgyong missed you."

She smiled bitterly. "He didn't actually."

"You're siblings," Kangwon said, giving her words a disapproving look. "There's only so much I can do for you two, especially if you're not going to take my advice. Work things out with yourselves so you can work things out between yourselves. Please."

Her eyes downcast, and he added, "You know he cares about us. He cares about you."

The edges of her lips turned slightly sad.

"Sometimes I don't think I do know that," she said quietly, then slipped out of the room before he could say anything else.

Kangwon sighed. By the time he was in the hallway, she was gone, and he set off to store her blood before he cleaned the splatter off the floor.

Sometimes he wondered what they'd all be like if they'd been formed the way they should've been, in a free Korea. Who they'd be. The old Hamgyongs had been sworn brothers, bloodthirsty savages the way the Japanese and Qing told it, and valiant warriors the way their surviving histories- according to Hwang- did.

The truth was probably a little different from even that, though. They'd still been nobles. The invading Japanese and Chinese wouldn't've been the only ones to end up on their swords. And they'd stopped taking up arms in their later years, not fighting Japan the way they should've.

But pretty much every version, and Kangwon's common sense, said they'd been close.

Had that been built on their almost five hundred years as one person? Or had it happened as their own people, as Hamhung, Kyongsong, and Kapsan when they'd been shattered, or North and South Hamgyong when they'd been reformed? In a better world, would that closeness have carried on in the Hamgyongs he knew?

And even if their predecessors didn't affect them, could South Hamgyong and her brother be close anyways, if it hadn't been for... everything else?

There wasn't much use in wondering when this was the world they lived in. The world where they'd been Occupied and Divided, growing up in ways they never should've. The world where his cousins couldn't have one conversation with each other or face who they were and what had happened to them. And the world where Kangwon had gotten his brother taken. They could make a better world for the future, but they couldn't change the past. He couldn't know if they could be different, just like he couldn't know if he could've saved Pak Yun-ho. All they could do was accept what had happed, and just keep moving forward.

He just wished his cousins would.

SH in her head: North Hamgyong's going to need a full-body cast when I'm done with him.
SH out loud: How dare you imply that I would ever hurt him.

After waking up, I realized I had a bite mark on my arm. I was very confused until I vaguely remembered I had a dream that annoyed me so much that I woke up and bit myself very hard before going back to sleep. I can't remember the dream at all and I don't know why I would do that.

Tiny Zhao Jingjing <3 (this is part of a larger picture I will post someday).
Her lipstick isn't smeared for gross reasons. If you look carefully you can see the edges of her face are lighter because someone vigorously scrubbed the powder and make-up off her. Like when you grab your cat's face in both hands and… I can't think of a way to describe this. I call it kajiwaji, but that's a nonsense word that means nothing. I grab my cat firmly on both sides of the head and go 'kajiwaji kajiwaji kajiwaji' as I move them back and forth really fast. That's what 'someone' did to her. But without the kajiwaji-ing.

Kim Il-sung gives a vibe that he is righteously committed to women's rights. He can't go ten minutes without mentioning them (exaggeration, but not by much). Every one of his war speeches is 'we need more doctors, and most of them should be women. We need more teachers and factory workers, and most of them should be women. We need to make sure more women and young people are in positions of power. Women do NOT belong in the household, they belong in the workplace, do NOT let your husbands make you eat the bread of idleness. Dear men AND WOMEN guerrillas. The Chinese sons AND DAUGHTERS are here to help.' He is spiritually driven to mention women's progress by his deep belief in it. Meanwhile Mao always gives off a vibe that sexism annoys him on a personal level. To his first wife: 'This arranged marriage is stifling both your rights and mine. Goodbye.' seeing prostitute get beaten while man yells that even once the Communist Party takes the city, they'll want prostitutes, too Mao, incredibly irked: We need to abolish prostitution.
Neither of these things is lesser than the other. But they are both heartening and deeply amusing to me.

I don't want to talk about the elections. I dream of a sacred war of justice.

At Your Fingertips

[image]

North was starting to hate driving.

He had… thought it was useful before. To be able to get across their country in only a few hours, to go from city to countryside in a few minutes, seeing more of his people and land in a shorter time than he would have if he was on foot. The convenience of roads and motorcars wasn't something guerrillas were used to.

But now the vehicle was just a bigger target, another wasted resource if one of the planes on the edge of his hearing came closer.

And it gave him time to think. He had enough of that. Endless time to think when all he wanted was to do something.

As he drove out of Pyongyang, his mind was already circling, chewing at the peace talks like a dog trying to gnaw its own leg off.

The concession wasn't the worst thing that could have happened, he knew that. Before it had been made, it had been agreed upon that civilians that ended up across the armistice line from where they were from would get the help they needed to return home. So long as the forty-four thousand remained classified as civilians, they should be returned someday.

And they'd exchanged it for two more important demands. The men and women from the south that had joined the KPA officially would be allowed to return to their homes directly, if they wished. It made North prickle, knowing many of them would be at risk before an official end to the war was made, but it prevented them from having to be repatriated to the north, discharged from the army to become civilians, then sent back to the south, clogging processing for actual civilians. And it was up to personal choice. It was another way to help the Yanks save face by allowing them to not have to say outright that they weren't going to ever hand over the list of names, but it would get people where they needed and wanted to go. Even if some were forced to say they wanted to go home, they would be left with a fifth column behind enemy lines, in case America or Rhee tried anything.

And, more importantly, their proposal for full repatriation had finally been accepted. The specific figures for the last lists of soldiers- eleven thousand of America and his puppets' prisoners in North and China's hands, and one hundred thirty-two thousand of theirs in America's- would all be sent back to their armies, not counting the southerners that chose to go home.

The senior American staff office had agreed, only adding that the lists should be revised for the POWs captured after the December lists, accidental duplications, and a few thousand prisoners they'd found to be from the south in the meantime. Since North's negotiators had already proposed revising them before the secret talks, there was no issue with that.

But neither of those felt like a victory to North. There shouldn't be any 'side' for the southern KPA soldiers to choose to stay on- only Korea. And their 'proposal' for full repatriation was just proposing that America follow international law, the damn laws he had helped create. It was a victory that they'd made him accept, North knew that. But it shouldn't have been.

And he knew some of those forty-four thousand, most of them, were his soldiers. And since he knew that, it made America's reasons for wanting to hold them suspect.

His Premier had told him the same thing he'd apparently told South Hamgyong and South Pyongan- that they would get their POWs back after the war was over, and shine light on what had been done to them then. But it still felt a betrayal to their comrades.

North's eye narrowed at the muddy eastern highway.

He wasn't irked with the man anymore. He hadn't asked him to wake him up after all, and he had told him to do whatever he could to get an armistice. And he'd also caused enough trouble for him by making him come by to clean his burns while he was out.

But he was still irked with Kangwon. More than irked. If he'd been awake he could have- He didn't know. But he could have done something.

Now, like Kim Ju-bong, another loyal soldier lost, he knew not all of their soldiers would ever make it home, whether it was to the north or south.

It was done, he tried to tell himself. It was done and a ceasefire was creeping closer. They'd recessed to revise their lists on the 4th, the day after Kangwon had been returned to him. The statement that all prisoners would be released and repatriated at the time the ceasefire was affected, and that the lists should be agreeable to both sides had been added to the armistice draft, and the understanding about southern KPA prisoners being allowed to return home had been agreed on.

The American had tried to add the caveat that prisoners that resisted repatriation by force shouldn't be returned, but they'd managed to successfully reject it. It would be too easy for America to say prisoners had resisted when they hadn't, or when they'd been coerced into resisting, like some of them had been forced into signing the blood petition.

Some likely would resist forcefully, those that had joined Rhee's reactionaries in terrorizing their fellow prisoners. It was important that North got these ones back, too.

Though he disliked the idea of returning their own prisoners from Rhee's army that had repented in their camps, and would also resist, hopefully the oversight from nations that weren't America's puppets would keep them safe. Numerically, there were far less of them than KPA and PVA soldiers that America could lie about.

Once again, he was forced to play numbers games with his people's lives. Some for the many, many for the majority. His brother had been the first sacrifice. He had foolishly thought that once he got him back, it would be the end of it.

North's hands tightened around the wheel, blisters popping on the backs of his hands. His foot pressed down harder on the gas, the engine growling in response.

Even now that they'd almost settled the issue, America was still dragging it out. His men had asked for a week's recess to revise their lists. North and China's had finished in a few days. And now the Yanks had asked for another eight.

Yes they had far more prisoners. But it was still far too long just to take names when most of them were all ready curated. And if they had just started when North and China had mentioned it two weeks ago, it would have been done by now. Instead they were just adding time for more prisoners to be captured, more revisions to have to be made. America knew he couldn't win, so he was trying to save his ego by acting like he had all the time in the damn world, making them wait.

North despised waiting. Waiting for their people to free them, waiting for his wounds to heal, waiting for South to realize that if they didn't free themselves from that shack then they were going to die in it. Waiting to be Divided, waiting to be Reunified, waiting to strike back. Waiting for America to realize he wasn't ever going to get what he wanted from them and to just admit that, waiting to get Kangwon back, waiting to hear that Gangwon was being Commanded to back up the lie that North had been holding him hostage that America was spewing, waiting to see all his provinces again, waiting to see his-

"Going rather fast, aren't we?"

North slammed his foot on the brake so hard he got whiplash as the Jeep screeched to a halt. The person behind him got off worse, going flying off the side of the vehicle, landing on his back on the road.

"And you say I'm bad at driving," China quipped, arching his spine in a stretch before sitting up.

All of North's building fury had been blown away by pure bafflement.

"Where the fuck did you come from?"

His ally sat up, dusting at his pants. “I was clinging to the back of the Jeep. My Jeep, some might say.”

There was a small hitch to stand on. But-

“You couldn’t have got through the checkpoints.” Even if a guard recognized him as Mao Zhilong, he still would’ve had to get North’s permission not to show his face.

“Oh, I was clinging to the underside of the carriage.” China said this like it was normal. “I came out after.”

North had never once stopped. He shuddered as he imagined the man latched on to the bottom of the moving vehicle before scuttling out onto the back somehow.

“What are you- a lizard?”

“Of a sort.” China hopped into the passenger seat. “You should tell your guards to check underneath every vehicle.”

They usually did. But who on earth would stowaway on North’s Jeep besides someone who had something very wrong with him?

“You’re lucky the road isn’t muddy here,” the Chinese man said, brushing more dust from his uniform.

“You mean you’re lucky,” North grumbled, wishing he had been driving through a muddy stretch. China had probably purposefully chosen a dry one to come out.

“So.” His ally settled in. “Where are we going?”

“I am going to a village.”

“I guess we’re going then. Unless you want to kick me out and make me walk back to Pyongyang.” China’s voice grew smaller. “Alone. Vulnerable. Where anything could happen to me.”

North grit his teeth.

There hadn’t been any new accusation against China since

Gangwon was taken over a week ago. But that didn't mean he was safe. With no proof but the Commands, which could be argued against in court by saying South had Commanded Gangwon to lie, America might be biding his time, working off his knowledge that China was here to try and ambush him. That could be another reason why he had asked for an extension to make the list.

Though it did seem unlikely. Kangwon was an idiot, but North believed him when he said his brother didn't know about China. And China was an idiot, but he seemed to believe that, too.

Or at least North was still stuck with him.

Still, it was best to be safe. Reluctantly, he pressed the gas again, heading on to Malhwi-ri. The letter he'd received was too important to wait any longer.

"By the way, let it be known that the first thing you did after recovering from your grievous illness was 'borrow' our Jeep," China said, leaning back, content that he wasn't going to get booted out. "And now here we are again. I'm glad the fever didn't affect your habits."

North side-eyed him, remembering the song that had woven through his fever dreams. He opened his mouth, then closed it, adjusting his hands around the wheel.

China had apparently kept himself scarce. Kangwon said he hated sick people. He had no reason to believe that wasn't true.

"I preferred it when you were avoiding me."

The other country had also been scarce since North had woken up.

China clicked his tongue. "I wasn't avoiding you. Just because you didn't see me, doesn't mean I haven't been around."

He gave him a sly sideways look that North studiously ignored.

"I was just lying low to avoid receiving the same reaction as your provinces," he continued airily. "But I've decided I've escaped your wroth. For now, anyway."

North was irritated with China, especially after he'd realized that the only way Liaotung would have been able to go get SH to try and head off her moronic cousin was if she'd been awake early for some reason, and loitering around Moran Hill. And Kangwon had confirmed he'd ran into the Countryhuman, looking like he wanted to bite his own fingers off as he said it.

And North was annoyed with himself for being conflicted on how to feel. He hadn't been able to confront him immediately, too preoccupied with catching up on what he'd missed, playing PR with Norway, trying to navigate thanking CCCP without making him think he felt like he owed him, and to apologize for the trouble his province had gotten him into with the UN without actually apologizing. Now when he tried to get angry over it, it collided with the fact that Kangwon said China had stopped short of commanding him not to go, or physically restraining him, and fizzled out.

"You knew he was going to leave," North said flatly.

"I knew he was feeling uncharacteristically anxious about something when he took my blood," China corrected. "At the risk of ruining my mystique, I don't actually know everything. Your comrades are very tight-lipped when it comes to your provinces. The moment I learned, I sent mine off."

"And you let them go."

"En," China easily replied. "I wasn't exactly comfortable detaining a foreign province without genuine reason. Unlike some nations."

Before North could snap at him, he turned his head, his eyes unsmiling as his voice lost the airiness.

"I am sorry your province was stolen, Chaoxian. I know what that's like."

North didn't know if he was talking about Taiwan, Hong Kong and Macau, or something else. He didn't talk about his past, and Liaoxi and Liaotung only ever danced around it, even now that one was… courting North Pyongan.

"I did everything I could without crossing any lines in our relationship," China continued seriously. "You haven't put your provinces under my command-"

"And I'm not going to." North bristled, even though he was well aware he'd been ordering the Chinese provinces around almost since the day they'd arrived.

"I'm not asking you to," China assured. "But because of that, I let my comrades go into danger I knew they shouldn't. And that hurt you."

He shifted more towards North, who slowed the Jeep slightly, cursing his missing eye for making him have to turn almost completely to see him.

"So I want to ask- if something like that were to happen again, would you want me to stop them?"

North opened his mouth, looked away, then looked back and demanded, "Did you let Gangwon go because you wanted a ceasefire?"

"No," China said immediately. "I'm not the biggest fan of the Western nations thinking they can demand our own provinces whenever they please. And this war is for your country- I wouldn't compromise one of its provinces. We get this armistice on terms that please us both, or not at all."

North looked back at the road.

"And if that isn't enough to convince you," China added after a moment. "While I'm sure your Kangwon thinks his brother doesn't know anything about my presence here, that doesn't mean I'm sure your Gangwon knows nothing. I wasn't able to get close to him without giving myself away. It was a risk to me to let them go."

North's jaw worked. "If you thought Gangwon did know about you, would you have stopped him?"

"Yes," China answered without pause. "I've told you my country comes first, just as yours does to you."

The idea of the foreign Countryhuman restraining his provinces made him bristle, and it should have made North even more wary. But instead it was reassuring. Of course China's considerations towards Korea would always be less important than his own country, just like with CCCP. As it should be.

"…Yes," North decided after a moment, already regretting it. "If one of my provinces is about to do something stupid, and I am not in a position to stop them, you have permission to. But only if it is to save them."

He took his eye fully off the road, giving China a glare that let him know his country did come first to him. He wasn't giving him permission to stop them from doing something for Korea if it hurt China.

"And don't do it in public," he added.

He felt uncomfortably ashamed, the same way he had when he'd ordered CCCP not to be so handsy in public. The Soviet might have no patience for unnecessary actions, but he seemed to find patting North's shoulders necessary. He could tolerate it in private for the sake of their camaraderie (he could not tolerate the hugging anywhere), but not in front of his people. The shame came from feeling like he shouldn't tolerate it in private either.

But in this case, he couldn't lose another one of his provinces, both for the ceasefire and for his own… pride. If the price for that was China dragging Kangwon or whoever off kicking and screaming, then that was acceptable.

"And I'm not responsible for any harm they inflict on you while you try," he threw in.

He wasn't going to tell any of them what he'd just given China consent to do. If they were smart, it would never have to come up again anyway. So if South Pyongan or North Hamgyong saw the foreigner restraining one of their cousins or siblings, or the restrainee fought back, it was not his fault if China got his mouth bloodied because of it.

“Reasonable terms,” China agreed after a moment, then tipped his head, his voice lowering. “And what about you? Do I have permission to pin you down and stop you from running off the next time you try?”

‘Ah hate when Korea runs off.’

North’s knuckles whitened around the wheel. “…No.”

“Alright,” China agreed, his tone returning to normal as he leaned back. “I’m always up for another sight-seeing trip anyway.”

The Korean grimaced. "When did you start thinking that just because I am tolerating you staying here that I want to be around you?”

“Probably around the time you started letting me sleep in your room,” China said flippantly, stretching his legs out. “It’s been disinfected, by the way. And my materials have been moved back in.”

“And I am going to keep sleeping in Jonsung complex.”

Or ‘sleeping.’ He had a million reports to catch up on, and correspondences to read. Not every one needed a personal response- he’d been mortified to find out several villages had scraped together enough funds to purchase cheap paper and mail him letters essentially cheering him on- but the ones that did needed to be responded to quickly. This one had already been sitting too long.

Far, far too long.

North asked abruptly, “Have you made any progress on your handheld radios? Or did I give you that radio for nothing?”

China perked up. “You’re actually interested in my project?”

North couldn’t deny it before he was babbling on about needing to disassemble everything he’d already worked on to refit the parts he'd salvaged from the reactionary radio, and the challenges over getting them working again, turning the question he’d asked just to keep his mind off things into an hour-long ramble.

He sounded far too happy about it. He'd been thrilled to get the radios working in the first place, but now he sounded just as thrilled to take them apart again. Going to all that work for nothing would have just pissed North off. He would have found some way to fit the parts without ruining everything he'd worked for. If he knew anything about technology.

"I think I've got them up and running again," China said as they drove through Koksan. "I've just been waiting for someone to help me test them."

He eyed North suggestively.

"Find someone else," he clipped. "I'm busy."

"Busy wearing circles into your office floor while we wait for America's pencil-pushers to learn how to write." China caught his sharp look, and his eyes squinted up. "That was only a metaphor. But your reaction tells me that's exactly what you were doing."

North grimaced.

He was up to date on everything urgent, and while he had decided the ceasefire talks wouldn't keep him from the frontline if he was needed, he still wasn't. There were only small holding battles, along with probing actions to make sure America's forces knew no matter how long they took to get the list updated, the KPA and PVA wouldn't flag. And the eternal aerial and naval bombardments, of course. And they didn't have enough bazookas for North to make a dent in those.

But he still needed to do something. Today's trip wasn't enough.

"I hope you don't get those radios working," North said bluntly. "I don't want to talk to you any more than I already have to."

"So that means you'll take one if I do get them working?"

North didn't dignify him with a response, letting him ramble as they kept driving.

China's eyes were glowing again, the way they did when he got excited. North made sure he kept him firmly in his blind spot.

'We can't trust any of them.'

North Pyongan had came to speak to him about that. He was pleased he wasn't just bowing down to everything he said now, but he had still told him to shut up.

It wasn't that he didn't trust China. Or no, that was exactly it. He had told his Premier that he wouldn't trust a foreign country, and he still wouldn't. He couldn't. He had accepted that he was here to… pay the debt he felt like he owed Korea's people. It couldn't be the only reason, but it was one of them. He knew he wouldn't try to kill him in his sleep, and he could depend on him to watch his back in combat.

But it didn't matter. No matter why he was here or why his army was, they wouldn't be if there weren't geopolitical interests involved. He had said this war was for North's country, but that wasn't true. They would never risk their soldiers if they didn't share a border with him, just like CCCP wouldn't have been so helpful if he didn't have to worry about having a puppet Korea on his east.

And North wouldn't have wanted them to. If he was in a position to help another country in Africa or Southeast Asia, who didn't have a direct affect on his country, he... might. But he knew that he couldn't expect that from another country.

He caught his gaze drifting, and fixed his eye firmly on the road again.

He… didn't have a problem with China or CCCP, personally. Aside from the clinginess. And the touchiness. And the Soviet's occasional overbearing attitude (he knew he would have stopped Kangwon and Gangwon from going without permission because he saw them as his 'sons,' which meant he thought he had a 'right' to). And how annoying and nosy China was. And how he never took no for an answer, refused to leave, inserted himself everywhere, took almost nothing seriously, constantly lied, had to be still lying about his real motivations for being here, and-Anyway, North didn't like either of them, but he could tolerate them as comrades. They were both…

Maybe if they weren't Countryhumans, they still would have come to Korea's aid as guerrillas, not because they shared a border or to combat America's camp, but just for the sake of Socialist fr-camaraderie. Maybe he could accept that they were both that sort of person.

But they were all Countryhumans, and so they would never know. Their countries would always come first. That was why CCCP had kept his promises, and why he'd retrieved Kangwon. That was the only reason North could assume China was here. That was the reason why personal relationships between countries could never work.

He didn't mind that. It was better that way. Like he'd said, it was how it should be. But it did mean that Korea could never truly trust their comrades. If they became inconvenient or harmful to their interests, the other countries would turn their backs on them. It wasn't something to feel spiteful over, and he didn't *mis*trust them the same way he did America, Japan, Britain, Norway, and their ilk. He was just fully aware that Korea would never come first to anyone but Koreans.

But he couldn't explain that to his provinces. They'd just give him those looks, like they were sad he thought that way when it was just the truth.

At least some of them still believed it wasn't, even after he had tried to get it through to them. He didn't want them to distrust their comrades, he just… Didn't want a repeat of the Pak Chae-eun or Norway incidents. He couldn't afford to lose good soldiers.

'Any more good soldiers.'

At least China didn't pretend that he would never turn on him, or that they'd always be aligned. CCCP seemed to think that North was already a part of his family, no matter how much he rejected it, and that they would always be walking the same path.

North knew he would be. But he couldn't trust that anyone else would. Comrade Stalin and Comrade Mao were fine, but not all of their cabinets were, and whoever came after them might not be. China's recognition that they might be enemies one day was more trustworthy than pure comradeship.

But he still didn't like him.

It took a few hours to reach where they were going, made even longer by North having to pull off the road to hide the Jeep in the hills while enemy reconnaissance planes and bombers flew overhead.

They had to be careful. They were only a few dozen ri from the frontline, and Kangwon province had been being hit hard for the past few days. It was being hit now. North could feel the nerves he still had left tingling, struggling to feel something with their deadened endings, while his hands burned around the wheel. And the edges of that stupid gash felt tight.

Most of the damage was coming from the naval bombardment, and the Taebaek Mountains acted as a buffer between them and the East Sea, where the battleships were pelting the Kosong area, trying to break their line. But the heavy clouds and fog of the past few days were gone, leaving the sky clear for bombers as well. And since most of the local factories had been moved underground, deep in the craggy foothills and formerly thick forests of the Taebaeks, now the only targets left were anything that looked even slightly like part of their supply line, and the villages.

There weren't many of those left, only the ones wedged between valleys and ridges where the bombs couldn't reach them as well, and the remnants of towns.

North's destination was one of the latter- Malhwi-ri. Later this year, they were going to change the village's name to Kumgang, and promote it to a town as the seat of the new Kumgang County, which would be formed out of Hoeyang County and the parts of Rinje and Yanggu Counties they held.

North had gritted his teeth at the decision, though he knew it was just to make management easier while they worked out the ceasefire, a proper end to the war, and Reunification. And it made sense to turn one of the most scenic mountains in Korea into its own county, especially with how they'd been planning to increase tourism to it before the war. That was the only reason they were doing it.

The village still named Malhwi-ri was on the Kumgang River, close enough to the front that China asked if he was running off again. It sat between the peaks of the Taebaek Mountains, surrounded by floodplains and wide sandbars. Before the war, it had been picturesque, nestled under the shadow of Mount Kumgang, and filled with the scent of snow and pine, and the rich, silty smell of the river.

It was mostly gone now, reduced to houses that hugged the hills, far away from the craters that had taken out the mills and bridges. North didn't bother going into the remains, heading straight for the foothills that rose across the river. The water was swollen by spring runoff, but he found a fisherman to take them over on his boat, giving him the last of last month's salary to him. Because he had been unconscious, he'd had a surplus.

After a half hour's hike into the hilly woods, North left China at a stream, threatening him with death if he wasn't right where he left him when he got back. And that he'd make him walk next to the Jeep all the way back to Pyongyang, which might have been more effective.

The Taebaeks were a frequent base during the Occupation, especially Mount Kumgang, where Korea's Army had stayed in those early days. North was able to find the dug-out he was looking for solely using the directions and sketch provided by the Party member that had scribed the letter for its sender. It was sheltered under a hill crowned by a copse of beech trees. If North had to guess, it was an old fox den that had been dug out, the walls supported with rough lengths of wood and chunks of stone before being covered with dirt again. Some of the materials had definitely been repurposed from destroyed houses in the village.

Good. Some places had more difficulty than others following the housing material provisions. At least a veteran had a sturdy place to live.

The weeds and saplings had all been cleared out from under the beeches, and he could see patches of fresh dirt where stones had been painstakingly pulled from the earth, soil smoothed over where they'd been, leaving nothing to trip on.

A faded green and blue bojagi hung over the mouth of the hole. It would be dark inside. Though he supposed that wouldn't matter for the occupant, if she was alone.

He padded closer, standing outside, reluctant to call out. He should have just sent a reply back, and told her the war would be over soon.

He quietly inhaled, and a voice suddenly called out, "Is someone there?"

It was tinged with fear, so he had to answer right away.

"It's Comrade Korea."

There was a shocked silence, then the sound of hands patting the dirt before the bojagi was swished aside, revealing a young woman.

Her dark brown hair had grown out of its bob, pulled back in a simple bun. It wasn't the only change. Pockmarks covered her angular face, little pits in her otherwise smooth skin. And her eyes…

"Comrade Choe Jong-mi," he greeted her, not letting the clenched fists behind his back colour his tone.

The stretcher woman he'd once dragged out of a cloud of white phosphorous looked vaguely up at him, her eyes wide. "I didn't expect you to come in person."

Her voice was no longer fresh and vibrant, the way he'd heard it for the first time on Liberation Day two years ago. But it did sound the way he'd heard it last. Not broken anymore, but ragged, even raspier than his. It had been because of the white phosphorus after all.

But he knew the reason it was smaller than he remembered came from more than that.

"I would have came sooner," he said. "But I was preoccupied with the war effort."

He couldn't tell her he had been sick. That wouldn't help her with what she was looking for.

Ssi-bal, he never should have let Kangwon convince him to rest. Never again, even if he got down on his knees and begged.

"Of course," Choe Jong-mi said quickly. "That's why I didn't expect you to come. Do you want to come in?"

"If you're alright with that." North couldn't imagine how she would be.

"Are you kidding? Jong-ok's stomach would explode if she knew I got to host you."

It was a joke. But North could hear the way the damaged edges of her voice started to bleed again.

She shuffled back, and he pushed past the bojagi, joining her inside. He hesitated, then cursed himself, letting it fall into place. It was just a curtain.

The dug-out was a small, round room. A thin futon and a blanket were pushed up against the far wall, and an assortment of clayware lay on another bojagi next to it, along with a shovel and a few folded clothes. It was cramped, and would be claustrophobic if the other occupants were here, but neat. And though dug-outs were usually too small to stand in, North found that he could actually could. And it wasn't because he was short.

Her parents must have worked hard to make sure she had room to stand up, just like they'd worked to clear away hazards from outside, giving her a small bit of freedom.

But since Choe Jong-mi was sitting, he sat, too, cross-legged on the dried reeds covering the floor. She asked if he wanted tea, and reached behind her, patting around as she looked for something before he turned it down.

"You're settling in well?" he asked.

She dipped her head. "As well as we can."

Osaek-ri had been above the 38th Parallel, but below where the frontline was now. After her family had fled in the face of the Americans and Rhee's army, afraid of facing retribution with both of their daughters in the KPA and one of them in the Party, they'd stayed in the Second Corps operation zone, before relocating here after the KPA's return.

Choe Jong-mi was incredibly lucky that she'd managed to reunite with her parents. The only reason she had was because the soldiers that had been escorting her and the other wounded north hadn't made it to the Parallel in time, and been forced into the Kangwon mountains, where she'd encountered a guerrilla after the area had been Liberated that had met her father and mother. Many soldiers had came home to find their families gone, and even now hadn't found them again. Whether it was because they'd fled south, fled farther north, been taken by Rhee's army, were hiding in the hills, or were some of the unidentified bodies found in mass graves… Either way, this daughter had been lucky.

She was also lucky to be alive.

"Are your parents healthy?" he asked.

She nodded. "They're out getting firewood and water."

North's jaw tightened. "Are they nearby?"

"Within screaming distance," she told him. "I try to tell them I'll be fine if they go farther, but they won't listen because, well. I'm sure you can see I really wasn't just getting someone to write for me because I'm lazy or illiterate still. Not that I can."

Her lips lifted bitterly, then fell. Above them, her eyes stared sightlessly. The lids around them were wrinkled and misshapen, red lines fencing in scarred yellowed patches on her tanned skin. Her pupils and irises had turned a cloudy white, thick scar tissue running across the bloodshot scleras. In her right eye, the pupil had burst and ran like an egg yolk into the ring of brown around it.

It wasn't a surprise. The Party member that wrote her letter had told him that was why he was scribing. Her vision had started to go on the march north.

North's jaw feathered, his knuckles tightening on his thighs. He opened his mouth, but the words wouldn't come out.

"Can you see anything at all?" he asked instead.

"Cloudy shapes out of this one." She pointed at her left eye, then her right. "But only shadows out of this one."

The idea that she was alone in this small space all day, unable to see if anyone came to attack her, made North clench his jaw. And the fact that she was choosing to be alone in here with him, with him between her and the exit when she couldn't see him at all, while comforting to know that was how much she trusted her country, also made his chest grow tight.

He tried to shove away the idea of being trapped underground in a world full of only shadows and clouds. He was imagining it. She was living it.

"You shouldn't be alone," he decided. "I'll arrange to have a Women's Union comrade watch over you."

"No, no," she hurriedly said. "I don't need that. I didn't write because I wanted to cause problems for people, I just…"

She trailed off, looking down at her clasped hands, even though she couldn't see them. North kept his own eye from flicking down.

Aside from her talk of what had happened to her and her family, and where they were, the first half of her letter had been simple.

'I'm sorry for writing. I know Comrade Korea must be very busy. But my parents have been telling me to write you and ask when the war will be over. They want to bury Jong-ok properly. I know you can't just end it tomorrow, and you don't need to write back at all. But if you do, could you please just reassure them it will be over soon? I'm sorry for the trouble, but please don't blame them. They just want…'

"You just want to bring your sister home," North finished, and she nodded meekly.

"I know it can't happen right away," she said quietly. "But… I hate seeing them like this. One daughter dead and the other…" She gestured to her face, her lips pressing together in a wavering line as she tried to smile. "I'm supposed to take care of them, but now they're stuck taking care of me again. And I-" Her mouth crumpled in as she squeezed her cloudy eyes shut.

"I miss my sister," she whispered.

North looked over at the bojagi while she pulled herself together.

"I'm alright," she said after a moment, her gravelly voice choked. "I'm okay. I know it's been a year and a half, but… We were close."

"The grief will never leave," North said flatly, before cursing himself. She didn't need to hear that.

"No," she quietly agreed. "It won't."

Her Countryhuman inhaled silently, then said, "You can tell your parents the war will be over soon. I can't tell you the contents, but I can say that the secret sessions of our negotiations are going well. Soon we will have an armistice, an official end to the war, and eventually Reunification. And then I promise you, I will make sure Choe Jong-ok's body is returned as soon as possible."

He could still remember where she was buried, at the foot of that pine tree on the edge of the field by the Raktong.

"Thank you," Choe Jong-mi murmured. "Thank you so much."

North knew it wasn't enough. He could hear her thinking it, accusing him past the clouds in her eyes. He had promised they would return soon a year and a half ago, and here they were, her living in a hole in the ground with her parents, far from their real home. And her sister was still buried in the earth over a thousand ri away.

He opened his mouth, shut it, stood. “I can go find your parents to tell them in person.”

“It’s alright,” Choe Jong-mi said, carefully getting to her feet, her tentative motions as she did even that simple thing making his muscles tense. “I don’t want to be any more trouble.”

The bold woman that had teased her sister at the Raktong wouldn’t have apologized like that.

“Do they still burn?”

She reached up, touching her fingers to one of the scars. “Sometimes. Bad enough I can’t even think. It’s like it’s… inside my eye.”

As he watched, her lids started to spasm, and she gave an embarrassed laugh, cupping her hand over her eye to hide it. “They do that, too.”

It should have been him. Not the blindness, but if someone’s white phosphorous burns were going to keep acting up, it should have been his. It had been him that deserved to carry that pain, not her.

North grit his teeth, then finally made himself speak.

“I’m sorry.”

She blinked in his direction. “For what?”

The guilt that had been clinging to him whenever he thought about her pressed down on his shoulders.

“I shouldn’t have let go of you.” He made an effort to keep his tone even. “It was because of my negligence that you received your injuries.”

If he'd just tolerated the white phosphorous ember on his back for a little longer, maybe Kangwon or one of the other stretcher women could have stopped her from running into the explosion after her sister.

She gaped at him in dismay, then shook her head vigorously. "No! I charged off on my own. It was my fault. I shouldn't have…"

But of course she'd had to. Her sister had been in there. North had known she would try. But he had let the pain win. And one of his people had suffered for it.

"And you got burned, too, because of me," she said, her own voice echoing his guilt. "You were trying to protect me."

He should have succeeded. She should still be in the army, still be in the Democratic Youth League, carrying the wounded, helping with spring sowing. Instead she was here, vulnerable and feeling useless.

"And I-" He couldn't say 'failed.' If he did, her confidence in what he'd said earlier would wane even further. "-would do it again. I am your country. Any injury I suffer protecting our people is one I would suffer a hundred times over."

But she shouldn't have suffered at all. The war had supposed to be over by then. She was supposed to be transporting her injured comrades to a hospital, and her sister had been supposed to be transferred to a Security Company, doing information work in the Liberated south.

"So cool," Choe Jong-mi whispered, then shook her head. "Can we say we're even then? If our Countryhuman is blaming himself over me being reckless, Jong-ok will- will come back to haunt me."

"Alright," North said after a long moment, though it wasn't.

But he didn't want her feeling remorse over something he was meant to do. She would always be on his shoulders. But she already had enough to carry forward.

"I left her," she said quietly, more to herself than him. "She died because of me, and I left her behind. What sort of sister does that make me?"

"You had to," North told her, chest clenching. "You needed to return home to fight for our country, like she would have wanted."

"And now I can't."

"There are other ways to fight." He would make sure she found one.

Choe Jong-mi let out a shaky exhale, then nodded. “I’m sorry for writing such a long letter, by the way. I wanted to keep it brief, but…” Her lips dimpled as they failed to smile. “I could hear Jong-ok telling me not to waste paper.”

“You can always write to me or our Premier,” North assured her.

He would make sure he answered sooner next time.

He went to leave, when Choe Jong-mi said, “Wait.”

He turned back to her. Her hands were clasped tightly together at her waist, and her white eyes were on the rush-covered floor. She looked almost… shy.

“I…” She sucked in a breath. “I know this is really forward, and feel free to say ‘no,’ but… Can I touch you?”

North stared at her silently, taken aback.

“Not in a- in a weird way,” she hastily said. “I just…” She bit her lip, then quietly admitted, “I’m starting to forget what things look like. It’s not bad yet, but awhile ago I realized I couldn’t remember the exact way Seorak Mountain looks in the distance. I can see the mountain, but I can’t remember how all the peaks look exactly. And I- I realized even when I get to go home, I’m never going to be able to see them again.” She swallowed. “Or… anything. I’m not going to be able to watch my parents grow old, or see Mount Kumgang like Jong-ok and me talked about, or the tree she used to like to read in or-“

Her voice broke. "I know it's dumb, but… But it was like when I realized I'd never see her face again all over."

Whenever North had thought about the possibility of going blind, when Japan would fracture his socket, an enemy soldier would gouge at his face, when he'd followed Choe Jong-mi into that white phosphorous, or when his brother had taken his eye, his concerns had always been physical. He would be vulnerable, unable to fight, unable to protect his provinces or his people. Even when it came to on-the-spot guidance or reports, he would have to depend on someone to describe things to him, read for him, and trust that what they were saying was true. He'd be helpless, useless, and no matter how hard he tried to push through it, he would never be what he once was.

He had never even thought about the other things he would lose.

He tried to imagine life without ever being able to watch the stars swimming in Chon Lake, or the emerald peaks of Mount Kumgang. To never lay his eye on the sweeping golden plains of Hwanghae province, or the winter sun gleaming off snow, or the silver rivers winding across their land. To never see the slopes covered in orchards or their cities whole again. Never seeing his people's smiles when they waved to him as he drove by, or brought in the harvest, or the looks on their faces as they crowded around him to celebrate Liberation or Foundation Day or the day they finally won this war. To never see Hae's grin or South Chungcheong's snooty look or North Hamgyong's glower or the artwork SH made for him. To never be able to see South again. To never be able to see Korea again.

"I'm sorry," Choe Jong-mi backtracked when he'd taken too long to respond. "I know that's too bold-"

"Okay."

Her marred lids fluttered rapidly. "You mean-?"

"You can touch me." North pried his boots off the floor, stepping forward until he was close enough to count the eyelashes she had left.

“Are you sure?” she asked anxiously. “I don’t want you to let me just because you feel like you have to.”

He did have to. He had been responsible for her condition. The least he could do was help her keep her memory of their country.

“I don’t mean-“

She cut herself off as North took her hand, placing her palm against his cheek, grateful that the burns still hadn’t reached it. He tried to control the way his muscles twitched at her touch. Even for all the touching he did put up with, he wasn't used to it happening to his face.

Choe Jong-mi’s eyes widened, but when he lifted his own hand, she didn’t remove hers. Tentatively, she brought her other one up so she was cupping his face. North tried not to squirm. He knew she couldn’t see him, but his eye kept darting away from hers.

Unlike so many of the hands around him, his own included, hers were soft. Not because she had the luxury of avoiding labour, but because there wasn’t much she could do when they were living rough like this now that she was blind.

North would try and find someone suitable to watch out for her, and help her learn skills she could use without eyes. She didn’t need coddling- she needed to learn how to move forward.

Choe Jong-mi’s hands were shaking as she held his face, and despite their softness, for a moment, North could feel the rough palms of an old woman with rheumy eyes and wispy white hair, her hands gnarled and worn, but gentle, the first time he’d ever felt such a thing from someone that wasn’t his brother. ‘Pak Ok-yeon.’ At the memory, a bit of his own quivering eased.

The woman hesitantly stroked a thumb over his cheekbone, tracing the angular line. North tried not to grit his jaw, knowing she would feel it, just like she could feel how sharp his bones were under his skin, and the swooping hollow of his cheeks as her digits drifted over them. With her skin on his, there wouldn’t be any pretending it was just how his bone structure was.

He wanted to pull away, but then she would know why. So he stay rooted to the floor of the dug-out, letting her explore him, getting bolder as she went.

Her little fingers swept down over his jawline, resting just under it, feeling his rapid pulse. North made an effort not to tense. She was one of his people and he trusted her. If she wanted to feel his throat, he would let her, even with the bandages that swathed it.

But after a moment, her touch left, and she used her forceps fingers to outline his jaw, meeting at his chin before she cupped his face again, lower this time, with just the tips of her fingers clinging to him. Slowly, she slid her thumb up until it touched the curve of his bottom lip, where she carefully traced the outline of them, his skin tingling in her wake.

This was too much touching, both for him personally and for a woman touching a man she wasn't married to. But the slight red tinge had left Choe Jong-mi's cheeks, and her expression didn't make him uncomfortable the way the ones of the women SH and Kangwon would help guide him away from did, or the eyes of an audience sometimes still could.

Her sightless, scarred eyes were filled with awe, but it wasn't the awe of a crowd staring up at a being they saw as beyond their reach, but the awe of his people as he pulled them up next to him, letting them embrace him, showing them that they weren't below anyone, let alone him. It was the awe of realizing her country really was in her hands, and it made her tremble as much as him. They weren't a man and woman now, but a Korean and her country.

When she was done gently prodding at the corners of his mouth with her thumbs, she moved them slightly up.

"Is this where the white strip on our flag is?" Her voice was hushed, like she was whispering in a temple.

The comparison didn't bother Korea when he was whispering with her. He couldn't even trust himself to speak, just responding, "Mm," to her as she sought out the bands on their flag- the crimson blood shed by the revolutionary patriots and martyrs that had always defended their land, the snowy purity of their people and culture, and the navy of their spirit as they fought for peace, blue like the seas that cradled Korea. Choe Jong-ok's favourite colour.

She read his face like a map of their homeland, trailing her fingers over its contours, familiarizing herself with its valleys and ridges, following invisible rivers and mountain peaks that she would never see again.

When she was done, Choe Jong-mi ran her thumb under the skin under his eye, possibly the only delicate skin on his entire body, unable to see the shadow under it. Then she passed it over his upper lid, running along his short, sparse eyelashes, feeling the soft orb underneath. She did it gently, soothing the tension in his chest. Korea's eye had half-lidded to allow her to do it, and it didn't open all the way after as she cradled his face again.

Her gaze shifted towards the left half, around where his eyepatch was. The thumb on her left hand rose, touching the bottom of the fabric, following the outline over his brow and back down over his socket. Korea's breath caught in his throat, and he went still, trying not to scare her off. He was her country. She had a right to investigate as she pleased.

"Are you really missing an eye?" she murmured.

"…Yes," Korea managed to answer, hoping she wouldn't ask how.

She didn't. And she might have felt him tense despite his best efforts, because she only stroked the edge of the star eyepatch again, then returned to holding his face between her warm palms. They were both trembling, eyes wide now, and Korea could feel through her fingertips that her pulse was racing just as fast as his.

Choe Jong-mi gazed into his face, and he met her eyes, swallowing. Even though she couldn't see him, she smiled, her lips curving up in a wavering line.

"Jong-ok would be so jealous," she whispered, and tears started to pour down her scarred cheeks.

Her hands slid away, and North had to stop himself from pulling them back.

"Thank you," she murmured, wiping at her face. "Now even if I forget… Thank you."

North watched her step back, her questing hands curling in around herself, cradling her own ribs now.

Ghosts weren't real, but Choe Jong-ok was haunting her. Neither her nor her parents could move on with her hovering over them. They hadn't been able to have a funeral or three-day mourning period, or a 49th Day ceremony to guide her spirit towards a new life. Even though it was illegal to waste food on offerings right now, they didn't even have a gravesite to visit. They couldn't feel like they had said goodbye.

There were no such things as ghosts or reincarnation. There was only one life, and Choe Jong-ok was gone from theirs. Bringing her body back wouldn't bring her back. And corpses didn't care where they were buried.

But their living families did. Even if the rituals were just superstitions, they had an effect on the people that conducted them. They let them move on.

North Pyongan had once asked- after realizing that North was never going to turn towards Christianity- why he didn't at least follow their own native traditions. He knew why he didn't like customs like leaving food offerings for ancestors while the people around them starved, but he'd wondered why he didn't follow the other observances.

'I know you said you have our people, but… Much of your grief seems to come from them, too. Even if you don't want to believe in God, the rituals might give you some solace.'

But North didn't need solace, not the way his province meant it. He had his people for that, too. He believed in them, that they would never stop fighting, and that one day they would all win freedom with their own hands. His grief and rage over what was being done to them only made him fight harder. And as their Countryhuman, he couldn't move on. He didn't deserve to have the weight on his shoulders lessened when so many of the people he was carrying forward where there because of him, because he hadn't came soon enough, because he had given up.

He didn't approve of the parts of any religion or spiritual practice that told his people to tolerate suffering in this life to be rewarded in the next, or to ignore their oppressors because they would be punished by some divine force in an afterlife that was never coming. But he did recognize that not all of his people could bear the full weight of their losses. Some of them needed to lighten them if they hoped to keep fighting, to keep pressing forward. And if rituals were what was needed to do that right now, then he would do his best to help them conduct them.

Rituals didn't matter to the dead. They did to the living.

"Comrade Choe Jong-mi."

The woman raised her head, her bloodshot eyes even redder. He gazed steadily into them, making sure she felt the weight of his vow.

"I will bring your sister home. I promise."

She nodded wordlessly, and he turned to go, escaping out into the later afternoon sun. He didn't bother looking for her parents, not when he felt so light and shaky.

He knew he had been imagining her accusations, just like with his soldiers and everyone else last year. She didn't blame him for how long her sister had been left behind, not when she looked at him like that, something beyond the clouds in her eyes shining brighter than even the sun. She believed he would keep his word, that she could bury her sister where she was meant to be buried. She had faith in her country, and even if he took another year, she would probably still have faith.

But if he could accept making her wait that long, then he wouldn't deserve it.

It would only be a few more months, and then he would have access to the south. He could move freely through his country the way they all always should have been able to. In just a few months the war would be over, like he'd said. They would have won. Just a few more months, that was all.

But he had already left them waiting long enough. Corpses didn't care how long it took, they didn't care if they ever saw their hometowns again. Choe Jong-ok was long gone.

But her family wasn't. And they needed her to come home.

Happy Spring Festival/Seollal/assorted other Lunar New Years! ^^ Asking for good fortune is too audacious for me, so may we all survive the year again.

Important to know that North would also let a man do this to him. So long as he's Korean.

If you're wondering why Choe Jong-mi wasn't as messed up physically by the Raktong, it's because white phosphorous is liquid soluble, and the smoke is included. So it got into her eyes, she couldn't be treated properly because they were out of supplies and launched immediately into the withdraw (even if she was treated, she likely still would have gone blind) and the moisture in her eyes combined with the phosphoric acids to gradually corrode more and more of them.

When North says he was irked at Kim Il-sung, he's being an unreliable narrator. What he was really doing is sitting at his desk and pouting at him like this:
(x ⌒ -̃) = 3 But he would never use the word 'pouting' for himself. Kim Il-sung also would never. Out loud.

By the way, this will never be brought up, but after the war the Foreign Minister, Pak Hon-yong, would eventually get accused of being an American spy, and removed. American media obviously says this was fabricated because while they can never be entirely sure if the DPRK has things like free healthcare (it's in their constitution and the UN has observed them before) or if a high-profile politician has been brutally executed (he showed up a week later) in the modern day, they are 100% certain the evidence from decades ago was fabricated. I'm not saying it was or wasn't. But in the context of the story world, North is convinced he is because of how easily he agreed that Kangwon should go to the Oslo meeting, and because it's never entirely clear how America knew they'd be there in order to have the Norwegian State Police arrest them immediately. Spy at Moscva airport? One of the Swedes at the Swedish one? Or maybe a spy in Korea.

Parallel Steps

A man and woman holding hand tillers in front of a flooded field, women packing jumeokbap with smiles on their faces, peasants and soldiers hard at work, a man leaning on a hoe with a group of farmers, dressed in white just like them, his Party membership card presented proudly to the sun.

'Fight to finish rice sowing in time! All efforts for the front! Let not an inch of land go idle!' These were the types of slogans on the lithograph posters SH's paintings had been turned into that she posted around Pyongyang.

She loved lithographs. During the Occupation, they'd had to make every poster by hand, and while she hadn't discovered her talent at art yet, she knew how hard it was for the women and men that made them. Even if they could get a contact at a printing press to make copies, they were already risking themselves by siphoning paper and black ink, so they couldn't afford to steal any colours. Posters were a better medium than pamphlets for communicating a message when so many of their people had been illiterate, but black-and-white ones just weren't as impressive.

SH liked that now not only were the words just as understandable to their people as the images, but that the images could speak the way they were meant to, in splashes of colour that interrupted the dreary rubble their lives had become. After a washerwoman had admired one, she had even taken to painting tiny pieces with slogans on scraps of lithograph paper that would go to waste otherwise, distributing them to her and the other civilians in the dug-outs. It killed two birds with one stone by livening up their holes in the ground, and making sure they'd see the motivationals every day.

But the ones today just weren't speaking to her.

As SH carefully pinned a poster that read 'The struggle for food is a struggle for the country and for victory at the front!' to a newsboard where people tended to congregate, she wished it read 'DEATH TO THE YANKEES' instead. But her recent batch of designs had been rejected. 'Too disturbing,' the information worker had said, just because she'd paid too much attention to the coils of intestines spilling from the Yankee's soft belly as he was gutted.

Her slogans weren't exactly subtle, but she didn't want to be subtle. She wanted them to shout at anyone that read them 'THESE MEN DESERVE TO DIE! AMERICA DESERVES TO DIE! HE'S A LIAR AND A MONSTER AND WE CAN'T TRUST A CEASEFIRE!'

But she couldn't say that. At least not the last part. She… wanted a ceasefire, she did. She just didn't trust that America did. But their people were already nervous since they weren't allowed to know what was happening in the secret sessions. They needed hope right now.

So even though she wanted to paint too-pale and too-dark men with their skin bursting and tearing the way hers was today under her bandages, she would instead paint emerald fields and happy farmers. She would save the rest for the wall.

SH let out a breath, feeling her energy go with it.

She'd felt off since walking Zhao Jingjing to the river two days ago. It wasn't just the bombardment her province was still taking. She felt nauseous and tired. Worried she might have caught something from the lab assistant, she'd gone to Kangwon again, but he assured her her blood was still clean, and that a day was too fast for most diseases she could have caught to start showing symptoms.

The sympathetic fever must just be taking its toll, and the burns were only making it worse. That was all.

She inhaled until she felt some oxygen return to her lungs, then set out, trying to keep some pep in her step in case anyone saw her. Her other posters had all been passed out to the underground factories to hang up, or posted in public areas. Now she only had two left. Her heart sank as she realized which ones they had to be. She checked again anyway, just to be sure.

A man heaving back to pound the head of a railroad tie into the ground, a cheerful but determined look on his face on one, and on the other, two men in the foreground with those same hammers over their shoulders, rags tied around their glistening foreheads, smiling broadly as they watched a train roll down the tracks behind them.

'Rebuild what the enemy has destroyed!' and 'Rail lines are the veins of our country!' they read respectively.

SH groaned, letting them fall to her sides. 'Great.'

Was North Hamgyong working on Pyongyang lines today, or had he gone to his province? He never announced when he did, and it wasn't like she asked. The targeting on their rails had been intense the last few days. They'd been cut in over fifty places in a day alone, including the crucial stretch between Pyongyang and Kunu-ri, plus another train had got destroyed, so he might-

Oh. Right. Korea wanted him to stay near the city, too, for some reason. And since most farmers would be waiting for night to work on sowing, and he'd never choose farming over hitting things with hammers anyway, he'd definitely be working on the tracks.

'Talk to him maybe?' Kangwon said, like it was that easy. It wasn't, and not because of her 'personal problems.' He was just so caught up on thinking there was something wrong with her that he had to bring her past into everything.

She had tried talking to him, and he'd rejected her every time. When she asked him how things were in his province, he grunted, when she tried to talk about their plans when they'd used to take the same vehicle to their provinces, he grunted, when she tried to stand watch with him those first few times during the Occupation, he'd say she could do it if she wanted to so badly, then go to sleep. He'd walked away from their first New Year's dinner as a family, for goodness' sake! Every time she tried to bring him food, see if he was okay, ask if his back was acting up, or if he was feeling alright, she was just met with insults or a brick wall. The last time she'd ever asked how his day was was in 1947, and she hadn't even gotten a 'Shit.' He'd just shot her a glare like she'd insulted their shared ancestors three lines back.

He wanted her to keep trying to reach out so he could keep shoving her away, because he liked hurting her. And she was expected to keep trying with a smile on her face just because she was a woman, and because they were siblings.

Well, if he wanted to keep making fun of her whenever she did 'women's tasks,' then she wasn't going to. And it wasn't like he cared about siblings anyways. Just look how he felt about Korea's. SH had been the one captured by him, SH had been the one taken hostage by America while he let it happen, and SH had been the one to have her mind invaded and body stolen by him, yet she didn't want him dead, she didn't want to hurt Korea by taking his brother away. But North Hamgyong did. He acted like it was a personal slight against him, like he was the one who'd gone through it, like he was the one who suffered, just like back-

SH hurriedly painted a burning cage on a hill, flames leaping through the bars, before the thing behind the wall could start to scratch.

A thought leaked through like smoke, one she'd been trying to keep back there.

'Why was it Kangwon's brother that was taken?'

She ducked her head, painting the words away.

She didn't mean it. She loved North Hamgyong, really. But he couldn't be Commanded, he could take torture better, and Gangwon had been a nurse. Almost anyone could work on a railway, but they needed medics right now. And Kangwon felt guilty over his brother being taken. SH wouldn't, since it wouldn't be her fault. Korea couldn't berate her for it, and North Hamgyong couldn't be a jerk to Kangwon or her.

She would feel bad if he got taken, of course. She'd feel awful, unlike him.

'I know North Hamgyong missed you.'

Her fists balled into knots.

'He didn't, actually,' she had answered, that ugly circular scar twinging. But that was a lie.

She knew her feelings about him shooting her were tied up in a maedeup knot. She had wanted him to. She really had. She had wanted him to stop the pain the Commands were making her inflict on the comrades trying to restrain her, to strangle the words coming from her mouth that she never would have willingly spoken in a million years.

And he had promised he would. So many years ago, he had promised. She hadn't wanted him to fulfill it the way they'd meant back then, but she had wanted him to do it.

She just wished he hadn't.

'I wish I hadn't-'

The paint brush swished and cut like a sword as she set off with her shoulders back. She had work to do.

Part of her wanted to just head back to the theatre to paint away some of her languor and try to feel right again, but she knew she couldn't. Korea had entrusted art and information work to her, and hanging posters was part of both. She wasn't going to let North Hamgyong get in the way of that.

'I'm not going to let the people who took those things away from me take that, too.'

Her stomach swirling, SH set off for the Pothong River.

At least it was overcast today. That tended to keep the enemy bombers away, from the capital at least. Either the weather was better on the coasts, or the hideous Yankee ships were being extra active to make up for it, blasting away knowing they would hit their targets, with no risk of crashing or being shot down. They'd been hitting the east coast hard, especially the frontline in Kangwon's province and the rail lines farther north. And her. She could feel her heartbeat throbbing in the new patches of raw skin, making the dark thing stir.

It had been quiet since two days ago, stuck silently pacing behind the wall, turning in circles as she tried to use the operational pause to paint distance between them.

But she knew no matter how many layers she put, it wouldn't be enough. Not when one blow was enough to crack the concrete and sends paint chips flying, ruining all her hard work.

She really didn't want to see North Hamgyong today.

She got lucky at the Pothong River bridge. It was in good condition, several workers having a late lunch around an open-air kitchen while a political worker walked the tracks with a few others, animatedly discussing the Party's platform while he instilled revolutionary ideology in them. She spoke with them for awhile, reminded everyone to work hard, and pinned her poster up on a board along the tracks.

And most importantly, she didn't see a single hint of green skin or gloomy glower around.

The men tried to convince her to eat with them, offering up spring namul they'd harvested from the plot of land the railway employees had been given, but she politely turned them down.

She didn't exactly have a problem with how men were put in good spirits by having a pretty face around, or how it made them work harder. She knew it wasn't malicious, and it honestly probably wasn't even conscious half of the time. And she was a province. It was part of her job to motivate her people, to give them hope and urge them to work harder.

But she didn't feel very… provincial today. Her skin felt tight, and so did her insides. She just wanted to hang her last poster, then go back to the theatre, to work on her sewing and paint.

Unfortunately, she didn't get lucky at the Taedong crossing.

As soon as she saw the pine-green form standing in the river, broad back flexing as he hammered something in the water into place, the tightness in her chest and stomach crept into her muscles, the way it always did now when she saw his face first thing in the morning, and when they met at the GAZ at night.

She took a deep breath. She could do this. She wouldn't ignore him in front of others, because that was immature, and she wasn't him. But she would keep any conversation formal and short.

"Put your backs into it!" North Hamgyong bellowed, his voice grating on her 'ears' as it echoed over the river. "We get this stretch checked over by nightfall. We won't have rotten wood getting our locomotives before the Yanks do!"

The men answered with an "Ura!"

He could at least try to sound encouraging, instead of like the next train was going to make it ten metres off the submerged track before it was hit by an enemy air strike.

One of the men working with him spotted her first. He stood up, wiping sweat from his brow. His expression was tired, but when his eyes landed on her, he lit up.

"Comrade SH!" he called, and the other men in the river quickly stood, waving as they spotted her.

"Hello, comrades!" she called pleasantly, not making eye contact with her brother.

Still, she could see how his face went from grim to grimmer as he turned.

She could see that look in his white eyes, the same one he always had when he looked at her now, saying what he had wanted to before, what he still wanted to now.

'I wish I hadn't-'

The dark thing tapped its talons, and she painted bubbling water over it, like something was being held under it. She wasn't going to give North Hamgyong the satisfaction of making it use its voice again. She could do this without hearing it growl.

"I just came by to hang a poster," she called, holding it up. It was the one of the man hammering the tie. "Would one of you comrades like to show me a good place to put it?"

She turned her gaze to one of the closest men, smiling. "How about you?"

His eyes widened, and he excitedly started out of the water, before someone grabbed his shoulder, yanking him back.

"I'll do it," North Hamgyong growled irritably. Which was pretty much the only way he knew how to sound. "Stop gawking and get back to work!" he shouted.

SH kept her smile fixed on her face as he slogged through the water, then up the bank. He snatched his shirt up from where it was tossed with the others.

"I can find a place on my own," she said in the same tone she would have used for a People's Committee secretary she'd never met before.

He pulled his sleeveless undershirt on over his head, covering up the bloody bandages and patches of uncovered burns. "So you were just being petty," he grunted.

"I was looking for the chance to see how one of our comrades is feeling, since I know you won't have," she answered in the same polite tone. "Not everything is about you."

Even though he always acted like it was.

"Hang it at the rail station," the male grunted, crossing his arms. "If you put it out here, it'll just get wrecked when it rains."

"This one is for the workers. It will do better here."

"And it will get ruined here," he growled, like she was being dense, when really she had been doing this for years now.

"Which is why I need a good spot for it," she said 'patiently.' "To make sure it's as protected as possible. It is also laminated."

“Why the fuck are you talking like that?”

“If you can’t help, then I’ll ask someone else.” She turned back to the river, opening her mouth, and he snatched the poster from her.

“Even children know how to ask for things,” SH said, fighting to keep her tone neutral.

North Hamgyong ignored her, looking down at the poster with a curled lip. “You think we look like this when we work?” he demanded, thrusting the smiling man at her.

It wasn’t like she hadn’t posted a dozen of these around the rail lines already or anything.

Painting, painting. ‘He’s just trying to pick a fight.’

“It’s how you should feel,” SH pointed out. “Railway workers are some of the most important. ‘Railways are like the circulation of blood in the body.’”

She should have brought the other poster. But he’d just find something to nitpick there, too. ‘You think we smile like this when we fix a track so a train can go through? We know it’s going to get bombed before it reaches the front, we know we can’t-‘

Deep breath. She didn’t need to invent things to get mad at when he was already trying hard enough.

“And our comrades smiled when I showed up.” She looked over his shoulder, waving, and the men still watching her as they worked waved back, grinning.

Maybe she was being a little petty. But he was always going on about her treating Korea one way and him another. So why was he free to be as unpleasant to her as he wanted, but she couldn't return it with even a little pettiness?

“Maybe if you smiled a little more while you worked, they would, too,” she said, watching his eyes darken.

“Fuck you,” he growled.

“Charming.” She plucked her poster out of his ragged hands. “I’ll go find someplace to put this now.”

He grabbed for it again, but she stepped out of reach, walking away.

He followed, barging past her. “Put it up at the dug-outs. It’s what we have a damn board for.”

And if it rained, someone could bring it in.

SH kept pace with him, but didn’t speak.

“I don’t see what the point is,” he grumbled. “If the damp doesn’t get it, the bombs will.”

“And then I’ll make another,” SH answered.

“And it will get fucked, too.”

“And then the war will be over, and our rail lines won’t be being destroyed every day.”

He curled his lip. “You still think that’s ever going to fucking happen?”

SH’s tongue itched to answer, but she held it. She was too burning, uncomfortable, and tired for this. She’d been tired of it for awhile now.

“You heard what Korea said this morning,” he said, trying again. “The Yank asked for an extension. You know why?”

SH did. But she kept quiet, reaching the post hammered into the ground outside the mounds of the dug-outs. They were empty right now, which meant North Hamgyong could keep trying to get her to bite back as she prepared to nail the poster in place.

“Because he’s doing the same exact thing he’ll have been doing for a year soon,” he continued. “Fucking stalling while he keeps bombing the shit out of us. He's pounding us both right now. I know you fucking feel that.”

She almost couldn't. The patches of skin that had still been surface burns had spread deeper now, eating into her nerves. Only the shallow ones on her face and hands still hurt.

But they did hurt.

"He's going to keep doing that," North Hamgyong growled. "He's going to keep doing it until there's nothing fucking left of us."

Using a rock with good grip and some thin nails from her pocket, SH set to work hammering them into the slightly singed board, using the holes where others nails had been. She made sure to position the poster directly under the small triangular roof, so it would be safe. It faced a few of the dug-outs and the city ruins, which meant any fog or wind off the river wouldn't degrade the lamination as quickly. She painted a nice fog bank rolling in, swallowing them all, but leaving her poster untouched.

"While we all keep starving and dying of his fucking diseases," the person behind her said, still trying to get a response. "How much more of this do you think we can take?"

'A thousand years,' SH didn't say. If he didn't believe it from Korea, he wouldn't believe it from her. And there was no one else here to hear. If he wanted to drown himself in pessimism, that was his choice, so long as he drowned alone. He just wanted to drag her down like always. And she was better than that.

"How many more years do you think our cousins down south can take?" he demanded. "What do you think the miguk-nom is doing to them right now? You think South Chungcheong's just sitting there accepting being ordered around, even with the Commands? You think Gangwon's going to get off just fucking fine for choosing us? Do you think your favourite fucking violet bastard wouldn't try some shit and get his head kicked in?"

Part of SH wanted to snap 'Don't act like you care when you don't even care Gangwon got taken.'

Instead, she finished tapping the last nail in, getting the head as flush to the worn wood as she could get it, then turned to face him.

“I think you should apologize to Kangwon,” she said calmly, her fingers holding the hem of her tunic. “You should be the one to go get our blood results tonight, and when you do, you should say you’re really sorry for saying Gangwon being taken was his fault, and that it isn’t. And then you should say you’re sorry it happened at all.”

“Why should I?” he demanded without even hesitating for a second. “It is his fault. You heard him say it.”

The dark thing sat up, but still didn’t growl. SH didn’t even get angry. Her fingers clenched in her hem, then released, and she nodded.

“Alright,” she said, and turned to walk away.

She’d probably paint for a bit first, try to touch up her more ‘disturbing’ pieces to be fit for civilian eyes, so the resources she’d used on them wouldn’t be wasted. Then if it was late enough, she would practice her steps for the end of month performance. Her feet hadn’t quite relearned how to dance with three toes missing.

“The fuck do you mean ‘alright?’” The man stormed after her. “What’s fucking wrong with you today?”

SH didn’t respond, already practicing her brushstrokes on the walk, trying to figure out how to turn intestines into something more artistic. Streams of pink flowers maybe? ‘Our homeland can’t bloom without driving out the invaders?’ Maybe that was too abstract.

“Is your head screwed on?”

She was trying not to entertain thoughts of *un*screwing his.

No. She didn’t want to hurt him. She didn’t want to maim him. He wanted to hurt her, he wanted to maim her, to gouge at her until she was as miserable as him. He always had.

Fish eyes popping in her mouth, sweet and gelatinous, tipping her head back to catch the last one he tossed, all of them for her.

‘Not always.’

She shook her head. Who cared about that? It was so far away from how he was now that it might as well have been someone else. And didn't the other stuff just make it worse? He wasn't formed this way- he'd became it. And it was because he had wanted to. Everything she had gone through, and she had still chosen to come out smiling, to come out kind. And so had Zhao Jingjing. So had the Jeollas. So had Jin-suk and Oh Mi-ae and so many other women.

What right did he have to be like this when it was her that had every reason to?

She painted the memory away, giving it to the dark thing to feed on, along with all the others.

He followed her even once she left the rail line, heading into the city center at a brisk but reasonable pace, still trying to hurt her even when she was mustering all her willpower to get away peacefully. Because of course he did. Men didn't know how to take 'no' for an answer or leave a woman alone.

"Why should I apologize?" he demanded. "I'm not the reason Gangwon's probably getting tortured right now."

He just wanted an excuse to say it, the thing that had been hanging between them ever since that day he'd came to find her cleaning the bunker. He wanted to say it, he wanted to ruin them. She didn't have to give any man what he wanted anymore.

Finally, SH stopped in an alley, turning to him. She could feel the anger in her chest, but she kept her words even.

"You should apologize because you care," she said, smiling. "Or at least Kangwon seems to think you do, for some reason. But it's okay. You don't have to apologize. I know you don't."

He could read her face as well as she could read his. She knew he had seen the ultimatum in her eyes when she'd told him to. And she had seen him refuse to even think once about answering.

His features twisted at her words. "I'm not apologizing because it's not my fault," he snapped. "Kangwon said I was fucking right. And I bet you haven't told Korea to apologize."

"This isn't about Korea," SH said, blood pounding in her temples. "This is about you, and how you don't care about us."

He wouldn't even say it now. Instead his brow furrowed like a dog's as he bared his teeth at her.

"Because you care so fucking much about me."

If she didn't, why would she have waited forty-two years before giving up on him?

SH wanted to stifle the cry, to not give him the satisfaction of knowing she did when he didn't, but it still burst out.

"Of course I care about you! That's why I ask how you're feeling, it's why I ask how your day was or if you ate or what work you got done! You're my brother, North Hamgyong. I- love you!"

Maybe some small part of her had still thought that speaking the words they never had even back when they'd eaten fish together in moldy sheds would break him, that Hwang and Kangwon were right, and his callousness really was a mask, and it would shatter and he'd apologize to her and tell the truth.

But of course he didn't. Somehow the words just seemed to twist him further, his lips peeling back as his eyes narrowed.

"You still can't tell the fucking-"

It hit them both at the same time. Whatever hurtful thing North Hamgyong was going to say cut off as his teeth snapped down, his eyes slamming shut. SH gasped, fire rippling along her skin as her body burned. It wasn't just a brief strike, the kind she ignored every day. She could feel blisters rising in already charred flesh, popping and bursting as they rose. The burn over her chest spread, the edges pressing against the bandage wrapped tightly around them. It felt like the wound was fighting to squeeze under, pain building and building until it burst, washing her body in a flood of agony as it crawled across her body.

SH staggered, her back hitting the wall behind her. She could feel her skin tearing as she slid down the weathered clapboard, nothing compared to the feeling engulfing her front. She buried her face in her knees, gritting her teeth as she tried not to grab at the wound spreading across her skin, widening until it met one wrapping around her arm, meeting at a spot several inches over her heart.

The pain didn't end, it kept going, only numbing once it ate deep enough, and she got used to it.

Once she'd mastered it, she sat, panting, her fingers cupping her left shoulder, wanting to squeeze to try and stifle the feeling, but knowing it would just make it worse.

North Hamgyong had his head down like a bull, breathing heavily. With his sleeveless shirt, she could see that the last bit of green had disappeared from his ribs, charred black and crimson reaching out from under the blood-soaked bandages.

"The… The rail line between our provinces," SH managed to gasp, waves of pain still flowing through her as their border was bombarded.

"No… shit," her brother gritted back, hands balled tight at his sides.

SH pressed her face to her knees, the burns on her cheeks making the dressings over them damp, trying to steady herself.

It had to be a naval bombardment. Even wings of bombers took time to do their next pass. But this was constant, barely letting up.

Her brother didn't either. The second it got more bearable, he demanded, "And you still think we can win this? They can do that to us whenever they want. They will be able to do that to us whenever they want, even if by some miracle the Yank signs a damned ceasefire. That's why he doesn't want us to build airfields, it's why he'll keep his damn blockade up. Even if an armistice is signed, even if the war ends, he can do that whenever he gets fucking bored."

He glowered down at her. ”We're screwed. Just fucking admit it.”

The dark thing finally broke its silence, a growl rumbling in its chest as rage rose in SH.

Of course. Instead of asking if she was okay or worrying about their people, he was striking when she was weak.

But it wasn’t like she’d expected him to. The first words he’d ever spoken to her when he’d woke up to find her caged had been ‘Why the fuck would you do this?’ And the second had been ‘Did those bastards already rape you?’ going straight to patriarchal possessiveness, because her purity was more important than her.

She had never had a chance to answer the first question. But it had stayed with her, the way he had said it, hurling it like an accusation, like it was her fault, until one day she finally made herself accept whose fault it really was.

So she hadn’t expected him to ask if she was okay now. You only asked if someone was okay if you cared.

And he didn’t. Not anymore.

—

North Hamgyong’s entire body burned, the ship cannons continuing to hit like a hammer on a fucking rail tie, every round destroying a rail line, a building, a train, his land, his people, him. The cool breeze didn’t stop sweat from sheeting down his forehead, stinging the wounds even more. His head was pounding, already screwed up by the fever, and now feeling like a steam engine firebox burning at full-tilt while some idiot shovelled more damn coal into it.

He was sweaty and pissed and burning, and now on top of that, his aching back let out a twinge. Because wasn’t that always the way it was? It could never just be one shit thing, it had to be twenty. They could never just sign over all their shit to Japan, they had to be signed over. They could never just be Divided, they had to be in a civil war, and then they had to be in a real fucking war against half the damn world. And they could never just be poor and starving. His sister had to sell them into slavery.

South Hamgyong sat at his feet, twitching as their connecting line was cut in another fifty fucking places more.

"We're screwed," he growled, daring her to challenge it the way she always fucking did. "Just fucking admit it."

He wanted her to admit more than that, admit how she actually felt about him, even though he knew she never would, and if she did, that would be fucking it.

He expected her to glower at him, get pissed and defiant, work herself back up into high spirits to spite him, like she usually fucking did.

Instead she looked up at him with the same aching exhaustion that'd been in her eyes since the second she showed up today.

"What's wrong with you?"

Her voice wasn't cold or filled with the rage he'd finally got her to admit to. For some fucking reason, she sounded sad.

"What's wrong with you?" he retorted. "You have to know this isn't going anywhere."

SH shook her head, ignoring his bait again. "You didn't use to be like this. You were always a jerk, but you were never…"

"Never what?" he snapped, skin prickling.

"Cruel. You were never cruel." She tipped her head at him, hand still tented over where his bullet had hit. "What happened to you?"

'Cruel.' Was he cruel for having a reasonable damn expectation for how this war was going to end? Was he cruel for trying to make her get the fucking truth through her thick skull? Was he cruel for saying it was Kangwon's own damn fault he hadn't been able to protect his brother when Korea had said it too?

He would show her cruel.

"You should know," he growled. "It's your fault."

Hurt struck her face, and he made himself keep glaring as it morphed into something uglier, the thing she really felt.

"It is not my fault," she growled back, rising. "Do not blame me for how you turned out. I'm the one it happened to, I'm the one who was-!"

She cut herself off, taking a deep breath as her closed eyes flickered behind her burnt lids. When she exhaled, she opened them to pin him with a glare.

"I spent long enough blaming myself for everything that happened to us," she said firmly. "I won't be blamed for what you let yourself become. I'm the one who went through the worst of it, and I didn't let it change me."

She had. The South Hamgyong she was now would never have went to Japan, never have signed that stupid fucking contract. Not for him, not for anyone. She would have found another way, through blood and fire. She wouldn't have rotted in that cage for six damn years.

His sister had let it change her. She had just changed into something stronger, better.

"I wouldn't have 'become' this if it weren't for you!" he hissed, and her eyes flashed.

"Who's the one who got in that stupid fight?" SH angrily demanded. "Who's the one who got sick? Who left me alone and forced me to do whatever I had to in order to fix him?!"

"Who fucking signed me up for slave labour?" he shot back, his mouth barreling away from him like a train down tracks. "Who refused to leave no matter how many times I asked her to? Who fucking sold herself in the first place?!"

She bared her teeth. "I would never have signed that contract without a reason, and you are that reason!"

As if he didn't fucking know it.

"You should have let me die," North Hamgyong said coldly.

"Then it's a good thing I'm not you."

Hurt flashed through him as she turned on a heel, stalking away before turning back.

"And I want you to know the reason I didn't hit you for saying that is because Korea wouldn't want me to. And that is the only reason." She glared over her shoulder, ready to deliver another targeted missile.

"I know you think that if you make me as miserable as you, it will be like I never left that cage. But I did. Korea gave me the chance. He did what you couldn't. And you need to accept that, North Hamgyong."

'Don't say it don't say it don't fucking-'

But she was daring him to, demanding it, and there was no Korea or North Pyongan or Chinese province here to stop his locomotive mouth this time.

"I wish I hadn't missed."

Pain contorted her features at his words, far worse than the bombardment still shaking through both of them, and she quickly left. Her hands stayed clenched at her sides, but he knew she was crying.

North Hamgyong bared his teeth, then punched the alley wall. He kept punching until one of them broke.

—

1912

'SLAP.'

North Hamgyong flinched as something wet slapped against his shoulder, but he didn't turn around to defend himself, knowing damn well what had just hit him.

"Dinner is served," his sister laughed as she came around his side, holding the large grey mackerel in one hand. She had another in her other fist, grasping its slippery tail tight.

North Hamgyong would have been pissed his shirt smelled like fish now, if everything in Hungnam didn't already smell like fish.

So instead he just grunted, "You got some big ones," impressed.

South Hamgyong sat across the small fire he'd started on the dirt floor of the shed, balancing one of the fish on her knee as she handed the other to him.

"Did you see the look on that fisher's face when you took his hat?" his sister giggled, pulling out her little knife.

He snorted. "I thought he wasn't going to chase me, just gawk at me like a fucking idiot."

"Language," his sister scolded.

"I'm not saying 'darn,'" he grumbled.

"Then just say 'like an idiot.'" The girl slid her knife into the belly of the mackerel with some difficulty. "Did you have any trouble making it away?"

"No," he replied, eventually getting his own blade past the slippery fish skin. They seriously needed to find some way to sharpen their knives. "You?"

She shook her head, pulling guts onto the floor of the abandoned shed and piling them neatly.

He relaxed. His least favorite part of robbing idiot fisherman was the time spent waiting for his sister to return. He'd been sitting with his hands tucked into fists until that mackerel hit him.

Their mark this time had been one of the fishermen that sold their catch to the Jap companies to ship to Japan. North Hamgyong didn't care who they stole from, so long as it wasn't some bastard just trying to feed his family, but his sister insisted they only take from those overfishing to sell their catch and the richer Japs, leaving the poor ones alone.

So what if they were poor? They were still stealing Korean fish. But he didn't care enough to argue with his sister and upset her.

They finished prepping their mackerel, impaling the gutted corpses on sturdy sticks. South Hamgyong finished working hers through the cut she made around the fish's gills, then held it over the fire. It was dark now, so the smoke that leaked out of the slightly open shed door would go unnoticed from outside.

"I got that job," he informed her, remembering that he hadn't yet.

She brightened. "Really? Did the practice interview help?"

"Yeah," he grunted, holding the fish deeper in the flames. "I start tomorrow."

If it weren't for his sister's mock interview, he would have answered 'What makes hiring you worth the risk?' with something like 'I don't even want you to fucking hire me.' But instead he'd been prepared with, 'Provincehumans have better endurance and stamina than regular humans. I can do the twice the work for half the pay.'

Which was bullcrap. Besides being unkillable by regular means, he wasn't any physically different than your typical starving fifteen-year old street urchin. But the second part was true.

Half a yen per hour. They'd be lucky if they could afford thread on that. And they'd be f- screwed if they got sick or injured or caught for stealing food.

"Don't glower," South Hamgyong chided. "It's something."

He huffed.

“I was thinking about setting up near the docks,” she told him, plucking the warm eyeball from her fish to pop in her mouth. “I can mend shirts for the fishermen. I still have some thread left from the merchant,” she added before he could complain.

He *‘tch’*ed. “I don’t want you spending all day by the docks.”

There were too many Japs, going out to sea and coming in. Hungnam wasn’t as busy as Wonsan or someplace farther south, like Busan. But it still received too many visitors from their bastard of a neighbour.

“Well, I have to do something,” his sister sighed, turning her fish. “Unless I go back to shining shoes-“

“No,” he quickly cut her off.

He hasn’t liked the idea of her doing that in the first place. Sure it didn’t require skill, and all she needed was a cloth to do it. But the kinds of bastards that got their shoes shined were rich men, the type that thought they could buy anything they want, and if that didn’t work, they could just take it.

He hadn't been able to contain himself when he’d come to pick her up that one day and seen her kneeling on the dusty street, polishing that Jap’s shoes. The bastard had such a disgusting look in his eyes that North Hamgyong had smashed his head off the wall.

Which was why they didn’t live in Chongjin anymore.

As South Hamgyong’s brother, it was his responsibility to protect her from ass- jerks like that.

“Set up by the warehouse,” he told her. That way he could keep an eye on her while hauling goods, carrying boxes and other useless crap.

Loading ships might have paid more, but he wasn’t going to have a hand in the endless stream of resources leaving their country for Japan. Nothing ever came in. He'd end up killing someone if he had to do that.

“Yes, sir,” South Hamgyong said sarcastically, removing her fish from the fire.

His was done, too. They switched, him taking the one she’d made for him, and her taking the one he’d cooked for her.

“Keonbae,” South Hamgyong toasted, smiling as she reached over to tap her grilled fish against his.

He snorted. “Keonbae,” he returned, already ripping into the mackerel, making sure to save the eyes for her.

It was soft and flaky. They didn’t have any seasonings, but they never did, so they couldn’t tell anything was missing. The Southern Hamgyong juggled her fish from hand to hand, while the Northern dealt with the burning. His hands were already deadened from manual labour.

As they ate, South Hamgyong started to chatter on about how one day they would have better food, and a house, and real jobs. She’d be a famous seamstress, and he'd be a renowned mechanic.

Usually he hated when she did that, made up crap that would never happen. They’d never make enough with him on half a yen an hour, and her on the crap sum she made by poorly mending shirts. The only ones who made enough in Korea were the bastards who didn’t deserve to.

And being famous or renowned would get them killed by Japan. Or worse.

But right now, with the fresh fish, warm fire, and his sister’s excited voice, he could tolerate her fantasies. He could even pretend to believe them.

She smiled at him, pulling a thin bone from her teeth.

That was why he kept going. Why he took the underpaying jobs and dealt with the abuse from slave-driving managers. For her smile.

It was hard for him to smile, when so much was crap. But he tightened the corner of his lips in return, and she went back to talking about the dresses in the dirty catalogue she held onto like it was made of f- darn gold.

It was his job to keep her smiling, to protect her from the perverted men, bloodthirsty Japs, and greedy factory owners. It had been since he'd been poked awake in that back alley, her crouching over him, that dirty white sheet wrapped around her like a fancy dress.

'You should be more careful when you walk home, oppa,' she'd said, smiling as he shot up and away from her. 'I was following you for three streets.'

He'd known there were other Provincehumans, but he'd never thought to look for them. And he hadn't expected the other Hamgyong to be a girl.

She was. She was his sister. And he had to protect her.

They finished their mackerel, then banked the fire until it was only smoldering coals. South Hamgyong curled up on her dirty sheet, demoted to a bed now that North Hamgyong had mugged a man for his clothes to give to her. He sprawled out on his burlap sack, rough and coarse.

"Goodnight, oppa," his sister said, smiling tiredly. "See you in the morning."

"'Night," he grunted back.

He waited until she had drifted off to sleep, breathing deep and even, to close his own eyes.

Screw Japan and screw underpaying jobs.

But things weren't crap all the time.

—

1952

SH didn’t cry. She didn’t sob or wail after the person who was supposed to be her brother confirmed what she’d know all along, even before he almost slipped up that first time. She had known, after all, even if she’d tried to convince herself she didn’t.

She just wiped her tears and went back to painting, sitting herself in a private room in the Moranbong Theatre and throwing herself into a canvas, not stopping even when Liaotung came to tell her they were all heading back to base. She stayed long into the night, only stopping to relight her lamp after the electricity was cut.

It still wasn't enough on its own to soothe the dark thing now that it had opened its slitted eyes again. Every stroke of colour had to be mirrored on the wall, the scar over her heart burning under the carpet of burns like a brand.

South Hamgyong did know why her brother was like this, actually. Because he had failed. Kangwon was right about him, at least. She could never work things out with him when he was so tangled in his own personal problems. And he had chosen those problems, he had chosen to be like this. He had chosen to wallow, and he wanted her to join him again. She knew she was right about that.

Well she hadn’t. And she wouldn’t, because she had chosen to spread her wings and fly free. It wasn’t her problem if he refused to do the same, and she didn’t have any responsibility to pull him out of the muck when he wasn’t trying to help himself, only pull her under.

He had taken her past away. She wasn’t letting him take her future with it.

The answer to who is in the right and who is in the wrong with these two is ‘yes.’

I just know if this book was as big as a real one, there would be people picking sides against one of them (mostly SH because she’s a woman and so not allowed to be anything but sweet and perfect). So I’m very glad that all my readers aren’t like that (to my knowledge). My SH lovers like North Hamgyong, and my number North Hamgyong lover (you know who you are) also loves his sister. And I am chewing on both of them. Mmmm, bitter.

Also jumeokbap are called jwegibap in the DPRK, but that's a Munhwaeo thing, which wasn't enacted until the 60s, so I'm fairly certain using jumeokbap here is correct. Just so we know.

Born To Leave

The General knew what North was planning almost the second he slunk into the office immediately after returning to Pyongyang. After his Countryhuman told him the details, he stared at him, long and somber.

"Is there anything I can do to stop you?" he asked eventually, sounding like he knew the answer.

"Order me not to go," North responded flatly.

"Besides the one thing I won't do."

North didn't answer.

The man shook his head. "I can't approve of this."

"Our people would."

The General looked up at him. "I think my country knows that isn't true this time. They would have cheered on your efforts to rescue our provinces from the enemy's grip. But this isn't that. None of them want to see our Countryhuman risk himself for gestures, even ones for them."

North's fists squeezed, but he held his tongue.

He was right. This was a gesture. But he had to do something.

"Order me not to go," he repeated.

Kim Il-sung sighed, rubbing his hand across his face. "Sometimes I think you enjoy putting me in difficult positions, comrade."

North's eye flicked away.

"Some of our comrades are worried about you," his General said eventually, folding his hands on the table again. "They worry you're growing more reckless."

'South Hamgyong.' It had to be. She was the one that had nagged him most for Chorweon and Seoul.

"I wasn't reckless to begin with," North clipped.

Kim Il-sung looked up at him with his dark eyes. "You do know that we will win this war, comrade."

"Yes," his country responded. "But I need to do this now. I need to do-"

His grip on his military brace tightened, feeling phantom hands brush over his face.

"I need to make sure her faith in her country doesn't go unrewarded."

The General closed his eyes. "And how am I supposed to convince our country not to go when he says something like that?"

"Order me not to."

North didn't know if he wanted him to or not, even when he knew it would be the only thing that could stop him from taking this incredibly stupid action.

But if he hadn't wanted to go, he wouldn't have been Korea. And if Kim Il-sung had ordered him to stay, he wouldn't be the General.

"No," he said, shaking his head at himself as he did. "Comrade Kim Tu-bong and I have agreed that we will never order our country to do anything. Our country commands us."

He gave that country a helpless look, knowing what that meant.

"Then I'm going," North said, relieved after all.

"You are," the Premier sighed. "Against both of our better judgements."

North didn't take the decision back. "Don't tell the provinces you know where I went."

After the man had given Kangwon and Gangwon permission to leave, SH, Chagang, Hwang, and North Pyongan had told him he should convince him to take on the authority to command the Provincehumans at least. He had managed to make North Pyongan back down, but the others had been less convinced. They were dissatisfied with their Premier's decision, and while they hadn't shown any resentment, North wanted to keep it that way.

The General shook his head firmly. "I won't let our provinces be consumed with worry for you."

"They will be anyway."

"Better the worry of whether or not a mission will succeed than the worry of uncertainty." The man tipped his head. "I might remind my country of recent events. Or when the South was taken from our borders."

The furious panic that had crackled through every inch of North's body until he knew his brother was alive and back in Korea, and so was his province, was a feeling he could easily summon again. He still felt it for his southern ones after all.

"Our comrades worry just as much about your safety as you do theirs," the Premier said gently.

That was impossible, but North still said, "Fine. Then don't tell them until tomorrow. And make sure they don't follow me."

They should all be smart enough not to. But then again, he'd thought Kangwon and Gangwon were smart enough not fly halfway across the globe to an enemy nation.

"Alright," his General conceded, then stood before he could walk away. "Comrade. Our provinces and our people all care deeply for our country, just as much as I do. And for our Countryhuman. We don't want to see him suffer for wanting to serve his people."

"I won't get caught." He knew their land better than anyone.

“I have faith in my country’s skills.” The General’s gaze was sober. “I also have faith in his compassion and love for our nation. In these circumstances, those worry me more.”

North’s shoulders hunched slightly, avoiding his face. “I am only going for her. I won’t do anything to jeopardize the armistice or our country.”

The edges of his comrade's eyes dipped. “Don’t do anything to jeopardize yourself.”

North met his gaze again. “I won’t do anything to jeopardize Korea.”

The man exhaled, but knew that was a much as he could get. “Let this be the last time, comrade. Not the last time without notifying me beforehand, like before. Not the last time you do this for only a gesture. The last time.”

He came around the desk, resting a hand on his shoulder.

“This isn’t an order,” he said seriously. “This is a plea. We don’t want to lose our country, and we don’t want to lose you.”

North’s eye skittered away from the sincerity he saw in the depths of his black eyes.

It wasn’t like he did these things to worry him, or his provinces. But when they were trapped in America’s prison, or when they were hunting and being hunted across Paektusan by someone that could actually kill them, or O-geun was lying in front of him, small and bloody, or when the Chinese were holding the line and it was their last chance to-

He had to do something. He owed it to them.

“…This will be the last time,” he muttered. “The war will be over soon anyway.”

And he would be one with South. And his brother had never been very good at leaving.

Kim Il-sung gave him a long look, then dipped his head. “May you come back safe.”

North left.

Since he was keeping all his provinces near the city still, he found South Pyongan easily, working in the dark in a barley field across the river. The fields around Pyongyang should be coming along slower, considering the best time of day- night- to sow was when the B-29s came, and being so close to the city risked them getting hit accidentally or ‘accidentally.’ But with all his provinces devoting their efforts to rousing peasants to work around the clock, and mobilizing soldiers personally, most of them were either tilled and planted by now, or even starting to show sprouts of green.

The sight just made him grow tense. He needed his provinces in their capitals, making sure the planting was done there, in the fields hidden in valleys or by towns bombed less often. The Pyongyang fields were struck too much. Even now he could see craters in the soft brown earth closer to the river.

South Pyongan was working on one of these with people, so he calmed himself as he approached.

“C’mon, comrades!” she called energetically as they filled in holes under the moonlight. “Put your backs into it! Whoever finishes first gets the exclusive honour of sitting on my back while I do push-ups!”

“Is that an honour?” one of the older women asked, bemused, then did a double-take as she realized one of the Democratic Youth League boys had started to swing his hoe with renewed vigour, rapidly filling in one of the bomb craters with a determined look.

“Highest honour the State can give,” South Pyongan assured her, glanced over her shoulder, then spun around. “Oh, hey Korea! Normal things happening here. How’s it going?”

He ignored her, raising his voice to the women and Youth League members that had paused to look at him. “Comrades! Your country is grateful for all your efforts. ‘The struggle for food is a struggle for victory at the front,' and I know if everyone in Korea is working as hard as you, then our victory is inevitable."

They cheered, throwing themselves back into their work, getting their eyes off him.

"Come," he ordered South Pyongan.

She hesitated, looking at her hoe. It made a little ember glow in his chest.

"You can finish later," he assured her, walking away.

She followed, until they were standing next to one of the Taedong's branches, next to the burnt remains of a farming hut.

"Before you get at me, I know we're not supposed to show off the bandages, but I was seriously chafing." South Pyongan gestured at her upper half. She was wearing a sleeveless undershirt without her tunic, but with the off-white fabric swathing her arms, it still looked like she had a real shirt on.

"That's not what I'm here for." North's eye lingered on the flag wrapped around her left bicep, then went to her face. "I know you have a smuggler."

His province lost her easy attitude, her diamond eyes shooting open. "What? Me? Smuggler? No. I don't even know what that is. I mean, obviously I know what a smuggler is, but I don't-"

"Then tell me where you got that tea South Hwanghae told me about."

He hadn't been able to escape her rib-crushing hug as she saw him for the first time in over two months and babbled about how sorry she was for 'making' Kangwon lie about her, and every single tiny thing that had happened while he was out.

He also maybe hadn't tried very hard.

South Pyongan *'tch'*ed. "Oo, that little snitch." She saw his look and said, "Okay, fine. I might, maybe know a guy. But Korea I swear he's not stealing shit or extorting people or moving contraband, he buys his stuff from people and salvages and maybe he knows other guys from the south that steal Yankee crap and sneak it here, but I swear I said I said if he bought anything from our guys I'd twist him into kkwabaegi, and I'm not doing anything super illegal, I'm just signing his entry permits for cities and-"

"Enough," North shut her up.

The less he knew the better. And he already knew she was using the cut she made from it to buy goods from their peasants to distribute to war victims. Chagang had noticed something in her behaviour and investigated while he was unconscious.

Both of those things made him smug. But he kept his expression flat.

"Get in contact with him for me. Tomorrow."

South Pyongan looked intrigued at that. "Wait. So I'm not in trouble?"

"No."

She brightened. "In that case, I can definitely hook you up with Completely Reasonable Prices Kim."

North squinted critically, before his province's expression suddenly shifted, her lips pursing.

"Wait. Why?"

"I need him."

She narrowed her eyes. "For what?"

Irritated, he demanded, "Do you want to know, or do you want to get away with falsifying travel documents?"

"Okay, first-" She held up a finger. "I'm not falsifying them. I'm literally just giving him a signed paper that tells the guards he has permission to enter, which you've told us we can do. I'm not even getting People's Committees to sign his overnight papers if he wants to stay somewhere, that's all up to him. If my paper makes it easier, that's so not my fault. And second-"

She held up another finger, then pointed them at him. "SH is totally right whenever she says you not telling us what you're planning is shifty. It always ends in you doing something stupid."

"Do not talk to your country that way," he said coldly, and she smacked her fist into her palm.

"You are." She shook her head, a mix of disbelieving and impressed. "Seriously? Right after you freaked out on Kangwon for doing the exact same thing?"

North hid his grimace. "I'm not doing 'something stupid.' I am performing my duty as Korea's Countryhuman."

The twist to South Pyongan's lips faded. "Korea, are you-?"

"No," he clipped.

He wouldn't. He was just going for Choe Jong-ok. That was all.

His province stared at him, then shook her head again. "And you say I need to be responsible."

"This is me being responsible." It was. It was his responsibility to keep his promises to his people.

"Okay," she said skeptically. "I'm just saying, you're lucky I'm not the 'learn by example' type."

He really was.

"Will you contact the man or not?" he asked.

South Pyongan heaved a dramatic sigh. "Fine. But if you die and North Pyongan's right about the afterlife, you better float down to protect me from SH." She thought for a moment. "Or crawl up."

North grimaced. "He isn't right." More seriously, he asked, "Can we trust this merchant?"

South Pyongan's mouth worked as she thought. "Yeah," she said eventually. "He's a little money-hungry for sure, but he's a patriot. He never sold anyone out when the Yanks were crawling all over the place, and I didn't have to bargain too much to get him to slash his prices."

North nodded, handing her a scrap of paper from his pocket. "Then tell him to remain in the Kangwon area for the next few days. And on the 17th, give him this."

Even if he was trustworthy, it was better if no one knew where he was for as long as possible. And six days should be enough.

"And since I know you're going to read it-" He shot his province a glare as she innocently blinked. "Don't go to the location, and don't tell the others about it. It's too close to the front."

"But not too close for you?" South Pyongan boldly opened the paper up in front of him, squinting as she held it up to the moon. Her eyes widened.

"Uh, Korea? This isn't 'close' to the front. Last time I checked, it's past it."

North ignored her. "If it's too dangerous, or he doesn't think he can do it, he can wait at the secondary location."

North might have to carry his cargo even farther, but he wouldn't have the man getting hurt.

South Pyongan lowered the paper, staring at him. "Y'know you're the worst, right? Like seriously- the worst."

"Is that a yes?" he asked coldly.

"Ugh, fine." She shoved the paper into a pouch on her pants belt. "But you know I've gotta tell my brother about this."

"Which is why you will be working the fields until at least midnight." North turned on a heel, then was dragged back by his sleeve.

He glared at South Pyongan. Her jaw opened, shut, and she rubbed the back of her head.

“Come back safe, yeah?”

“I always do.”

Forty minutes later, North returned to the bunker with the others for the first time since he’d recovered from his illness, having to reassure North Pyongan that his sister was fine, she was just choosing to work late. Which clearly didn’t reassure him. Taking on extra work wasn’t exactly typical of South Pyongan.

No. North couldn't say that anymore. Her working with the merchant was taking on extra work. And she had been working hard while he was out, scavenging building supplies and helping build dug-outs.

But missing dinner was definitely unlike her and always would be. He could see the worry that lingered in North Pyongan’s eyes, no matter how much he said she was fine.

North knew he was thinking of the Kangwons. Even though they hadn’t been able to see him much with him in the hospital, Gangwon's absence and Kangwon's loss now hung over them as the others ate their rations. The non-war-related topics were less, and the jokes were quieter, especially without South Pyongan there.

North Hamgyong was also absent, having headed immediately into the bunker, telling Hae to take his rations, though North couldn’t allow that. SH’s more-forced-than-usual cheer and the way her eyes determinedly didn’t follow him told him all he needed to know.

“Korea?” she said hopefully, her hand on the spoon (only serving, North Pyongan had cooked).

He shook his head, and her lips pressed flat.

“You should eat.”

Between the dark look in her eyes and the desperate edge in her voice, he decided that she needed him to listen tonight. And his rations would be going to other soldiers for the next few days anyway.

Wordlessly he got up, wrestling the spoon from her, taking a small portion of rice. SH looked disappointed at the size, but some of the tension went out of her shoulders.

"Oh, jiejie can move mountains," Liaotung noted. "I don't think I've seen gege eat before."

"Don't call me that," North muttered, Hae attaching to his side the second he sat. "And you have."

The turquoise woman crossed her arms, putting on a wise face. "I've seen Comrade Korea eat, not gege."

"Eat your food and don't be rude," Liaoxi scolded.

Both of the provinces looked just as flushed as his, the sympathetic fevers tinging their cheeks orange and purple, respectively, even with the cold reduced to a spring chill. North had been caught up in an awkward briefing by Kangwon on how severely the Americans had targeted their lands at the end of March.

Since he was here, North asked, "How is the germ warfare in your provinces?"

"Still not gone," Liaoxi said sadly. "But we're keeping on."

Liaotung nodded, swallowing a mouthful of rice. "They're really branching out on Jilin and Heilongjiang now. They had to slaughter an entire village's worth of animals up there."

North listened to the women brag about their cousin's people in Heilongjiang, who had woken up to a sudden infestation of voles after a plane had gone by, and put every single cat, dog, and rodent to death without needing to be told, then fire-cleansed every home. Their story matched Kangwon's entirely.

He'd been worried about America spreading the disease to China as well, where he couldn't oversee the efforts to stop it from spreading. It was slightly reassuring to know the Chinese were almost as diligent as his people when it came to hygiene.

As his provinces joined in with their own humble-bragging, someone whispered in his 'ear,' "I thought you weren't sleeping here?"

North swatted at the fly, and China leaned back.

"I'm not," he said. "I just came to make sure South Hamgyong did an acceptable job cleaning. Alone," he added, glaring at her.

"Everyone else was busy," she said, then pivoted. "You'll come to the May Day performance, right?"

"We'll see." He'd be back by then at least. Barring something going incredibly wrong.

"Trying to avoid talking to me all of a sudden?" China said on the other side of his head.

Another thing he hated about China- how observant he was.

"Oi." Hae pouted up at the Chinese country. "Ah'm the only one that gets to whisper to Korea."

North removed the hand she cupped over his ear slit. "That isn't even true."

His meager portion of rice finished, he stood up, Hae reluctantly sliding off his arm.

"Koreaaaaaa," she whined. "Don't go."

His teeth grit. "I need to bring North Hamgyong his rations."

"No need," SH said cheerfully from her log. "If he wants to starve, he can."

North shot her a Look. 'What is it this time?'

Her tight smile said, 'Nothing,' and her burning eyes said it was her brother, and worse than usual.

North narrowed his eye at her. 'Behave.'

Her gaze narrowed, a piercing flame as her hands tightened on her bowl. 'Not if he doesn't.'

Ssi-bal, they better both be alive when he got back.

—

North Hamgyong was an idiot. He knew that. He fucking knew it. He'd spent so many years in that cage keeping his damn mouth shut under the weight of everything bearing down on them, and now ever since it had lifted, the words just came spewing out with nothing to hold them back. He wasn't his sister, he wouldn't just pretend everything was okay now when it wasn't.

And how was he supposed to keep quiet when she looked at him like that, the way she'd been looking at him since she'd came back from that POW shithole, the same way she'd been looking at him for thirty-eight damn years?

Whatever. Now she never would again. He'd just cut the last fucking tie between them, and he'd known that when he was saying it.

And now he wasn't her brother anymore. Maybe he hadn't been since the moment he'd shot her in the shoulder instead of the heart, breaking their promise. The miguk-nom hadn't raped her, but if he had, it would have been North Hamgyong's fault for being weak, and South Hamgyong couldn't forgive him for that. That harpy couldn't forgive him for anything, and even though he didn't deserve it, if she thought Korea could forgive his brother for cutting out his eye, then she should be able to forgive him for being an idiot.

Maybe he hadn't been her brother for awhile now.

North Hamgyong slammed his broken fist into the wall again, pain splintering through the bones. It would fucking hurt to work tomorrow, but he'd do it anyways. He'd go to the military hospital when he got it bandaged so Kangwon couldn't nag him.

The door to the men's quarters opened, and he jerked his head up, snarling, "That had better not be-"

Ssi-bal.

Korea stepped in, flashlight in one hand, bowl in the other. North Hamgyong swiftly looked away, uncurling his legs so he was sitting properly on his bed.

"Your rations." His Countryhuman placed them on the edge of the cot, the single one at the back.

North Hamgyong looked away from them. "I don't want that shit."

"You work manual labour," Korea said, unimpressed. "You need the energy."

The province scoffed. "You're such a fucking hypocrite."

Just like his damn sister. It was probably why she liked him so much.

But no. He knew why she liked him. She'd told him to his shitty face.

'She likes him because he did what I fucking couldn't.'

Korea scowled. "If I ate tonight, you will."

"Unlike you, I don't have to do everything South Hamgyong tells me," he muttered.

Korea glared at him, finally lowering his damn flashlight so he wasn't blinding him, pointing it at the floor.

North Hamgyong's stomach cramped at the warm smell of rice, but he crossed his arms, hiding his injured hand. "Is she out there lying about me?"

"No."

His teeth gritted. Not even slandering him. He bet she'd never say his damn name ever again.

Good. He didn't want to hear it from her.

"Then what do you want?"

Korea stared at him, his thin face half-hidden in the shadows, somehow still without the stupid fucking burns the rest of them had.

"She followed me because I gave her hope," he said eventually.

North Hamgyong's biceps bulged as his arms tightened, hand twinging. He hadn't wanted to talk about this shit again.

"She followed you because you aren't me."

Three-fucking-hundred and forty-six damn times she'd turned him down. And it had only taken Korea once.

"I tried to make her leave," he growled. "I tried. I would have protected her, I would have-"

"How?" Korea asked. "You didn't even believe you could protect her."

He bared his teeth up at him. "I did."

He'd been her brother. It had been his fucking job. Just because he'd fucked up once-

"You didn't." Korea's voice was cold as damn steel. "How was she supposed to believe in you when you didn't believe in yourself? How was she supposed to have hope that you could save her when you didn't?" He drew himself up, looking down on him with his slitted eye. "I gave her the hope she needed, I gave her the chance to save herself, and the belief that she could. That is why she followed me."

'Korea gave me the chance.' Like they were fucking psychically connected.

For a damn commie materialist, he put a lot of stock in shit that didn't exist. 'Hope.' What was fucking hope? South Hamgyong had been trapped in a fucking cage, dressed up in Jap costumes and raped by foreign bastards and rich pigs almost fucking daily, and the reason she hadn't let him save her from it was because he didn't have something that didn't even fucking exist?

He wanted to hit Korea. He wanted to smash his fists into his steel until they both broke and he had to put him down. If he'd been so fucking useless that the only reason South Hamgyong had followed someone else instead of her own brother was because of a damn concept, then maybe she was right, and they really would be better off without him.

But he couldn't hit him. So instead he raised his head and asked, just as cold as him, "Then why didn't your brother follow you?"

He'd expected him to get mad, to snarl at him and leave him the fuck alone.

Instead, like South Hamgyong, he went quiet, raising his head, staring into the dark above his province for a long time.

"I don't know," he said eventually, his voice too fucking low.

North Hamgyong turned his head, teeth creaking. Ssi-bal. His fucking mouth again.

Then his country came back to earth, and pinned him to the bed with a glare. "But I do know that if he had followed me, we wouldn't be at each other's throats the entire damn time. What do you think Kangwon would do to have his brother back?" His jaw feathered. "What do you think I would do?"

North Hamgyong scowled. He shouldn't want his brother back. He was a shitty puppet traitor that had cut out his eye and could destroy their entire nation.

"You still have your sibling," Korea delivered with that damn finality of his. "Don't lose her when she's right next to you."

He spun around, leaving the room, taking the light with him, leaving North Hamgyong to beat his throbbing head into his sore knees.

Why should he not want to lose South Hamgyong? Why should he when she could believe he didn't give a damn about her or the others, and couldn't admit she didn't give a damn about him? Why should he not want to lose that accusing glare, blaming him for everything that had ever happened to her when she had been the one to make herself a fucking whore? When she would never forgive him for making her do it? When she'd never forgive him for anything? Why should he not want to lose her when he'd already lost her thirty-eight damn years ago? Why should he care when she'd said that to him, her voice tripping, not because it wasn't something sisters said to their brothers but because she didn't mean it? Why should he want her to mean it?

…He was no fucking better than Korea.

—

After all his provinces were asleep, except for Chagang on watch, North quietly unpacked his bag, putting only what he needed in it- ammunition, tooth paste, a good pine twig for brushing, extra socks, ammunition, and the uniform he'd change into once he got past the frontline. Something else slipped in, too, his hand not wanting to let go of it.

North Hamgyong's question tried to creep in, but he blocked it out. He had a mission to accomplish.

China always went to sleep first, so he only had to move quietly to get away from him, slinking out the door.

He glanced down the hall before he left.

'Ah hate when Korea leaves.'

This would be the last time. It would be. The war would be over soon. When they had peace, he wouldn't have to run off to save their people or them, and leave them worrying.

North left the bunker, replacing the lingering scent of disinfectants with the cool night breeze again. Chagang looked at him, tipping his head, but he'd already said he wasn't staying the night, so he didn't ask questions.

Squinting, he said, "Travel safe."

His voice was slightly strained. When he got back, he should see if SH could find more ginger and meowi, or if South Pyongan could get some from her merchant.

North nodded. "I'm visiting a village in South Hamgyong tomorrow, so I won't be at the meet-up point. Tell the others you can all deploy to your provinces again, but to be cautious."

The communique had been handed to him after he'd spoken with South Pyongan- Norway was sending soldiers to Korea. It was only a battalion, not enough to matter or change things. But it was a sign- Korea was an enemy.

That made it mutual. Even before he'd stolen his provinces, the Norwegians healing the men that raped and murdered his people was hardly any different than doing it themselves.

It was also the foreign country's revenge for getting Kangwon back, which meant North likely didn't have to be wary of anything more drastic, though he would stay on alert.

Chagang's gaze bored into him for a little too long, then he saluted at his order. "Yes, Korea."

North set off into the forest, emerging from the trees, moving swiftly as he followed the road their tires and boots had carved across the field after months of living here. The path always made his teeth ache.

He had made it to the other side of Pyongyang, heading for a supply depot to get a vehicle, before he stopped on the eastern highway, near where he had been when he sent North Pyongan off to Guk Island.

"If you're going to come, then stop skulking in the shadows," he called, not looking over his shoulder.

After a second, someone slunk out of the ditch, smiling under his mask.

"Want to tell me when you noticed?" China asked.

North hadn't. He had just figured he was there. If he hadn't came out, he would have called again before the depot. Then checked the underside of his vehicle very carefully.

"Does 'if you're going to come' mean I'm allowed to?" his comrade asked when he didn't answer.

"I'm going to the south," North said bluntly, turning to face him. "Farther than Seoul."

"Hmm, foreign sights unseen," China hummed. "And a chance to stretch my legs."

"It's too dangerous for you."

"Oh? Do you think you're not skilled enough to get there undetected?" China asked innocently. "Because I think I am."

North glowered. "If Gangwon can tell America that you're here, and he accuses you while you're down there, we won't even know. What are you suppose to do if they call another snap trial?"

"My comrades are experts at stalling," the man said flippantly.

The Korean heaved a sigh, turning away. "Fine. But keep up, don't talk, and no complaining."

"Oh? Giving in so easy?" China asked. "Have you gotten so tired of me you're planning on turning me in to the enemy once we're there?"

"If I don't let you come, you'll either go tell my provinces or stalk me across Korea anyway." And then North wouldn't be able to keep him- keep his eye on him.

China was at his side in a flash, padding down the highway. "This should be fun. Though I have to wonder if this is revenge on your helpful little doctor for his stunt, or if worrying people is just some sort of fetish of yours."

'Fun.' Risking himself getting captured and putting his entire country in danger. North could never understand him.

"I brought rations, by the way." China hefted his bag. "Since I couldn't help but notice that you were packing rather light."

North side-eyed him, and he smiled.

Ssi-bal. He had a feeling this six-day trip had just gotten a lot longer.

Today's fun fact is that April 1952 (this chapter) is thirty-eight years to the month since when North Hamgyong woke up from his coma to find out what SH had to do for him.

Also in real life, Norway only ever provided medical support to the United Nations forces. In this, he has been driven to provide one battalion. How brave of him.

Finally, the long-awaited paragraph(s) about why I believe the accusations of America using biological warfare during the war:

America bad.

Okay, serious now. Sources will be at the bottom. First, let's say the stories about Japanese Communists and North Korean POWs being used as test subjects in Japan, Geoje Island POWs being experimented on, and Ishii Shiro visiting Korea are all just rumours (despite there being evidence against that). The fact still stands that America did grant Ishii Shiro and other Unit 731 chiefs amnesty in exchange for their information on germ warfare (and other grisly things). It didn't come out until decades later, but is now a known fact that they flat out lied about that. They also lied about Japan not using germ warfare on China during WWII when scientists drew comparisons between what had happened then and what was happening in 1952. It's now known that we did use biological warfare and that the US covered it up. But anyway, let's also say the very suspicious circumstances of the smallpox/viral haemorrhagic fever outbreaks the year before were also just sheer coincidence (despite there being lots of questionable events there).

Second of all, let's not talk about the American pilots much. I wouldn't trust the word of a North Korean/Chinese POW in American hands, so I'll be fair and not trust the word of an American in North Korean/Chinese hands. The only thing I'll say is that there were no signs of torture; while they said they were threatened at the time, some have come forward in their old age to recant that and say they were actually treated well; they were at threat of being court martialled if they didn't repeal their testimony once home, which would have been disastrous for them and their family in that time; and most of them didn't repeal their testimony to the UN, though it was said their legitimacy would be solidified if they did. And later Al Jazeera (decidedly not pro-DPRK) tracked one down, and he said 'I didn't know. But they send it with you.' Also the people responsible for their debriefing when they returned home went on to be part of MKUltra. I am not saying they were brainwashed to repeal. I don't really believe in 'brainwashing' in that sense. It's just one of those 'everything is connected' moments.

So the meat. America started their biowarfare program in 1943. They experimented with germ warfare on their own people in 1950, three months after the war in Korea 'began.' They sprayed San Francisco with two types of bacteria, one causing urinary tract infections, and another that, while not a pathogen, can still cause respiratory illness. At least one person died. They carried out over two hundred of these 'tests' from 1949 to 1969. Also in 1950, pneumonia bacteria was sprayed over Panama City and Florida, and a cancer-causing chemical was sprayed over the Midwest. This isn't conspiracy stuff. It's 'even Wikipedia admits this' stuff. So it's not a matter of 'would they.' Not even counting future claims of other cases of germ warfare, if they did it to their own people, they would do it to the people they committed the Nogun-ri and Pyongyang massacres on.

So there's all the aberrant insect appearances that have been mentioned in previous chapters, appearing months too early, and some not having been spotted in Korea beforehand. If you want the full rundown, look at the ISC Commission report (it's very long, so if you're a busy person most of the bulk is in the first few hundred pages; but if you're not willing to read it, don't proclaim biowarfare wasn't used in Korea). There's also the appearances of plague without cases in between Korea and the closest endemic regions in Manchuria and Fukien, as well as blighted oak leaves appearing above the 38th Parallel, where that kind didn't grow. None of these things changed in the future. As in there were no new studies that said, 'actually these appeared here/then all along.' (though if things (global warming) continue, insects are going to keep appearing earlier and earlier). The anthrax studies were actually some of the first really publicly done studies, actually, discovering things that would later come to be scientific fact, so it wasn't like they were using information that was already out there. They did conduct these comprehensive studies. Also the US or affiliates have never even tried to launch some mass investigation in the modern day to prove that these diseases and vectors were present all along, which you would think they would do if they were so sure the DPRK and China were lying.

The 'proof' that has all come out against the allegations has been baseless. 'Soviet letters' discovered after the fall of the CCCP said it was all a ploy, but they were hand-copies, and the originals and their reference numbers were never provided. Very convenient that they just so happened to find the personal admittance to that evil scheme that no one else is allowed to see. A book in the name of a Chinese scientist who worked on the case came out after his death saying it was all a false alarm. But it came out after his death, and long after he could have moved to America and gotten rich off of that story. No one ever came forward and said he'd hinted it was all overblown before. Two men who have investigated the allegations for years said that if the previously mentioned items were true, it would go against a lot of other evidence, some of which came out publicly after these claims, like some intercepted cables the US released which contained information it wouldn't have made sense for that Chinese scientist not to know about. They actively showed that the PVA and KPA were being negatively impacted by the germ warfare, so it certainly wasn't a false alarm. And not every report was taken at face value. North Korean investigators reported internally several times that some claims were false when they went to investigate, so that shows that they weren't just trying to pump up outrage (and really, did Koreans need any more reason to be outraged at America? They were living in holes in the ground at this point.)

A couple authors claimed that they had confirmed that an anthrax sample had came from natural Chinese sources, not American, based on a genomic analysis. But they never published this analysis, and an investigator called their source's sources, none of whom actually backed up the claim, and the main one of which said he'd never even heard anything about the analysis. Other Soviet records seem to say the Soviets didn't know if the germ warfare was true, but that the Chinese and North Koreans (the people it was happening to) seemed to believe it was. And Stalin also seemed to believe. Intercepted messages from KPA and PVA soldiers show that they were utterly convinced biowarfare was being used on them. A staunch Hungarian anti-Communist who was in Korea at the time later confirmed he had seen flies in winter, long before they should appear.

No one really claims this, but in case you're thinking 'what if it was germ warfare, but they did it to themselves??' That would be incredibly stupid. Most of Korea's hospitals had been bombed, along with water stations, and medicine factories. They had lost hundreds of thousands of soldiers, and illness spreads most easily among army units with how packed together they are. China was also advancing very fast in the sanitation department, but still had a mostly feudal population. Infecting their own country would just tamper with the part of their supply line that wasn't being bombed. Also since they had livestock shortages, all the animal culling they had to do was not good for their food supply. This was also at a time when America was drawing out the ceasefire and trying to gain more land in the deal. If their line had weakened, they could have lost more territory. They did handle the outbreaks well because sanitation was very important to them as recently-feudal countries, but it wasn't a 'haha, if we release this, we can handle it easily!' situation. Putting aside any beliefs about morality, it would have been risking tactical suicide. I think the fact that America doesn't even claim this (explanations for the positive tests of bodies are usually 'uh, well, they must have infected them themselves after death.') is proof that it's not an option.

So I think at the very least, the outbreaks were real. The Soviet administration as a whole likely wasn't sure if it was really biowarfare, but were happy to say it was since it made America look worse than they already did. But many of them, and the North Koreans and Chinese did seem to believe it truly was germ warfare. Saying it was all some sort of master plot completely invented by them just worked to help the US paint their picture of the sly, slanty-eyed Asian hordes, brutish, but with enough wickedness to infiltrate good American minds and infect with them strange ideas (and if you think I'm exaggerating, look up American Korean War propaganda or WWII anti-Japanese propaganda. Yes, fuck Imperial Japan. But it wasn't the war crimes they were targeting. Even in the 'You poor folks are being used as puppets by your evil commie masters' leaflets, the Korean and Chinese are made to look animalistic.)

You could say, 'okay, with all the destruction of sanitation measures like you just said, doesn't it mean sickness could spread more easily?' Yes. But the way the sickness cropped up in those specific periods, many of the illnesses out of season or area, along with the vectors, with such sudden intensity, is definitely suspicious. The ISC Commission also interviewed dozens of witnesses in both Korea and China who were adamant they saw American planes dropping non-explosive bombs that released insects and other things. Korea was actually in worse straits hygienically the year before because of the aftermath of the tactical withdrawal, and they hadn't rebuilt any of their hospitals yet. Yet aside from the strange winter outbreaks, the spring illnesses weren't reported as out of the ordinary. This is despite the fact that the previous winter and spring had much more troop mobility with new PVA and KPA divisions coming in from China and leaving Korea. Also the same rash of illnesses were never reported in the South (there were outbreaks, but not in the same vein as these ones), even though they had far more foreign troops from different places occupying them. And while they were less destroyed than the North since their rear wasn't being bombed, they were still destroyed. They didn't have hygienic conditions either.

Some people say the Soviet Union vetoing the Red Cross investigation (later chapter) is proof that they didn't want their lie to be exposed. I have a full rant on this for later, but if you read the UN minutes, they weren't actually vetoing an investigation- they were vetoing a vote without North Korean and Chinese representatives present. They clearly stated this multiple times, along with the fact that it violated the UN Charter. The UN accuses them of having no proof for the charges, and the Soviets pretty much say 'Yeah, we don't. Because it's not our proof. That's why we need their representatives here.' The North Koreans and Chinese were never allowed to speak, but they did make it known that they didn't want the Red Cross to be the one investigating. This is also seen as proof that they're lying. Yet the Red Cross wasn't 'impartial' as the UN was claiming. They were literally part of the organization at war with them. They also had a history of glossing over Nazi concentration camps in WWII. Meanwhile the US admitted in a cable that they didn't want a real investigation because it could cause loss of morale by revealing other things they were doing (chemical warfare. They claimed they weren't doing chemical warfare, but surprise! They were. How fascinating) The International Scientific Commission and the International Association of Democratic Lawyers get accused of being Soviet puppets, but the fact stands that the IADL reported on atrocities in Korea that did later turn out to be true, and none of them ever came forward in the future to say they were bribed or lying. I've said before there is no such thing as being unbiased, and that's true. But I would trust a group of professionals from all over the world who personally investigated with no monetary gain (most of them were from capitalist countries where their work could have got them blacklisted) over the people who were actively bombing Korea. Professor Mori Masataka, who has spent much of his life studying the crimes of Unit 731, including biological warfare, has also visited the DPRK in the modern day to speak to survivors and witnesses, and study the proof they still have, and has also concluded that it was used against them.

Overall I think there's just too many coincidences. It could have been just natural outbreaks with the war bringing new diseases. But when you add the physical proof of the lab reports and autopsy results and collected specimens that shouldn't have been there, and the fact that none of the proof against it is actually verifiable, it really does make it seem like there's something else going on. At the very least, North Koreans and Chinese do wholeheartedly believe it was germ warfare. It has left a deep, deep scar on their psyche. If you've ever heard about how they don't like cold water in China, it's because with the fears of biowarfare, the Communist Party started a mass campaign to boil water before drinking it. That lingers in their culture, just like the war itself, while the US does everything it can to make its people and everyone else forget.

And in the end, that's the final nail of proof for me- the fact that the DPRK and China still remember and memorialize what was done to them, while America tries to erase it, even more than they do with Vietnam and Iraq. With them its distortion, justification, and lies. With Korea it's nothing. Chunks of meeting minutes from those years remain missing, files remain top secret, flight paths are never revealed. It's called the Forgotten War in America for a reason- you only want to forget when you still have something to hide.

In the end, even if it wasn't truly biological warfare, it was the US's fault. They started a war on false pretenses and refused to let it end even when the North Koreans and Chinese were more than willing. Every baby that starved because its mother couldn't get enough nutrients to produce milk, every child that died of exposure in the winter, and every person who died from illness, whether intentional or simply because they were living in caves with all their infrastructure laid waste to, is on them. The crimes that have been fully proven without a doubt are more than enough to indict.

ISC report- https://archive.org/details/ISC-Report-on-Bacterial-Warfare

The investigator who called the genomic analysis sources: https://valtinsblog.blogspot.com/2017/04/revealed-suppressed-report-on-1952-us.html?m=1#.WiwJuUqnGUm

Write up on the released intercepted messages with more sources at the bottom- https://kayej.substack.com/p/a-real-flood-of-bacteria-and-germs?utm_campaign=post-expanded-share&utm_medium=web&triedRedirect=true

Al Jazeera documentary- https://odysee.com/@swprs:3/Dirty-Little-Secrets-Korea-Biowarfare-AJ-2010:c?lid=

They do a little of the typical saber-rattling of 'North Korea is aggressive' (when really they were just responding to Trump), just so you're aware.

Al Jazeera documentary with the write up at the bottom, with the account of the man whose father was killed by typhoid I mentioned in another author's note:

https://www.aljazeera.com/video/people-power/2010/4/4/dirty-little-secrets

Soviet vetoes meeting minutes- https://undocs.org/en/S/PV.587 https://undocs.org/en/S/PV.590 (this one isn't so important, it's just the wrap up of 'aha, since you refuse an impartial investigation (without having the people who are lodging the accusations present to vote, and carried out by the people bombing those people) clearly you are a filthy liar! I am British, innit.') But there is the interesting second part of the UN dragging their heels on letting less-developed nations and Socialist nations into the UN, while proposing Japan joins just a few months later)

The gaslighting in these is genuinely insane. I know that word gets misused, but that is legitimately what it is. Please read the first one and join me in not understanding how Mr. Malik didn't just start killing people. I'm a fairly calm person, but I would be moved to extreme violence if I was him.

Thomas Powell's book The Secret Ugly: The Hidden History of Germ Warfare in Korea is supposed to be good (his parents were actually involved in breaking the story), but I can't find a link for a free version. ⛩⛩ Here's an interview with him: https://youtu.be/wQjHvQsALv0?si=RyFi-PLyNRo-EwWU

And another with Jeffrey Kaye:

https://youtu.be/vweZtDxeF7M?si=luaiIwybeaOOE5T6

Newspaper summary:

https://www.chinadailyhk.com/hk/article/271228

A little thing about Fort Detrick: https://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2019/09/15/cia-fort-detrick-stephen-kinzer-228109/

This is completely unrelated, but do you ever think about how the Black Lives Matter movement in America was so large that it spread across the world, causing unrest and demands that the US treat its minorities better, then suddenly covid hit, forcing people to stay inside and not gather together? And it was announced conveniently right before it hit that Fort Detrick was 'suspending' its deadly germ operations after breeches of safety protocols? And also there was an influx of lung-related illnesses in the area at the same time? And how when Biden said covid could be a Chinese bioweapon, China said, 'Okay, come check out our Wuhan lab and we can check out Fort Detrick.' And then he clammed up. And how there are apparently a few interesting e-mails involving American capitalists, covid, and Israel in the Epstein Files… Not necessarily saying this is true. Just one of those things nya…

Betting On Jade

1936

Hwang stared at the newspaper in his hands with abject shock. He'd snatched it when they had been in Gangneung out of pure habit, wanting, as always, to learn about what was transpiring in their country. Political maneuvers, projects, information from Japan, anything really, though today he'd been focused on seeing what had been said on the anniversary of their official annexation. It was usually all propagandistic chaff, but a kernel of truth could sometimes be found within.

But for once, what he saw had taken him completely by surprise.

He pulled his wire-framed glasses off and vigorously polished them, as if by doing so he could transform the image before him. But when he slipped them back on, it was still there.

It couldn't be. But...

The province darted a look over the top of the paper at Korea, who was putting his firearm back together on the other side of the clearing, cleaning it after their foray into civilization for supplies.

"What?" his country said, looking back.

"Nothing." Hwang hastily ducked back behind the news, examining the picture once more.

It certainly appeared like it.

"What's up, Hwang?" Sang asked, leaning over. "You look like you've seen a ghost."

"Ghosts aren't real," Korea said perfunctorily.

"It's nothing." Hwang turned the newspaper away from her. He couldn't jump to any conclusions. He needed to discuss this with Korea first.

A cousin of his had other ideas.

"What are you hiding?" South Pyongan came from his other side, snatching the paper from his gasp. As soon as she saw what was on it, her jaw fell open. "What the hell is this?!"

Hwang winced as Korea demanded, "What?"

When the girl shoved the paper at him, his white flag paled even further. Hwang knew what he was seeing there.

Taking up almost the entire front page of the Keijo Nippo was a black-and-white photograph of someone standing next to Japan, clasping hands. Though the photo was grainy, it was clear who it was.

Korea.

'In celebration of twenty-six years of peaceful cooperation between Nihon and Chosen,' the headline proclaimed.

By now the other provinces had gathered to see what the fuss was, crowding around South Pyongan, gasping as they saw what she had.

But Hwang was focused on Korea. When he had seen the picture, his eyes had widened in shock. But not the shock of learning new information, but more... outrage. As if he were solely surprised to see himself standing next to Japan, not at seeing a mirror-image of his body, as one should be.

And... was that relief?

"Korea..." Gyeonggi ventured after a second of stunned silence. "Is that... you?"

"Of course it's not me!" he snapped, his reaction already masked. "The only way I would ever get within a foot of Japan is if I was putting a bullet in his heart."

"We're not doubting that," SH assured him. "But that certainly does... look like you."

"It's probably photo manipulation." Korea's knuckles were clenched around the grip of his gun.

Gyeong shook his head, hoisting his precious camera. "There are telltale signs when a photo's been messed with. I'm not saying I'd be right all the time, but this one looks pretty authentic."

"And recent," Kangwon added, chewing on a nail.

Korea's jaw clenched. "Just drop it."

"We can't just drop your literal doppelganger appearing in a photoshoot with Japan," Chungbuk pointed out.

"Y'all're crazy," Hae defiantly proclaimed, shoving her head close to the photo. "That don't look anythin' like Korea! Look at the eyes."

"Doesn't," Hwang corrected as he took a closer look.

Indeed, the Korea in the picture had wide eyes and a rounder face. And while his smile looked genuine, there was a stiffness to the corners of those eyes that made it look like he was on the other end of a gun and not a camera, though maybe only to someone who knew that face well. It wasn't an expression he could picture on the country he had known for seventeen years.

"That's because it's not me," Korea insisted.

"You can say that all you like," South Pyongan said skeptically. "But that's clearly you. I mean, it's not like there's another Korea."

Their Countryhuman looked away.

Silence fell as the cousins all exchanged looks of growing astonishment.

"Korea..." Hwang wasn't quite brave enough to voice his conclusion.

SH picked it up for him. "Are you saying... there's another Korea?"

Their country didn't answer, which was an answer in itself.

The provinces were all stunned into silence.

Hwang couldn't believe it! There were previous examples in history, and there was he and his sister, of course, but to think his own country...

"This is fascinating," he said, not seeing the looks some of the others cast him. "I wonder why two of you exist? My hypothesis for Hae and I is that the sheer class disparities in our province resulted in the two of us, but why are there two Koreas? Is one of you naturally less educated or-"

Gyeong elbowed him, and he suddenly noticed that Korea looked decidedly murderous.

Right. Perhaps he could pose those questions later.

"Who cares why there's two of them?!" South Pyongan burst out. "Why didn't we know there were two of them?" She gave Korea a pointed look, but he wouldn't meet her gaze.

"Is it not obvious?" South Chungcheong had been silent, but now she spoke up. "He did not want us privy to the fact that half of our country is colluding with the enemy."

South Pyongan took another look at the paper, as if just realizing what the full picture implied. Her blue face darkened. "He's a traitor?"

"No!" Korea barked with enough force to make both of the women flinch. "South isn't a traitor."

Kangwon's heavy lids flew open. "'S-South?'"

Korea glanced side to side, as if thinking about fleeing, before steeling his shoulders. "Yes. That's his name. He's my brother and he is not a traitor. Japan must have forced him to take that photograph."

"But why didn't you tell us about him?" SH asked, her expression quite hurt.

It was an enigma to Hwang as well. To think their Countryhuman had an unknown sibling in enemy hands the same way he had, without anyone ever suspecting, was... nigh inconceivable. Seventeen years he had been concealing that fact from them. Hwang had only been missing Hae for eleven, and he hadn't even been aware that he was. But evidently the same wasn't true for Korea.

'Seventeen years...'

Korea seemed to have recovered from how off-kilter seeing his brother had knocked him. "And what was I supposed to say?" he demanded, drawing his head up. "That the other half of me is a coward too afraid to fight Japan, so I left him behind?"

"You could have just told us you have a brother," SH said softly.

Their country looked down. If Hwang didn't know better, he would have said he almost looked... ashamed.

"I was going to tell you when we were Liberated," he muttered.

Several points were connecting in Hwang's head.

"Korea," he started slowly. "Is this 'South' imprisoned in Seoul?"

Korea *'tch'*ed, looking away again. "He should be."

The others seemed to catch on.

"The Seoul raids." Kangwon blinked in realization.

"Seodaemun Prison..." North Pyongan murmured.

"The reason you stayed so long-" SJ started.

NJ picked up, "-wasn' to kill Japanese..."

"It was to look for the other Korea," North Hamgyong finished grimly, startling the girls.

Their country grimaced, once more answering with his silence.

The mood shifted a little, from agitation to contemplation. Hwang, too, was immersed in it.

It all made sense! The multiple raids on Seoul, even when it was risky for them to enter the city! How often they visited, even with the Kempeitai chasing them! That one high-risk low-reward mission that had been so unlike Korea! Hwang felt a deep sense of self-satisfaction as the pieces finally came together, an answer to a mystery that he hadn't thought to solve.

Sang broke the silence. "If you told us the truth, we wouldn't have been so hard on you back then, Korea."

North Pyongan nodded, glancing at his sister. "If we knew you were looking for your sibling, we would have helped."

"I wouldn't have," North Hamgyong broke in, glowering. "It was a stupid move, and it got people killed."

"Hambu!" Hae exclaimed in horror.

"It's true," he growled. "He doesn't even know if he's in Seoul."

"And clearly the boy is quite chummy with Japan," South Chungcheong added.

"Well, some people actually care about their siblings!" SH said brightly, her smile stretched taut.

She spared a glare for the Chungcheong girl, then she and North Hamgyong exchanged a look that could have reduced anyone who walked into it to atoms.

"Everyone shut up!" Korea snapped, and they all quieted.

"North Hamgyong is right," he continued after a moment. "It was stupid. I deviated from the plan of attack and it got several of our people killed. As revolutionaries we need to criticize ourselves, and learn from our mistakes. Which is why I haven't made another attempt."

"But we know now," Sang pointed out, looking excited. "We could help."

North Pyongan nodded. "With all of us working together, I'm sure we could-"

"No," Korea denied firmly. "If I couldn't find him before, I won't find him now. They've stepped up security in the capital. In fact, I bet Japan published this in an attempt to lure me out." His teeth ground together for a second. "Regardless, South isn't a skilled fighter. It's more imperative that we stay free so we can Liberate all of our people, including him."

SH hesitated. "But..."

"No 'buts,'" Korea said. "We have more important things to do."

The words were harsh, but pragmatic. Hwang was also thinking pragmatically.

"We do have more important things to worry about." The glasses-wearing boy once more ignored the looks that were shot his way by the others. "Korea, this newspaper has an added purpose, aside from a possible trap. With this 'South' appearing next to Japan during a time when our guerrillas are becoming more active-"

Korea immediately understood. "They'll think the will of the country isn't behind them."

Hwang nodded. "It's propaganda. We need to counter it."

His Countryhuman grimly considered this. "We'll have to go public."

So far they had been working in obscurity, imploring their people not to divulge the identities of those who had helped them. It had kept them and Korea's Army away from an overt hunt, and out of Japan's hands. Just one more group of Korean guerrillas.

"That's going to cause a lot of trouble," North Hamgyong pointed out.

"It'll be more trouble if we don't," Kangwon countered. "People can't think Korea stands with Japan."

"He doesn't," Korea growled. "He's being threatened, I know he is."

"Then we need to tell people that," SH said.

Korea closed his eyes, then snapped them open. "We'll head north, make contact with the March First again, and the underground papers in our own country. North Hwanghae, I'll need you to send a message to that student of yours with the Dong-A Ilbo.

"It's time our people know their country is fighting for them."

Hwang's heart leapt. He'd been dreaming of this day! It was imperative the announcement be perfectly crafted. He would prepare one of his mental drafts, and enlist Hae's help to make his words more palatable for the masses.

Korea got to his feet. "Strike the camp. That paper is already a few days old. We need to counter this as soon as possible."

"Wait, Korea!" Hae, who had been unusually silent until now, jumped up, grabbing his sleeve. "There's two'a you?"

"Have you listened to a word we've been saying?" North Hamgyong demanded.

She stuck her tongue out at him. "Ah was askin' rhetorchally."

"Rhetorically," Hwang corrected.

"Ayuh." His sister turned her big eyes on their Countryhuman. "Is the other Korea like you?"

Hwang shook his head, bemused. Of course the concept of two Koreas would be his sister's dream come true.

Korea hesitated, then shook his head. "No."

Hae pouted, and he added, "He actually has a sense of humour."

South Pyongan whistled. "Wow. That's hard to believe. So what happened to you?" She dodged the pinecone that came her way.

"Wait, can you tell us about him?" Sang asked. "Pretty please?"

"Beautiful please!" Hae pleaded.

Korea *'tch'*ed, saying after a second, "Fine. I will talk about South this once, then you are all going to drop the topic until we're Liberated. Deal?"

"Deal," they all agreed in one voice, some earnestly and some not so much (Hwang was one of the latter).

"And we talk as we walk." The Countryhuman slung his rucksack over his back. "Come on."

As they trekked over the hilly north, Korea reluctantly started to describe his other half.

"He's not... really a coward. South is... kind..."

—

1952

On a good day, travelling alone, North could likely cross the southern half of Korea from north to south within two days, not stopping to eat, and with only a single rest. Once the Division was gone and he could finally move freely over his country without hiding from enemy soldiers or with 'borders' to stop him, he would test that. But right now, with the war, his prediction was around six days there and back, maybe a bit longer if he did return with more than Choe Jong-ok.

America's eight more days for revising started tomorrow, today by the time their vehicle reached Kangwon province. North was confident he could make it to the Raktong and back before the 19th, even with China slowing him down.

He wasn't really, he would grudgingly admit. His comrade kept pace easily (with his stupidly long legs), and didn't complain when North said they were going to take as few rests as possible. The Korean would just have to be more cautious with him at his side, taking longer, more mountainous routes. If he was ambushed alone, he knew he could escape. But it didn't matter if China managed to get away, because if even a hint of his red skin was exposed, his country wouldn't.

North looked over every few minutes, fighting the urge to adjust his old grey and white scarf that China had traded his ushanka for again with the warming weather, wanting to pull it even farther down over his white eyes and the strip of crimson around them.

North had examined his mental map of the frontline thoroughly before deciding where to cross. The Seoul area was obviously not worth it, and crossing by Chorweon and the so-called 'Iron Triangle' was out of the question. The mountains were heavily surveilled by both their armies. The area above the Hwacheon Reservoir was also out, as the thickest concentration of enemy troops was there, with four divisions of Rhee's army under the US X Corps' control, and the American 40th Division. The Yanggu-Haean-myeon stretch was less heavily patrolled by America's 25th and Rhee's 8th, but if they were spotted, their only escape routes would be west, straight into the cluster of enemy troops, or east, where the Haean Basin would cut off their escape. North knew they couldn't count on any of his people helping them there- anyone even slightly left-leaning or 'suspicious' would have been relocated long ago, likely to the same camps as his soldiers.

And even if someone there might help them, he wouldn't put them at risk. He didn't even want China here.

So the only option left was the line between Haean-myeon and the coast. It was only held by two divisions of Rhee's I Corps, though it presented the same problem of leaving them trapped between the basin and the sea. Except worse because the area was narrower, and they couldn't even try to escape over the water.

But North deemed it worth it. The majority of combat was taking place between Chorweon (his chest squeezed as he looked at its position below the Dividing line) and Haean-myeon. With the constant naval bombardment, North's soldiers could barely launch any probing actions. All they could do was hold on and repulse the reactionaries. There was also slightly less aerial reconnaissance, since the enemy knew no major push could come from there.

'Not that a push can come from anywhere.'

And Rhee's soldiers were still useless. On top of that, his newer conscripts were more likely to be sent to the area, ones that were less steeped in reactionary rhetoric. If they did need an ally, they were more likely to find a defector there.

So North and China took a vehicle bound for his Third Corps to Malhwi-ri for the second time in twenty-four hours, then hiked after it, into the southern peaks of Mount Kumgang. Annoyingly (even though North had planned it this way), they couldn't cross the front that night. The drive east had left the time around zero five hundred hours, with only an hour until dawn. They spent half the day hiking across the lower slopes, until they were just north of the KPA Third Corps, and the gap they held between the Soyang and Nam Rivers. Then they headed farther east across the northward course of the Nam, entering his First Corps' territory, a mountain mass facing the 'NDA's' I Corps.

As they marched, they passed through the empty villages his people had fled from, and the ones they hadn't been able to.

North stopped on a ridge, looking down at the burnt, barren patch of earth where Oemyon-ri had used to stand. It had been small, mostly wood and thatch and flesh. The napalm had spared none of it. The only thing that remained to mark that his people had once lived there were chunks of broken, sooty tile his soldiers had stacked into burial cairns, marking the tomb of those whose homes they had once been part of.

A pole had been thrust into the earth in the center of the scorched patch, the words on it slashed deep with hate and rage, proclaiming, 'AMERICAN BASTARDS' at the sky in a cry of helpless defiance.

The United Nations had stopped responding to their complaints about civilians being targeted. The Americans reported it almost openly now. His villages could be used to house soldiers, just like his fields could be used to feed them, his oxen could be used to bring them supplies, and his children could grow up to become them. In the eyes of America and the world, they were all military targets.

Korea was nothing but a military target.

He tore his eye away, finding them a place to wait out the hours until the sun fell, sheltered from the rain that started to fall.

As they waited, North could hear the detonations of bombs and blast of artillery from their shelter in a narrow valley. It made his skin prickle.

He knew he should just give this up, go join the First Corps instead, to fight by their side and bring them hope in victory, even if it didn't change anything about their situation.

But he had promised. So he remained rooted to the mountainside, ignoring China's attempts at conversation, until the sun set again. Then they crept forth, into his soldiers' line.

They had no trouble, as he'd made sure he was up to date with the codes for the area, easily able to respond the few times someone called out, either hearing some brush of their clothes against rock, or just being vigilant, making North proud.

They made it to the curve of the Nam, staring down at the band of shining black water passing below. The mountains rising on the other side were dark, with only the occasional searchlight panning the shore they were on, swiftly followed by small arms fire from his soldiers until it went dark again. From the west, the distant roar of naval cannons boomed.

They stealthily descended the ridges, stripping down at the bottom so they were in just their undershorts, before slipping into the dark, cold river. They moved slowly, packs over their heads, careful not to cause ripples or sloshing in case they were heard over the pattering of rain. North's muscles were wound tight, waiting for a shout of discovery or bullets to spray the water.

But they made it to the other side, and he swiftly changed into the 'National Defense Army' uniform he'd requisitioned, grimacing as he pulled the pants on over his wet boxer shorts and soaking bandages. He tucked his damp KPA uniform into his bag, unsurprised to see that China had also changed into the same reactionary uniform he'd worn on their POW camp breakout. His eyes smiled at him as he buttoned up his long sleeves.

The next few hours were nerve-wracking, as they navigated their way through Rhee's line, passing by men prowling through the woods and lining the ridges above them, voices filtering through the trees and down over the rocks. The falling rain and heavy clouds over the moon serves them well, but there were still several close calls, the worst of which came as they were forced to ascend a ridge to escape approaching sentries, who then stopped to have a smoke break below, where the rain couldn't touch them. They chatted lazily while North and China pressed themselves to the rock only a few metres above their heads, in plain sight if they looked up.

"Do you think the commies will sign?" one man's voice drifted up to them with another whiff of cigarette smoke.

"Hope not," the other said. "They still need to get what's coming to 'em."

North grit his teeth. They were so close. It would be too easy-

China's shoulder touched his, and he pulled away, letting the men mosey off back in the direction they'd came from. Then the Countryhumans moved on.

Several times China would stiffen, backpedalling or giving North a signal to find a new direction to go in. The Korean did every time, not hesitating.

And eventually, the Chinese man stopped, tilting his head, then murmured, "Clear."

Some of North's tension eased, though he still remained on guard as he lead them south through the night, past the enemy's rear.

They crossed the roads that led to Kansong and Yangyang, making it safely into the Seorak Mountains, walking until the sun came up, then walking more, working their way around valleys, climbing up and down ridges, and skirting villages.

In the early morning light, as they scaled a ridge that would set Mount Odae within their sights, the final major peaks they had to traverse before leaving the Taebaek mountain range for the Sobaeks, North turned.

Below them, nestled at the foot of Seorak Mountain, was a small village, a cluster of houses with thatched roofs, some with tile. It looked different than when he'd last seen it, visiting as many villages as he could after the elections. It had been bombed thoroughly in the first part of the war, and shoddily rebuilt. He could see villagers creeping out, starting their day, some of them people he likely knew, the ones that hadn't fled or been murdered, going about their lives in Osaek-ri.

It wasn't safe to be exposed so high up, but North still searched around, finding a flat rock and using the tip of the utility knife in his boot to scratch the outline of Daechongbong and the lesser peaks into it. When he was done, he ran his fingers along the lines, satisfied they were deep enough to feel with his fingertips. He stashed the rock in his bag, casting a defensive look at China.

But his comrade said nothing, just spread a pinned sleeve, gesturing for him to lead on.

They reached Mount Odae around nineteen hundred hours, as the sun set. Its peaks weren't as towering as Seorak Mountain's, but as they skirted a winding mountain road, it still put a great chunk of Korea at their feet.

North looked out at the rolling hills and jagged ridges, the white and grey peaks growing a coat of spring green in defiance of the air strikes that were launched even here, targeting guerrillas. Patches of colour bloomed on the ridges, untouched by foraging- bright gold sansuyu, pale pink and white plum blossoms clinging onto their flowers, snowy mountain magnolias like the ones on his northern provinces' flags.

And jindallae, crowning the ridges in vibrant pink and purple, making his teeth clench.

But even that wasn't enough to stop him from welling with that unnameable emotion that always filled his chest when he looked out over his country like this, the same one he felt gazing out over his people.

The sunset had burned away the clouds that had hung heavy all day, leaving the land awash with reds and golds and purples, and even under the scars he could see marring it, the craters in ridges, the severed tree stumps, the burnt patches where napalm had razed all life away, it was still his people's home.

"Korea is very beautiful," China said from beside him, voicing his own thoughts.

North straightened slightly, shaking out his shoulders.

"And you're very easy to flatter," his comrade added.

The Korean grimaced, turning his head from the landscape. "Fuck you."

China laughed, padding along the trail after him. "I did mean it, though. Your nation is almost as beautiful as mine."

"Then when it isn't being carpet-bombed, you'll think it's more beautiful," North countered his subtle brag. "You should see Paektusan in winter."

Even if he had, he hadn't seen the 'Korean side' (it was all Korean). The way Chon Lake caught the moon as it rose overhead, or the way the waterfalls froze into fantastic shapes, or how Janggun Peak looked robed in ice and snow.

"And Jeju's canola fields." They had visited in spring during the Occupation, when the flowers stretched across the island like a golden sea. Hae had had to be pried away from them. "And when Mount Kumgang has all its trees, it looks like it's carved out of jade."

North realized he was antsy for China to see his country when it wasn't being torn apart. It was unfair that he'd only seen it at its worst, and hadn't been able to see way the rock formations of Chilbo Mountain towered over the pines, or the gold the gingkos shed over Yongmyong Temple, or the old mounds of the Kangso Three Tombs and their vibrant Goguryeo-era paintings, or the mountain magnolias that bloomed on Mount Taesong, filling the air with their sweet scent. Not to mention all the deep blue mountain lakes and thick stands of old growth trees hidden away in the mountains, that had no name but what the locals gave them, or-

"In fall, all these trees turn," North explained, sweeping his arm at the peaks below them. "The entire span of the Taebaeks, from Wonsan to Busan, look like a wildfire."

China's eyes squinched up. "I'm looking forward to seeing it all."

Many of the sights he'd thought of had been destroyed, Yongmyong Temple decimated, the gingkos and mountain magnolias burnt to ash, and even the tucked away forests cut, bombed, or burned by reactionaries. And the canola fields of Jeju had been drowned in blood.

But the land was still here. And so were his people. They would rebuild and replant, heal the wounds and create new sights for them to enjoy. They would make Korea as beautiful as it had been, and then even more so, until no one could doubt they were the most beautiful country on earth.

The thought gave him a fresh burst of energy, getting them over Mount Odae and the road that lead to Gangneung.

But even with that, and all the exercise he did, North could feel his body wanting to flag. It wasn't his blisters- his feet were so callused those almost weren't possible for him anymore. It wasn't hunger, he had a rock for that. And it wasn't his muscles or energy itself. When he was in marching mode, he could push his body past its limit, and only realize when he stopped walking.

It was his stupid burns, the ones around his thighs and... other places. As... non-thick as his legs were right now, they still chafed after so many hours, the thick bandages rubbing against each other. Getting them wet had only made it worse.

He was almost glad when China started to complain about being tired, even though he pushed them on for another few ri, until it was the middle of the night, and they were in the ridges just north of Jaengsong Town. Then he started searching for something he knew was nearby.

"I think this might be the end of me," China moaned, stumbling up the rocky Geumdaebong Peak. "You'll have to leave me for dead if I don't get a break of at least ten minutes."

"What did I say about no complaining?" North griped. "And how did you do the Long March if you can barely handle twenty-four hours?"

"Do you think we were walking the entire time?" China asked. "If that's what your Arduous March was like, I'm surprised you didn't get where you were going sooner."

North didn't dignify him with a response.

High up on the lowest ridge, he found it, a dark cave mouth gaping in the rock.

"Do you hear anything?" he asked, keeping his voice low.

China prowled to the edge, listening, then shook his head.

North cast a reluctant look up the mountain. They were on the edge of Gangwon province, and still had more than half their journey to go. He didn't want to waste any of their night travel.

"I'm sure I can keep going after an hour or so," China assured him, his ten minutes jumping dramatically.

North could keep going, even with his legs. But if they were ambushed, he didn't want his comrade to be unable to fight or flee.

So he led him into the cave, one of many they'd discovered during their mapping of their country. North Gyeongsang had found this one, actually, spotting it while answering nature. He'd stuck his head in and ended up tripping and tumbling down the sloping mouth. When North Chungcheong had tried to help him up, he'd fallen again, and taken him with him.

With that in mind, North was very careful as he picked his way down, testing each foothold before placing his weight on it, turning on his flashlight once the light wouldn't be seen from outside. He'd been hoping China might trip, but he made it down safely, peering around in the white glow, harsh after a night of travel in the dark.

It was a limestone cave, the rock pale and rippled, carved into undulating formations by millions of years of erosion, making it look like the walls were melting like ice. Stalagmites rose from the ground, lumpy and misshapen, and stalactites dripped water from the ceiling into a dark pool at the foot of the slope.

North strafed the cave with his light, seeing nothing more threatening than a beetle that scuttled across the wall, likely not one of the Yankees'. A dark opening at the back led to the rest of the cave, where he knew it opened up.

Nodding, he tossed his light to China, dropping his bag on the rock ledge that ran around the pool. It would keep them out of the line of sight if someone were to peer into the cave.

"Toilet," he said, turning back for the slope. When he realized the other man was behind him still, he shot him a look. "Don't follow me."

"We need firewood," he pointed out.

Right. Their canteens were low, and they had water and a chance to make a fire. They had to take it while they could.

"I'll get it," North said.

"I can."

The Korean glared at him. "We're only stopping because you need to rest. If you aren't going to, then we can leave."

China sighed, retreating. "Very well. But don't leave me alone down here too long." In a small voice, he said, "I'm afraid of the dark."

North shook his head, heading back outside, trying not to hobble. The area before the cave was flat, but stretched far enough that he didn't need to worry about anyone below somehow seeing him in the thin moonlight.

He did take the opportunity to piss, but then he worked his pants down over his thighs, along with his boxer shorts, wincing at what he saw. The bandages around his thighs were dark, and when he pressed his finger to them, they squelched.

Fresh bandages. He supposed he could have brought those.

But he hadn't. And he would be fine. He could handle it for another few days.

North belted his pants back up, then went to find firewood. They didn't need much, just enough for their canteens to boil on. When he had an armful of thin branches chopped off the scrub trees growing out of the rock, he returned.

He tensed, seeing something on the ground outside the cave mouth, one hand going for his pistol as he scanned the mountainside. But as he got closer, he realized it was...

Bandages.

North glared at them, then at the cave mouth. He stalked over, tossing his armful of wood down, listening to it clatter on the rock. Sadly, he didn't hear a yelp.

He snatched up the roll of fabric, thinking of that night in Hyochang Park as he bandaged his wounds by Kim Ku's gravestone, and the steamed buns that had fallen out their wrapping.

Not understanding China any better, North rewrapped his legs, satisfied with the clean, dry new dressings. His thighs were going to be covered in scars, even once the burns healed. But it wasn't like he didn't have worse.

By the time he was back in the cave, China had taken off his mask and started a fire at the back, far enough away that the smoke wouldn't choke them in the short time it took to boil, and their canteens were sitting in it.

And he was also rummaging around in North's bag.

He was across the cave in a second, snatching it away from him. "What do you think you're doing?!"

China sat back on his knees, unbothered at being caught. "Snooping. It's admirable I've been able to wait this long, really. By the way, I noticed you use ginseng in your toothpaste mix when the other herbs you use would be sufficient. Since it's harder to find, does that mean you go out of your way to add it?"

"Mind your own business," North growled, the cold limestone leeching through the fabric of his pants as he kneeled to rummage through his bag, making sure everything was still there.

Rock, uniform, toothpaste tin, pine twig, ammunition, socks- North's heart plummeted when he realized he couldn't find something, tearing everything out before spinning around, relief and panic sparking in his chest.

"Give it back."

China looked up from the photograph he was holding, smiling. "Can I get a 'please?'"

"Give it!" North didn't wait for a response, lunging at him.

The other country held the photo up, but North just bowled him over, scuttling over his body to grab onto the paper in his outstretched arm. He tried to pull it from his grasp, but the two fingers China had pinching the corner only tightened, making North's chest do the same.

"China," he growled down at the Countryhuman, whose face was pressed into his sternum. "Give."

The fingers released, and North quickly got off him, putting his back to him as he hurriedly examined the photograph, his shoulders falling as he realized it was fine.

He knew his overreaction had just shown China how much this photo meant to him, but... It did mean a lot to him. He couldn't have anything happen to it.

It was a picture of him and South, from right after Liberation, before his flag had changed to the People's Committees'. North Gyeongsang had taken it with his Graflex 4x5 Speed Graphic, and had the photos developed in Seoul. His brother was dressed in the crimson and navy jeogori he'd shown up in, waving enthusiastically at the camera with a broad smile, his other arm around North in his uniform, his lips curved.

He hadn't realized he was smiling when it was taken. The expression looked alien, something that didn't belong on his face. But every time he looked at his brother's grin, lit up from the inside, even in black-and-white, he could remember why it had been there.

"You weren't exactly look-alikes even then, were you?" China said from just over his shoulder.

North jolted, hunching protectively over the photo. "What are you talking about?" he asked irritably. "We were identical."

You couldn't see their slight height difference in the photo. Besides the clothes, the only difference was the colour of their eyebrows. North's were black and South's were white.

"Hm." China leaned back.

"Don't 'Hm,' me," North muttered, carefully tucking his supplies back into his bag to make a safe spot for the photograph.

It had been stupid to bring it. He should have left it with his Premier like his book of names, and like he had once he'd retrieved it from his hidden compartment in the chosonjip. He'd been terrified enough when he had thought it burned with their house. If anything ever happened to it...

But he'd just... wanted it with him.

He took one last look at his brother's face, the way he was beaming.

'Then why didn't your brother follow you?'

It wasn't like North Hamgyong was the first person to ask that. He had spent thirty-three years asking the same thing. Even after being briefly reunited with his brother, North still didn't have an answer.

He didn't have an answer for a lot of things.

Unbidden, his gaze drifted to his own face. The smile wasn't the only thing that made it look so strange to him. Neither was the white flag with its taegeuk.

Looking at this memory, feeling the moment as it was captured in time, it was hard to believe that one boy would ever want to cut the other's eye out.

North shook his head, arranging his uniform around it.

He knew his brother hadn't wanted to do it. He never would have unless he had to. And he knew he regretted it.

'잘못했어.'

"You were so cute," China remarked when the photograph was safely buttoned away again. His eyes flicked critically over North now. "What happened?"

'Life.'

"I was never 'cute,'" the Korean growled.

China hummed skeptically.

Ssi-bal. He hated that he'd seen that. The photograph wasn't private- all their provinces had been there when it was taken, and so had several of their comrades, Choe Bong-nam included. But it felt private. He didn't like that China knew he looked at his brother like that.

The acrid smell of smoke was greeting stronger, and North went to check their canteens. They sounded like they were boiling, and the floor didn't look like it was cracking, so he left them for now, heading back to the rock pathway by the pool.

China was sitting on part of the wall where the limestone flowed down, creating a natural bench, with North's flashlight by his feet.

"I'm very sorry for rifling through your things," he said with a gravity that was so sincere it was definitely feigned. "In exchange, I can show you one of my most precious possessions."

"Don't bother," North dismissed, sitting a fair distance away from him (bag safely at his side). His legs screamed with relief from his hips to his feet.

But China was already rummaging overexaggeratedly in his sleeves.

North finally caved. "How do those work?"

"Magic." China's face brightened. "Aha."

He pulled a small stone from his sleeve, holding it up to the beam of the flashlight. It was grey-green and smaller than his palm, with natural edges to it. Green and blue striations glittered inside.

North blinked, unimpressed. "It's a rock."

"Your observations never cease to impress," China teased. "But actually, it's jade, to be specific."

"You have a gold-plated knife, and your most precious possession is a rock."

"One of my most precious possessions." China paused. "Though admittedly it is rather high on the list." His eyes slid to North, and his smile turned sly. "Do you want to know how I got it?"

Wary, North said, "I don't care."

"Hm." China held the rock up again. "Shame."

After a few seconds of watching him fondle the stone, North demanded, "Where?"

"From a man named Kim Hyo-ri."

North froze. "What?"

"No need to ask for Hanja," China said. "It's the one you're thinking of."

Kim Hyo-ri hadn't left Korea's Army after the disastrous Seodaemun mission that had killed his brother. He'd left nine months later, after it came out that North had one.

When he'd recovered from the shock of the name, the Korean demanded, "Tell me everything."

"The Japanese were closing in on a village in my northeast, and I ran into him there," China said, rotating the jade between his fingers. "He was trying to teach my villagers how to fight, since there wasn't time to flee. When my comrades and I volunteered to help, he told me he'd been a part of a little guerrilla group with the Korean Countryhuman."

He cut his eyes to him, passing him the jade. North took it with newfound respect, knowing it had once been in his comrade's hands.

"And interestingly enough, he told me there were actually two Korean Countryhumans," China continued. "And that he was looking for his General's brother."

North blinked. "He said that?"

China nodded. "En. He said he wasn't going to give up until he was able to reunite his Countryhuman with his other half."

North was dumbfounded.

When Kim Hyo-ri had announced he was leaving, he hadn't tried to stop him, or ask why. He knew why. He was leaving because he had realized his brother had died because North had been trying to save his. Because his Countryhuman had failed him.

But he had actually left to... find South for him?

"What happened to him?" he demanded, already knowing.

The man had never returned to Korea. He knew because he had searched for him.

"He died in the defense of the village," China said softly. "Protecting one of my elders."

North squeezed his eye shut. 'Ssi-bal.' He wished he would have told him. He wished he would have asked.

"Then he died for..." North faltered. "...Our countries."

"En," China said with a small smile. "I found that jade on him. Salvaging, you understand. What he'd told me intrigued me, and so did the stone. Do you know why he would have had it on him?"

North hadn't even known he hadn't despised him.

"No."

"Any guesses?"

Men and women leaving Korea, streaming across the mountains and rivers into China and the Soviet Union, only stopping to bend, coming up with rocks, small stones that wouldn't weigh them down, but still tether them.

"It could have been... a piece of Korea to... bring with him," North said hesitantly.

The other country thought, then nodded, like the answer pleased him.

North looked down at the stone, rolling it between his fingers, like he could read Kim Hyo-ri's will in the small divot on one side and patches where fingers had started to wear it smooth.

Even after North had gotten his brother killed for his own selfishness, he had still loved... his country.

"I buried him," China said quietly. "When the devils were dead, the villagers gave him a funeral. I can bring him home for you when this war is over, if you want."

"...No."

Kim Hyo-sam had been disposed of by the Japanese. It didn't matter where Kim Hyo-ri was buried, if he couldn't rest next to his brother.

"I don't..." North wasn't bold enough to echo China's words from the cemetery, so he silently held out the jade.

China observed him, then gently took the stone back, sliding it into his sleeve. "I'll continue to take good care of it."

North nodded wordlessly, gazing over at the fire, watching it flicker and snap.

In the end, it wasn't just China he misunderstood.

The other country eventually got up, tamping down the flames, leaving their canteens on the ground to cool as he walked back over.

"So," he asked, his voice light as he smiled again. "What is this brother of yours like? It occurs to me I've never asked."

"An idiot," North said bluntly, adjusting to the weight of Kim Hyo-ri, heavier than it had been.

He would update his name in the book. It was all he could do.

China smiled knowingly. "Nothing else?"

"No."

"A man of a singular characteristic. Fascinating."

North sighed. "South is..."

He trailed off, realizing he had been about to say 'kind.' He thought of gunshots in Pyongyang and his brother grabbing Kim Song-hui's gun, of Hae left silent for a night.

The word wouldn't come.

He also realized that he didn't want to talk to China about this at all.

"He's frivolous," he clipped, trying to end the conversation.

China stared at him for a long moment, then said, "En. That is the impression I got when I met him."

That got North's attention, and his neck twisted so fast it cracked. "You met my brother? When?"

China waved a hand lazily. "A few years ago, 1938, maybe."

During the Occupation, then. And of course his comrade hadn't thought to mention this to him before.

"Why?" he demanded. "What did you talk about? What was he doing?"

"Nothing important." Seeing North's Look, he sighed. "Fine. Our acquaintance was brief. I heard that the Korean Countryhuman was staying in my country, so I went to propose an alliance. I was turned down, as I suppose he had his own problems to deal with. Then we went our own ways."

North's mind raced. Kim Tu-bong hadn't found out about South until towards the end, so he wouldn't have known, but Kim Ku had never mentioned that during his visit a few years ago. South had never mentioned it either.

Ssi-bal, if he had known back then that China himself was seeking comrades during the Occupation, they could have coordinated their factions more closely, been even more effective against the Japanese, maybe even stopped that mess of Chinese Communists accusing his of being spies sooner. What had the Provisional Government even been trying to accomplish?

'Damn adventurists.'

"How was he?" he asked, referring to South, of course.

"A bit shy, but fairly personable. Charming, funny, a fine singer," China listed. "And utterly uninspired. We shared a few drinks, then I decided his help wasn't worth the effort of pursuing."

North bristled on behalf of his brother. "You can't say that if you don't know him well."

South may not have had a mind for politics or leadership, but North was fully aware that he was personally... easier to get along with than him. He had an interest in the arts, singing, dancing, theatre, and- as China said- he certainly had a better sense of humour. South had always been the fun one, the friendly one. China just didn't know him.

The other man made a noise of disagreement. "I can, actually. Getting to know people is like betting on jade. Someone with a skilled eye can learn to tell from the exterior which stones have promise and which are useless. Some are intriguing enough to take a look inside, but they only contain cheap minerals. But a rare few, once you crack them open, hold high-quality jade."

North was gifted with a crystal-clear image of China walking along a table, upon which sat a row of roughhewn grey rocks. He trailed his fingers over them, sleeves flowing behind, occasionally stopping to tap one with a fingernail. He split one open, discarded it, then moved to the next. This one, he pulled a shard of glimmering green jade from, holding it up to his face and smiling in self-satisfaction.

The Korean shuddered in distaste, blinking away the image. "Don't even think about trying to 'crack me open.'"

China gave him an enigmatic smile. "Who says I haven't already?"

'Disturbing bastard.'

"Anyways, you can imagine how disappointed I was to learn I had such a boring neighbour, and how thrilled I was to hear that there was another Korea. Even more so now that I know that unlike your brother, you're actually interesting."

North gave him a wary look. 'Interesting' was the exact same word North Pyongan had used to describe the Chinese man just before they'd met. It didn't exactly thrill him to be called that by him.

'We're similar people,' China had said over a year ago.

Should he hit him?

They trailed off into silence as North entertained a brief fantasy about doing so. He wouldn't of course. Not unless China gave him the chance to fight him again. He had more self-control than that.

Behind his lips, he ran his tongue over his canines.

His thoughts turned to his brother, and what words he would use to describe him now. 'Frivolous' was satisfying. 'Light-hearted' if he wanted to sound more charitable. Though it could be said that a heart that remained light in the face of the crimes South had stood by and observed couldn't be considered a virtue, even if none of them were his fault.

He had been kind, once. He had saved the last sip of water for North, had put on performances to try and bolster his spirit. He had been kind to him at least. But maybe in that microcosm of a world that had been just them two, that couldn't be an accurate assessment. The only other people he had ever witnessed South interact with were their guards, with whom he had been polite. Though he had been outright friendly with Toyama Ichiro, their ill-fated accomplice, 'friendly' carried less weight than 'kind.'

Friendly was 'nice,' which was only an upholding of etiquette, an empty word. North saw no use for it and had never tried to claim the attribute for himself. But South had clung to it like a lifeline, hoping that 'niceness' would win them allies and maybe even their freedom. The saboteurs who attempted to infiltrate their People's Committees and Party were 'nice,' simpering and smiling to ingratiate themselves with others. After all, so long as someone was nice, they could still retain some support even after being exposed as treacherous snakes trying to harm their country.

The word 'nice' had started to lose meaning for North. All it carried were smiles with sharp edges and knives hidden in sleeves.

"We can't tolerate not having all our prisoners of war returned," he said suddenly, his voice echoing as he wrenched himself from his thoughts. A slightly inane declaration, all things considered.

If China was baffled by him randomly (and loudly) repeating something they'd talked about dozens of times before, and was also on its way to being resolved, he made no sign of it. "You'll find no dissent here. I'm sure some of our soldiers would genuinely want to resist, but-"

North cut him off. "So long as even one of them could be being held against their will, we can't give in."

It was hard to believe anyone that wasn't a landlord or former politician would willingly choose South's system over his, but as he knew by now, five years-

'Seven.'

-wasn't enough to sweep away the old mindset completely. Especially not when America was laying all of Rhee's crimes at their feet. Once they won the war, they could continue re-educating those who went against their own interests, and show them what a democratic society could be.

"Then it's a good thing America's diplomats are at least pretending to play along," China said languidly. "I would hate to leave a loyal comrade to be tortured in a camp. Or worse, sent to Taiwan."

It sounded like a joke, but North knew enough to read deeper. If the loyal Chinese soldiers were sent, they would be tortured in another camp. And if the disloyal ones were, they would join the Nationalists in slaughtering the Communists and other Taiwanese natives, then be turned on the mainland by Chang Kai-shek.

"What is Taiwan's character like?"

It shouldn't have taken him so long to ask. He knew of his recent history, but far too little of the 'Country'human himself, considering he had been pressing to join the war.

"Unimportant," China dismissed. "He's not the one in control. Seeing as he wasn't present at the meeting to authorize intervention against you, or my trial, I doubt he's incredibly involved in the Nationalists' actions. But if given a few more years, I'm sure he'll be showing them his belly."

His tone implied that he wouldn't like to see him get those years.

"Is he your brother?" North asked, somewhat haltingly, not liking how personal the question came off as when it was supposed to be purely information-gathering.

"No. I have no family." The answer was fairly blunt to come from the usually airy man. "China stands alone."

"What about the other Chinese Countryhumans?"

In his effort to learn more about the world, North had paid particular attention to his large neighbour, considering the history of their countries, and their parallel struggles (or perpendicular). He could name each of the past Countryhumans that could all be considered 'Korean,' along with their biographies. But the Peninsula was compact, self-contained, unlike China. There had been dozens upon dozens of 'Chinese' Countryhumans, dating back thousands of years. From city-states to kingdoms to nations, dynasties rose and fell, along with their personifications. Frequent warring, unifications, and political alliances ended with the embodiments of the states dissolved, merged, or outright executed by conquerors, like Ming had been. There were so many that even his head spun trying to remember all of them.

China's civil war had been no exception. North had kept an eye on the situation during his own Occupation and nation-building- there had been multiple 'Chinese' Countryhumans all claiming to be China (though many had been little more than city-states), all proclaiming support for one army or the other, though none had been so vocal or active as the China that was currently reclining next to him, shivering slightly in the cold of the cave. If accounts were to be believed.

"Do you see any of the other Chinese Countryhumans here?" China's voice was sharp. "I am the China formed of the will of the people and I am the only China."

The slitted look he cast North was clear in its meaning, and he looked away. Unlike certain other countries, when someone wanted something dropped, he would drop it. Sometimes.

The silence between them had gotten somewhat stiff, but North paid it no mind. At least for once he wasn't the one showing his hackles.

After some time, China- with a return to his usual carefree tone- extended, "I suppose if you must give Taiwan a familial title, it would be 'annoying little cousin.'"

With this peace-offering, the cave air slackened, and North tried to find a way to pose the question that had entered his mind when he had thought of all the Countryhumans formed during China's occupation and war, and realized he still didn't know much about his comrade's past, aside from what Lin Heung-won had told him. He knew if he outright asked the man next to him which China he'd been, he would receive either another sharp answer or, more annoyingly, a sidestep.

Instead he tried, "How old are you?"

China raised his eyebrows in exaggerated offense. "Now comrade, you know it's impolite to ask a country their age."

The Korean rolled his eye. "That's for women."

"Really? I think it's common courtesy."

"What year were you formed?"

"Back when tigers used to smoke tobacco..." He trailed off, smiling as North gave a withering glare at the folktale beginning. "No?"

The Korean country switched tactics. "Where were you formed?"

He knew what China was about to say before he said it.

"China." The innocence is his tone was remarkably well-crafted.

"Forget it." He turned his head to look into the dark of the cave. "I don't actually care."

It wasn't like it actually mattered which China, exactly, he'd been. Like he'd said, he was the only one now, and he was here, helping North's people. He was here on this foolish march south. He didn't know why he'd bothered asking.

China let him stew for a moment, then said, "Maybe I'll tell you someday. If you get me drunk enough to spill my secrets, I might even tell you about my other little 'cousins,' annoying and not."

North got the impression that China wasn't the type to say anything he didn't want to, even under the influence.

He snorted. "You just want free drinks."

His comrade laughed at that, teeth flashing. "More clever than your brother, by far."

—

1936

North stood on the mountaintop, looking out over the border they shared with the Soviet Union.

He was far enough away from the camp that he could no longer hear his provinces chattering about him and his brother, making speculations and assumptions that he had no care for. North Chungcheong had already told him he was going to like South more, since he could actually take a joke.

North had no doubt that most of them would like his brother more, not that that really mattered. By the time they met him, they would only have a short while until they were one person.

Of course, he would have preferred they hadn't learned about him at all until then.

He clenched his fists, thinking of that picture. He just knew South had been coerced to take it. He had confiscated the paper after, searching the grainy grey of his face and hand for any sign of discoloration, a bruise or a cut. He hadn't seen any, but of course Japan wouldn't want something like that in the paper. His brother even looked well-fed, or at least not starved, though that was likely just for the photoshoot.

If the news had to come out like this, maybe he should have just told them about his brother back after Seodaemun. It would have saved a lot of hassle.

But it had been... difficult for him to speak of South. Even if it hadn't been for the practical considerations. It had felt... He didn't know. He didn't like to think of his brother's face as he had last seen it- scared, confused, hurt.

Betrayed.

He had no right to feel that way. North had wanted him to come with him, he had begged him. If he had, they could both be here, leading their provinces and people to freedom. But South had refused. He would never be able to understand that.

He had tried not to think about his other half for years, especially since Seodaemun. But now that he knew he was alive...

Alive. South was alive.

He squeezed his eyes shut as he finally let himself feel the relief that had flooded his body when he'd seen that picture.

He was alive. His leaving hadn't doomed him, not yet.

His brother was alive.

Now that he knew, North wanted to think only of the future, of the way his brother's face would look when they saw each other again. The way he would beam before he threw himself at North and they embraced, finally together again. Finally one, as they should be.

Now that the provinces knew of him, he knew they wouldn't shut up about it. But at least their anger over the prison break had abated, mended by knowing why exactly he had acted so recklessly on that mission, and why he had lied after. It had been stupid of him, and he deserved the criticism for it, and the tension that had filled the air between them for the past nine months. But...

He didn't want them to mistrust him. It would be bad for the cohesion of their group.

"Korea?" a tentative voice said from behind him.

"South Hwanghae," he said, not turning around as he blinked rapidly.

"Can ah ask you somethin'?"

He sighed. "I said I would only talk about South once."

Even though when he had said it, he knew the provinces wouldn't just give up so easily. He'd have to snap at them at least twice to get them to drop it after today.

"Ayuh, but... Ah haven't slept yet, so technic'lly it's still just once."

North sighed again. "Fine. One more question."

"Can you..." There was a shuffling sound, and he pictured her scuffing her boots in the undergrowth. "Feel him missin'?"

North was silent, and she clarified, "When ah'm not with Hwang, ah can feel it. Like... my heart is lonely. Do you feel like that, too?"

The lamps in the village at the foot of the mountain had flickered off, plunging the landscape into darkness. It was only across the river that the lights of the Soviet towns resumed. Their destination, to announce to their people that they were fighting for them, and that they wouldn't rest until Korea was free. Both of them.

"I feel it," he said quietly. His fingers twitched with the urge to touch his chest, and he curled them into his palm.

He shouldn't have told her that. He needed to remain strong. He needed to make up for the fact that they knew now that he hadn't been able to protect his brother, needed to keep them believing in him, to stave off their pity if something happened to-

North flinched as her sturdy arms wrapped around him from behind, immediately trying to pry her off.

He shouldn't have told them about South. He should have doubled down on the photo manipulation angle.

Hae didn't budge. "Don't worry, Korea," she chirped, her voice muffled by his jacket. "We'll get him back for you, ah promise."

North stopped his squirming, realizing that he wasn't going to get her off him without hurting her. And also...

"I know," he said, because of course they would. Even if to hear someone else actually say it was...

Suddenly he realized that he couldn't wait to introduce South Hwanghae to his brother. He would love her, everyone did, even if explaining why he had 'South' and 'North' Hwanghae was going to be embarrassing. And SH, South would love to hear her sing. And North Pyongan, too, with his poems. Him and Gyeonggi would get along like fish in a barrel, both enthusiastic and overdramatic. And finally Chungbuk would have someone else to tease about his height.

"We will," he pledged to Hae, feeling himself settle.

Someday soon they would all get to sit around a table covered in enough food for them all, in a warm house that was theirs, in a free country that was theirs, him and his brother and all of their provinces. And then it would be Korea and his provinces, and they would know that all of their people were just as safe and joyful as they were.

'Please, South. Hold on until then.'

Hehe. I think I did a good job subtly foreshadowing that China and South met first. Also the mystery solved of why China has that rock.

Expect the next chapter in ten to twelve business days. It's already written, but now I have to think of a five-line poem for it. And we know how I am with that.

I see a lot of Americans talking about the information in the Epstein files and saying things like 'god should take everyone' or 'the world deserves to end.' No?? The last time I checked, I haven't been sex trafficking and raping women and children. I would actually say confidently that the majority of people don't do that, and- being nice to men- wouldn't do that. Why does the world need to end because capitalism has taken a handful of humans with no empathy and given them the power to buy and sell lives? Sorry your country is awful, but America is not the entire world. And it's the same people that say violence isn't the answer in response to revolution. So our options are either nothing changes ever or the entire world gets wiped out? I see. It's like they're only not individualists when it comes to punishing literally billions of people for the crimes of probably under ten thousand. Literally 1% of the population deserves to unequivocally die painfully. The rest of us are either fine or could be fine if re-educated.

Down In Your Bones (You Know)

"I can't believe him," SH seethed, the water in the bucket sloshing as she aggressively cleaned the dishes from supper. Hwang hadn't been brave enough to claim his spot on the schedule from her tonight.

"That's crazy, because I totally can."

"You get to say nothing," SH hissed, shooting South Pyongan a glare over her shoulder. "I can't believe you just let him walk away!"

South Pyongan had told them about the task she had to accomplish for Korea as soon as she returned a few hours ago, though she was slightly cagey about what it was, until North Pyongan broke her with an expectant look. Now North Pyongan knew she had a smuggler, and they all knew that Korea really had went south, not that they thought the Premier would have lied to them about that.

And they knew she had known he was going.

His sister made a face. "What was I supposed to do? Knock him out? I mean I totally could," she quickly said. "But then he'd just wrap me in a straw mat and bludgeon me when he woke up."

"You could have come told us!"

"And then he pours ash water in my 'nose,'" South Pyongan said confidently. "You know how hard it would be to snort that out without actual nostrils?"

SH was glowering fiercely at her, so North Pyongan stepped in.

"It's not my sister's fault," he told his cousin gently. "We all know Korea would not have accepted her trying to restrain him in any way."

He wouldn't turn to the... creative punishments his sister had proposed. But it would cause friction between them, which North Pyongan didn't want to see happen, not when they seemed to have finally settled with each other.

SH made a sound of frustration, though her shoulders slumped. She knew as well as the rest of them that if their Countryhuman wanted to leave, then no matter what, he would leave.

"It is my fault," Chagang said suddenly, and they all looked over at him as he emerged from the trees with a moping Hae. "I should have noticed he was planning something."

"No offense, Cha-Cha," South Pyongan said, shifting over on the log to make room for him. "But I'm pretty sure you only learned what noticing even is like, a year ago. No one's blaming you, big guy."

"I was on watch," he said stubbornly. "I should have noticed."

"You wouldn't have been able to stop him, either," North Pyongan assured him.

He looked to Hae, dragging her heels as she plopped down on the ground, her legs crossed.

"How is the garden?" he asked.

"The burdock's already sproutin'," she muttered, not launching into her usual stream of excited chatter about her plants.

"Korea will be fine," North Pyongan assured her.

"Ah know he'll be fine," she huffed. "Korea's too smart for the reaction'ries to catch him. But ah want to be with him." Her shoulders hunched. "Why does Comrade Mao Zhilong always get to go, and we don't?"

'Ah.' She wasn't worried. Of course she didn't believe something could befall Korea. She was just jealous he kept disappearing with China.

"To be fair," Liaotung said, slowly sliding her bowl into SH's wash-water, avoiding her eyes the way a mouse would avoid a cat. "I do doubt that he chose to take him with him."

Liaoxi nodded. "Even if someone doesn't want China with them to go, if he thinks it interesting, it will be so."

"In that case, perhaps we should be more worried about Comrade China returning than Korea," Hwang said, having mustered the bravery to dry the dishes SH had washed, fending off her attempts to do it herself.

North Pyongan caught the subtle glance Liaoxi and her sister exchanged, and moved his hand so it was touching hers on their seat.

"They will both return safely," he said, and his... comrade gave him a grateful smile.

"Neither of them are going to return."

North Pyongan looked over to see a North Hamgyong coming back from the latrines, storming for the door.

He also saw the overwhelmingly dark look that crossed SH's face.

"Your positivity is always so refreshing," Liaotung remarked. As with her sister and China, she was skilled at making the sarcasm sounded genuine.

"Fuck you," North Hamgyong snarled. Though the Chinese woman was the one who had spoken, his glare landed on SH. "You know damn well one of these days he's going to get himself killed pulling this stupid shit."

The Southern Hamgyong shot up, and so did North Pyongan, stepping across the clearing and laying a hand on her arm. Her muscles quivered under his touch, then eased as she let out a breath.

With a bright smile, she said to her brother, "Why don't you go back inside? I've always liked it better when you aren't around."

Her eyes narrowed pointedly, communicating in that same secret dialect of their silent language that North Pyongan shared with his sister, and he winced as North Hamgyong's face contorted. His pine-skinned cousin stormed back into the air raid shelter.

In the awkward silence, South Pyongan let out a whistle. "Damn SH. Okay."

"Perhaps a bit... harsh," North Pyongan agreed.

"Because he's never said anything even slightly harsh to me." She didn't even attempt to disguise her sarcasm. "And don't pretend that you actually want him around."

The Korean provinces all gave each other looks as she returned her to her dishwashing, silently agreeing that now was not the best time to deny that.

"I like this side of you," South Pyongan said, impressed "Want to help me drag him down to the river and toss him in while he's sleeping?"

North Pyongan gave her a disapproving look, and she squinted mischievously.

He knew his sister didn't intend to be malicious. He didn't think she actually understood how fraught the Hamgyongs' relationship had become, especially since yesterday.

It relieved him, as did her accepting that Korea didn't want anything to happen to South. Even with the distance being put... No, that they were putting between each other, they were still too close for her to fathom other siblings genuinely disliking each other.

But he understood. SH and her brother had always been... tense. But not like this. The ride to the bunker last night, and those to and from it today had crackled with an uncomfortable energy. Even though SH had been in her usual good mood on the way into the city, talking about their plans for the day, he had noticed how her eyes refused to even drift towards the front seat and its driver. And when the General had came to meet them at the drop-off point to inform them of Korea, the way she hadn't even cast North Hamgyong a look warning him not to say anything disrespectful in front of their Premier had been louder than actual words would have been. And when they had first got into the truck with Korea the day before that...

Well, North Pyongan had immediately understood why when he'd gone to get his blood taken that night, Kangwon had said to watch out for them.

He just didn't know how. He and his sister had never needed anyone to reconcile them. They rarely ever got under each other's scales, and if they did, like when he had hurt South Pyongan by unintentionally insinuating that she enjoyed killing, it would eventually be worked out, either by him telling her she had gone too far in her pranks and teasing directly, or her awkwardly forcing herself into a 'gross talk.'

And when he knew the Hamgyongs had even more difficulty than her with that, he didn't know what else he could say to help them, just as he didn't know what he could say to Kangwon to soothe his grief over Gangwon.

He knew better than anyone that there were no words that could help.

Their relationship wasn't something the provinces could resolve, or Korea. And neither could their people. In this case, all he could do was offer a prayer to God to see them through their turmoil.

But he knew peace could only come at their own hands.

He sat back down next to Liaoxi, her and her sister both staring at the dark trees as intently as a barehanded fisher would stare into a river, as they always did when the Koreans were having family issues. Though he knew they were both listening intensely, both for China and themselves. The Liaos truly were just as curious as their Countryhuman.

Interrupting SH and South Pyongan's musings about the logistics of carrying North Hamgyong to the Pothong without him waking up (which were getting a little too in-depth), Hwang sighed and said, "I do wish that our proposal had been accepted. Perhaps it might have prevented this."

"I do, too," Chagang agreed, and SH bobbed her head, pursing her lips.

"Ah don't," Hae declared. "Korea doesn't think it should happen, so ah don't either."

"I'm with you there," South Pyongan said, leaning back over the log. "The less people able to tell me what to do, the better. Also SH, I think the plates are clean. You can stop scrubbing now."

North Pyongan shook his head, even though he knew that wasn't her only reason.

"Proposal?" Liaotung asked innocently, while South Pyongan wrestled the already clean dishes away from SH.

The Korean provinces exchanged looks.

"Classified," Hwang said.

"We're sorry," North Pyongan apologized. "We shouldn't be talking about private matters when we cannot involve you in them."

"We don't wish to impose," Liaoxi said politely as her sister jostled her lightly. "If you like, of ourselves we can dispose."

"No," he said, quickly enough that South Pyongan looked over from dumping out the dishwater, sensing something to tease him over as accurately as sharks sensed blood. "That's alright."

Liaoxi's slender brows rose slightly, her lips curling, and he looked away, face warm. His hand reached into his pocket, fingers brushing against the scrap of paper there.

He had been working on this for awhile. And a night when China was gone, so he was sure they weren't being eavesdropped on, was perfect.

He managed to ignore his sister's looks for the next few minutes, until the others started to trickle off to bed.

"Comrade Liaoxi," he said when it was just them left by the dying fire, and his sister on first watch. "Would you like to go on a walk?"

South Pyongan clapped her hands over her ear slits. "Ewwww. I don't want to know about your private lives."

North Pyongan gave her a dry look, and Liaoxi arched a brow.

"To hear that is quite strange," the Chinese woman said. "When our marriage you have been offering to arrange."

North Pyongan hid his face behind steepled fingers, frowning at his sister past them. 'I thought you were only saying that to me.'

She gave him a little smirk. 'Well, if you're going to treat me like the man of the house...'

"I am so sorry," he said to Liaoxi, then to South Pyongan, "And I was just asking her for a walk. Don't think... that way."

His cheeks flushed, realizing what he was saying in front of Liaoxi, quickly apologizing again.

She only flushed prettily, dipping her head.

"It's alright if you don't want to go," North Pyongan told her, almost grateful that his sister might have just made him lose his chance.

"No, no, that won't be so." Liaoxi put her hand on his elbow. "But is it truly just a walk...?"

"I was also thinking we could... talk," he said, slightly unsure if she was actually looking for assurance that it was, or for him to finish her rhyme.

He had been right about it being the second option, it seemed, because she smiled, sliding her hand around so their arms were linked.

"Blech," South Pyongan enunciated. "You better go far enough away I can't hear you 'talk.'"

North Pyongan gave her a look dripping with as much disapproval as he could muster. His sister just waggled her eyebrows at him.

Sighing, he and Liaoxi headed off into the woods, through the budding larches that flanked Jangsan, meandering northeast along the curved blade of a mountain.

"I really am sorry for her," he said again. "I can tell her seriously to stop."

She might listen.

Liaoxi laughed slightly. "I'm okay with it. But if you heard what Jilin would say if he were here, you might have a fit."

She smiled at him, tipping her head, her eyes meeting his like they did when she was trying to make him understand something, and North Pyongan relaxed slightly, thinking he might.

It was the embarrassment she was... He didn't like to say she was faking. She was performing the shy way she had reacted, the way she performed her softer voice.

He still didn't entirely understand why she felt like she had to act. But if that was the dynamic between her and China and their country, then it wasn't his place to say anything. He was only her...

North Pyongan glanced at Liaoxi, finding her already looking at him. Her eyes squinched, and he quickly averted his gaze, thankful it was too dark under the trees to see his purple cheeks.

He didn't entirely know what they were. They had agreed to be together, and both used 'courting' to refer to their relationship. But that wasn't quite the word for it. They weren't trying to decide if they were right enough for each other to be engaged, because they couldn't be engaged. They would never be married, so she could never be his fiancée or... anything else.

And aside from how often they touched now, not much had changed from when they were simply friends. Even when she twined their fingers together at dinner or took his arm like now, he was hesitant to initiate the same things. He... really wasn't used to it. Liaoxi said she wasn't either, but she still had far more confidence than him.

He didn't mind the elusive way she acted. He did enjoy trying to figure out what she was really saying to him past her cí and little smile. To find the meaning hidden in her moonstone eyes.

But it also worried him that he might misread her and make her uncomfortable in some way. He didn't doubt that if she was actually displeased, she would let him know, and he knew since she had no issue with touching him, she likely wouldn't take issue if he touched her. But the idea that she might, and he might not realize, discomforted him. He preferred to let her take the lead on how much contact they had.

But that made him feel like she might not realize how much he liked her. If he didn't show her as much affection as she showed him, wouldn't that leave her feeling unappreciated? He had tentatively asked if she wanted him to be more openly affectionate, and she had told him to do what he was comfortable with.

But he wasn't *un*comfortable being affectionate with her. He only... wasn't sure how to be, physically. It made him worry that she might feel like they were just friends who held hands. He didn't mind if that was what their relationship was like, but he did mind if she didn't know how much he cared for her.

His hand grazed across his pocket, making sure the paper was still in there. The fact that it was made him even more anxious.

But hopefully he could communicate his feelings right this way.

"So," Liaoxi said as they left Jangsan, emerging from the woods into the rolling fields between them and the Hyongje Mountains. "A proposal was mentioned?"

She tipped her head up at him, and North Pyongan's cheeks went hot as his mind went blank, before realizing what she meant.

"Oh," he said, embarrassed. "Right."

Her eyes narrowed mischievously. "What meaning did you think I intentioned?"

"Nothing," he said quickly. "And it isn't information Comrade China needs to know. We were just... discussing safety measures."

It wasn't a lie. The 'proposal' Hwang had brought up had been their attempt to propose that Korea give Kim Il-sung, Kim Tu-bong, or both of them the authority to issue commands to the provinces. Technically Kim Il-sung already could as the Supreme Commander of the army, since they should rank beneath him as generals. But as Provincehumans, they had the ability to supersede orders, if needed. And he didn't have any authority at all outside of military operations.

Of course, most of the provinces would listen to him anyways, and Kim Tu-bong. They were the chosen representatives of their people, the former as the Premier and the Chairman of the Worker's Party, and the latter as the Chairman of the Supreme People's Assembly. It was why North Pyongan had agreed with the cousins of his that wanted to convey authority over the provinces to them. If they were to guide their people down the path they were travelling, they had to listen to them, to let them guide them in turn. But it was impossible to listen to that many voices. As elected officials, Kim Il-sung and Kim Tu-bong carried the will of the majority, so he'd thought it would be acceptable if their word could restrain at least his cousins- or his sister- from doing something dangerous the way Kangwon had.

But as they had made their case, Korea had looked at him before any of the others, with a sort of disappointment on his face. And North Pyongan had realized that he was just trying to slip back into what was comfortable for him- obeying. Their Premier and Chairman might act as mouthpieces for the masses, but they were still their people. Their voices should be listened to attentively, but they were still just droplets in the rush of the river. He had to help

Korea paddle, not give his oar over to the water.

So he had changed his mind, and helped talk his cousins down. And from the glow in Korea's eye, he knew he had done the right thing.

But it still left them with a problem. They hadn't just decided it was the right thing to do to stop themselves from doing anything reckless in the future. They had been subtly trying to hint to Korea that he should give the men the right to command him, even just in the scenario where he had to be stopped from running off again. And hoping that perhaps if the Premier had the authority to command the provinces, it might give him the confidence to order Korea, too, the next time he tried... something exactly like what he was doing this instant.

North Pyongan understood that was wrong now. But his Countryhuman's absence at the moment proved that they'd been right to seek a safeguard.

He didn't actually know if an order from the Premier would stop Korea from his drive to do what he thought was right, and he didn't think one from Kim Tu-bong would at all. But something needed to be done. He still believed that.

"Hmm," Liaoxi said to his words. "Perhaps measures to stop your Countryhuman from with mine absconding?"

North Pyongan could never be sure if she was too observant, or if he was too unskilled at lying. Either way, he silently apologized to Korea.

"I'm sorry," he apologized to her, too, taking responsibility where he knew Korea would not. "My Countryhuman keeps putting yours in danger."

Liaoxi shook her head as they padded along the Hapjang River beneath Mount Ami, following it to the Taedong's main course. "China wouldn't miss an opportunity for bonding. Believe me, my sister and I know the fault is his own."

And yet if something happened to him down in the south, it wouldn't change the fact that he wouldn't have been there if Korea hadn't gone.

"And 'tis better than if your country had gone alone," the Chinese woman added.

It warmed North Pyongan's heart that she cared for Korea's safety, and he should be comforted that he had someone to watch his back for once, just like he had in Seoul and Chorweon. Especially when he believed Liaoxi when she said they had nothing to fear from China.

But he wasn't. Because he also believed that Korea had grown fond of their comrade, at least in the same way that he was fond of CCCP (not that he would ever dare suggest that to him). Even if he hadn't, he knew his Countryhuman wouldn't let the Chinese pay for their aid in this war.

North Pyongan could still remember that day in Namsan Residence with clarity, the way his heart had sank as the Japanese guard levelled his pistol at him, knowing he couldn't bring himself to pull the trigger on his bolt gun. Seeing his sister's face from the corner of his eye, the wild panic on it as she realized she couldn't get to him in time, and he knew he was about to make her watch him 'die.' And he could see the way Korea had came out of nowhere, throwing himself almost directly in front of North Pyongan without even a moment's hesitation, his pistol coming up. He had outdrawn the man, spraying his brains over the pavilion floor just a heartbeat before South Pyongan had won her grapple. But if he hadn't, if he had been just a second slower...

It was better for Korea to be alone than with someone he felt like he had to protect.

"That's just the way it be," Liaoxi said when he had been silent for a few paces. "When you care for one whose self is not their own priori-ty."

"Is Comrade China like that, too?" he asked, wincing apologetically so she knew he wasn't returning to trying to work information from her.

Liaoxi hesitated, then nodded. "Sharing that I have no fear. It should by now be quite clear. He cares for himself, he really does, but when there's something he's more interested in..."

Her eyes darkened slightly.

"That care becomes a 'was?'" North Pyongan suggested.

She nodded almost grimly, her hold on his arm tightening. Hesitantly, he squeezed back.

He still hadn't been able to get anything out of her on her past with China. Not the full story behind her always leaving one bullet in her rifle, not whether or not she'd been telling the truth about Manchukuo bending the knee, or how she had even met her Countryhuman. He knew she and her sister had been Fengtian, that they were close with Jilin and Heilongjiang, and a scattering of stories about her time in the Chinese army, never specifying time or place or even which army- Red Army, Eighth Route Army, People's Liberation Army. And none of her stories involved China.

He did wish he could know more about her. But he knew she wanted to tell him- she just couldn't.

"So he's done things like this before?" he asked.

"Yes." Liaoxi didn't elaborate. But there was a note to her voice that told him whatever memories they were, they weren't happy.

He supposed that was just the way it was, caring about someone who didn't come first to themselves. He had spent years watching his sister leap headfirst into danger, throwing herself at men far taller and broader than she, over and over again until she got them to break more than her, or luring them into alleyways to mug them for everything they had, no matter the danger it put her in, and had known she was doing it for him. She loved the thrill of combat, yes, but she wouldn't drag herself off the floor with her wrist still broken for another fight if she didn't have to keep him fed.

She had came first to him as well, and he would have taken all those injuries she received in the ring or on the streets unto himself, if he could have. He would have taken a Kempeitei bullet for her. But with who they were as people, and who they were to each other, it was far more likely that she would be the one getting between him and a barrel, just like Korea had.

Over those years, he had never feared for himself, knowing God and his sister would keep him safe. He had feared for her. He had watched her in the ring, her eyes gleaming as she launched herself at another man that could snap her in half if he got his hands on her, and known that between her desire to win and her love for him, what happened to herself was just an afterthought. The only way he had been able to soothe that fear was reminding himself of how capable she was, and praying to the Lord to keep her safe, even when he should have been able to.

Another injustice he had done to her without even realizing it. Even when they were each other's priority, he hadn't been able to prioritize her the way she could him.

And it did hurt, a little. More than a little. That she couldn't be his priority anymore. Their people were. Even now that he could protect himself, he would never be able to return the favour, to make her feel as cared for and safe as he had felt back then. He knew that wasn't what she wanted anyways, but it was what she deserved.

But as reckless as South Pyongan could sometimes be even now, as much as she had cared more about him eating at night than keeping her own body whole, at least she did care about herself. Korea...

It was difficult sometimes, to care about someone that didn't care about themselves.

He had to wonder where that fit into Korea's philosophy of the path. If they were guiding their people, was it really okay for him to run sprinting off of it at full-speed into danger?

'He probably doesn't see it that way.' The Premier hadn't told them exactly why their Countryhuman had gone south, but if it was for anything like sneaking across the Raktong River to rescue their POWs, or staying in Seoul to resist the American army until the last, or chasing down Japan on his own, then it was because he thought what he was doing would protect their people, and reaffirm their faith in the path they were walking.

To Korea, things like this were likely about what everything else was- belief. And if so, then any safeguard they could come up with would never be enough.

North Pyongan had thought it before, that his Countryhuman was even more zealous than him. The province could make himself surrender parts of his faith when he knew it was the right thing to do.

But he didn’t think Korea could do the same.

The two provinces were silent as they reached the main channel of the Taedong. The night was cool, the sticky heat of summer still a few moons away. A light breeze rippled the waters, and soothed some of North Pyongan's sympathetic fever, though it did nothing to soothe his nerves. Nightbirds called from the budding trees, returned to Korea with the long winter over, and the only bombs that fell were distant ones.

Again, North Pyongan had to fight the shame that bloomed in his breast. Even if the night was peaceful around them, it wasn't for others. The fever in his head told him his people were still falling sick. Those outside of Pyongyang were under bombardment, and the ones in it were hunkered in their dug-outs or working the fields while they still could. And Korea was ri away, infiltrating enemy-held territory. While they walked along the quiet riverbank, he could be injured or being taken into enemy hands.

But there wasn't anything he could do about any of it tonight, and he couldn't let himself be paralyzed with fear, the way he'd almost been when his sister was taken. He had already confessed his feelings to Liaoxi. If he didn't say what he wanted to now, he would just be making excuses to justify backing down out of nervousness. He couldn't be trusted to guide his people if he couldn't even muster the courage to share what he wanted to with his... close comrade.

The walk stretched out, nearing an hour, and he felt himself anxiously wondering if Liaoxi would ask to turn around. But she seemed content to meander at his side, observing the wheat and barley fields, watching the breeze play though the green stalks that had started to push through the loam in some places.

The Taedong River flowed from the southeast before entering Pyongyang, taking a lazy curve and travelling southwest alongside the city. Above the bend, the Hapjang River and the channel that carved out Reungra Island from the bank formed a spit of land that had used to be blanketed in forest, and was now covered in farmland and felled trees. A narrow hill adorned the tip, watching over where the bridge had used to be.

North Pyongan led Liaoxi towards the shadow cut out of the horizon, staying on the dirt road that ran alongside the Taedong to avoid trampling any crops. He wished he could bring her up to the crest of the hill for the view, but he knew they had anti-aircraft teams stationed up on it. So instead he took her to the shore below, where the steep side of the hill pressed up against the road like it was considering toppling over onto it.

By the riverside, he took off his tunic, spreading it on the ground for Liaoxi. With a small bow, she gracefully folded her legs under herself, and he joined her.

The Taedong was wide here, the dark water reflecting the stars above, and the swelling moon as it rose overhead. The bank across from them was carpeted in shadow, and so were they, hidden under the hill. it made this small section of riverbank feel cozy, even with how exposed it was.

As beautiful as the sight before them was, North Pyongan's gaze was drawn back to Liaoxi, and how her eyes were given a pearlescent lustre by the moonglow. His heart skipped like a stone, and his last doubts fell away.

He reached his hand into his pocket, fingers closing around the paper, and he took a steadying breath.

"I wrote you something."

Liaoxi perked up, her head swivelling from the river. "If I may ask, is it poetry?"

Swallowing, he nodded. "You've recited so many for me. And you asked me awhile ago if you could see one of mine."

He hadn't written in so long. Even with his sister back at his side and the war at a stalemate, he couldn't find his center. He might have been able to pen a few poems about how Jangsan turned to jade with spring, or the way the Taedong glistened like black silk under the stars, but he knew that wasn't right anymore. He couldn't write about the land around them when their people were dying to protect it. As the Premier said, he and their other poets had to doff their horsehair hats. And he had to replace his with his general's flatcap.

But as he had stood guard over Korea while he was ill, attempting to compose, he hadn't been able to craft words to invigorate their soldiers and instill hope in their homefront, too wracked with worry for his Countryhuman.

So he'd thought to start small, with words that didn't make his heart clench with fear for their people or his tongue want to form prayers. With what he should have done when he confessed to Liaoxi in the first place. Though now that he was sitting in front of her, her eyes fixed on him, it didn't feel so small.

Liaoxi nodded vigorously. "That would be just fine."

Her pearl eyes said it would be more than fine, easing him slightly. He held the folded paper out to her, but she didn't take it.

She tipped her head. "Won't you read it to me?"

North Pyongan flushed. "Out loud?"

"I've read many for thee."

"They weren't about me," he tried, but her eyes just squinched expectantly.

It was true she had read other poems to him, and even if they weren't... like this one, all poetry was inherently soul-bearing. It was why he had barely ever read his poems out loud, even for his cousins. And even then, it was mostly for SH, Hwang, and the Jeollas.

Then again, nothing could be worse than South Pyongan stealing his poetry book and reading them out loud herself.

"Okay," he said, the word coming out almost mumbled.

Liaoxi shifted so she was facing him, her legs crossed, and he mirrored her, their knees bumping together. With slightly clumsy hands, he unfolded the paper, face warming as the words appeared.

"Skies of shadow and flame,
An abyss to swallow all thought.
And then I knew your name,
My pearl of worry was caught.
Your homeland's revolution calls to be seen through,
Yet mine's justice is brought by your scope.
If our nations must be in the fire, then I'm glad to burn with you.
My citrine and moonstone, you bring me hope."

When he was done, he fought not to hide his face behind the paper. But his head still dipped, his hands rising until he was looking at her through thin pulp and ink. Her citrine outline was barely visible as her hands rose to cover her own face.

"Um." The heat painting his cheeks flared. Had he ever said 'um' before in his life? "I know I'm not very... experienced. I don't entirely know how to care for you the way you might want. And... I don't think we can ever be... intimate together."

He didn't want to bring that into it, but the more he thought about it, the more he felt like she should know, in case she was expecting it one day. Waiting until marriage was important to him, and since they could never be wed...

"If that isn't right for you, then I understand," he said. "I just wanted to do something to show you that I really do... care for you."

His eyes flicked up, over the edge of the paper, and he could see that she hadn't been covering her face, but removing her mask. Her white eyes peered out of the shadow of her plum blossom-patterned scarlet scarf.

For a moment, he almost swore she looked... sorrowful.

Then she leaned forward, a beam of moonlight striping her face, and he realized she was smiling. She took his wrists, lowering the poem to his lap, and he squirmed slightly with nothing to hide behind. His eyes flicked to her bow-shaped lips, so rarely revealed when they weren't at the shelter with the others.

But his were dry, burns singeing the edges, just like the rest of his face, charred a hideous black and red, so he couldn't-

"Can I kiss you?" Liaoxi asked, breaking the Commandments by stealing his words.

North Pyongan ducked his head, his cheeks flushing indigo. Shyly, he nodded. "I would like you to."

Liaoxi's hand cupped his cheek, gentle against the bandages there. He wished he could feel her skin, and like she had read his mind, her thumb slipped off the edge of the fabric, caressing his cheek bone. It wasn't soft. He had held her hands enough to know they were those of a gunwoman.

Her lips were, though, as she tilted his head up, and the upper bow brushed his. Her eyes stared into his, closer than he'd ever seen them, like she was seeing into his soul, then shut, her lashes resting on her cheeks. He followed her lead, even though he just wanted to keep looking at her, immersing himself in darkness just as her bottom lip met his, deepening into a proper kiss.

Warmth flowed through him, washing away the little guilty voice saying this was sinful. He knew it wasn't. There was nothing in the Bible against love.

Liaoxi was resting her lips against his, almost in his lap, and his heart was thrumming. He didn't know where to put his hands, but he knew he wanted to touch her. Carefully, he placed his hand on her cheek, and she didn't move away. She leaned in, putting more pressure between them, then broke contact.

But she didn't shift back. She wrapped her arms around his neck, pulling herself farther onto his lap, and burying her face in his shoulder. North Pyongan's hands fluttered like butterflies, before coming to rest on her back.

"Are you-?"

"That was my first real kiss," she murmured into his uniform.

"Me too," North Pyongan admitted, running his hand over her shoulder blade. "I hope nothing was amiss?"

In answer, she lifted her head again, her lips finding his like a honeybee to a flower, drawing him into her. North Pyongan gladly let her.

He still didn't know why Korea had given them his blessing to be together. But he was very thankful he had.

—

The Sobaek Mountains split from the Taebaeks on the edge of Gangwon province, trailing diagonally across the country, culminating in Jirisan, the tallest peak in the southern mainland, and the tailbone of Korea's 'spine.' They were filled with plunging valleys, steep peaks, and dozens of caves that wound their way into the earth, perfect for hiding guerrillas. And they were all as familiar to North as the rest of his mountains.

North Chungcheong had found their unit in them, they had sheltered among the peaks before and after freeing the Jeollas, spent time in countless villages around them, including Dan Hoon's, and they'd fled into the maze of towering pillars and thick forests from the Kempeitei more times than could be remembered. He knew the land, and led China confidently across it, easily avoiding the few groups of reactionaries on the prowl for his guerrillas that they almost crossed paths with.

They had reached the range the same night they'd stopped in the limestone cave, something in North's chest squeezing as they left Gangwon province behind, even though he knew his province wasn't there. The next day was spent marching southwest, the sky above them clear and pale blue for the first time in a week.

It was clear in the north, too. North could feel the sizzling in his destroyed nerves burning worse.

For a few hours, the hike had been almost peaceful. But then the sun crested the horizon, and the planes returned from the north, wings of lithe fighter-bombers and heavy B-29s soaring in to the Taejon airfield like owls that had disgorged their pellets coming to roost, making him grit his teeth.

He still hadn't heard anything about Pak Seo-nam after the Ri Gun-hon situation had been resolved. He couldn't risk exposing him to his other agents so they could attempt to hunt him down. And all he had heard about the provinces was that his spies were fairly certain they were all still imprisoned in Busan manors. Gangwon had been moved to one a week after he'd been stolen, a gap that was too long for North to be comfortable with when his condition couldn't be confirmed. And like the others, South Chungcheong hadn't been seen leaving.

'Keep your promise.'

Both of them had better be okay. They all had better be.

The two Countryhumans didn't speak much as they travelled. North kept his jaw locked against the pain in his thighs, and China, for once, decided to keep his mouth shut, aside from occasional soft humming that only stopped when he was reluctantly scolded. They only rested twice more, when the Chinese country broke his silence to get whiny. North didn't berate him as much as he could have- both times his legs were reaching their limit, demanding more bandages before they soaked through his pants.

They drank their water sparingly, boiling more in the caves North located for them, and dined on namul he found clinging to the rocks, eating them uncooked. Tough, bitter chwi, garlicky chives, and small stone namul that he located with the ease of someone that had foraged his meals for twenty-six years. The addition of the tinned fried dace with fermented black beans that China had brought, another 'care package' from his Chairman, saved North from having to crunch on a particularly thick sponge of lichen he spotted growing on a fallen tree.

Fried fish were definitely better than lichen or SH's cooking. But North's stomach still churned as he forced them down.

At the end of the second night, they were in the mountains where the boundaries of North Jeolla, South Gyeongsang, and North Gyeongsang met, the place where Gyeong always jokingly said he was 'threatened by eum energy.'

North would have preferred to continue on to Jirisan before leaving the range, but he could see the planes circling the peak on the horizon, and the occasional bombs dropping from them. His guerrillas were still active in the area, which would mean the mountain was also crawling with reactionaries hunting them.

He wanted to meet his comrades there, both the northern soldiers that had stayed behind, and the southerners that lived in the area. Their perseverance deserved to be praised, and they should know that their country was still fighting for them.

But he couldn't. Just like with his soldiers at the front, he couldn't risk one of them knowing where he was and being captured, having the information tortured out of them. If it was just him...

But it wasn't.

So they briefly rested in the high peaks, then left them for the smaller hills and ridges that lined the land between the Sobaeks and the Raktong River, the ones that North's army had fought their way through almost two Julys ago.

There were more enemy patrols here, Rhee's men training in mountain combat to be sent to the front or to hunt guerrillas. A light rain and cloud cover made their daylight travel slightly safer, but they were still forced to slow their pace.

North tried to fight his impatience. They had only been travelling for three and a half full days, which meant they were only slightly behind schedule. And now that they had a vague idea of enemy positions and activity, the route home would be sped up enough to compensate for the burden he'd be carrying.

No. Choe Jong-ok wasn't a burden. Not even when she was dead.

In the early hours of April 15th, they reached the Raktong River. And just like that, they were farther south than they'd made it last summer, and North was standing on ground he had stood on two years ago, that had taken his soldiers over a month to reach, that he and China's hadn't been able to in a year and three months.

If only it was that easy for an army.

The moon was clouded over, casting shadows over the fields, turning the landscape into a jumble of black and grey. But North's boots trod it with familiarity, over the artillery-scarred hills and muddy paths, through the crumbling villages and earth that no longer held any traces of the black ash of napalm or the houses it had burned away, until he was standing on the edge of a field.

The pine was gone, but he hadn't needed it anyway. He picked his way around the rows, careful not to trample the small sprigs of wheat. It didn't matter if it could be used to feed Rhee's army- it could also feed his people.

He hadn't thought about what he'd do if she was gone. If Rhee's butchers had reached her before him.

But they knew most of the bodies buried in the earth were there because of them. They wouldn't dare risk digging up something they shouldn't. She was still right where they'd left her.

He dropped to his knees on the edge of the field closest to the Raktong, among the gnarled roots still clinging to the ground, and unslung his Type 49, leaning it against the jagged stump. The grass was fresh, short blades sprouting thickly in one spot. Wordlessly, he untied the small spade from his belt, and started to dig.

The earth was rich and dark, as soft as it was when he'd put her in it. Softer. Like she was eager for him to bring her home to her sister.

But that was stupid. Choe Jong-ok was dead. He was digging down to a skeleton.

China watched him from a pace away. "Who was this?"

"Choe Jong-ok," North answered. And as the spade entered the ground with a soft 'schk,' and he heard instead dirt tumbling out of shaking hands to spatter on a body, he found himself saying, "Her favourite colour was blue."

China kneeled on the other side of the grave, widening the hole he'd made with his hands. "Tell me about her."

North did. He told him about how she'd been a quiet child, how she was smart and kind and knew how to listen, how she aided the Korean People's Revolutionary Army after Liberation, how she'd joined the Worker's Party and launched an information campaign to stop people from electing her for her village's People's Committee. How she hadn't wanted to join the army. Everything Choe Jong-mi had told him as she cried over her little sister's grave, he told China, and his comrade listened.

They hadn't been able to bury her deep. Soon his spade hit something with a clang, and North carefully used his hands to extricate her dented metal canteen, setting it aside. He didn't need to look at what he'd written on the message the General had sent him. He remembered every word.

And he remembered the football on the other side.

North switched to his hands, not wanting to damage her. As he plunged them into the earth, he felt coarse fabric and something smooth and cool. Gradually, the dirt fell away, exposing bone that shone white compared to the dark around them. A sweep of his hand revealed her face, one dark hollow staring up at the night sky.

The other eye was covered by the bandages that Kangwon had wrapped her white phosphorus burns in, and as North gently worked her skull out of the grave, it fell away.

He held Choe Jong-ok's skull up to the heavy clouds, searching the empty sockets and gaping nose slit, the macabre smile of exposed teeth and the scraps of greasy dead hair still clinging to her skull for some hint of the woman that had blushed and scolded her sister on Liberation Day, or charged straight into the path of an enemy plane in order to save a comrade.

But it was just a skeleton. Of course.

North set her down gently, brushing a strand of short hair out of her face, before liberating the rest of her bones from the grave. China helped, handling them with care, until they couldn't find anything in the dirt but the rotting bandages and the shift she'd died in.

Lined up on the grass, the bones looked both too little and too much. Too little to make a person and too much... Too much.

North untied the burlap sack he'd had on his belt, unrolling it. He nestled her bones inside, along with her canteen and her scorched uniform. Behind him, China reburied the other fabric without being told.

By the time they were done, the black sky was turning grey. North stood, hoisting the sack onto his back, and bent forwards slightly, picking up the final thing he'd brought- a broad white cloth with thick straps that he'd kept rolled under his pack.

China stepped forward, and though he wanted to snap at him, he let him steady the bag of bones on his spine.

Choe Jong-ok was his responsibility. He should do this by himself. But he wouldn't risk her falling.

North wrapped the podaegi around his back, bringing the straps around his front and crossing them up over his shoulders, pulling them tight under the bulge of the bag, before wrapping them around his waist and tying them tightly at his front, leaving the bones snugly pressed against his back, the way mothers carried their infants before they could walk. His hands made the motions with familiarity, having used this method to transport supplies many times before. Now he would use it carry one of his people.

He straightened, and even though he should be turning north, his eye went to the east.

He couldn't see the Raktong from here. Only the hills before it, and those that rose across it. The high cliffs South Pyongan's tank had fallen from. Obong-ri, that they'd protected so fiercely. The hill where they'd looked at Yeongsan and been so damn close-

China stepped back, looking at him from above his mask with serious eyes. "Are we going anywhere else?"

He knew what he was really asking. The same thing South Pyongan had been.

North looked east as the light grew paler, like a beacon. He could feel the cord in his chest aching as it felt more slack between him and the person the other end was tied to than it had in a year and eight months.

Busan was there, only half a day's walk away. His provinces were there, waiting for him to save them. America was there, thinking he was safe so far from the front. South was there.

Whispers of memory crowded in, the voices that had called out to him with worry and fear as he stood nearby and told them they had to retreat, threaded through with his provinces', his brother's, his own.

'Don' make us wait too long, you hear?'
'I will not lose another province.'
'This will be the last Liberation Day that we spend Divided.'
'You said this would be over soon.'
'We will return.'
'I will come for you.'
'See you soon?'
'See you soon.'

'Keep your promise.'
'I promise.'

Intention wrapped around the cord, holding it tight.

He could try. He could try to kill America, try to rescue his provinces, try to knock his brother out or make him see sense or just talk to him, to tell him everything that America and his army had done to their people, to convince him to come with him and end this, to prove that the word he'd used for him back then was right and he was still-

But he couldn't. Killing America would be tantamount to suicide, as his crumbling nation lashed out in a final death rattle. He had let Japan slip from his grasp for that same reason. And Japan hadn't had the atom bomb.

Freeing his provinces' bodies wouldn't free their minds from the Commands. They might even have ones to stop that from happening. He didn't trust America not to have forced South to program them to harm themselves or... And it would only draw out a ceasefire.

And in the end, that hadn't been what his promise to South Chungcheong had meant. When he had sent her off to the south after the Division, and in their first communication after the war began in earnest, he hadn't promised to keep her safe or rescue her.

He had promised to Liberate their country.

And he had failed at that. He hadn't been able to Liberate it in time, or in the way they wanted. He had seen it in her eyes when they met in the POW holding camp- he had let her down, just like everyone else.

But just like how his soldiers kept fighting, even now she had passed his instructions on to Pak Seo-nam, when it wasn't an order. And she had saved his book of names from the chosonjip of her own volition. Even when she had to know he couldn't bring the army sweeping down on Busan to Liberate them directly, she had still placed her faith in him. She still believed he could free them.

And the way to do that was though the armistice. He couldn't jeopardize that. When he had made that promise to come for his provinces no matter what, it had been when he was naïve, and hadn't understood fully what war cost. He did now. They all did.

He couldn't risk trying to save them when it would only disrupt the ceasefire, put Korea in danger, and possibly even get them hurt or worse. Not when he knew America wouldn't risk killing them right now.

If it was just him, he would still have to try. But he had promised his General he wouldn't do anything to jeopardize Korea.

And looking at China standing next to him, looking at him with eyes similar to the way he'd looked at him in Seoul...

'What do you want to do?'

He thought if he chose to go, it would jeopardize more than Korea.

And his brother...

'She begged him to run. And he tore the gun out of her hands.'

He'd been cautious of him notifying America if he showed up in Busan at the beginning of the war. Now...

His mental grip on the cord that bound them loosened, leaving it slack and aching.

He couldn't jeopardize their country.

"No," he said to China, trying to pretend the word didn't fall as reluctantly as it did.

His comrade nodded, giving no indication as to how he felt about that. "Do you have anything else you need to bring back?"

North's gaze was drawn across the hills, towards the small rice paddies beyond them.

Roe Chul was buried there, along with the rest of South Pyongan's tank crew.

'You better have meant what you said about my bones being buried here. I'll come back and haunt you if you don't.'

'I promise, Comrade Roe Chul. Your bones will be buried in Chaejon-ri.'

The man was dead. But the promise had been made when he was alive.

But to dig those bones up, to haul them across the Peninsula for over a thousand ri, over mountains and though the frontline with a deadline, like he had no other choice...

It felt like an admission. One he couldn't make.

"No," he said again to China, tearing his eye away from the distant grave. "We're done here."

Corpses didn't care where they were buried. The living did. And there was no one waiting for the soldiers of Tank 44 to come home. No one that couldn't wait. No one that didn't need to wait.

And he knew Roe Chul would haunt him anyways.

"Come on," he said, heading back for the hills, back for the north, like he had two years ago. "Let's go."

He would be back. And when Korea was Liberated, he would bury Roe Chul in his hometown with his own hands.

He could still keep his promise.

Heartwarming: forty-five year old woman and forty-one year old man share their first kiss. <3
And forty-one year old man and □□□ year old man go sanctioned graverobbing.

Well, it's technically not Liaoxi's first kiss, as Manchukuo once burst into Fengtian's room, forcibly kissed her, was slapped hard enough to send him sprawling, then proceeded to kneel on her floor with his hands over his head while she stood there uncomfortably as his minders dragged him away. But it's her first kiss as Liaoxi and the first one she actually chose. So her first kiss.

I wrote this chapter in one day. The other days were spent trying to think of a poem. Embarrassing. There needs to be a study conducted on how I can write almost anything without flinching except for poetry. I don't even flinch writing intimate scenes. I just get embarrassed re-reading them. But my face was heating up as I wrote North Pyongan's and I was squirming like I was the one having to read it out loud.
If any of you left a comment making fun of it know that by the time you reach the end of this sentence, I will be dead. If you didn't, thank you.

Also I've been slowly editing Chasing Liberty (looking for spelling errors, contradictions, or anything), and at the speed I go, if I did ten chapters a day it would take me nineteen days from where I am now. I read fast, but I do not edit fast.

Shattering Delusions

Korea was supposed to be back by now.

Sure, he hadn't given Pyo an actual day he'd come back, but he had given her that message to give to the guy she was acting all suspicious about, and wanted him at the front on the 17th. And Hae knew he wouldn't want him to wait around, 'cuz if he was a good guy he might get hurt, and if he was a bad guy, one of the bad seeds lurkin' in their soil waiting to sprout, he might turn him over to the enemy. If Korea wanted him there on the 17th, then he was supposed to be there on the 17th.

A good revolutionary was flexible, because plans din't work out all the time. Hae wouldn't have minded if it was a day he was late by, 'cuz sometimes that happened. Like when she thought she could get an entire field turned over before the rain came, but she only got three-quarters done since she had to take a break to tighten the tang on her homi.

But Korea didn't make mistakes like that. Not when he only had to worry about himself, and not when Hae knew he'd be mad that he missed the miguk-nom turnin' in their stupid list.

And he was late by three whole days.

"He wouldn't have missed the deadline," SH said, pacing around the wooden bathing tub. "I know he wouldn't have."

It was evenin' bath time, and Hae had her flashlight out so they could see, which meant her cousin had to swat li'l midges out of her face as she went.

Now that the snow was gone and it was getting warmer, more an' more bugs were coming out. Hae didn't like it. Now she couldn't tell which ones were normal and which ones were agents sent by 'Merica to poison them. Some bugs were good for crops, too, but she had to kill all of them, just in case, even the helpful ones. It made her feel bad.

"It's probably a good thing he did," Pyo said, kicking her legs up on the side of the tub, sloshin' bathwater everywhere. "Otherwise he might've throttled the Yank that handed over that bullshit list."

"Ah wish he would," Hae muttered.

She wasn't the best with numbers math unless she was usin' it to predict harvests, but if the Yankees had came up with that new number on accident, it would mean even she could count better than them.

But she knew all of the guys 'Merica had doing that stuff would be rich and privileged. They could afford school. So they were either choosin' to be stupid like him, or they were evil. Hae had decided was probably both.

"I wish I had some soap," Pyo said, scrubbing hard at her arms with the clear water, makin' it the same yucky brown-red colour it always turned when Hae bathed.

SH suddenly stopped, whirling around to them with her eyes wide. "You don't think that's why they gave us that list like that, do you? If they caught him, America might want to drag out the war more to-"

"I don't think he really needs an excuse to drag out the war," Pyo interrupted, and Hae could see her talkin' to SH with her eyes.

'Hey, not in front of Hae.'

Hae pouted, resting her chin on the edge of the tub, making sure to keep her flashlight up so South Pyongan could see.

She wasn't a kid. She wasn't going to start screaming an' cryin' just because she was scared Korea might be in trouble. She'd been real brave in the holding camp, hadn't she?

The Gen'ral wouldn't tell her what exactly Korea was doing down south, but he'd told her he hadn't been planning on going to Busan. And if he didn't, then she knew there was no way 'Merica or any of the traitors would ever catch him. Korea was too fast and tough for that, and knew their country way too well. If he wanted to, he could probably play cat and mouse with 'em for days, the way they'd used to. And Mao Zhilong was pretty sneaky, too. He'd snuck up on Hae a couple times to slip candy into her pockets (not a bribe since she hadn't accepted it, she'd just found it there). So she wasn't too worried for Korea, not in the way she'd been worried for Kang an' Gang in dumb ol' Norway.

But she was more worried than she'd been a few days ago.

But SH was even more worried. So Hae smiled at her, pretendin' she hadn't seen Pyo's look.

"There's no way Korea would get got," she said confidently. "He probably just ran into some reaction'ries, so he has to take the long way home."

Pyo nodded. "Yeah, what she said. Now come here and tell me if this looks like a rash."

"Can you take this seriously?" SH asked, all distressed as she threw her hands down.

"I take scarlet fever very seriously," Pyo assured, turning around so Hae could look at her back instead, sweeping her flashlight over it.

Her skin was smooth and the same pretty blue it always was, with only her paler scars mottlin' it. And all those stupid burns.

"Not a rash," she declared.

"Korea is missing," SH stressed, eyes flashin'. "He's somewhere down south doing who knows what, surrounded by the enemy, and we need him back now to deal with America throwing the talks again."

"Freaking out about it isn't going to solve anything," Pyo pointed out.

"I'm not 'freaking out,'" SH snapped. "I am worried."

Hae looked down at the dirty water in Pyo's tub, sloshing as she shifted around, ripples makin' her reflection go all wobbly.

Korea had been real upset that he'd missed the secret sessions starting, and she knew even though he'd been saying the POW problem was almost all settled, he had to have known 'Merica might be schemin' something like this up again, too. She knew he wouldn't have missed the list deadline unless he really, really had to.

"Ah'm... a li'l worried, too," she admitted.

She hadn't even got to see Korea that much since he woke up. He'd only been up for eleven days before he left, and most of them he'd either been worrying over Kang an' Gang or holed up in Jonsung complex. They'd only really talked once, and it was when she was tellin' him everything that happened, and he was scolding her for getting Kang to not tell him that she died. And even though he'd been more mad at her cousin at that point, and hadn't been too disappointed in her, he had still been disappointed.

If somethin' had happened to him, and that was the last time she ever-

'Nope! Bad thought, go away.'

South Pyongan looked at her an' SH, then heaved a big sigh, sitting up to grip the tub's rim with her hands.

"Look, I'm really sorry I let him go, okay?" she said, all uncomfortable-like. "But I told you I don't think he was planning on storming Busan or anything. If I did, I would've dragged him back here. You've got to trust me on this."

SH sighed, all the fight going out of her as she slumped against the tree growin' next to the tub.

"I do trust you," she said. "And I'm not mad at you or anything, really. But you know even if he really wasn't planning on doing anything drastic, that can change. You know he can be..." She thought for a second, then settled on, "Impulsive."

Hae frowned. That was a word Korea used a lot for Pyo, usually when he was criticizin' her, which meant SH was probably using it in a bad way.

"Korea ain't impulsive," she protested. "He just realizes he needs to do things, then he does 'em without thinkin' too much about it."

"If I said that to him during a criticism session, he'd probably hit me over the head," South Pyongan pointed out, and Hae nodded proudly.

"Ayuh."

SH shook her head. "Even if those were different things-"

"And they're not," Pyo cut in.

"-it still ends the same way." SH crossed her arms, lookin' out into the dark that crowded in around the clearing.

Hae huddled in closer to the tub, feelin' the warm water against her chest though the wood. She wished she'd got to cuddle with Korea before he left.

South Pyongan looked between them again, then huffed. "C'mon, comrades. There's no way he'd risk our asses getting bombed just to go shank the Yank. He said all that crap at the big session last January about not killing him unless we had to, right?"

"That was last year," SH said, all tense. "Before things..."

She trailed off, her fingers grabbing the hem of her tunic.

Pyo's grip on the tub tightened, but she shook her head. "What hasn't changed is the Yankee loser's big bomb. No matter how impulsive he is, Korea's not gonna risk us getting Japaned just for a little revenge. He's..." The corner of her lips dimpled a li'l, but Hae couldn't tell if she was smilin' or frowning. "More responsible than that, yeah?"

Hae watched SH's uniform stretch, and thought she'd have to remind her that ripping it would be violatin' the army economization order, and she'd have to report her.

But then she let go, exhaling real slow.

"You're right," she said. "I'm sure he wouldn't do something that risky."

"He probably wouldn't be planning a Geoje jailbreak either," Pyo added, leaning back in the tub again. "He's got to know there's no way even he could get everyone back here. It'd just be saving a few and getting way more killed, which is like, the opposite of his whole thing."

SH nodded confidently. "And I don't think he would risk rescuing our cousins when we're-" Her smile got a li'l tight. "When we were so close to a ceasefire."

She said the last part to Hae, like she might be worried he would try. And since she sounded less upset than she had since the Gen'ral told them Korea had taken off again, her cousin bobbed her head.

"Right," she chirped. "Korea din't know 'Merica was goin' to mess with the numbers, so ah don't think he'd go cause trouble when things were goin' smooth."

And the sessions were secret, which meant he wouldn't hear about it on the radio when he was down south or anythin'.

Hae thought that was probably why the miguk-nom had made the sessions private in the first place. Not in case they talked about the massacres they'd been doin' on Geoje Island after all ('cuz they never had), but so they could hide the no-good, rotten thing they'd been planning on doing.

SH's shoulders relaxed. "Yes," she said. "You're right. I'm sure he's just got caught up in something, and he'll be back any day now. Now hurry up and get out of the tub," she ordered Pyo. "You're burning all the wood, and we still need our turns."

Hae sat on her log while SH briskly scrubbed down Pyo's back, and she complained about germs. She pulled her knees up to her chest, balancin' her flashlight on them for her cousins, and gazed out into the forest, towards the south, where Korea had gone without them. Again.

She wasn't worried about Korea gettin' caught trying to 'shank' 'Merica. She already knew he'd never do something like that, even though she really wanted him to. Hambu had been grumbly about it, but he was right that if Korea hadn't killed Japan when he had the chance, he wouldn't go out'a his way to kill the miguk-nom. Japan had put her in the hole, after all, and he'd done all that bad stuff to all of them. America was just as bad, but he hadn't had the chance to do anything too awful himself (even though Hae was still mad about that slap).

She wasn't worried about him gettin' got at the Geoje camp either. It wasn't like he couldn't get their POWs all the way back here- Korea could do anything. But he couldn't do it stealthily. It would make a big mess and take the wheel off the talks, even now that the Yanks had broke it. And she wasn't worried about him getting caught tryin' to free their cousins. In the POW camp, she'd known Korea was going to come for her 'cuz he could. And he'd promised that if he could, he would.

But he couldn't right now. There were the Commands and the negotiations, and even if the Yankees were dastardly liars that were messing things up again, Korea wouldn't risk messin' 'em up even more.

Neither SH or Pyo had mentioned what she was really worried about. Looking at their faces, SH's exasperated expression as their blue cousin worried about rashes and stuff, Hae wondered if it was 'cuz that was what they were really worried about, too, and didn't know how to make her feel better when they couldn't make themselves feel better.

Korea was too good to get caught by the Yanks or the traitors. He was quick and strong and clever, and he could get out of anything. Hae had seen it happen maybe a thousand times, and exaggerating facts was a tool of the reactionaries, so that wasn't what she was doing. He was always one'a the first to notice when there was an ambush, or if an enemy scout was watching from the hills, or when a villager was acting too suspicious to be anythin' but a Japanese spy.

But somehow, the Southern One had took his eye. Even though he was a whiny li'l yellow-belly that wasn't Korea, he'd hunted him down in their forests and cut the real Korea's eye out.

Korea said it was an ambush, and he wouldn't lie. Which meant he really hadn't seen it coming.

And that was what worried Hae.

She wished he'd taken her with him, or one of the others. She liked Mao Zhilong, she wouldn't mind if he tagged along, but he din't know the stuff they knew. And even if he did, Hae couldn't count on him to protect her country, 'cuz even if he was nice, he wasn't one of them.

She knew to watch out for the Southern One, and she'd give her life for Korea in a second. But he never took her with him. Not to fight Japan, not to stay in Seoul, not to Chorweon or the most dangerous missions after they'd joined the KPRA.

Hae was the only one that knew how lonely his heart felt, and she thought she might be the only one that realized the Division had made it worse. And if he was down south and felt that ache, the same one she'd felt every single day in the hole...

She drew her legs closer, trying to beam her thoughts across their land like a radio, hopin' her country could hear them.

'Please come home soon, Korea.'

—

A few days earlier

North and China trekked back towards the Sobaeks, stopping for a rest as soon as they were out of the foothills. It was slightly longer than the others, since they'd pushed themselves hard the night before to reach the Raktong while it was still dark.

It made North itch, but it was still only the 15th. Three days was enough time to make it back behind their lines, and wouldn't leave South Pyongan's merchant waiting for long. Even if it ended up being four, so long as they got back at some point on the 19th, he'd be able to join the discussion on the revised list of POWs.

Or do damage control.

The Korean pretended he didn't see the look China was giving him as they settled in, taking first rest since he refused, sleeping curled up in the back of a shallow cave with Choe Jong-ok's bones still on his back.

In the bunker, he always fell asleep after the other country. Doing it while he was awake, and they were deep in enemy-held territory, made it difficult to close his eye. But the pressure against his spine made it easier, even knowing what it was.

The soft humming filling the cave had nothing to do with it.

The next day, their conversations had fizzled out entirely, except for when he would turn down China's offer to wear the podaegi or carry his pack for a few ri. It wasn't an uncomfortable silence, only the one that fell between soldiers on the march. North couldn't do much but focus on not letting himself limp, and China was still giving him that look, watching him out of the corner of his eye.

It was night, and they were padding through the still thickly-forested ridges above Huibang Falls, almost at the Taebaeks again, when he finally demanded, "What?"

China eyed him again, that long contemplative stare that made his hackles raise. The falls ran below, the ridges amplifying the sound between them, turning it into a distant thunder.

"Before I tell you this, can I get a promise that you won't storm off?"

The words made North's hackles rise more.

"What is it?"

His comrade kept walking. "A promise, please. I don't want either of us to end up stranded in the mountains."

"Fine, I won't 'storm off,'" the Korean agreed impatiently. "Now tell me."

China was still silent for a few more paces, sliding through the gnarled yew trunks. Then he said, "Do you remember that letter America left in Gyeongmudae for you?"

The one he had torn into pieces, and China had pieced back together before burning.

North eyed him, wary of where this was going. "...Yes."

"There was some information on it I think you should hear."

"Then spit it out," North snapped, tense.

China cut his eyes to him. "It said that your brother was the one who ordered Seoul burned."

North halted, his boots suddenly rooted to the forest floor. "What?"

China stopped, turning back.

"Aside from all the taunts, America was telling you that the one who gave the order to burn Seoul during their retreat last year was your brother."

"Don't screw around."

"I'm not." The eyes over his mask were solemn.

Pressure started to build in North's chest. "You said it was nonsense. 'Useless taunts and nonsense.'"

China stared into his eye. "And you told me your brother would never hurt you."

"He wouldn't."

The other country tipped his head. "I know he's the one who took your eye."

North's jaw locked for a second, fighting the urge to cover his eyepatch. "Who told you that?"

"Does it matter?" he responded. "It's true, isn't it? You told O-geun that the enemy took your eye, but it was your brother all along."

"America made him," he shot back, and even though the look in China's eyes didn't change, it still made him bristle. "And that doesn't matter. He would never burn Seoul."

China's head tipped the other way. "And why not, when he cut his brother's eye out with his own hands?"

Because that was just North. But burning Seoul would have hurt South, too, it would have hurt Gyeonggi, it had hurt their people.

"America was lying," North clipped, the pressure moving into his throat, trying to choke the words. "South would never do that. He was lying to try and turn me against him, just like he's trying to turn him against me."

The accusation Kangwon had hurled at his brother from his report echoed in his mind. 'If you're against our people, you're against us.'

South wasn't against their people, and he wasn't against North either. He was just scared. That was why he had came after him that night at the Parallel, it was why he hadn't followed him at the Raktong. Because he was scared and didn't realize who America was.

But he had to now. America had been the one to burn Seoul, him and MacArthur. South knew now, he was still just scared. North knew, he knew because his brother had left his own note.

'잘못했어.'

North jerked his head up, lips peeling back from his teeth. "But I won't let him. And I won't let you try to me against him, either."

"I'm not trying to," China said calmly. "I just thought you should know. 'The more knowledge Korea has, the better.'"

North spun away, branches cracking as he paced in a tight circle before reeling on him again.

"Then why didn't you tell me before?!" he demanded, voice echoing under the trees. "Why did you tell me it was fucking nonsense just to say it wasn't now?!"

China stared at him quietly, and North bared his teeth at him.

"My brother would never burn Seoul," he snarled. "And he would never hurt me."

The foreigner gave him that look, the same one his provinces had around the criticism circle that made his skin itch and jaw creak.

"America lied," he growled, advancing on China. "He was fucking lying. This is exactly what he wants- for me to doubt my brother the way-"

His chest spasmed, and he suddenly slammed by China, shoulder-checking him so hard he hit a tree, shaking the leaves.

"I'm going ahead," he clipped. "Don't catch up to me if you know what's fucking good for you."

"I told you while we were here specifically so you couldn't run away," China called after him. "What happened to not storming off?"

North didn't answer, stomping over the bare ridgeline, sliding down into another stand of yews.

His body felt hot and prickly, his burnt skin too tight for his body.

China was lying. And even if he wasn't, even if he really was just telling him now because things were different than last year, America was.

South would never hurt him, he would never hurt their people. He knew he hadn't burned Seoul because he knew he'd realized by then that he should have gone with North at the Raktong. He'd seen the way America had treated their provinces, seen the way he treated their POWs, seen the way he treated Korea, and understood that he was wrong. He'd realized the second he went back to Busan. All those things his provinces had reported him saying were just falsehoods America had fed him and things he felt like he had to say because he knew he was being monitored. He only stayed because he wasn't North and he was afraid. North knew America was lying because America didn't know his brother had left that note, tucked away in the desk like they'd done when they were young, apologizing. South had apologized, he had said he was sorry for not going with North, and North sank his claws into that, refusing to let it struggle free.

'잘못했어 jalmothaesseo jalmot-'

North froze suddenly, his insides going cold.

잘못했어. 'I'm sorry.'

Or more, 'It's my fault.'

South had never apologized with jalmothaesseo. He had always used mian. When he would tug the blanket off North at night or accidentally touch one of his bruises, it was always 'Miaaaaan,' in that little guilty whine that left his brother no choice but to forgive him, even if he'd actually been upset. Even when he apologized at the Raktong, when he had cut out his eye, standing there with that blankly calm look the shock on his face had morphed into and said he was really sorry with North's blood still dripping from his Yankee blade, he had used it. 'Jeongmal mian, hyung.'

'잘못했어.' The word North had clung to for over a year, he now desperately tried to push away, to expunge its meaning from his mind entirely and pretend it had none.

But he knew it did. 'It's my fault' settled into the hollow in his chest in a way 'I'm sorry' never had, and the dreadful truth sank into his bones.

South hadn't been apologizing. He had been taking responsibility.

The fires raging in Seoul as the KPA entered, the thick, black, choking smoke curling over it, the empty streets and torched slums and flattened Yongsan district, the civilians cowering in the hills and pulled out of the rubble, charred and blackened and just as decimated as their capital. The pain that would have enveloped Gyeonggi, making him whimper and writhe like he had on the way to the Raktong, the all-consuming agony that enveloped North as he set foot in the city, solely glad that he was lifting it from his brother. South had given the order. He had been responsible for all of it.

'Family always knows where it hurts most.'

A thick darkness roiled inside of North, hot and black and choking like the smoke from the fires that razed Seoul, and he thought that he might scream.

And then it extinguished, his entire body freezing, every hair left on it standing at attention as the space between his shoulder blades began to prickle.

He was being watched.

North didn't look around, standing rooted under the trees below the ridge. He could hear them now, the soft rustle of undergrowth as bodies moved through it, the 'clink' of firearms, almost inaudible under the echoing waterfall, the things he hadn't heard in his fury.

He was surrounded.

Run. He had to run. To duck and dive and pull his Type 49 from his back without damaging Choe Jong-ok's bones, and he had to do it now.

The tension in him built, his calves flexed, and-

"Comrade!"

It happened in a second. The cry came from the top of the ridge, strident and clear, demanding attention. The trees shook as the men jumped, startled from their hunting crouch. North lunged for where he hadn't heard noise, trying to escape the encirclement.

Behind him, a rifle cracked.

North twisted as he dove, stomach dropping as he realized he didn't feel pain spreading through his body, just in time to see the figure standing on the ridge stagger.

And, silhouetted by the faint moonlight, China fell to his knees.

—

1945

"Absolutely not."

The American soldiers looked down on North, unflinching in the face of his anger. Their faces were pale and gaunt, with protruding noses and unnaturally deep-set eyes, heavy shadows caking them. Their khaki uniforms were rumpled and well-worn. The men had likely been mobilized from some Japanese island, or maybe China, sent to Korea as swiftly as possible.

To claim them.

"I'm afraid it must be so, sir," the one suit with them spoke.

He was a tall man with a long face and small moustache, who had introduced himself as Patrick Hurley, American ambassador to the Republic of China.

"I have explicit orders to detain the Korean Countryhuman until Mr. America arrives to oversee the surrender of Japan," Hurley said, and his eyes slid from North to South. "Or Korean Countryhumans, as it seems."

"Your 'orders' do not apply to us," North growled.

"North," South whispered, scandalized.

North made an effort to reign in his tone and not snap at the first real foreign diplomat he'd had to deal with, conscious of the eyes on them. It was like the bastards had purposefully waited until the declaration of the People's Republic and his denouncement and tacit acceptance of the Joint Administration were over to ambush them like this.

North drew himself up, glaring cold, professional daggers at the foreign men outside of the Gyeonggi Girls' High School.

"You have no authority to enter our country and detain a Korean Countryhuman," North said coldly. "You would not have it if there were one of us, and you do not have it now."

They hadn't even known there were two Korean Countryhumans. They hadn't known about their People's Committees or the proclamation of the People's Republic or how North had fought the Japanese for over twenty years or how South had been imprisoned in the same damn country Hurley had been squatting in. They didn't know a single fucking thing about Korea, yet here they were, rushing to put their boots in their country and on their necks.

"Korea is to be divided," Hurley said, just as cold. "The southern half is to be placed under American authority, including this city."

There was an uneasy rumbling from the crowd, and North knew he couldn't back down. He was already being forced to accept this. He wouldn't tolerate being ordered around in their own country.

"You are not in charge yet." He glared up at the man. "And you will never be in charge. Korea denies this forced Joint Administration. We deny the idea that we need foreigners to put our country back in order when it was them that destroyed it in the first place. We deny taking orders in our own land, and we deny any 'authority' your country thinks it has. We have already began rebuilding our nation."

He swept a hand at Seoul, at the thousand men and women gathered outside the school, independence activists and his revolutionaries, cheeks still glowing. The People's Republic might be only a symbolic declaration, but it had still given them hope to come together to declare it.

"We do not need your 'aid.'" He narrowed his eye at the pale man. "Just as we did not need your trade when your nation attempted to force ours open seventy-four years ago."

A look of confusion flickered in the man's eyes, and North's lip fought not to curl. He didn't even know about the Shinmiyangyo.

Of course he didn't. Korea was just another country in the long list of nations the United States of American thought it had any claim to.

"I don't expect you to know this," he said, knowing he didn't. "But your SS General Sherman invaded our river and broke our laws, violating our native religions and kidnapping our officials. And when our people fought back, you murdered our civilians."

North hadn't been alive for it, but his comrade Kim Il-sung had described the events in detail, his great-grandfather having been there. So had others. And his common sense held the memory in a place of righteous defiance. The crowd murmured, feeling the same way.

"But we kept fighting," he told Hurley, stepping forward, glaring up at him. "And we destroyed your ship. And when your country returned to make us pay for the crime of defending our sovereignty, we still did not bow. And we will not now."

He looked away from the foreigner, boldly turning his back on the armed men to address his people, his provinces lurking to the side, ready to act, and his cowering brother. He couldn't spare a reassuring look for him. Words would have to be enough.

"Korea will not bow to invaders," he announced, his voice ringing over the plaza. "Gone are the years where foreigners can do as they please to our nation and our people. Even if this unjust administration is to be accepted, Korea will never accept any authority but its people's. We are entering our long-awaited shining future, blazing forward to freedom and independence."

The crowd cheered as he easily relit that spark of wild elation that had followed them since Liberation and echoed in the rafters of the school assembly hall. He could see the tears in Lyuh Woon-hyung's eyes.

Satisfied, North turned back to the Americans.

"We are letting the Soviet Union and America walk hand in hand with us towards that future," he said, keeping the grudge out of his voice, projecting only confidence and magnanimity. "We are giving your nations the chance to say that they played a role in the shining paradise our country will become."

He cooled his voice, looking up from under his lids at the man.

"But you decide what that role will be."

North didn't threaten him, not outright. That was what soldiers did, not politicians. But he was still clearly one of the former. His uniform was neat, but worn, even more so than the foreign soldiers'. The red star on his cap was the colour of the blood it was obvious he knew how to spill. And the pistol on his hip glinted coldly in the early autumn sun.

And the Americans were outnumbered. The crowd was pressing in, his words having stirred them, reminded them of how long their nation had truly been menaced by invaders, how Japan wasn't the start and should have been the end. The men and women here had all fought the Japanese government in some way, and by the looks on their faces, they were willing to fight these foreigners, too.

There was a part of North that wanted to let them. To help eliminate these invaders with his people, then go to CCCP and take back his acceptance, to tell him he had a week to get his soldiers out of their country before he declared war, and to tell America that any American that set foot on their soil would be considered his own declaration.

But it wasn't what their country needed. So he settled for not ordering his guerrillas to back off as they moved in closer with the others, coming to stand at their country's back with a deadly promise in their eyes.

And even though their country was the one Dividing Korea, even though they had just dropped bombs that hadn't been thought possible even a few years ago on their former Occupier, even though the American soldiers were armed, and they all stood head and shoulders above North and most of his people, Patrick Hurley stepped back.

"Very well," he said stiffly, moustache quivering in indignation. "You may go."

He was trying to salvage his pride by acting like he had a say in it.

North didn't respond, just curled his lip in disdain, letting the words linger pathetically as he turned around, not sparing another look for them.

"Comrades!" he called, raising his arms for his people. "We have done something great today!"

No matter his views on the People's Republic or the men they'd elected, it was still a milestone in their journey towards liberty. He wouldn't begrudge them that. Any criticisms were best saved for private, political-minded company.

"Korea and our provinces will be moving on," he announced. "To spread the word of our People's Committees across the country and congratulate our people on the freedom we have all fought so ardently for. But I trust that you will handle matters here, and play your part in restoring our nation and moving it beyond what it once was, just as you played your parts in Liberating it.

"We wouldn't be here without you."

His throat swelled as he scanned the sea of white clothes and Korean flags, the taegeuk now striped with crimson. Though these were more well-stitched, they didn't stir his heart the same way those sloppy ones that had flown in Pyongyang did. But the faces of those waving them did.

"Long live the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army!" he called, having completely forgotten the foreign men behind him. "Long live our independence activists! Long live all the Korean people who have fought for our country!"

"LONG LIVE KOREA!" those people roared back, and their voice thrummed in Korea's heart with no Japanese blades to cut it short, no less precious than every other time he had heard it.

South had flinched at the noise, hunching in on himself, so North put his arm around him, making him stand straight. They were cheering for him, too.

His brother smiled at him. But his brows drew in.

North didn't notice. He wanted to stay and let his people embrace him, but they'd already done that inside. And there was too much work to do.

He nodded to his provinces, and they peeled off the wall, marching along behind him as he headed for the meeting spot he'd set with Lyuh Woon-hyung.

He spoke with the man for over an hour, counselling him on how to handle the Americans when they arrived, and cautioning him on the president of the People's Republic. They couldn't have real elections yet, so the decision had been made by the returned members of the Provisional Government and some that had still been here. Lyuh Woon-hyung had been appointed Vice President, while a man named Rhee Syngman was to be President.

North didn't know much about him personally, only that he'd been absent from Korea almost since the Occupation began, was the President of the Provisional Government for a few years, and was in America right now. And while not everyone in the organization was a rightist (Kim Tu-bong, the man that had discovered and brought his brother to him, was a Communist), it was said Rhee Syngman was. And though he didn't begrudge the people of his that had been forced to flee Korea, he did begrudge those that went to America to beg aid from a nation that approved of their colonization in the first place.

He tried to involve South in the conversation, since while Rhee Syngman had been out of office by the time he arrived in China, he had still been in the country. But his brother had apparently never met him. He hadn't met many of the Provisional Government.

He didn't blame the men for keeping his brother's existence a secret (this didn't extend to those that had also known North was out there, and could have told him his brother was safe). Being mostly isolated was better than being recaptured by Japan. But he wished they'd given him more coaching on politics. Even if they fed him their own views, at least it would give North a base for teaching him the right ones for their nation. He could practically hear the birds chirping in his brother's head as he and Lyuh Woon-hyung discussed the governance of Seoul, like whenever he tried to explain Marxism to him.

It wasn't South's fault, though. And he would have time to teach him, even if he didn't stay in Seoul during the Division.

North... still hadn't decided whether he would or not. It wasn't a decision he wanted to make until he had to.

When he was done, he left, and their unit set out for the edge of the city. It was still a thrill to let his steps ring on the stones, unafraid of drawing attention. Once he'd crept through the streets with his insides crushed and blood spilling out of his chest, dragging himself from alleyway to alleyway. Alone. Now he walked proudly with his brother at his side, the way it should be.

But after a second, he realized he wasn't.

North stopped, looking back, and his provinces did, too. South stood on the main road, rubbing his arm.

"What's wrong?" North asked, automatically scanning him and their surroundings.

Had one of the Americans done something earlier? Had a Japanese still in the city just shot him with a dart?

But he looked fine. Just... ashamed.

"I think... maybe we should stay here."

"We can't," North replied. "There's too much to do. And our people have it handled here."

They had to solidify a revolutionary base in the People's Committees as soon as possible, especially in the south where the Americans would soon take control, then they had to get back to CCCP and the guerrillas they'd left with him to make sure he really had obeyed his order not to return to Pyongyang without them. And he still wanted to get to the far north to make sure the Soviets behaved themselves before their military police arrived. America coming put a deadline on things, which he hated, but he needed to-

"No," South said. "I mean, I think we should stay with the Americans."

North blinked. He couldn't immediately process the words.

When he did, he demanded, "What?"

South shifted uncomfortably, but before he could open his mouth, North grabbed his wrist, dragging him down the street.

"We'll be back," he called to his provinces, trying to ignore the stunned looks on some of their faces.

Ssi-bal. South Chungcheong, South Pyongan, Hwang, and North Hamgyong were still skeptical about the time his brother had spent with Japan. They'd been behaving themselves so far, but even that sentence had probably just set him back with them.

North found a quiet alley in the slums on the edge of the city, between two leaning shacks.

"What are you talking about?" he demanded.

South looked down, away from his eyes. "America's going to be here soon, isn't he? Mr. Hurley said it would be in the next five days at most."

"So?" North demanded, baffled.

"So it's not like there much we can do in five days," his brother replied, rubbing his arm again. "Wouldn't it make more sense to stay here?"

"Even if it did, we can't give those bastards what they want." North's lip curled as he remembered the smug look in Hurley's eyes, so sure the Koreas would obey him. "Didn't you hear anything I said?"

"I heard you pretty much threaten him," South said, raising an eyebrow.

"I didn't threaten him," North dismissed. "I warned him."

"Those are just semantics." His brother clutched at his hand. "Brother, those are the guys coming to Divide us, and you're trying to make them our enemies."

"I am trying to make sure they don't make themselves our enemies," the taller Korea growled. "Did you see the look on that bastard's face? He thinks he can walk all over us, just like America. Were you even listening when I told you about the General Sherman and Hawaii and everything he's done?"

"Even if his country's done bad things, that doesn't mean he has," South tried to point out.

"But he has," North growled, clenching his fists.

America hadn't changed since his formation. He was the same Countryhuman that had colonized North America, wiped out its indigenous population and forced the survivors into open-air cages to crush their culture. He was the same country that had turned Cuba and Hawaii into sugar plantations, and he had been the one to authorize the Shinmiyangyo, trying to force them open, cutting down their civilians and occupying their forts on Ganghwa Island, thinking he could do whatever he wanted because that was what colonizers did.

"He also defeated Japan," South argued.

"America didn't defeat Japan!" North snapped. "The Soviet Union did. And our country spent decades fighting him. America didn't do shit when we were being cut down in the streets. He only stepped in because he was threatened, and he only dropped the atom bomb on Japan to threaten CCCP."

"Okay," South said, in that grating 'this is why we shouldn't try to escape today' voice that North could remember so well. "We know him and CCCP hate each other, and we know they're both going to be administering us. Aren't things going to be tense enough already? Do you really need to make things worse by disobeying them?"

The word made North's teeth creak.

"I am not 'disobeying' them," he growled. "They do not have the authority to give us orders. We don't have to obey."

"But it would make it easier."

There was a popping sound in North's temple.

"It would make it easier, wouldn't it?" he snapped, eyes blazing. "Just like it was always easier to play nice with the Japs and do everything Japan wanted, wasn't it? Just like it was easier to eat their food and wear their clothes and obey their rules." His eyes narrowed. "Just like it was easier to stay."

South's eyes flashed indignantly. "It wasn't easier to stay! Do you think anything I went through was easy?"

North's teeth ground together, thinking of his brother locked up alone for years, his brother who had always gotten upset if North didn't feel like talking for even a few minutes, who craved conversation like the rice they were given, even if it was one-sided, his brother who had never stuttered before.

No. He didn't think it was easy. But it was like South thought that over twenty years of war, of taking bullets and slaughtering Japanese and burying their comrades had been.

He shook his head. "Then why do you want to stay now?"

"Because America isn't Japan," South said, his fingers digging into his arm. "And you already said we're going to accept it, so why do you want to fight it?"

"Because it deserves to be fought!" North snapped, then sucked in a breath, trying to calm himself.

"If you want to g-go," South said into the silence of the alleyway. "It's... okay." The words were reluctant, like they were being dragged out of him. "M-Maybe if one of us stays here, it'll make the Americans happy. And you can do all your political stuff, then come back here and stay with me. Did you ask Mr.- Um, CCCP if we could stay together? Even if he said no, maybe I could try and lay on the charm and see if the Americans will let us."

'Let.' Like they needed permission from great powers to do what they wanted to in their own country, to stay together after they'd been separated for so long.

"I... don't really want to be away from you, even for a few days," his brother said, rubbing his arm, using the voice he'd always used when he wanted North to do something. "But if you really have to..."

South smiled tremulously, trying to make a peace offering. But peace wasn't freedom.

And North was starting to remember why his feet had kept walking that night.

"No," he said, and the word made his brother's lips waver.

"No?" South asked hesitantly when he didn't continue.

"No," North repeated. "We can't stay together."

After meeting even that minor American representative, North knew CCCP was right- they wouldn't both be allowed to stay with him. And North couldn't stay with America. If he did, he could work undercover, helping his people if the foreigners went too far. But he wouldn't have the same power that he would have with CCCP, the power to not just put bandages on their country by saving individuals, but the power to change things. To finally take control of their country, to put his people's hands on his reins and help them cauterize it for good. To prepare a base of their people's power for when the Division was disposed of in a few months. If there really was going to be a four-way trusteeship with Britain and the Republic of China, two other capitalist powers, then they needed to form a vanguard party as soon as possible and prepare their people in order to stave off their influence and counter the propaganda they were sure to bring to bear against them.

He couldn't do that here. Not when he would have his brother in his 'ear,' begging him to behave, to keep his head down and not cause problems, just like he always had.

South's face had crumpled at his words, like he'd put his fist into it. "W-What are you saying?" he asked after a moment, words wavering.

"I am saying that if you don't come with me right now, then we won't be together again until the Division is over." The ultimatum tasted like ash in North's mouth.

But he had to make the decision now, or he wouldn't make it at all. And it had to be the one he'd made before.

His brother's eyes widened. "N-No. Nononononono. North-" He threw himself forward, clutching at the collar of North's uniform with his soft white hands. "Please don't leave me, please, not again, please-!"

"Do you think I want to?!" North snapped, making him flinch back with his ferocity, though he didn't let go. "I want you to come with me, South, just like back then! I wanted you to come with me."

It was the closest they'd gotten to talking about it, and it made the fingers around his collar tighten.

He searched his brother's face, looking for what he wanted to see. But all he found was the wide glimmering white eyes that had always begged him to stop fighting, the ones that begged him to stay. The ones that had almost made his feet turn around all those years ago, to slink back to his cage and just keep taking it.

The ones that could make him give up.

"But you didn't," he spat. "Because you're a coward. And you still are."

South flinched like he'd hit him, and his hands slid off his uniform.

North stifled the urge to pull them back, to crush them in his and never let go again.

The tears in his eyes spilled over, running over his disbelieving expression. "You're leaving me again."

He was the one leaving. He was the one that wanted to crawl to the Americans with his tail between his legs.

North wanted to be angry, to scream at him for being like this, for making him walk away again.

But he was his brother. He couldn't be mad at him, not truly. Mostly he'd felt what he had back then, as he had looked into those anchor eyes and known that there wouldn't be any convincing him.

"You're letting me."

South shrank in on himself. "Please," he whispered.

'Please just give up.'

North gritted his teeth. And for once he turned the plea back on him, taking his shoulders firmly in his hands.

"Please, South," he begged. "Come with me."

Even for a few more days, they hadn't had enough time, just a few more days-

But his brother just gave him that despairing look, the same one from their prison doorway, like there was an impassable river between them that he couldn't ford, that he didn't even want to try.

"I- I can't," he whispered, his voice breaking.

North had always wondered if he should have pleaded with him to leave all those years ago. It had always stuck in his head, digging into his brain like a thorn- what if he just hadn't tried hard enough? What if he had just taken one more second to say 'please,' that little word that always broke him?

He supposed it should be a comfort to know now that it wouldn't have changed anything.

He let go of his brother's shoulders, stepping away.

"Then I'm going."

South grabbed for him, but North was already out of the alleyway, back into the warm fall afternoon. And his brother didn't cross the threshold.

"Please," he said again from behind him, raw and desperate.

"I'll see you at the Division, brother," North answered, walking away.

He didn't want to look back. But he had to.

South was watching him with that same look from twenty-six years ago. Scared, hurt, confused. Betrayed. Even though he was the one choosing to stay.

North's feet didn't waver this time as he turned the corner, leaving his brother behind.

Their provinces were waiting for him where he'd left them.

"There you are," Sang said, relieved. Then her brows furrowed. "Where's-?"

"He is staying here," North clipped, making some of his provinces' eyes widen in shock. Others only narrowed. He glared at all of them. "Would any of you like to do the same?"

The answer was instantaneous. "No, Korea."

"Then we move out."

He strode past them, and they followed, knowing not to ask questions.

As he left Seoul and South this time, he was marching, not crawling. But he could feel his heart growing lonely again, the way it hadn't been in weeks. The way he thought it would never have to be again.

But he had to do this. He couldn't stay, just like he hadn't been able to stay back then. It was easy to slip back into being North when he was with his brother. Too easy. And he couldn't be him.

He was Korea. And he had a country to raise from the ashes.

He knew it wasn't South's fault that he was still just South. But if he had just came with him back then, he wouldn't be. North just couldn't understand why-

Whatever. It was in the past. And this wasn't like last time. America couldn't torture South when this Joint Administration was so public, and negotiations would come in three months. North would get his brother back, and he would call him an idiot, flick him on the forehead, and apologize. Then they would just have to put up with five years of trusteeship, giving him time to educate his brother and make sure he was ready to be Korea. He didn't want the end of the Division to Unify them, and he doubted it would- Korea could only Unify when the contradictions that had created two of them in the first place were reconciled.

And once they were Unified, they would be Korea, and their country would be finally, truly, irrevocably Liberated. South would be fine until then.

After all, this Division would only last a few months.

There is a very small hint in here about where China learned South was the one responsible for North's eye. Veryyy small. Also Safeway Pyongyang reference!!

Patrick Hurley was the US ambassador to the ROC at the time of the Division, and from what I can find, he was in China. But in real life he didn't go to Korea. In this, America just wanted someone to lock down the Korean Countryhuman before the commies could get to him (completely unaware of North's history or there being two of them).

I can't talk about this much because the topic makes me reasonably feel insane with rage and grief, but the sheer amount of Slavic girls and women in the Epstein files is heartbreaking. Soviet women went from being one of the most advanced and liberated in the world, with high education and some of the most female scientists to commodities. Bodies to be shipped across the seas. And it's especially the Slavic ones because racist Western men can still get the 'purity' of a white woman, but still with an 'exotic' air to her, and no ability to gain independence when she's across the sea from her homeland and family, and can't speak English. How the men in the files talk about not liking black women. They want all the vulnerabilities of an immigrant, but in a pale package. They want whiteness, but they also want the thrill of conquering the other that comes with Slavic women. Girls. The post-collapse period interviews with the kids who are talking about how they sell their bodies, how they're eleven and so young, are some of the worst things I've ever seen. How many of them ended up in America under some capitalist man or on his plate? And how Western men immediately went from portraying the Soviet woman as brutish and 'manly' to mail-order bimbo brides or whores. They can't stand to see a woman or women as a whole have real power, when they do they need to crush them down and brutalize them, make us 'women' again. Even the idea of the Soviet woman couldn't be allowed to stand, she had to be fetishized, torn down and conquered. It doesn't matter that the Soviet Union was revisionist towards the end, the collapse was still one of the worst things to happen in history. And for women, I might say it is the worst, maybe only under the formation of patriarchal religions. It's a very good thing I discovered Marxism because if I didn't I would be a virulent misandrist with an interest in adventurism. As it stands I know men aren't the enemy-capitalism and the intimate relationship it has with the patriarchy is. And hurting random men on the street will not solve that.

Fetters Of Conscience

There was no time for reflection on the battlefield, no time to process things. If you stopped to take the situation in, you died.

North had survived thirty-three years of real combat. He was already moving as China went down, springing away from the encirclement, darting through the woods while shots rang out behind him, turning the yew trunks to splinters. Behind him he could hear boots scrabbling up the mountain ridge, and he knew the reactionaries were going for China to finish him off.

He hadn't gone far enough to double back safely, but he did it anyways, turning sharply, a bullet whizzing by his face close enough to feel. North charged for the ridge, bursting from the trees and sprinting straight into the few men jogging up it. They scattered, shouting in alarm as bullets pelted the rocky ground around them. North tore through, ducking to stop a man from grabbing him, ignoring the pain in his thighs and the heat that shot through his leg as one grazed his calf.

China wasn't on the top of the incline, and he almost felt a moment of relief, thinking the shot hadn't hit him, he'd only been faking it-

But as he crested the ridge, he could see a figure crumpled halfway down, unmoving.

"Get the North!"

Still with no time to pause, North pelted down the slope, throwing himself forward as the men behind him followed, spraying the mountains with gunfire. He grit his teeth, knowing there wasn't any time to carry China down. So even though his comrade was injured, he slid across the final stretch, slamming into him at full speed, both of them tumbling off an outcrop, falling back towards the forest they'd been walking through.

North twisted in mid-air, not wanting to land on China in his arms or Choe Jong-ok's bones on his back. So it was his side that hit the ground a few metres down with full force, agony lancing through his burn gash. He gasped, but China let out a worse noise, a thick gurgle that made his blood run cold. He couldn't let it stun him, so he forced himself up, hauling the other man with him, wrapping his arm around him and dragging him forward as the men chasing them took the slightly longer way down, calling for his head.

North's heart thundered in his chest, China's blood soaking his side. His comrade's breathing was wet as his feet stumbled along.

"I think they shot me in the lung," he panted, raspy and whistling as the air leaked out of him.

"No fucking shit," North growled, panic shooting through him.

Ssi-bal. Lung punctures were almost always fatal unless they were treated immediately. And even if they weren't being shot at-

A rifle cracked in the woods, and he hurried forward, dropping China in the tangled white branches of a fallen yew tree, cramming him into the cage of limbs, cursing at every crack of dead wood. They couldn't get away like this, and he couldn't fight holding him.

The front of China's uniform was soaked with blood, and his black mask glistened wetly as it soaked through the fabric. Still, as he looked up at North, hand over the crimson liquid pouring from his stomach, the Korean could tell he was smiling.

"Ah," he said, far too calmly, his words drowning in his own blood. "Sorry, comrade. But I'm about to pass out."

His eyes rolled back in his head, and he slumped back.

North wanted to shake him, to slap him back awake. But there wasn't time.

His mind raced. His comrade needed medical attention and he needed it now. But even if they could lose the reactionaries, the front was still days away, and he hadn't brought an aid kit.

The blood kept pouring out of China, the stain spreading.

This was his fault. He shouldn't have let him come, he shouldn't have raised his voice or stormed off, he shouldn't have-

Raised voices in the woods nearby, undergrowth cracking under dozens of boots, firearms stuttering, striking wood, stone, and earth in a violent staccato.

North couldn't think about that. He couldn't think about how the other Countryhuman would die if he didn't get medical attention, or how he had taken the shot meant for him, he couldn't think about how many more ri were left until the front or how his brother was just one more person he hadn't understood. All he could think about was destroying the enemy.

His body hadn't stopped moving, snatching China's Type 50, tearing off the podaegi and shoving the bones and his pack in with his wounded comrade, covering them both in dead branches, hoping his rasping, gurgling breathing wouldn't give him away. He stood, ammunition in his pouch, submachine guns slung over his shoulders and pistol at his hip, leaving China with his in case he woke up. They hadn't brought rifles.

Everything drained from him, his panic and rage and grief and pain, leaving him cold and ready to kill.

He couldn't afford to be stealthy. He needed to lure the men away from China. So he took off back into the woods, crashing through them loud enough to draw fire.

Three men he'd seen climbing the ridge, and he'd heard at least six when he was surrounded. Likely a patrol unit, so he could expect ten or more, and at least one sent off for reinforcements. From their hunting cries, they had realized who he was, so there wouldn't be any giving up the chase. He had to finish this quickly.

"My quarry isn't with you!" he called as he wove through the trees, avoiding a bare stretch of slope. If he could convince one or two to defect, it would help. "I'm not here to kill you!"

Except for whoever had shot China. He was going to tear him to pieces.

He didn't use his gun until he was far enough away that stray shots wouldn't hit his comrade's shelter. When he was, he turned, firing with his Type 49, spraying the woods and sending the men diving into the darkness. Someone shouted, and in the chaos, he dove to the ground, pressing himself to the thick trunk of a fir as the men returned fire, guns stuttering until someone called to hold.

There was a moment of silence as the reactionaries listened, and North held as still as possible. He needed a rifle for what he had planned.

"Fan out," the unit commander barked.

"Should we double back?" a young-sounding man asked. "He might try and go back for the casualty."

"No need," another answered, tinged with smugness. "I'm sure I got a killshot."

North grit his teeth, but didn't peer around the trunk to try and spot who was speaking.

"Kim's right," the commander said. "Take Pak and head back. Stay on alert. The North is vicious."

He would show him vicious. Before those two men got too far away. North stayed still as the unit spread out to search. There were no shadows under the trees, so he had to count on footsteps, listening as a pair tread closer.

When they were just around the tree, he lunged. A rifle blasted, but he'd aimed low, and the shot went over his head. He grabbed the man's legs, yanking back as more shots followed, dragging him behind the tree and plunging his tiger-hilted dagger into his throat, not wasting a second before he tore the rifle out of his grasp and ran, hoping that the two that had left would return to follow.

North fled until he burst out of the trees, heading up a bare ridge, sacrificing cover for high ground. Rocks and dirt slid under his heels, almost sending him plummeting, but he kept his footing and reached the top of the ridge, throwing himself to the ground, heart pounding. He propped his rifle up, wriggling until he could peer down the steep slope, and the second there was break in the bullets flying around him, he raised his upper half, firing two shots.

One man went down, a round in his head, but he had to duck as fire was returned, and the other he'd been aiming for only cried out as his shot took him in the shoulder instead.

Ssi-bal. He needed to make every rifle bullet count before they got too close. As soon as there was another gap in shooting, he fired again, managing to get two headshots before being pinned. His next attack got one, and the sight of half of the reactionary men advancing before he was pressed down under a constant barrage of submachine fire.

The men alternated, some climbing while others shot, then switching roles so they advanced piecemeal up the ridge, inexorably. North was only able to get three more shots off, and two of them went wide as his targets zigzagged.

Now that they were close enough, he switched to his Type 49, spraying the climbers, watching two go down before the whites of their eyes were close enough to see, and he took off running again, sliding down the rolling hill on the other side of the ridge, taking sharp turns and still feeling rounds strike clods of dirt from under his boots.

Down into the valley and up onto the next ridge, where he hit the ground and repeated his strategy. The soldiers used their cover and advance method from the start, spreading wide when they got close enough for his Type 49, so he only got two, and one man in the chest. But he was already thinning the herd. The patrol had been bigger than he'd thought, sixteen if the seven men below were all that remained.

"I don't want to hurt you!" he repeated, his voice echoing down the ridgeline. "I am not the enemy! America and the Syngman Rhee regime are. If you leave now, you don't have to die."

“Tough words for someone who’s outnumbered!” someone shouted back over the submachine fire that made him press his face to the ground.

Grit flew into his eye, and he slammed it shut, feeling his chest tighten in a mix of alarm and-

He had given them their chance. And they had chosen. He didn’t need to regret what would come next.

When the shouts echoed from the other side of the ridge, the reinforcements of what sounded like at least another patrol coming to flank him, instead of his stomach sinking, the excitement inside him only built.

He burst up, taking off along the spine of the ridge, stable, but still thin enough that if he zigzagged too wide, he’d go tumbling off and down the hill. He twisted just as the first patrol reached the crest behind him, his last rifle round taking a man in the head, sending him reeling back below, before he tossed aside the empty gun.

He didn't risk firing again, keeping his submachine guns on his back as he pelted along the rocky ground, a hail of bullets falling around him, tearing through his enemy jacket and screaming by his face close enough to taste gunpowder, and this was even better than tearing apart the guerrillas in the Osok Mountains with South Pyongan. He didn’t have to worry about having her out of his sight or holding back to make sure she learned the lesson he wanted her to, and he didn't have to fear a bomb hitting his soldiers down below, the way he had when he'd shot down that plane.

The crisp mountain air streamed against his face, washing away the sympathetic fever and eternal heat from his burns. Sobaek Mountain rose before him, the ridge rising to meet its spine, and the forested hills fell away on either side, silver seas under the light of the half moon peeking through the heavy clouds, an entire mountain for him to use against the men chasing him, either as a maze or a killing ground.

He didn't have to worry about the bullets flying around him because they would only hit him. And he didn't have to worry about getting caught.

It was finally just North.

He should have went east. Even if South alerted America that he was there, he could have escaped. The foreigner didn't know their country, and neither did his men. And Rhee and his brass had spent the Occupation in America and China, never having to learn the lay of the land to survive. Most of the ones that had, like Paik Sun-yup and Kim Sok-won, had already been eliminated in the first and third stages of the war.

Part of him wondered if he should just let the men catch him, bring him to Busan and his brother. He needed to confront him about Seoul, ask if what America's letter had allegedly said had been true. He knew it was. But he needed to hear him say it. He needed to know if he would. And then he needed to do what he should have by the Raktong- drag him back to Pyongyang even if he kicked and screamed.

North didn't flinch as a bullet shot by him, gouging the side of his skull, hot blood running down his cheek.

No. He couldn't. Because it wasn't just him out here. China was hidden down below, bleeding out. He had taken that bullet, and he was depending on North to get him back to safety, and soon.

So the Korean Countryhuman stopped dancing with the gunfire, and plunged suddenly down the ridge, down into the forest that carpeted Sobaek Mountain. And his pursuers followed.

They wove in and out of the firs and yews, North leading them down into the deforested hills and back up into the wilderness as he pleased, emerging from cracks in the land to grab men, tearing their helmets off like shells so he could smash their skulls open on the rocks, leading them into defiles where he deftly scrambled up half-hidden handholds, leaving them trapped in a killing corridor for him to pepper with submachine gun rounds, and leaping from the shadows of trees to grapple with them, using the knife China had given him to finish them off. Slashing, stabbing, shooting, soaking himself and the mountain in hot streams of blood, some of it pouring from him.

He didn't allow himself to get caught up in the rush of hunting, or take risks. He kept his movements simple and deadly, refusing to get bogged down in brawling. The one time he wasn't able to retreat immediately after he'd jammed his blade into the back of a soldier's neck, and been slammed to the ground by two others, he prioritized getting away over killing them, slamming his knee into one of their groins before tearing himself free and fleeing into the dark. He didn't let himself forget that China was waiting for him, or that Choe Jong-mi was waiting for her sister.

Twenty-five kills he counted, almost all of them he was sure. Just a few more, and he knew he could save China. He even started to work his way back towards where he'd left him, the footsteps cracking off in the woods now sparse, the voices far fewer, only raising to yelp as they stumbled now. Just a couple more ambushes and he knew he would have won.

Until he rounded a corner on a narrow mountain footpath that ran between two steep ridges and should have spit him out on a broad slope whose limited cover he could use to pick off the men on his heels, and was met by a dead end instead.

North skidded to a halt, the jumble of rocks and earth in front of him not making sense to his adrenaline-filled brain, until he looked up, instinctively searching for a way out, and realized the debris had came from the ridges above.

He hadn't been able to come here in years. In that time, a flood had caused a rockslide.

He was trapped.

His body wanted to back up, to try and flee back the way he'd came, but the men were already behind him, boots pounding down the rocky path. He lunged forward instead to scramble up the wall of stone, but before he could, someone shouted, "Halt!"

North froze, his shoulders prickling, every muscle in his body demanding to climb, to escape. But he could feel the guns on him.

Slowly, he turned around.

Three men stood in the defile behind him, a pistol and two submachine guns raised. The chests behind them heaved, their uniforms smeared with mud and blood. One was young, with the red armband of a recruit, and the other two were older, more grizzled. A scar stretched across the lead man's thick neck.

"Put… down your weapon," this one panted.

He was out of breath, just like the other two, exhausted from two hours of sprinting over rough terrain, much of it uphill. The one with the pistol was holding it in one hand, the other arm hanging limply, a victim of trying to grab North while he was slipping back into the woods after eviscerating his partner. They were weak and exhausted, and had just watched two entire units get obliterated by one man.

But so was North. He hadn't rested well in days, pushing himself to the brink on the hike, and the pain and exhaustion he'd been fleeing just as much as the reactionaries was finally starting to catch up to him. His burns all throbbed in time, the heat of the fever building again, made worse by the narrow walls of the pass, and his bandages had finally bled through. He didn't need to look down to know his entire lower half was soaked in blood. He had suffered several hits, too, mostly grazes and a broken rib. But one bullet had taken him in the back of his left arm, making it want to tremble as he aimed China's Type 50 back at the men.

And even though they should be low on ammo by now, their confidence as they held their guns pointed straight at him told him they weren't low enough. Any attempts to climb would end with a bullet in his back.

"Put down your weapon," the lead repeated tightly.

Every damaged nerve in North's body told him not to do it, told him he needed to shoot, to throw himself at the men standing between him and freedom and escape. The walls of the defile were closing in on him, and his body was screaming, 'TRAPPED TRAPPED TRAPPED.'

But he smothered it. He lowered his gun, though he didn't put it down. He slung it over his shoulder instead, where it knocked against his Type 49, making his injured arm twinge.

The scarred man blinked, uncertain with the half-obedience. He didn't look like a commander, only a survivor.

North drew himself up, putting his shoulders back, even as it made them groan.

"I don't want to hurt you."

The men blinked, taken aback.

After a second, the recruit said, "You're joking, right?"

It sounded like he was trying to scoff. But the question came out more uncertain.

Glad that there wasn't any way for them to tell the difference between the blood that covered his uniform from their fellow soldiers and the blood that came from him, North said, "No. I don't want to hurt you."

The trio was stunned into silence at his purposeful misunderstanding of what the boy had meant, though their sights didn't waver.

"I told you I didn't come here to kill you," North said into the silence, steady and authoritative. "If you hadn't engaged me, every single one of your compatriots that have made this mountain their grave would still be alive. No one would have ever even known I was here."

The scarred man recovered from his uncertainty, his lip curling. "And we're supposed to believe that with everything else you've done?"

How many posters of him with horns and fangs and blood-soaked hands were plastered in the southern cities now?

North didn't let his jaw feather. "The Korean People's Army hasn't committed the crimes your propaganda says it has. And neither have I."

He wanted to scream it at them, to tell them the truth of Taejon and Jeju and Pyongyang. To tell them America's army was the one herding their people into rail tunnels and firing on them for days, to tell them Rhee's army was the one that had left tens of thousands dead in every city they'd pulled back from, to make them see what their countrymen in the north were going through even now, forced into caves, unable to go even a single day without that infernal buzzing from the skies. To tell them South was the one that had burned Seoul.

But he didn't.

"I don't expect you to believe me." He didn't let the fury he felt at that colour his voice. "Because America doesn't want you to. But I will ask you this."

He met each of their eyes, ending with the scarred man.

"Do you want the war to end?"

The man's lips tightened. But after a second, he said, "Yes," and the other two echoed him.

The boy said it most reluctantly. He looked young enough to have only just reached conscription age, and hadn't experienced the horror of real combat yet. The thunder of artillery, screams of thousands of dying men, and fires raging in the trenches that would make this hunt across the mountain seem like exercise. But he still said yes.

Good. This wouldn't work if they were like the men he'd overheard at the front. And none of them sounded like the man that had shot China.

North nodded decisively, like there could be no other answer. "So do I."

The boy's eyes flashed, his grip on his submachine gun tightening. "You're the ones who started it!"

'We only attacked once you did.'

North was able to keep his temper better with the men than with his brother. "You were lied to. The Korean People's Army didn't cross the Parallel until Rhee's did. And we only marched on Seoul once his general attack was launched."

He swung his head back to the scarred man, narrowing his eye. "And I think you know that."

The soldier was grizzled, with the familiar weary air of someone who had seen too many months or years of combat. And he had a Kangwon accent.

His guess seemed to be correct. The man's lips pressed thin, though he said nothing.

"And regardless of who started it, I am the one that wants to end it," North said, keeping his voice clear even as the pain in his legs made them want to shake. "The Americans have admitted to their crime of bombing the neutral zone, killing one of Korea's precious children to prevent a ceasefire, and they are the ones refusing to follow international law so that the POW issue can be settled. They are the ones drawing these talks out when this war could have been over months ago."

'Years ago.'

His voice grew more heated. "They are the reason you and I are fighting here in these hills, they are the reason your brothers-in-arms had to die today, and they are the reason you could end this night lying alongside them instead of at home, fighting to rebuild our country."

These men shouldn't be his enemy. They should be working for him in their factories or fields, while he worked for them in both, and in the assembly halls. He shouldn't have to hesitate to call them his people- they were his people.

“America is the reason Korea is still Divided,” he delivered, taking a step forward, making the men tense. “America is the reason Korea was Divided in the first place. No matter how you feel about our Socialist system, he is your enemy, not me, and not our countrymen.”

He had to fight every instinct in his body not to duck away from the dead black eyes of the bores trained on him, only a few feet away now. He took one more step, until he was directly in front of the scarred man, the gun barrel almost touching his chest, his head held high.

“I want to end this war,” he insisted, letting some of his desperation in to show them he was sincere. “I want to see Korea Reunified. But if you shoot me here, if you bring me back to America and Rhee, then what do you think will happen? What would happen if my soldiers took S- the South to the north?”

They didn’t answer, but they didn’t need to. Neither America nor Rhee’s clique would accept that. As long as South was in their possession, they could pretend they had Korea’s support. North knew that even if he had gone to Busan and abducted South, or convinced him to come back with him, America wouldn’t tolerate it. Even if he got his brother to tell the world that he stood with him against Rhee’s regime, the enemy would just say he was being threatened to. And if he went to stand before the United Nations to show that he was sincere, America would steal him the way he’d stole Gangwon and tried to steal Kangwon, and use him to spread even more propaganda against them, to claim North had starved him or tortured him to make him say what he wanted. His brother would never do that to-

For a moment, the sharp tang of gunpowder and the cloying stench of his own burnt flesh and blood were choked out of the crisp night air. All he could smell was smoke.

It didn't matter if South would lie. It would be America’s word that was believed, whether it contradicted Korea’s or not. And if North refused to let him go to the UN, America would never let the war end with his brother at his side.

And his own government couldn't sign an armistice with him in enemy hands. It would make it seem like they were paying a ransom for a hostage, giving in out of fear. And while they had orders against doing something like that…

'We don't want to lose our country, and we don't want to lose you.'

Certain members of his government were compromised by emotion. While he trusted his General not to be overcome by it, if the voices arrayed against him were united, he would either have to follow their will or keep waging the war with a divided cabinet, the way America wanted.

North couldn't let either of those things happen.

"If you attempt to take me now, then you will all die."

North met each of the men's eyes, showing them that he was sure he meant it. The boy bristled, indignant, the man with the broken arm quailed slightly, and the scarred one met his gaze, unflinching.

"And even if you do not, if you succeed, your only reward will be more months of this bloody war, more months of risking your lives hunting down your own countrymen like animals while Rhee lounges in Busan and hosts banquets. More months of our people being slaughtered." North looked at the two older men, knowing the words would reach them deeper. "The boy the Yankees killed at Kaesong is only a drop in the sea of blood they have spilled. There is no one in the north that hasn't lost someone. And I know it isn't any different in the south."

The pistol in the other man's hand wavered slightly, his eyes shuttering.

"I want to end that," North said, words ringing clear. "I did not come here to hurt my people, even those fighting for the army that has killed hundreds of thousands of them. I didn't even come here to sabotage the Americans. I came for a personal matter, and I would have left peacefully if I could. And I would still leave as peacefully as possible. I promise you if you let me go, I will return to the north and keep fighting for real peace for Korea, and for you.”

His voice lowered. "And I promise if you don’t, then either this war will never end, or you won’t live to see it.”

The boy’s mouth still pinched at the threat, but the scarred man was the one that mattered. He gazed into North’s eye as the Countryhuman tried not to shift, his dread over China building.

It had been too long. He needed to get back to him.

His heart pounded, the walls pressing in to crush him as the tension the guns raised inside him wound tighter, telling him to lash out and kill the enemy, to get away get away get-

“Lift your eyepatch.”

North wrested himself out of his building panic, but his muscles didn’t stop quivering.

The lead soldier stared at him grimly. North didn’t bother asking why. Trying not to show his reluctance, he pinched the edge of the circular eyepatch between his fingers, flipping it up to expose the hollow, stifling a shiver as the cool air brushed across it.

It shouldn't bother him to show them. He hadn’t worn an eyepatch for the first eight months after… losing it. He’d even taken the bandages off as soon as possible, preferring to look like a soldier than a patient.

But ever since his provinces gave him his patch, he hadn’t taken it off unless necessary. And it almost never was. He even wore it when he slept in the bunker with China, regretting how he’d removed it that first time.

It was stupid to regret that Choe Jong-mi hadn’t examined it. Even if she had, he would still have to show it to these soldiers. It wouldn’t change anything. But it still somehow rankled that the first of his people he was choosing to expose it to in years were these reactionaries.

Still, even though it could show them how weak he was, how he'd been stupid enough to let himself be permanently handicapped, North held still, letting their gazes crawl across the empty hollow, trying not to twitch.

The scarred man's jaw worked like it was something he'd been expecting, and he looked back to his remaining eye.

"Who did it?"

North didn't want to spread the same malice against his brother that South was letting- that Rhee and America were spreading about him. Even now. But he knew if the man was asking, it was because he had heard rumours. If he wanted to walk away, he couldn't lie to him.

"The South." His throat closed at the admission, but he forced out, "Under America's orders."

Even if South had burned Seoul of his own free will, he still had that, at least.

The man stared at him, long and hard, knuckles tight around his firearm. North's blood beat in his temples and legs, and blood trickled down his arm, plastering his uniform to his skin.

Every single fiber of his body was poised to fight through the pain and move. He would have to go low, aim for the young man first. He was less experienced, but more eager to fight. Once he had his weapon, he would only be facing one submachine gun. Neither older man seemed the type to shoot their own, so he could use the boy as a shield while he took out the lead. Then the broken-armed one and his pistol would easily follow. But if he took any more injuries, he wouldn't be able to carry everything he needed to back to the north.

Everything would hinge on the first few seconds.

North narrowed his eye, ready.

And the scarred man's gun dipped, his hold on it loosening.

"Go," he said, stepping aside and jerking his head at the exit.

The boy swung his head to him, eyes wide. “But he killed our guys! And he’s a commie!”

“That’s not what this is about.” The man grabbed the muzzle of his firearm, forcing it down. “I’m your commanding officer now. We’re letting him go.”

The boy stewed, but he didn't try to wrest his gun free. The other man slowly lowered his, stepping aside.

North’s muscles unwound so suddenly his aching legs almost shook.

“Thank you,” he said solemnly.

“Just put an end to this damn war,” the man replied.

North moved past them. It was a struggle not to limp now, and he could feel his skin prickling as he put his back to them. But he still stopped at the bend in the pass, looking back.

“What are your names?”

The scarred man’s eyes flicked over him. “Ok Jong-mun.”

The boy wouldn’t give him his name, but the wounded man did. North would need to add them to his book, and find the missing one after. When the war was over, Ok Jong-mun should receive acknowledgement, and the boy should receive special attention in his re-education.

North dipped his head to them, then left the defile, moving away from them as fast as he could. As soon as he was out of earshot, he took off running.

Or tried to. His legs would only let him move with an awkward, stilted gait. But North pushed through it to swiftly hobble up and down torturous ridges, back up to where he’d left China.

As he approached the tangle of dead yews, he could hear branches cracking, and see a shape moving in the dim light left from the setting moon, poking around in the undergrowth, too close to where China should be hidden.

North didn't bother talking this time. The man tried to scream as he hit him, but he gripped his head with one hand, smashing it back onto the ground as they both went over. The other brought the tiger knife around, plunging it into his face, piercing cartilage and bone with a crunch, again and again until he stopped screaming, and then he stabbed him one more time.

North slumped forward as the bit of energy he'd mustered drained from him all at once. He straddled the dead man for a moment longer, his face buried in the moist soil beside his head, and his fingers still wrapped around the hilt buried in his skull.

'Skull.' Choe Jong-ok and China.

The Korean rolled off his kill, wrenching the blade after him, wiping the blood on his pant leg. But the fabric was too wet. It only smeared more on the silver blade. He tucked it away in its sheath, and forced himself up, staggering over to the dead yew, dropping to his knees again in front of the white wood, and heart stopped.

He couldn't hear China breathing.

North tore though the branches, not caring how much noise it made, until his hands found his comrade's body, still warm. He grabbed onto him, holding still, trying to feel his breath or his pulse or something.

It was there. Faint, his sides barely expanding, but it was there.

Whether awake or asleep, China's breaths were always quiet, barely audible. But this wasn't the same. His lips were parted, and a low gurgling came from them.

North dragged him out into the moonlight, unbuckling the belt around his waist and lifting his uniform shirts up. It was too dark to see, and he didn't want to draw attention with his flashlight, so he felt around in the blood that slicked his red skin, finding the bullet wound near the middle of his ribs, hot and swollen to the touch.

Ssi-bal. It was definitely a lung shot. Not in the center, but towards the bottom right lobe. It didn't have to be fatal, but if North didn't give him at least emergency field care, it would be.

And he couldn't. He had no doctors, no supplies, and at least two days to go until the front, more when they were both like this.

He shouldn't have brought him, shouldn't have let him come, shouldn't have let him stay, shouldn't-

North shook his head, digging his blunt nails into his own thighs, using the pain to center his bleary mind.

That was the past. He had to focus on the future. He had to get out of here before those men notified their superiors and more reactionaries were sent after him. And he needed to get China someplace he could try to at least clean his wound.

North didn't need his mental map. He was in North Gyeongsang province, nearing where the Sobaek range met the Taebaeks. He knew every village in the area, and had visited plenty of them during the Occupation. He couldn't trust any of them now, couldn't trust that Rhee wouldn't have soldiers there or that some reactionary or someone desperate for the reward for turning him in wouldn't sell him out.

But he knew someone that wouldn't. He didn't know if she was still there, and if she wasn't, if would just add time to their travel, and if she was, it could put her at risk. But-

'Comrade!'

North grit teeth. He had to try.

He took something from his belt, a hollow reed he'd cut from next to a mountain stream on the way here. It was too dangerous to go digging around in China's wound for the bullet, but he could feel the airflow coming from the hole, which meant his lung had been penetrated. This was Kangwon's field, but he'd had him explain treating men that had taken shots like this before, and knew if the lung stayed deflated, it could collapse permanently.

Still, North hesitated for a moment. As it stood, if China died it was because of the reactionary's bullet. He would eventually revive. But if North intervened and complicated it, what if that counted as him striking the killing blow, and it killed the other Countryhuman permanently?

China's breath hitched in his throat, a strangled rattle, and he made up his mind, stripping off his jacket and tossing it over them to muffle the glow of his flashlight. The bloodflow had mostly stopped by now, and he tried to wipe his skin clean with the sleeve of his undershirt, smearing dark red over the scarlet.

Gritting his teeth and hoping any mistakes he made wouldn't kill him, North stuck the end of the reed into his chest, working it into the soft tissue of his lung. It was unsanitary and risky, but he knew if he let his lung collapse, if it hadn't already, even if it healed it would be more likely to collapse again. The idea of China getting crippled because North had let his guard down and hadn't even tried to do anything-

He breathed gently into the reed, just once, and thankfully felt his chest expand. The bullet was still lodged in there, but he could get his airflow going again, and drain the blood he could hear bubbling inside him.

With precise movements, he cut off a swathe of the dead reactionary's uniform to tie around China's torso, staunching the bleeding and fixing the reed in place. He retrieved Choe Jong-ok's bones and placed their packs in with them, before tying the podaegi back on with difficulty. It placed more weight on his back, but he couldn't carry both bags separately. He arranged their firearms around it, buckling them firmly in place. Then he took a deep breath.

Leaning down, he slid one arm under China's upper back, the other under his knees, and heaved.

China was heavier than he looked, but North still could have handled him on a good day. But those were few and far between, and definitely not today. He staggered, the weight of the podaegi almost dragging him back, and panic surged into his throat as he realized he was going to crush Choe Jong-ok and injure his comrade even more.

He grit his teeth, straining his legs and spine, making them scream. But it helped him gain his balance. And then he was standing with China cradled in his arms.

It wasn't comfortable. His torso was scrunched up, and too much of him hung past North's arms, his head lolling and his annoying legs causing them to cant to the right.

"Why are you so damn… long?" North grunted in exasperation, managing to center them.

China didn't reply, and something in his chest twinged as he realized he'd halfway been expecting him to be faking, to open his eyes and make some quip about the Korean carrying him.

He couldn't waste any time. With everything gathered, North set off. His steps were halting and pained, each one making his teeth grind and his muscles cramp. China flopped awkwardly in his arms, no matter how much he tried to rearrange him, and their guns banged against his sides, the repetitive motion cracking his burns and making his temples pound.

But he forged on. China had came with him. He was here.

And Korea wasn't letting a foreign country die for him.

Being suspended made my cliffhanger last a little too long. Forced tension.

I saw an American girl online saying 'How do North Koreans not know?? (I guess 'not know how oppressed they are') How can they not turn against their government?' And it's like… the cognitive dissonance… You have just found out (behind the rest of the world) that your government is ran by a ring of cannibalistic pedophiles that openly discuss how to control society's thinking and get rid of all poor people. The ones that aren't actively doing it are still aware in some way or the other. Why do YOU not turn against YOUR government?? Because a huge chunk of Americans still support Trump, and many more see him as this idol of evil that if he's removed everything will be sunshine and rainbows, and think the system that put him there, that created people like him and made it so that only they can take power, is perfectly fine. Protesting is not turning on your government, posting 'I hate orange man' online is not turning on your government. Turning on your government is realizing that the very core of your system is wrong and needs to change, and changing it violently. And America is not turning on its government. She was like 'I didn't even realize how brainwashed they are… so scary… Their psychology…' It's so clear that she doesn't even see North Koreans as people. Like they're this hivemind that can't think at a human capacity. People aren't like that! Every human on earth can think! Even at the peak of the repression in South Korea, there were still thousands that organized and fought back, like in the Gwangju Uprising. There are millions of people in the DPRK and they all have unique thought processes and views, just like everywhere else. Some of them hate their government, whether because they're rightists or ultra-leftists, more love it, most are just living life. Like every other place on earth, the DPRK isn't perfect, but many of its issues are caused by external forces like sanctions, and since they actually teach their children about imperialism, that is more widely understood. And the ones that are internal clearly aren't enough to spark revolt because there is no pacifying people that are inherently miserable. No amount of propaganda can distract people from their material conditions forever, especially when a huge chunk of that population has arms training and access to weapons. If the majority of people were not at least tolerating of the Worker's Party of Korea and had hope in Socialism, the DPRK would not have made it through the Arduous March.

Societies have a prevailing 'psychology,' yes, but if you want to talk about the North Korean 'psychology,' it isn't shaped by posters and speeches- it is shaped by the very real conditions in their country and the history they've gone though, such as having over 20% of their population genocided by America. It's that American view of 'Well, my country told me how awful your country is, so since I, a wise enlightened American who is right about everything, know how miserable and oppressed you are, why don't you? Why aren't you revolting? It can't possibly be because my country that has been at war with yours since before its foundation and has been proven to have lied about dozens of nations before is lying again. We couldn't possibly be wrong after all. It must instead be because your entire populace is stupid and lacks any capacity for human thought.'

And there's the cognitive dissonance. They can't tell you anything about the Korean War, they can't tell you about what sectors and parts of everyday life the sanctions impact, they can't tell you about how the defector industry and Hanawon work, they couldn't tell you about the policies the North Korean government enacts, all they can tell you is 'North Korea bad, North Koreans brainwashed,' because that's what their government told them. Americans are so brainwashed by their own state that they can't even hear the irony in a sentence like 'Why don't they turn against their government?' passing their lips as their baby-killing, pedophile, rapist president sits comfortably in his office surrounded by other men and women like him. They are so chained to the political line of their country that they think dancing in the streets and calling Trump old and fat online is turning against their government, while their government, their entire system, murders them by the thousands and us by the millions. This also shows that 'brainwashing' in the pseudo-magical 'everyone is a sheep who thinks the exact same' sense isn't real. The US spends more money than any nation on earth on propaganda, trillions each year, every piece of their entertainment is drenched in it, their social media is actively programmed to boost things that slander their enemies and cause division, and they have wealthy men talking about how to shape minds casually in e-mails. Yet American civilians still realize their material conditions are deteriorating, and that they haven't ever truly compared to the wealth of their nation. They've just been directed towards blaming other factors for them- immigrants, globalism, the red party or the blue party, Jews- instead of the actual core cause- capitalism. If you in the heart of the Empire can still realize that your conditions are unjust and deserve to change, why wouldn't North Koreans? The only way you can say they wouldn't is if you view them as inherently different than you, a monolith that can't think for themselves, which is exactly how Americans view most foreigners, and exactly how they've been taught to view them.

The DPRK's conditions also visibly improve. It is a developing nation and it has kept developing, despite all its hurdles and how outclassed by the US it is economically. It is so objective that the only way to deny that it has is to say all the houses and factories and greenhouses they build are fake. And the only way to believe that is to operate on the worldview that every single person with any sort of authority in the DPRK is insane, and that North Koreans are such sheep that they would never even protest billions of won and labour going towards building houses and factories that no one is allowed to live or work in while they starve. Meanwhile the US is visibly deteriorating. All of its progress is in AI to replace workers, more bread and circuses (and even those are declining rapidly in quality), and more ways to make money for the men that already have all of it. There is undeniable evidence that your criminal president is a pedophile and your nation is controlled by old money men and Mossad agents who don't even view their wives and daughters as people, let alone you, while every call for a real investigation is overturned, and even if one was initiated, no one would pay the way they deserve to for it. Why don't you turn against your government? Why don't you change that? Or is it easier to take comfort in the belief that your victims are worse than you, and pride yourself for at least being 'human' enough to realize that your government hates you while never actually doing anything about it.

History Marches On

One foot after the other, just like escaping Seoul. No matter the exhaustion bearing down on him, or the throbbing that started in his burn gash and spread throughout his entire body, or the pain that tore through his thighs with every movement, North just had to keep putting one foot in front of the other.

He kept China in his arms, facing away from him and slightly angled so the blood in his lung could flow out the hollow reed. It would leave an obvious trail, but there wasn't anything he could do for it. Every few ri, he would tilt him towards him and carefully breathe into the reed to make sure his lung wasn't collapsing. He tried not to pay attention to how often his sides rose and fell against him or how faint his heart was beating. Even if it stopped, he couldn't do anything but keep walking.

The green-grey peaks blurred above him, melting into the thick clouds as the sky turned from black to blue to slate. It was all North could do to remember his destination, to force his way higher into the Sobaeks, sticking to less-travelled paths. He could hear horns behind and below him, but luckily they stayed distant. He knew he wasn't in a condition to fight anymore, and if he was caught, he would have to. He couldn't let them take China, couldn't let Yao Song and his countrymen pay for their Countryhuman's stupidity, or his own.

His legs had started to buckle with every upward step. Pressure built in the gash as he raised and lowered his boot, culminating in a burst of agony that made his vision flash white as it met the ground, waves of pain coursing through his body, washing through every patch of charred flesh on it, before the pressure built again as his other foot moved forwards, an unrelenting cycle. But he couldn't stop to rest because he knew if he did, he wouldn't be able to lift China again. His injured arm could barely hold him as it was, every ounce of willpower going towards keeping it steady under his upper back, blood running down it, the strain refusing to let a scab form.

North let the pain blur together, letting all of it hurt so much that none of it hurt anymore, turning it into a sensation that made his mind and body scream, but couldn't master him. This was nothing. He had went through worse than this. Japan's attempt at using 'something worse' to force obedience into Korea hadn't taught him the lesson he wanted, backfiring like all the others. It had only taught North that he could survive anything, and that no matter how bad it hurt, no matter how much he wished for the suffering to end, it was only a shadow compared to what his people had felt. He would survive and keep dragging himself forward, because if he didn't, they would pay for his weakness.

China wasn't his, but he was in his country, and he had saved those who were. Even if he was trying to turn North against his brother, he had still taken that stupid fucking bullet for him. He was North's until he was safe, and couldn't say he owed him.

The hike should have only been a few hours. North didn't know how long it was. The sun never rose, buried behind the clouds. The grey shroud only lightened, then darkened, and that could have been his vision fading. Eventually he knew it was. The ridge had narrowed to just in front of him, an endless tunnel stretching through shadows. North tried to fight them off, but even sinking his teeth into his cheek only added a new voice to the screaming inside him, and the coppery taste of blood to his mouth. As he used every drop of strength to breathe into China once more, his lips left red smears on the reed.

His head wouldn't raise all the way again, his neck bending under the weight on his back, spine aching so much it felt like it would snap.

Then he saw it. Down below, on the mountainside, were over a dozen houses, small fields planted where they could be, open-air kitchens with smoke rising from them, and a stage in the center of town, the same stage he'd once stood on for Chuseok and told his people they had no gods, only themselves.

He could see villagers heading in for the day with jige on their backs and bundles of herbs in baskets, but he didn't call out. Too many eyes, too many people he couldn't let see China's red skin.

But he was almost there. North bared his teeth, mustering every single last bit of energy to keep moving, to not stumble as he navigated the hills around the village until he found the footpath that led up from it, just wide enough for a wagon. At the end of it, nestled under the shadow of a peak, was a peasant's giwajip. It was small and homely, the tiles on the slanted roof chipped.

He could tell it was still inhabited. As weathered as they were, the tiles he'd once helped replace the old thatch roof with were clean. The door was firmly closed, there were no signs of looting in the yard, and the small vegetable patch carved into the rocky soil looked freshly-planted.

She'd been old when he last saw her, and that was nine years ago, before the Yankees, before Rhee's butchers, before the war. There wasn't any way to tell if it was still her living here, or if he was about to walk into the home of someone that would run straight to the enemy.

But he had came too far, and he couldn't turn back. He could barely make it the last few metres to the door, and he didn't trust himself to try and open it.

"Song Dong-nyo," he called, his jaw aching as he unlocked it.

He could hear footsteps inside, shuffling towards the door. He shifted China in his arms, his strength slowly waning.

And he realized he wasn't breathing.

Blinding panic shot through North, and the second the wooden panels swung open, he barged past whoever was on the other side. It didn't matter.

He went for the low table in the center of the room, shoving a half-finished jogak-po and scraps of fabric aside to lay China out on it, his legs giving out at the same time, knees smashing into the floor. There wasn't time to remove the podaegi, so he forced himself to bear its weight as he leaned over the other man, tearing off his mask and upper clothing.

How would Kangwon do this? He'd shown North how to do chest compressions, but with China's punctured lung, would they just make it worse?

There wasn't time to think about that. North put the heels of his hands over China's heart, opposite the gunshot would, and started to pump, trying to keep a steady pace and not frantically slam his chest.

Pump pump pump pump-

"Comrade Korea?" a voice said from the door, Song Dong-nyo's after all. "Is that one of your guerrilla boys?"

"Go boil water," North ordered, not looking over, and the woman jumped into action like the days he would spill into her house with her grandson and their injured comrades had been just yesterday, hustling through the kitchen doors.

Pump pump pump-

He could hear the sound of blood spurting into the reed as it was forced out of China's lung and ssi-bal this wasn't working at all.

North stopped, tearing off his guns and podaegi, opening the bone sack and pulling out China's pack, rummaging through it. If he'd brought bandages, maybe-

There. He came out with a first aid kit, hoping it might have something like what he'd used in Seoul. It did.

North pulled out the little vial of smelling salts, waving it under China's 'nose' before setting it on the table and turning his face towards it, then resumed pumping his chest, harder and harder as he grew desperate, his own heart beating fast enough for both of them.

Pump pump pump pump pump-

Still China didn't move, his head lolling slightly under the force of North's palm thrusts.

He couldn't let him die on his watch, he couldn't be responsible for this.

Pump pump-

"Wake up you fucking bastard!" North hissed in frustration, cracking his palm across the dead man's pale cheek.

And as his hands slammed down on his sternum again, China took a gasping breath, small and weak, but his own.

North didn't let himself feel relieved. He kept pumping, worried that if he stopped helping his heart pump blood, it couldn't. But he finally made himself lift his hands before he could break his ribs, leaning over to press his 'ear' against the man's chest, listening tensely.

His heart beat under it, barely discernible over the Korean's ragged breathing. But it was beating again, and it kept beating.

North went light-headed, and he had to make the effort not to slump over on top of China, leaning back instead, unable to stop himself from falling back onto the straw mat flooring. The ceiling spun above him, the central beam threatening to crash down.

He wanted to close his eye, but he knew if he did, he would pass out. And China wasn't in the clear yet.

He forced himself up, writhing slightly, unable to get his injured arm under himself, glad that Song Dong-nyo was in the other room. When he was sitting again, he examined what he'd pulled out of the aid kit. The smelling salts, forceps, needles, surgical thread, cotton pads, antiseptic, and the bandages in China's pack.

The aid kit was just bare essentials, but there were enough bandages to last a couple weeks. It was actually all he'd brought, aside from the tins of fish.

A bandage roll squeezed in North's hand as he looked back at China.

He should let him die. It might teach him a lesson.

The other country went suddenly still, and North tensed, ready to restart chest compressions. But his breathing kept rasping.

North turned him onto his side again so the reed could help him get oxygen into his lung. His teeth itched to start trying to fix him, but he needed the boiled water first. He'd already touched the wound too much.

He looked around the house to scan for threats and keep himself conscious.

It was mostly the way he remembered it, the sparse sitting room with the kitchen doors to the left of the front one, and two small sleeping rooms off to the right. Song Dong-nyo had used to have a larger house down in the mountain village, before the cough that had swept through it, taking her son and daughter-in-law with it, leaving her to raise her grandson alone. She hadn't wanted to risk getting sick, so she'd taken him up to the hills, building a chogajip mostly by herself. Or so North had been told over tea she had foisted on him.

He leaned over, picking up the jogak-po he'd tossed on the floor, guiltily folding it. As he did, he paused, examining the multi-coloured fabric.

The patchwork was uneven and messy. And while that was the point of a peasant's bojagi, to keep scraps of fabric from clothes and blankets from going to waste, Song Dong-nyo had never made it seem like simple frugality. North had met her a handful of times and seen her work, and Dan Hoon would always keep an eye out for fabrics for her, and would bring back things she'd made for them- jogak-po to wrap their supplies in, gloves or hats, thin blankets. The woman had even been responsible for tailoring some of their uniforms before they'd joined the KPRA, making them less Japanese and more theirs. He would always catch SH glaring at her clothes when she was done with them, the stitches barely even noticeable.

These weren't like that. They were obvious, meandering and uncertain, and he could see pinpricks in the fabric where she'd had to retrace her steps. And the colours clashed in a way they never had.

North felt a twinge as he set down the cloth. She was seventy-nine by now. Her body must be starting to go.

That shouldn't bother him. All humans would someday die. It was his goal to make sure most of them died of old age.

Unlike Dan Hoon.

The door behind him opened, and North was on his feet in an instant, his pistol drawn. His vision fizzled black, and when it cleared, he was dumbstruck for a second, thinking he'd somehow summoned the-

No. It wasn't him, even though he looked remarkably similar. Flat, dark brown hair, an oval face, slightly wide hazel eyes.

"What the hell?" the man in the doorway asked, those eyes bulging out of his head as they darted between North and China, half-dead on the table.

"Shut the door," the Countryhuman ordered, only slightly lowering his gun.

The man blinked, but did as he was told, just as Song Dong-nyo emerged from the kitchen. As soon as she saw the man, her face lit up with relief.

"Hoon!" she cried. "There's my boy!"

"It's me, halmeoni," he said, smiling tiredly.

Immediately her face went sour. "What are you doing here so soon? Shouldn't you be chasing Japs into the sea? Don't tell me you dragged Comrade Korea here just because you couldn't stop worrying about me long enough to do your job?"

The man ignored the suspicious look North was giving him. "Grandmother, this can wait. Comrade Korea's..." His eyes flicked to China's red skin, exposed. "Comrade looks like he needs help."

Satisfied that at least the newcomer wasn't going to strike or take off running, North turned back to Song Dong-nyo.

"Is the water boiled?"

"Boiled water..." She perked up. "Oh, I was just boiling water for..." Her eyes flickered with uncertainty. "For tea, I'm sure. Would you like a cup?"

"Just bring a bowl in and leave the rest boiling for Comrade Korea," the man said before he could say anything, and the old woman nodded, hustling back for the kitchen.

She stopped in the doorway, squinting back. "But don't think this is over, Hoon. I won't have you missing out on Liberating our country just to fuss over your grandmother. I waited thirteen years for you to come home. I can wait a little while longer."

North's chest seized, but the man just said, "Of course, grandmother."

When the old woman was gone, his shoulders slumped, and he let out a tired sigh.

North narrowed his eye. "You aren't Dan Hoon."

He was too young, barely older than twenty. The guerrilla would have been forty-two by now.

And he was dead.

"No," the man said, kicking his shoes off in the entryway. "I'm not."

North observed him. "Dan Hoon-jo."

Dan Hoon's son dipped his head. "Yep."

"What's going on here?"

Dan Hoon-jo looked past him at the table. "I could probably ask you the same thing."

North stepped between him and China, holstering his pistol.

"Right." The man's smile was slightly bitter. "Guerrilla confidentiality."

They looked over as Song Dong-nyo re-entered the room, carrying a deep clay bowl filled with steaming water. Dan Hoon-jo hustled over to take it from her, but she brushed him off, chiding him for treating her like an invalid.

She was on the verge of it, thin and gnarled like a tree root, shaking slightly as she hauled the water over to the table. The black that had clung to her hair for so long was gone, replaced by wiry steel grey. But she was still relatively hale for her age.

It was the look in her eyes North didn't like.

"Here you be," she huffed, setting the water down on the floor. "Take care of your boy. But I expect the place cleaned up like usual, I don't care how eager you are to go celebrate."

"Comrade Korea needs his space, I think, grandmother," Dan Hoon-jo said, gently guiding her away.

"Oh of course, of course, the men need their space to talk," his 'grandmother' replied sarcastically. "You would think you grew up listening to your grandfather. It's a good thing that old codger had that fall, or heavens tremble to think how you'd have turned out."

The man shepherded her into her room with her jogak-po, closing the door.

North shoved the strangeness out of his mind. "I do need space," he told Dan Hoon-jo.

"Right."

"Your room," he ordered as the man started for the front door.

He paused, then nodded, disappearing into the side room, and North turned his full attention on China.

Getting the bullet out wasn't the priority. He knew that. With lung injuries, so long as it wasn't in danger of interfering with the arteries in the center of the chest, shrapnel could be left inside.

Kangwon had left one in Pak Mun-yong after the Battle of Pochonbo. His favourite gag was to ask if someone needed ammo, then tear open his shirt and tell them to come get it. North had hated it, mostly because he'd got him with it once.

China's wound wasn't near the center of his lung, so even if the bullet had shifted, it shouldn't be an issue. But the idea of letting it stay there...

The possibility of the enemy leaving something in his body had always repulsed him. Kangwon and Kim Yong-hwan both had standing orders that if he was ever killed by a bullet or shrapnel, they had to remove the object from him, no matter how risky it was.

North knew he shouldn't treat China off his own sensibilities. They weren't similar people, and the other Countryhuman probably didn't even care. But as he went to the kitchen to disinfect the forceps and needle in the water boiling on the hearth, he still thought hard on how the man might feel about the bullet being left in him.

It might help if he knew how he felt about anything ever.

The other country always fixed himself immediately after engagements, cleaning and stitching his uniform and washing at least his face and hands as soon as possible. But he also didn't seem that bothered when he couldn't, even when he complained. It seemed more about presentation than anything.

The only thing North could think of that might offer any insight was what he had said that day at the riverbank, when the Korean had come to wash Paik Sun-yup's blood off his clothes, and seen those scars on his back for the first time.

'I suppose one day I might have them removed, but until then, they're my reminder of what, exactly, is at risk if I fail.'

That meant he had thought about having them removed. Did they bother him the same way North's scars had once bothered him?

He moved the boiling water off the hearth, leaving it to cool to the side, and his hand went up to touch his left eyebrow, and the mark Japan had left just over it, the first one he had given him personally. It was barely visible after all these years, only a slightly lighter shade of blue than the rest of his skin, and not even a quarter of the size of the nail on his little finger.

But he still knew it was there. He could feel it. Just like he could feel every single other scar Japan and his followers had left on him, and now the Americans and theirs.

It had used to drive him crazy, knowing that his body would always bear the alien marks they forced on him, knowing his brother couldn't help but see them when he looked at him, see that he was too weak to defend himself, let alone him.

His fingertips drifted over to the edge of his eyepatch.

He had managed to overcome that after the March First Movement. To stop viewing them as violations inflicted on him and start seeing them as medals he'd earned by fighting back. They were still badges of shame, signs he hadn't been strong enough to stop what had been done to him, but they were his badges. The enemy didn't get a medal for failing to make him submit.

That grievous scar on his chest wasn't Japan's- it was his. His reminder that Korea never gave up, never begged. His reminder that he hadn't suffered half as much as his people, that he took the pain now to save them from it later. That he...

...North would remove the bullet from China.

His energy was flagging again, draining like his comrade's blood. He couldn't wait for the water to cool down any further.

He unwrapped the stained bandages from around his hands, revealing his red-black mottled skin. Folding them carefully, he shoved them in his pocket, not wanting to contaminate the kitchen.

The cast iron pot of water was still steaming. North grit his teeth, letting himself feel the throbbing from his burns and the ache in his arms and legs again, then plunged his hands in.

The water was so hot it felt cold, raising all his body hair and shocking his burns, sending sickening waves of pain up his entire arms. His temples bulged as his teeth locked down. He found the medical instruments, pulled them out and made himself put his hands back in, holding them under as he scrubbed them together, flaying charred flesh off along with the dirt, until they were obscured by the brown water. Every rasp of skin against skin felt like sandpaper grating him down to the bone, but he kept going, making sure his hands were as sterile as he could get them.

The pressure in his temples built and built, and when he couldn't take it anymore, he kept going for another two seconds, just to prove he could. Then he tore his hands out, water spattering the hearth, hissing on the still-warm stone.

His skin was tingling and raw, the few untouched bits more purple than blue. But now he could operate on China more hygienically. And he felt more awake.

Before that could fade, he wrapped his hands in fresh bandages, took the forceps and needle, and returned to the living room, kneeling next to China, making sure he was still breathing. He was.

He rolled him onto his back again, and started with dipping one of the scraps of jogak-po fabric Song Dong-nyo had left behind in the clean water she'd brought him, wiping down the area around the bullet wound. Then he threaded the surgical thread through the needle. He didn't need to worry about it being absorbable, since he wouldn't be stitching China's lung directly.

He held his flashlight in his stinging left hand. The beam wavered as his arm trembled, but he couldn't rest his elbow on the table or it would buckle. Grimly glad it wasn't his dominant arm that was injured, North slowly removed the reed from China's chest, his breathing getting more laboured as he set it aside, then picked up the forceps.

He hesitated as he looked at the dark red hole, fresh blood leaking out as the light scabbing around the edges was disturbed.

He should just sew him up. Ignore the bullet, disinfect, and suture his skin. It would be safer.

His eye traced the torn edges of the wound, the wide impact radius of damaged skin and the deeper cavity in the center.

It would scar for certain. China would always have a mark there, no matter how many creams or poultices he used. And unlike North, he had no Reunification to look forward to to erase it for good. He would always carry a reminder of Korea.

North didn't want him to. He wanted him to forget all of this. He wanted to win the war and send China home so he could forget about Seoul and Chorweon and debts and taking bullets and talking in their room at night. He wanted him to forget he had ever been here so he could forget he had ever been here.

But he couldn't do that. China would bear that scar no matter how well he did at stitching him up. If it would bother him as much as North's scars had once bothered him, then the least he could do was remove the bullet. If there was even a chance he would feel as... violated as North would with it inside him, then he had to get rid of it. And quickly.

He shone the flashlight into the wound, illuminating the red and pink flesh, not seeing any sign of a glint. Rifle rounds had a straight trajectory and didn't open up a large cavity, so it shouldn't be much off from the channel. North hadn't felt any resistance when he shoved the reed in, so he hoped that meant he hadn't shoved it deeper into the lung tissue.

The forceps hovered over the entrance wound.

Maybe he should get one of the humans to do this, just to be safe. Song Dong-nyo had experience with treating minor wounds for their soldiers after all.

But he didn't think he could depend on her body anymore. Or her mind, he suspected. And he hadn't seen Dan Hoon-jo since he was sixteen. He didn't know anything about the man he was or if he could be trusted with China. And if North passed off the task, and that just made it worse-

He slid the forceps in. They were long and thin, and the reed had spread the sides of the hole slightly, but he still moved slowly, careful not to jab with them. When they met the slight resistance of his lung, they were almost completely inside. North gently prodded around, trying to angle the flashlight better.

The fleshy sides of the wound pulsed in time with China's heartbeat, letting him see how weak it was. He set himself a limit- if he didn't find the bullet in a minute, he'd give it up and settle with stitches.

China's insides squelched, making North wince. He'd performed field surgeries before, and wasn't squeamish about them, but this was really more than he'd ever wanted to see of a foreign country. Unless he was disemboweling Japan or America. Or Norway.

His minute was running out, and he awkwardly spread his fingers in desperation, opening the entrance wound slightly wider. Fifty-five, fifty-six, fifty-

The light in his hand glinted off something buried among the squishy pink flesh and lighter-coloured lung tissue, and North went for it like a guided rocket. It looked like it had been dislodged from his lung, probably when he'd slammed into him after he first got shot. It was buried in the side of the canal. He guided the forceps to it, pushing back China's flesh to pinch the side of the round, and carefully wiggle it loose.

China moaned low in his throat, making him tense as he shifted slightly. Not wanting him to move and drive the forceps or bullet into his lung again, North swiftly pulled the round free, setting it on the table. His comrade stilled, and he exhaled.

'Got it.'

But he wasn't done. He used the forceps to pluck something small and white out of the flesh just inside the wound, a tiny shard of bone. The round had somehow gone almost directly between his fifth and sixth ribs, only taking a small chip out of the latter instead of shattering them and filling him with bone shrapnel that likely would have shredded his insides when North was dragging him to cover.

What was it he'd said back when they'd set off on the Second Phase Offensive? That he had a lot of luck?

Clearly none of it had rubbed off on North after all, or they wouldn't be in this situation in the first place.

He soaked some cotton from the aid kit in the disinfectant, unable to pour it straight into the wound without filling his lung with fluid again. He used the forceps to dab the inside clean, forcing another sound from China's throat, which he ignored. Then he stitched him up with the surgical thread, the easy step.

If he was human, North would have to suture his lung directly. But that would require cutting him open so he had space to operate, which he wasn't going to do. The reed had drained the excess oxygen and blood from his lung, so now that the bullet wouldn't leak lead for his system to fight off, and it didn't have to devote as much energy to sealing his external wound, the life-threatening puncture should close soon. It could still collapse again, but it was now safer than leaving the reed in. If Kangwon wanted to open him again up when he brought him back, North knew he could handle it. But he wasn't going to risk it.

He dabbed more antiseptic on the stitches, hoping they were tight enough, hoping his comrade wouldn't get an infection from the reed, that he'd made the right decision not to touch the lung, that he hadn't damaged him more getting the bullet out, that-

This was why he let Kangwon handle surgeries.

North hovered over China, feeling like there was more he should do, and also like he was about to collapse. He ended up wiping the rest of the blood from his stomach and chest, then pouring the last of his canteen into his mouth, holding him up so he wouldn't choke. He wanted to cover him, but both of their uniforms were soaked through. North's had dried, and crinkled uncomfortably with every movement. He settled for taking China's scarf off and spreading it over his bare upper half. Dan Hoon-jo had already seen him anyways.

'Ssi-bal.' He splashed his face with the slightly bloody boiled water in the bowl, trying to make himself look less haggard. He tried to stand, but his thighs wouldn't hold him.

He arranged them under himself instead, and called, "You can come out."

One side room door slid open, and Dan Hoon-jo stepped out, his eyes going straight to China.

"Is he going to be... alright?"

"Yes." He had better be.

Song Dong-nyo poked her head out of her room, and her brows shot up as she saw him. "Comrade Korea? What brings you here?"

"He got here earlier, grandmother," Dan Hoon-jo cut in.

"Oh, yes, yes. I remember now." She frowned at her great-grandson. "Hoon-jo? When you did get home? Is your father back?"

The man's jaw feathered slightly. "Not yet, great-grandmother."

Her eyebrows furrowed "Really? But I could have sworn..."

"I think Comrade Korea might need to stay the night," Dan Hoon-jo interjected.

North despised the idea of being slowed down more, but he knew he wasn't going anywhere until he recovered at least a little.

"I do," he said, looking to Song Dong-nyo. "Would that be alright?"

She clicked her tongue. "There you go asking again. How many times have I told you- my house is always open, as humble as it may be. It's the least I can do for taking care of my grandson for me."

The Arisaka rifle swinging around, its target locked in a grapple, unable to reach his gun. North's coming up, pulling the trigger, taking the Japanese man's head off, too late.

He hadn't.

"Why don't you make him some tea, jeungjomo?" Dan Hoon-jo prompted.

The woman narrowed her eyes. "Don't tell me what to do, boy. I'll make your father tan your hide when he gets back." To North, she asked politely, "Would Comrade Korea like some tea?"

He badly needed a drink, and to get her out of the room.

"If you don't mind."

"I would never mind doing something for my country." She shot another glare at her great-grandson, then marched pointedly into the kitchen, skirt swishing.

As soon as she was gone, North lifted his head to Dan Hoon-jo. "What's wrong with her?"

The man let out a heavy sigh, lowering himself to the floor next to him.

"Her mind's going," he admitted quietly. "It started just before the war broke out. It was small at first. She'd forget she already made tea, or slip up and call me dad's name. Thought she was just getting old. Then one day I came to check on her, and she threw her arms around me, asked if I'd heard the news."

North stared at him, waiting. He had a suspicion.

After a moment of fiddling with the goreum on his waistband, Dan Hoon-jo said quietly, "She told me we'd just been Liberated. She heard it on the radio, same way she did in 1945."

That was why she had mentioned celebrating, and 'Dan Hoon' having a job to do, driving the Japanese into the sea.

"And she..." His eyes flickered. "She told me it meant dad was coming home soon."

North grit his teeth. "Were you ever informed of what happened to him?"

Dan Hoon had died in one of their final engagements before they'd reached Busan, against a unit of Japanese soldiers launching a kamikaze attack after the Hiroshima bombing. He had sent two of the Korea's Army core off with his body immediately after.

Dan Hoon-jo nodded. "A couple of his comrades came by and told us. He's buried in the hills with his parents."

In the same family tombs they'd once helped clean on Chuseok.

North nodded. "Good."

Most of his guerrillas hadn't been able to be buried at home, either because there wasn't any chance or they no longer had one. Dan Hoon had. He'd wanted to make sure he reached it.

"Great-grandmother... She broke down," Dan Hoon-jo told him. "She keened for the entire day. Wouldn't let anyone else but me touch him at the funeral. It wrecked her, and she never really recovered after. She wouldn't clean or cook or even work on her sewing. She'd just lay in bed. And then one day, it was like she just... forgot. Like none of it ever happened."

North's had met a couple elders like that before. The confusion of old age could grow so bad that they couldn't recognize their own family members, or would get the year confused. Usually they ended up confined in a back room or outbuilding until they died.

Kangwon had called it by some foreign name, and said it was caused by the brain degenerating. It was one of the diseases that made North grateful he wasn't human.

"She's stuck in 1945," Dan Hoon-jo said, looking down. "We've always just been Liberated, and dad is always coming home soon."

What would that be like, to always be living in those days after Liberation, before they'd known about the Division, before he'd had to leave his brother behind again? When life was just travelling from village to village, celebrating with their people, peasants and proletariats and patriotic capitalists alike, freedom melting the class barriers away for one shining second. Their provinces and their comrades finally free, him and his brother finally together, finally knowing what it felt like to be happy. To be stuck in those golden days forever, never moving forward.

A shudder ran through him.

"And you just let her think that's true?" he demanded.

"Do you think I want to?" Dan Hoon-jo's knuckles tightened on his pant legs. "I tried to remind her. For two months I tried. Every time I came to visit her I told her what happened after Liberation, that dad was never coming home. And every damn time she reacted the same way she did the first time, breaking down, wailing until her voice went, like I was breaking her heart all over again."

He looked up, glaring challengingly at North. "Is it so wrong to let her be happy? To let her think her grandson is going to walk through those doors any second? To believe we really are Liberated? She spent more than half her life waiting for our country to be free, it was all she'd talk about ever since you took dad away. Is it so wrong to let her believe she got her wish?"

The country grit his teeth.

It was. Because they weren't free. North had failed at Liberating their country, he'd failed to protect Dan Hoon. She shouldn't be allowed to think he hadn't.

The kitchen door opened, and they looked up as Song Dong-nyo made her way in with two cups of tea. North tried to stand to take them from her, but his legs wouldn't even unfold now.

"Here you be." She placed them on the table.

They were chipped porcelain, salvages from her old home. She'd never had enough cups to serve all of them during their guerrilla days, but she had always made sure North got one of them instead of the clay.

"And I want to see you drink all of this," she said, shooting him a look. "It's barley tea, from that Min Yol-won's field, and I paid a pretty sum for it."

She might have forgotten the past seven years, but she clearly hadn't forgotten how to guilt-trip him.

North agreed he would, and she released his cup, satisfied.

"There's a cup for your..." Her eyes moved to China, and the wrinkles around them deepened.

"It's North Gyeongsang," North said, pulling China's scarf up to cover his five-starred flag.

"Ah, the clumsy one we happen to live in." Her lips pursed shrewdly. "Well, when he wakes up, make sure he gets his tea. And tell him not to go breaking any more of my dishes."

She lifted her head, seeing the darkness outside the paper-covered windows. "Heavens, is it that late already? I'd best be heading to bed. You can have Hoon-jo's room tonight. I'm sure he won't mind sleeping on the floor."

Dan Hoon-jo opened his mouth, then thought better. "Of course not, great-grandmother."

"Come wake me up if you be needing anything," the woman said, shuffling off to her room, muttering under her breath about not being born a few more ri north, in North Chungcheong province.

"You can have your room," North said when she was gone again.

Dan Hoon-jo shook his head. "It's not my room anymore. I live with my wife's family now."

North rubbed under his eyepatch. "You should have brought her north. I would have made sure she was taken care of."

She had done too much for them not to.

"I thought about it," Dan Hoon-jo admitted. "But even just moving her down into the village with us made her worse. Being here gives her more lucid moments. I just want her to be able to live as normally as possible before she's... gone."

He looked at him with solemn eyes, clearly asking North to stay silent.

The Countryhuman heaved a sigh. He was too tired for this.

"I need to get my comrade comfortable," he told him. And he needed to rest.

Dan Hoon-jo didn't look satisfied, but he stood anyway. "Right."

"You can't leave."

The man paused at his shoes, looking at him. "What?"

North stared back. "You need to stay here tonight."

"My wife is pregnant," the man protested. "Eight months."

"I can't risk letting you leave with the information you have."

If the reactionaries tracked him here, or there were already some in the area, Dan Hoon-jo could report them. If North was cornered, he wasn't sure if he'd be able to defend China and Song Dong-nyo in the condition he was in. And if even one got away, it would already be too late for China's country.

North braced himself, forcing his legs out from under his body to stand, his vision almost going black again.

"I can't let you leave," he repeated.

He couldn't trust him. He hadn't missed the accusation about taking his father away.

Dan Hoon-jo eyed him, tense, like he was ready to flee. North was ready to pursue. He didn't exactly want to tie up the boy he'd once helped teach how to load a rifle, but he wasn't going to risk letting him get away.

Then the man's shoulders slumped, and he let out a weary sigh, the exhaustion falling over him again.

"I used to think my dad was so cool," he said, making North blink. "He'd show up, show off all his guns, tell me about all the things he'd done and seen, how he'd fought by your side. But as I grew up..."

He crossed his arms over his chest, shame on his face as he confessed, "I started to resent him for it. He was never home. And when it was, it was to flit in and out. I never got to show him the first tooth I lost, or have him at my coming-of-age ceremony, or tell him about the girl I liked. All because he was off fighting for you."

Korea's Army had never been large, more informants and suppliers than fighters. They needed to stay small to avoid being caught. Most of their members had been people driven completely out of society for one reason or another, with nowhere else to go, especially in those early days. Most of them had no one to leave behind.

But Dan Hoon had been the first. And he had.

"Your father did what he felt he needed to," North replied, and Dan Hoon-jo smiled bitterly.

"That's what he told me. He was fighting for our country, like he had to. A fight he wouldn't let me join, even after I became a man."

North hadn't known the boy had asked. It must have been when Dan Hoon was visiting alone. And he must have purposefully hidden it from him.

"It was so important that he couldn't even stay to raise his own son," Dan Hoon-jo said, his fists clenching. "But not so important that I was needed. Four to seventeen I saw my own father's face so little that I couldn't even remember what he looked like when he wasn't there. And he was never there.

"And then he went and died on me."

North looked away slightly. It wasn't a rare story. It was why the Mangyongdae School For Bereaved Family of Revolutionary Martyrs even existed. As they'd gathered more soldiers and joined with the KPRA, and more and more Koreans had risen up against the Japanese, the more guerrillas had people to leave lonely. The life of a revolutionary wasn't one that lent itself to visits home on Chuseok. Dan Hoon-jo was one of many children that had lost their father before he had even died, and he'd still been luckier than most.

"I was such a brat in those last few years," Dan Hoon-jo murmured, some of his anger fading. "I'd make sure I was out in the hills when he came so I didn't have to see him. I felt like he'd chosen you over me."

North shifted uncomfortably, but before he could deny that, the man raised his head.

"I resented him so much. And I resented you, for taking him away, for letting him risk making me an orphan for you." Dan Hoon-jo was quiet for a long moment, then shook his head. "But now that I have my own kid on the way, I get it. I know why he left me. It was never really about you, was it?"

No. It wasn't.

His comrade's son gazed at him with sorrow. "It was about our country. About making sure that I had somewhere to live. That I'd be able to go to school and get a job, and that I wouldn't lose my wife the way he lost mom, just because we couldn't afford to get a doctor up here. That I'd be able to grow up safe. And even if I couldn't, that my kids would."

'Why do you want to come with us?'

'Because I want to free Korea.'

'Why?'

'Because I want my son to live in a world without fear. I want all children to.'

"Yes," North said to Dan Hoon-jo, the same thing he'd said to his father's request to join them.

It wasn't him that had drawn all those people from their lives and into the struggle. It was what he represented. Korea, and a hopeful future.

The man's eyes squeezed shut at the confirmation, and he whispered , "It was all for me. And I can't resent him when I know I'd do the exact same thing for my son or daughter. I forgive him."

North hunched at his choked voice. "Why are you telling me this?"

It came out too blunt. But his legs were starting to shake again.

Dan Hoon-jo took a deep breath. "Because I never got to tell him. And I never will. But I don't resent him anymore. And I want for my son what he wanted for me. I don't want kids to have to grow up without their parents so that their kids can grow up at all. And I want to be able to look my great-grandmother in the face and not be lying when I tell her we're free."

After a long moment, North broke eye contact. "...You can go."

Dan Hoon-jo dipped his head. "I promise I won't betray my father's dream."

North turned his back on him. When the door shut, he fell to his knees, resting his forehead on the table.

He should have been able to save Dan Hoon. He should have been faster, kept a better eye on him. He had promised Song Dong-nyo he would take care of him, he owed it to the boy he'd left behind.

But he could only keep carrying him forward.

North jerked slightly, and he realized his eye had shut. He needed to sleep or they'd never make it back north.

He gulped down his warm barley tea, then painstakingly climbed to his feet again, forcing his knees straight as they tried to buckle. Laboriously, he took China in his arms, moving him to Dan Hoon and Hoon-jo's old room.

It was small and mostly empty, with a pile of blankets and child-sized clothes in the corner, the men's hand-me-downs, likely ready to be moved down to the village for Dan Hoon-jo's child.

North noted with a pang that some of them had been mended with thick, messy stitches.

He laid China out on the thin rice straw mattress, covering him with his scarf again. His comrade didn't stir at all. Hopefully that meant he was fully in a recuperative coma. North fed him his cup of barley tea, then left the room, extinguishing his flashlight.

He tried to sleep in front of the entryway so he'd be able to catch intruders right away, but it unnerved him too much not to be able to hear China's breathing. He settled for lying down on the floor just inside the room, where he could. It was more raspy than gurgling now, reassuring him, at least a little.

Ssi-bal. He didn't know how he was going to explain all of this. He wasn't going to be able to make it back tomorrow, and he knew that South Pyongan would have at least told North Pyongan about sending the merchant for the 17th. And he would have told everyone else. They were going to worry.

They had better not do anything stupid. Maybe he should have given the General permission-

No. He didn't want that. North couldn't either.

He was going to worry, too. Kangwon would be shaking his head in that 'you're hopeless' way of his that North couldn't stand, and SH would already be plotting how to lock him in the bunker when he got back. And North Hamgyong was going to smug about something finally going wrong on one of these missions, especially since it hadn't been North that got injured. And Hae-

He should have slept in the bunker at least once after he woke up from his coma.

He turned his head to the side, trying to banish the thoughts. It was stupid to think about that now. His provinces wouldn't risk crossing the Parallel after him, not after he went off on Kangwon.

They would be fine, and that was all that mattered. What he should be worried about was how to tell Peng Dehuai that he'd gotten his Countryhuman shot.

'Comrade!'

North grit his teeth, turning his head the other way, towards the door.

Why the fuck had he done that? With his hearing, he had to have known North had just walked into an ambush. And standing on top of the ridge like that, practically daring them... to...

North's thoughts scattered and dissolved, not even being on guard in enemy-held territory enough to keep his throbbing body conscious anymore, though he clung onto the part of his mind that would help him reject the recuperative coma it wanted to drag him into.

As he went under, the thoughts he'd been trying to hold back leaked in, thick, black, and choking.

They smelled like smoke.

—

It was still dark when North opened his eye again, with only a faint grey light coming in the windows. He immediately tried to scrabble up, but all his limbs were cramped, and he fell back to the floor as fresh pain coursed through him.

He lay there, cheek to the warm straw mats, and as blood started to seep out of his arm again, he remembered he hadn't tended to his own wounds.

Sleep was clawing at him again, but he forced himself to stay awake. He was too stiff for it to still be the same night he'd passed out on. It had to be the next.

Ssi-bal. He'd slept through the entire day. They definitely wouldn't be able to get back by the19th now.

'Stupid.' He shouldn't have brought-

He jerked up, half-squirming across the floor to China's side, until he was close enough to hear that he was still breathing, it was just quieter.

North let out a breath. He was healing. He had to be.

But he'd need more calories to keep healing. So the Korean made himself do light stretches, reaching for his toes, rotating his shoulders, and rolling his neck, until he was limber enough to stand.

He stripped down by the light of his flashlight (covering China's face with his scarf, just in case), and treated his wounds, putting antiseptic on the worst grazes, like the one on his calf, and dousing his arm with it. The last thing he needed right now was an infection. Then he firmly wrapped them, along with his burns, relieved to get rid of the filthy fabric crusted to his skin.

When he was dressed, he pulled the scarf back over China's chest after disinfecting the scabbing stitches again.

North had only put on his undershirt and pants, not wanting to wear his KPA tunic in case he had to leave quickly, and not wanting to wear the entire blood-crusted reactionary uniform. But as soon as he emerged into the sitting room, he found two fresh sets of clothes folded on the table. Quietly, he retreated back to the room, dressing in the white peasant's shirt and trousers, setting aside the other pair for China, even though he doubted he would wake up to wear them.

Next to where the clothes had been, North found a small clay jar of barley, likely left there by Dan Hoon-jo. He hated to take from the village when he knew their harvests were never large, and were likely even smaller with Rhee's war taxes. But he needed to get food into China, and the fried dace would be too tough, and risk getting a bone lodged in his throat.

He hadn't used Song Dong-nyo's kitchen before, but he'd watched her and South Gyeongsang use it, so he was able to navigate by the light of his flashlight, setting the barley grain to boil, stirring it as he cooked it down into juk.

The house was quiet. Only the calls of a few nightbirds filtered through the window slats above the stove as his ladle scraped against the pot. North watched the pale grain part with a gentle squelch for the wooden spoon to pass, closing ranks behind it after. He focused on the swirls it left behind, keeping the rest of his mind carefully blank until he finally had a watery slurry that wouldn't choke China.

The smell of the woodsmoke from the agungi followed him back into the bedroom. But this wasn't the place to think about that.

'Where is?'

North shoved the thought aside, devoting himself to the awkward task of feeding China, sliding the barley juk (in the meanest sense of the word) into his mouth and massaging his throat to make him swallow, trying not to think about how Kangwon and his General must have done this to him, or that song.

China's throat flexed under his palm as the porridge went down. North didn't immediately lift the next spoonful, keeping his hand on his neck, feeling the blood in his arteries beat weakly under his fingerpads.

It would be so easy to kill him. To apply just a little pressure and stop his heart from beating for good. No one would ever even know. He could tell Peng Dehuai that the enemy had shot his Countryhuman and taken him to America to be killed, and there wouldn't be any proof against it because he wouldn't leave a body behind. He could be blamed for letting him go with him, but not for the death itself.

China was entirely vulnerable right now, completely at North's mercy. Which he had to have known could happen when he drew the fire of every damn reactionary on Sobaek Mountain. So why-?

North realized he was squeezing his neck, and went back to feeding him, working fast until the bowl was gone. He gave him the last of his own canteen, and used the scarf to dry the water at the corner of his lips, again trying not to think of Kangwon.

He shouldn't have entered that coma. He should have just dealt with the fever.

Back in the sitting room, he sat heavily on the floor, head slumping over onto the table. China had stabilized. There was nothing wrong with sleeping here.

But the door opened, and he groggily raised his head to see Song Dong-nyo shuffling out of her room.

North was prepared to explain himself, but she didn't seem surprised to see him.

"There's you." She clucked her tongue. "Always prowling around in the dark instead of just sleeping. But I supposed you've got more than enough of that for once."

"You remember me getting here?"

She gave him a glare. "I'm not so old I can't remember just yesterday." She made her way over to the table. "Is that barley I smell?"

North nodded. "Dan Hoon-jo brought it."

"That boy does have a good heart, when he feels like it." She squinted at the room. "Though I see he's not sleeping on the floor like I told him."

North didn't answer.

"No matter." The woman turned her squint on him. "I also see you have a bowl there. I assume it's for..." She trailed off, her brows furrowing.

"North Gyeongsang," North supplied.

"I know who it's for," she grumbled. "Not you, that's who. Even though I bet you've been crawling all over these mountains yourself."

"I-"

"Stay right there, stay right there. I'll go make you a bowl."

She shambled off to the kitchen, seamlessly steamrolling him, like when she'd coerced him into folding songpyeon. North huffed, deciding to humour her. The more healed his arm was, the shorter the walk north would be.

In a few minutes she was back, setting a bowl of barley on the table, and sitting across from him with her own.

"I hope you don't begrudge sharing with a poor old woman," she said.

"It's your grain." North set the tins he'd brought from the bedroom on the table. "These are for you."

She squinted at them, holding one up to the flashlight. "My eyesight's not what it was."

The characters on the can were also in Mandarin. North didn't say that, not wanting her to wonder why he might have Chinese canned food.

"It's fish."

It wasn't enough to make up for the grain, but it would still likely be her first taste of meat in awhile.

"Oho." She slid the can across to him. "Open that up, if you please. Let's eat like we're Joseon tonight."

"You should store these." Canned fish and barley made one meal. Barley one night and canned fish another made two.

"Bah," she dismissed. "This is our victory feast, isn't it? Soon all the fish and grain in Korea will be feeding us, not the Japs. We might finally get to stop rationing."

North's eye flicked to the table. He picked up the can, working the lid off and filling the room with the pungent smell of fish and fermented black beans.

"Now there we go," Song Dong-nyo crowed, rubbing her leathery hands together. "You can imagine we don't get a lot of fish up here. I feel like I haven't tasted any in... awhile."

She doled some out into his bowl and some into hers, one tough fillet for each of them. A spine poked out of his. North tried to pretend his mouth wasn't filling with saliva.

"By the by, I don't suppose my troublesome son made his way here with you?"

The Countryhuman looked up. Her expression was mildly exasperated, but the eyes that gleamed from the shadows under her steely-grey brows showed her worry.

"...No," he said. "He's not here."

"Well." She leaned back. "Then he better be cleaning the last Japs out."

He wouldn't tell her. Not tonight. He couldn't handle tears. Not when she had left the kitchen doors open, and the smoke was creeping among the rafters.

North wordlessly picked up his spoon, filling his mouth with the barley. He'd managed to convince this village that he wasn't a god, but they were convinced out of tradition less easily. Even though he was only half Song Dong-nyo's age, he was her Countryhuman. She wouldn't eat until he did.

She had added garlic scape kimchi to the grain. It was fresh and crisp, cracking like bone in a way the softened fish bones didn't.

"Phew," the old woman said as she gnawed on the dace. "This is almost as salty as last year's kimchi."

North snorted. They were. Even he'd been able to taste it through the ash in his mouth. He had almost expected China to complain, but he'd just waxed poetic about the convenience of canned fish.

They were convenient. He'd have to consider their own for the production of their uniform post-war field ration kits. For now they had to stick to livestock. China's army had already switched to compressed rations, replacing their fried noodles and potato powder, when the supply lines were open.

The two of them ate their meals over the light of a candle she brought out to save his flashlight battery, and talked, 'catching up.'

North had always felt... uncomfortable around people whose minds weren't entirely there. The drunk or mentally ill, or elders who had started to live more in their own heads than reality. It wasn't them he was uncomfortable with, but their unpredictability. It was difficult enough to guess what someone with all their faculties might be planning, let alone someone who didn't even know what they themselves were going to do next.

But he wasn't uncomfortable around Song Dong-nyo. And not just because she was an elderly woman he could easily defeat. She was the same person he remembered, even if he had to gently remind her about things that had once happened, or tell her information he already had years ago.

She eventually brought out her jogak-po, working on it while they picked at the black beans and scraps of meat left in the can with their chopsticks, North mostly just pretending so she wouldn't scold him.

"It's for Hoon," she explained, holding up the fabric. "I started working on it as soon as I heard the radio broadcast."

"Mm." North's chest squeezed.

"I've been thinking he needs to remarry once he gets back," she continued, guiding the thread through the cloth with shaking hands. "I know it should be Hoon-jo I worry about finding a wife, but there's a girl in the village he's taken a shine to. You know her- she's the younger sister of Kim Hyang-rae, the one who was always trying to get you to make an honest woman of her."

North grimaced. He'd been hoping she would grow out of that, but the last time they were here, she had almost said outright that she would leave her husband for him.

"A good girl," Song Dong-nyo appraised, frowning as she unravelled the stitch she'd just made. "Nothing like that sister of hers. And only a year younger than him. But with him settled, I think it's time Hoon moves on. It's going to be hard enough getting him to settle down and live the quiet life again- he needs a woman to tether him." Her unsteady fingers struggled to pull the needle back through. "And since we don't have much in the way of dowry money, he's going to have to hope to win some poor sot over."

North didn't say anything, setting his chopsticks down on his bowl.

It wasn't a jogak-po she was making. It was supposed to be a kirogi-po, the kind a groom would give to his wife's family, wrapped around a wooden goose, or a real goose in this impoverished village. Some of the malformed stitches were meant to look like sheaths of rice.

"But I'm sure you know by now he doesn't have a lick of sense in his body." Her jaw firmed as she had to unravel her stitch again. "So it's up to his grandmother to do the wooing for him. I'd like to make a cloth she can pass down to their daughter one day. I just can't seem to get the stitches-"

A tremor shook her, and the needle slid into her thumbpad, making her hiss, her wrinkled face contorting in frustration and what looked like shame.

North came around the small table, touching her thin wrist just before she could toss the kirogi-po to the ground.

"Let me do it."

Song Dong-nyo gave an embarrassed laugh, smoothing her thick hair as she relinquished the needle. "Sorry about that. It feels like I've been working on this forever."

"You're just tired." North guided the needle through the multi-coloured cloth, making the stitches small and straight. "I woke you up in the middle of the night, and I've kept you up."

"You don't need to make me feel better," the woman scoffed, leaning back. "I know I'm not what I used to be. My knees ache when it's cold, and I swear I need two more breaks when I'm bringing water from the well than I did just last week."

If she usually thought it was 1945, then she also thought she was seven years younger than she was. It really might seem like her body was suddenly shutting down around her.

North grit his teeth.

"I'd say don't get old, but you don't have to worry about that, do you?" she asked.

"No."

As he stitched the square in, her eyes roved his face.

"You look different," she said, finally noticing his blue skin, or maybe that he didn't look like a boy anymore.

"It's the flag of our People's Republic," North said, not looking at her. "The one we'll fly over a free Korea."

It wasn't a lie. Not really. And she didn't know enough about Countryhumans to question the change.

"It suits you," Song Dong-nyo decided. "White never did."

North looked down at his white shirt and pants. It was true he felt more comfortable in a uniform, but-

"Nothing can suit Korea more than the same clothes our people wear," he told her.

He wasn't like Joseon with his crowns and robes and twelve ornaments. He had never minded wearing plain peasant's garb. It was better than the scratchy workshirt and shorts he had been forced to wear for nine years of his life.

"I wasn't talking about the clothes."

North finished stitching the olive square of fabric in place, and passed the kirogi-po back to her. "You should get some sleep."

Song Dong-nyo ran her hand across the stitches, clicking her tongue. "When the man that can't even fold a half-decent songpyeon makes a better stitch than me, I suppose I need it."

"They were supposed to look like seashells," North muttered, making her chuckle.

"I'd say don't bother with the dishes, but I'm sure I'll wake up to them done anyway," she said.

"You will," North confirmed, helping her stand after he was sure he wasn't going to fall over. "I'll leave the other can of fish for you. And you don't need to save any barley for me."

"You've always been so charitable to us," the old woman said as he helped her to her bedroom door.

"It's not charity."

Even if Dan Hoon-jo hadn't given him their barley, it still wouldn't be. Even when he didn't receive anything in return for what he gave, it didn't matter. His people had given him existence, and the chance to fight for them. Anything he gave in return wasn't nearly an equal trade.

"I know, I know, it's 'mutual aid.'" She pointedly stepped on his foot. "I'm trying to say that the same way you're thankful for having the most generous people in the world, we're thankful for having the most generous country. Accept a compliment."

North wasn't generous, not in the same way he'd praised them for. They had so little to give and they gave it anyway. He had nothing to give but himself, and that was just what he owed them. He was just doing his duty.

But the tops of his feet were burned, and still hurt from walking all those ri. He kept his mouth shut so he wouldn't get stepped on again.

North helped her into bed, did the dishes, then returned to the side room to stare at the ceiling and listen to China breathe.

Then, unable to help it, he got up again, turning on his flashlight and going to the pile of children's clothes in the corner. Under the wide-legged pants and loose shirts that Dan Hoon and his son had once worn, there were more colourful fabrics, what he'd thought were blankets. North picked one up, unfolding it.

It was a jogak-po, made of dozens of patchwork materials in different colours, clumsily stitched together. The stitches were obvious, clearly done by a shaking hand.

'It feels like I've been working on this forever.'

North's jaw closed tight, and he doused the light.

He didn't wake as late the next day. It was still fully light out, even though that light was heavy and grey, and he could hear wind rattling the roof tiles. Voices were just audible under it, and they made his heart pound before he realized it was Song Dong-nyo and Dan Hoon-jo.

He made sure China was still stable, and that his stitches weren't swollen (though his skin made it hard to tell if they were red), put the last of the antiseptic on his wound, then made his way outside.

Dan Hoon-jo looked over at him from the garden, brushing his hands off on his white pants. Song Dong-nyo followed his gaze.

North could see the momentary flicker of confusion in her eyes, wondering what he was doing here, why he looked like that, before it settled.

"You're up," Dan Hoon-jo noted, coming over.

"I'm leaving tonight."

The man raised his brows. "Are you sure? The weather's not too good, and your... Comrade North Gyeongsang looked pretty rough."

"I need to get back."

The longer North stayed here, the more danger he put China and the family in. And the entire village, if Rhee found them here and decided they were all leftist sympathizers.

And tomorrow was the 19th.

"Don't try and stop him, Hoon-jo." Song Dong-nyo appeared to recognize her grandson today. "He's a stubborn one. And he's got to get back to fighting the good fight like your father."

Dan Hoon-jo hesitated, then nodded. "Right. I'll come by before sunset and bring some supplies by then."

"That's fine," North said. "You've already done enough."

"Then I'll just come by to see you off."

North acquiesced, then went inside to boil water for their canteens. Song Dong-nyo had left some of the barley for him anyways, so he fed the rest of it to the other man, rubbing his throat and resolving to tell him that he'd let him starve while he was out.

When it got a little later, North wandered outside, leaving Song Dong-nyo to work on her kirogi-po. She was almost finished.

He headed up into the hills, looking for the group of mounds he'd helped pick weeds from years ago, and finding it. They were sheltered by the peak behind them. There was one more than the last time he had been here.

North stared down at the mound as the sun dipped below the western ridges, casting long shadows over the mountain village, and the sky turned a muddy orange. He didn't look over as footsteps crunched over the grass towards him. He didn't need to when they sounded just like his had.

"Your father named our guerrilla unit," he said.

He hadn't been sure if they were ready to take on human recruits

yet. But still, in 1932, when they had paid their second visit to this village, and the young man that had showed them around the area with such enthusiasm the first time had asked to come with them, North had accepted. And when they had met a man on the run for getting in a fight with a police officer to protect a woman's honour, Dan Hoon had said he should come with 'Korea's Army.'

"Heh. I think I remember him telling me that," Dan Hoon-jo replied, far away as he gazed at his father's grave.

North raised his eye to him. "Korea will never forget Dan Hoon."

It was all he could give him, like always. Never enough.

Dan Hoon-jo's lips twisted. "Then remember him for me."

North bent, plucking a weed off the grave mound. "I will."

They walked back down to the house in silence, and North dressed in the reactionary uniform again, the dried blood rubbing unpleasantly against his skin. He put China's uniform and mask back on him, and wrapped his scarf around his head. With all of their supplies prepped, he went to say goodbye to his old comrade's family.

When Song Dong-nyo turned to him, he could already tell she had forgotten he was here.

Her brows raised. "Comrade Korea? When did you...?"

"He was just visiting, jeungjomo," Dan Hoon-jo said. "He's heading out again now."

"Oh... Oh right, I remember." Her words were unconvincing. She struggled to her feet, turning to him. "It's really true then? You've finally Liberated us?"

North could see the look Dan Hoon-jo gave him over her shoulder, his lips pressed flat.

'Please.'

He should tell her. He would hate to have the truth hidden from him, and she didn't deserve to be trapped in the past, no matter how happy that past was.

As joyous as those days after Liberation had been, they hadn't been flawless. Their nation had been in ruins, their factories razed, their economy ruined, their young men thousands of ri across the sea, drafted by Japan to fight in foreign climes, their women still imprisoned in brothels and illiteracy. And while shared joy made the class distinctions seem small, they had ran just as deep as ever. Even as the landlords held hands with their peasants, they still expected the taxes to be turned in on time, and for rent to be paid. Even as the capitalists waved the Taegeuki next to their workers, they still expected them to show up for work tomorrow, to break their backs for poverty sums. People had been starving and sick and dying, no matter how happy they had been. And if they had just stayed in the streets waving banners and celebrating forever, they always would have been. The only way to stop it was to move forward and take those golden days with them. Even if things got dark again, as they had now, they had to keep progressing, or they would never again grow bright.

It was repulsive, the idea of stagnating in time, completely oblivious to his people suffering around him, meaninglessly happy, at the expense of all else.

Song Dong-nyo was staring up at him with hope on her care-worn face. Hope she expected to be fulfilled. She expected him to have made her the master of her own destiny, she expected him to have brought Dan Hoon back safe, she expected him to have won because that was what he had promised a million times over, whether with actions or words or just what he was.

She was still expecting her grandson to come back home.

And maybe North didn't have a right to crush that hope. She wasn't him. She had no duty to bear the burden of knowing he had failed, in more ways than one. She was too old and feeble to rail against the injustices that had been wrought against them. What right did he have to make her feel the way he had when his guerrilla had brought the news about the Division to him? He had only heard it once- he would be making her hear it for what might well be the twentieth time over. And it wasn't her that deserved to feel that pain.

She didn't need to know about the Division or the war or the stalled armistice. She didn't need to know about the biological warfare or that he had failed again. She didn't need to know how bad things really were.

He would tell her one day. When he won them the ceasefire, and when they were finally Reunified, he would come straight here and tell her everything, and apologize for not being able to keep the first person who had pledged himself to fight at their side safe. He would bear her grief and help her look forward because even if she wouldn't be walking the path for much longer, she deserved for her last steps to be light. But for now...

"Yes," he said to Song Dong-nyo. "I Liberated Korea."

He didn't let himself pretend the words were truth for even a moment. He didn't deserve it.

Dan Hoon-jo closed his eyes in relief, and the old woman laid a hand over her heart.

"Thank goodness," she whispered, tears welling in her eyes. "And- And Hoon, will he-"

"Dan Hoon will be home soon," North told her.

She stared up at him, and her lips wavered slightly. For a moment, her eyes looked clearer.

Then her mouth curved up again.

"Good," she said simply. "I've missed him."

"He missed you, too," North said, lifting his eye to Dan Hoon-jo. "But he loved his family too much to stay."

More than the man's words, it had been the look in his eyes that convinced North it was time to start recruiting. He had wanted to do good and to protect his family. He had to do something. If North hadn't accepted him, he would have thrown himself at the Japanese without changing a single thing. Instead he had been the seed of Korea's Army, and played a pivotal role in their country's Liberation.

He would tell her that, too, someday.

"Dan Hoon became a good man," he told her now, the most he could say without using 'was.'

"So did you," Song Dong-nyo whispered, and her head dipped, her shoulders starting to shake. Dan Hoon-jo came to steady them.

"It's alright, great-grandmother," he soothed. "It's over. Dad'll be home soon."

North looked away from the stark grief on his face. Silently, he retreated into the room to get China, arranging Choe Jong-ok's bones and their packs in the podaegi again.

His hand reached for the photo inside, wanting to make sure it was safe, then retreated.

Just like after they had retaken Pyongyang, he knew he shouldn't look at it now.

He put the podaegi on, and slung their firearms over his shoulders again. Then he lifted China, careful not to disturb his wound. He was stable, not well.

He bore him across the room, and Dan Hoon-jo got the front door for him. The wind swirled in, rustling the mugwort hanging from the rafters.

"Thank you," North said. "And... I am sorry."

Not for taking his father away. It had been Dan Hoon's choice. Sorry that it had been necessary. That he had came so late.

"There's... nothing to be sorry about," the man replied, his lips turning in a bittersweet smile. "It's just the way things were in the end."

"It's not the end," North promised. "Your child will grow up in a free Korea. I won't betray your father's dream either."

Dan Hoon-jo's mouth opened, then he swallowed thickly. He bowed low at the waist.

North looked away in discomfort, but didn't tell him not to. He knew what it meant. He didn't have to fear him or China being given away.

He turned to go, but looked back as Song Dong-nyo called, "Wait!"

She hustled past Dan Hoon-jo, shoving a small box wrapped in cloth towards North.

"I can't believe I almost forgot," she said. "I made a dosirak earlier, since I know you won't have brought anything else with you."

"I don't-"

"You'll be taking it, after an old woman put so much effort into it, of course." She fluttered with the box, eyeing 'North Gyeongsang' like she was considering placing it on top of him.

As she did, the fabric wrapping it caught North's eye.

He frowned at the multi-coloured patches. "Is that the kirogi-po you were working on?"

The woman pulled the box to her chest, looking lost for a moment. "I was making that for Dan Hoon... for..." Her gnarled knuckles bunched around the edges, and she held it out to him again.

"I want you to give it to him for me."

North's jaw tightened. "I can't-"

"Please," she said, and the eyes he looked into were more lucid than they had been since he arrived. "Take it. If you don't see him before I do, then you can keep it. Give it to Kim Hyang-rae or some other woman if you ever take one." She smiled tremulously. "I'm not so old I can't make another."

North searched her face, then turned around before she could search his, offering her the podaegi. Dan Hoon-jo helped her open the sack, setting the dosirak on top. It added more weight, but it was a weight he deserved to carry.

North set off down the mountain road. As he went, he looked back at the two shapes standing in the stormy twilight. The shorter one raised her trembling fist.

"Long live Korea!" she called, her voice weathered, but not frail at all.

North couldn't put his fist up, but he echoed back, "Long live the Korean people!"

Then he left her behind, the same way he had left thousands of people behind, marching on.

One foot in front of the other. Like always.

Hehe. This is why in that one one-shot in the artbook, China says North carried him from the Raktong. You will notice that he says he carried him on his back though. This is because North refuses to ever tell him he bridal carried him.
An unfortunate seed has been planted in North. Well, the seed was already there. But it has been watered. And yes he does still have the kirogi-po in modern day. I like to think he gives it to Y/N (but in signature fashion doesn't tell her how he got it or what it means).

Takaichi Sanae had secret meeting with Peter Thiel. Yayyyyyyy dystopiaaaaaaa. Her face makes me feel violent.

Oh, also I added artwork to the end of the At Your Fingertips chapter because I forgot to add it when I posted. ^^

Homecoming

[image]

The journey north was far longer than the one south, and more torturous. North's two projected days for crossing the entire southern half of the Peninsula were turned into four just to cover distance he and China had crossed in under forty-eight hours.

His teeth itched in his skull as the talks circled in his mind. He knew he shouldn't be needed if all they did was exchange the lists- once they had them, only working out the final wording of the armistice draft would be left, and he had already agreed to the terms they'd discussed, as had 'China's leadership.'

But he still needed to be there, even if it was just to repeat proposals back to his comrades. He had been absent when the secret talks and abandoning the forty-four thousand had been decided on. He couldn't be absent now, or members of their government might start thinking he didn't want a ceasefire after all. And he knew all it would take to turn some of them openly against it was a slight waver from him.

And he didn't trust America. Talking those soldiers down had only reminded him what lengths the foreign country would go to to keep Korea at war, even when it was clear he couldn't win. The more North thought about it, the more sure he was that the Yankee had rolled over too easily when it came to repatriation. For the American, even three months of refusing to follow international law would be giving in too quickly.

It made him even more anxious to reach the front, but his legs wouldn't comply. He could only keep marching forward at a steady pace, forced to take breaks to regain his energy so he could run if he had to. China was a constant weight, even now that he could hold him better without the reed in his chest, but North only put him down to take a few minutes of restless sleep inside caves, twitching awake at every aberrant sound.

He only saw the enemy on the highways he had to cross, their convoys of foreign trucks speeding by on the way to the front, taking a shorter route than he could. The men must not have told their superiors who it was that had slaughtered their units, or the mountains would have been crawling with reactionaries. He didn't know if it was because he had completely convinced them that they didn't want to catch him, or if they just hadn't wanted to get in trouble for letting him escape. He hoped the boy wouldn't give the older two away.

Still, he kept to more difficult paths than they had on the way down, forcing himself to climb high into the Taebaeks, just below the upper peaks, to avoid anyone he could have ran into.

His legs burned like they were on fire, and his burns burst where the firearms were banging into him, only getting worse when the heavy overcast that had covered Korea for the past few days dispersed, and he could feel the planes hitting his land with renewed vengeance, even when it was them that had struck the first blow, and the right of vengeance should be Korea's alone.

North's wounded arm ached from holding China up, a deep throbbing pain that went into the bone. But every time he found himself thinking that it might be better to take breaks every hour instead of every two, he grit his teeth and pressed on, remembering the Arduous March. The whirling snow and cutting winds, the enemy's howls ringing over the mountainside, and the persistent weight of bodies in his arms, carrying them as far as he could before they bled out, or he had to trade them for a gun. His soldiers had been on it for the full hundred days, and they never rested unless they had to, so North couldn't either. And he couldn't now.

The weather was clear, the enemy didn't know where he was, and there was only one person he had to protect. The pain was nothing, the hunger was nothing. He didn't need to rest. He just had to get China to safety.

He pressed on over ri after rocky ri of mountains, every peak and pass blending together, the pressure inside him building and building until his skull swelled with it, and his teeth groaned.

He didn't feel any relief when he started to recognize the rolling hills of Mount Odae or the jagged peaks of Seorak Mountain, not even when he saw the faraway dot of Osaek-ri in the valley off to his left. He had lost this ground, it wasn't safe. They wouldn't be safe until he managed to sneak them through enemy lines. Somehow.

He didn't bother hoping that South Pyongan's merchant would be waiting where he had told him to. It had been too long. He almost avoided the area entirely, in case he was a turncoat and the extra time had allowed him to contact the enemy. But he did, just in case. If he was still waiting, North couldn't reward his loyalty by abandoning him.

It meant climbing Masan Hill in broad daylight, keeping low now that he was penetrating the enemy's rear, able to hear the rumble of truck engines not too far away. And the bombs.

It might have been easier to stuff China somewhere and climb on his own, but he refused to let go of him, in case some reactionary came sniffing around and he wasn't as quick as he'd been in the Sobaeks. He wasn't getting caught when he was so close.

From his vantage point, North blinked away the bleary splotches in his eye, squinting at the hillside. The slopes were almost bare, and the few trees that were left weren't thick enough to conceal troops, though he could see them farther out in the valley. He didn't see the merchant or the cart he had asked for in the gully he'd told him to wait at.

It didn't matter. He hadn't brought back the amount of bones he had thought he might. He could get China and Choe Jong-ok to the Third Corps' line by himself.

He stumbled down the hill, fighting his body's urge to cant forward.

When he'd descended a ridge and felt the prickling start in his shoulder blades, he almost groaned. But he didn't, and kept going, forcing his feet to move faster. A reactionary would have already either identified his flag and taken the shot, or seen his blood-soaked uniform and called out to see if he was injured. It was likely just a curious refugee or herb gatherer that he had to get away from before they could report him.

Undergrowth rustled behind him, and he had to stop, unable to bear his instincts screaming to turn around, to stop running away and defend himself. He dropped China, planting himself protectively in front of him as he whirled around, raising his pistol with an arm that felt too light.

"Mr. Korea?"

The 'Mr.' shot through his skull like a dart, telling him he was in danger, and his finger squeezed on the trigger. He barely stopped it from calling down every soldier in the area on him.

A man crawled out of the bushes on his hands and knees. He was dressed in white peasant's clothes with a brown suit jacket on top, and he cringed back from the pistol pointed at his face.

"Who are you?" North demanded, keeping his voice quiet.

"C-Completely Reasonable Prices Kim," he whispered. "And a man who really doesn't want to be shot by the person he's been waiting for for almost a week."

North's arm fell to his side like dead weight. He almost couldn't lift it again to holster his firearm.

He didn't ask why he was scuttling around on the hill instead of down where he had told him to be. It was enough to know that he would have been exactly where he was expected to be if this was a trap.

"We need to get out of here," he said instead, his voice even raspier from days of disuse.

"I would have been happy to do that five days ago," Completely Reasonable- North wasn't calling him that- Kim hissed, already hustling off across the hill.

North hauled China up, adjusting his scarf and mask, and followed. He kept on alert, but didn't sense any eyes watching them, and they reached the handcart sheltered in the ridges easily.

"In, in," the merchant gestured, eyes darting around fearfully. "Cover yourself with the tarp."

North's initial plan had been to walk alongside the cart while Kim pulled the remains, acting as a distraction in case the enemy came too close. But he knew if he wanted to be of any use if they were discovered now, he needed to get off his feet. So when he set China and Choe Jong-ok's bones in the cart, he crawled in with them. He tucked the other country's long legs in towards his body, and curled his own up with difficulty. Crammed together, there was just enough space for them. He maneuvered himself, putting his knees against China's side to put as much distance between them as possible, and twisting his upper half away so he didn't have to look at his unconscious face.

Reluctantly, he pulled the tarp over them, trapping himself in. It was already too hot, and China's quiet breaths and his own uneven ones grated in his 'ears.' But it was just a tarp. He could throw it off if he had to.

He was glad China hadn't woken up yet, even if it made his chest tight. He didn't want him to feel his body trembling as it was finally allowed to rest. This was worse than the aftermath of Seoul and Chorweon, if only because he'd managed to reach their lines again before his body started to shut down from exertion then.

He could hear the merchant arranging the tarp, then the handcart lifted, levelling them out, and they started to move.

"I don't suppose you have any food," the man whispered desperately. "I ran out days ago."

"No," North said. Song Dong-nyo's dosirak stuffed full of jumeokbap and kimchi had all been fed to China.

"I'll buy you a cow when we get back," he told the man.

He would be giving up his salary for the next few months, but that was fine. It went towards helping his people anyway, and this merchant was one of them.

He sounded markedly less tired and frightened now. "How about a cow and a pig?" he asked slyly. "A new draught animal could help me with my work, and since I haven't been locked up yet, I take it you'd be approving of that."

"I approve of nothing," North said, fighting to keep his eye from closing. "And I have the right to enact the people's justice if I encounter criminals."

"Yessirofcoursesir," the merchant said swiftly.

North sighed. Giving in to someone's greed only made them hungrier, but he didn't want to get turned over the moment a reactionary offered the man a chicken. And Kim really did deserve to be rewarded for his hardship while waiting for him.

"I can't give gifts," he said wearily. "But I'll find you a seller and give you a loan I don't care about being paid back. On one condition."

The merchant muttered something about lurking in enemy territory for five days already being enough of a condition, but grudgingly asked, "What?"

"It's not 'sir' or 'Mr.' It's comrade."

Sounding bright again, the man said, "Yes, Comrade Korea." Then he made a sound that could be charitably described as an avaricious giggle, picking up his pace, eager for his livestock.

North could feel darkness dragging him down, his body wanting him to sleep again. He fought it off. He had to remain alert to defend them if they were spotted.

His stomach made a sound, and he managed to slip his hand into his pocket, careful not to crinkle the tarp resting against him too much. He put the rock between his lips, rolling it around. It clinked against his aching teeth, and saliva flooded his mouth as it was tricked into thinking he was finally eating.

He wondered if South still did this when he got hungry. He wondered if he did get hungry, or if he was always full, kept well-fed by his masters, plunging then further into debt with every meal, the way South Hamgyong had told him about.

The air under the tarp smelled scorched, like burning flesh, and this still wasn't the place to think about that.

North twisted his head over, gazing at the slice of China's face he could see past the tarp drooping between them. His eyes were closed, his long lashes resting on his cheeks. The Korean reached over, pulling his mask down to his chin. He would already be having enough trouble breathing with the damage to his lung and how they were being smothered by the tarp. He would just stay awake to make sure the merchant didn't see him. The man might be loyal, but North wasn't taking the chance that a hundred thousand US dollars would be worth more than a pig and a cow to him.

China's lips were parted. North didn't like that he was able to say it was strange to see him unsmiling for so long. Even when he'd been more serious, like after O-geun, his expression had always been covered by the mask. And his lips were usually curved even in sleep.

His eyes flickered under their dark lids, something they hadn't done since he went into the recuperative coma. A good sign. Hopefully.

North turned his head away again, staring at the dappled olive light cast by the canvas a few centimetres in front of his face, trying to empty his mind of everything but the sounds beyond the handcart and the fight to stay conscious.

The hours passed slowly, worse now that he wasn't walking. Instead of blurring together, each second crawled by individually. The sun set, leaving them walking through the dark, the wheels of the handcart rolling along. North pinned China against the side with his knees, not letting him be jostled around when their wheels went over stones or down slopes.

He couldn't see their surroundings or raise his voice to ask Kim where they were, but he knew when they were nearing the front. The sounds of artillery and gunfire were close enough now that they had to be just a hill away, and he could feel the shudder of the earth as bombs detonated nearer than they had in over a week. And the buzz of planes, of course, settling into his skull with that familiar, tuneless buzzing.

They must not have taken the way he and China had on the way down, because they hadn't crossed the river, but North could still hear that the voices in the distance were no longer calling out the 'NDA's' Americanized lingo, but the KPA's own. 'Comrade Unit Commander, Comrade Nurse.'

Under the tarp, North wormed his way out of his reactionary jacket and pants with difficulty, careful to make sure his skin didn't brush China's, even if it meant twisting himself into positions that made his joints protest. He didn't need the disguise now, and he couldn't appear in front of his soldiers in an enemy uniform, especially soaked in so much blood.

He pulled China's mask back over his face, threw the tarp back, and sat up.

"Don't shoot," he called, his voice coming out less formidable than he would have liked. "It's Korea."

The merchant had startled, looking over his shoulder at him. He startled more as three soldiers emerged from the brush, yelping and almost dropping the cart's handles.

"Comrade Korea?" one of the men asked warily, his rifle half-hoisted.

North shifted more into the moonlight that made it past the tall ridges, letting them see his flag. Another soldier made a birdcall similar to the one that had let North know they were watching, notifying more hidden comrades that the situation was under control.

"I am returning from a mission across enemy lines," he said before they could ask questions. "I need transportation to Pyongyang."

The men jumped into action, one of them hustling off while the others stayed on guard. North wanted to stay in the cart, but now that they were back on their side of the line, he had no excuse. He grudgingly climbed out, his limbs cracking as he extended them, refusing to limp as they followed his soldier to the rear camp.

It wasn't long before a supply truck arrived to the dug-outs hidden among the Kangwon hills, and North was able to send the merchant off, thanking him for his efforts and promising again to get him the funds for a new draught animal and pig (and also 'hinting' that he shouldn't cross the Parallel again or tell anyone about the 'loan' if he didn't want his Countryhuman to come collect it someday).

When the truck was empty, he loaded China up in the back. Before he left, he turned to his soldiers.

"Comrades," he called, raising his voice loud enough to be heard. "Your country thanks you for all you hard work. Know that while you are here risking life and limb to hold the line against the Yankees and their puppets, I am fighting just as ardently for you."

He could see curiosity in their eyes, wondering why he had been in the south, and who the injured 'reactionary' with him was. It was fine if they thought he'd been on a top-secret mission against the enemy, instead of crossing thousands of ri and getting their ally shot just to retrieve a bag of bones. Either way, it was for their people.

"We have only managed to repel the Imperialist invaders and dash their hopes of making Korea their new colony because of you," he told them.

He should have stopped the words from falling from his mouth, but he was exhausted and could feel his legs about to give out again.

"And thanks to you, this war will be over soon." Pain pulsed though his burn gash. "Long live the Korean People's Army."

"Long live Korea!" they cried for him, thrusting their firearms in the air.

North scanned the crowd, searching for roan hair and a flat nose. This was the Second Corps, where Choe Kang-ok was stationed. But she must be at the frontline, as his reports said she almost always was.

He climbed into the back of the truck, nodding to his comrades as they pulled away.

He ached to just stop at Malhwi-ri now. But he needed to get China to a hospital.

The soldiers got out at the supply depot, and he promised to return their truck later. In the driver's seat now, he dug his fingers into his burnt thigh, letting the jolt of pain shock him awake, then put his foot to the gas.

The ride was far longer than he liked, as he had to stop the truck and wait for planes to pass on the edge of North Hwanghae province, and again when he was closer to Pyongyang.

The second time, it was only one plane. It swept low over Singye to the south, but he didn't hear any detonations.

North's hands wrapped around the wheel, picturing a mass of writhing black insects burrowing into the flesh of his country. But he kept going.

At the Pyongyang checkpoint, he told his soldiers to send a message to Singye, and to call a certain surgeon to Jonsung complex. He got there in the early hours of the morning, when the halls were dim and quiet, and took China to the room where North had stayed after Seoul and Chorweon, kept empty for this exact purpose.

He was never so relieved to set him down on the cot, knowing he wouldn't have to pick him up again. He had got him back. He had to be okay now.

His legs ached to sit, but there were no chairs, and he didn't want to sit on the bed with China. So he stood with his knees locked until the door swung open.

Kim Yong-hwan's brows arched as she saw him, a dry expression starting to twist her lips, before they fell as she caught sight of China on the bed, his mask and scarf off.

"Fix him," North ordered before she could say anything.

The woman shook her head tiredly. "What did you do now?"

"It's a lung puncture, lower right lobe," he clipped, then barged past her.

She was already moving, snapping on gloves from her aid kit. "Stay nearby," she said. "I need to look at you next."

North left without a response.

He wanted to go to Malhwi-ri right away, to get everything settled so he could throw himself back into work. But he couldn't show himself to Choe Jong-mi like this.

He stumbled down the hall, unable to feel anything below his waist but a dull throbbing.

The light was on in the office. Kim Il-sung looked up as he staggered in, closing the door and shedding the podaegi with fumbling fingers, carefully setting it behind his desk.

The man knew there was no point in asking if he was alright. "Did you accomplish your mission?"

"I'm not back yet," North rasped.

He was too tired to set up the cot. He dragged his chair over to the General's desk, collapsing into it, his cheek finding the cool wood.

"The lists," he managed to mumble. "What happened?"

"Nothing that can't wait for when my country returns for good."

His Premier's voice gave nothing away. North's neck wouldn't let him see his face.

"I got China shot," he muttered, his lids sliding shut, refusing to open again.

There was a pause. "I see. I hope he survived?"

"I wish he didn't."

The man gave a light chuckle, patting North him on the shoulder. "Get some rest, comrade."

North was rapidly losing his grip on consciousness. But he rallied his tongue to force the words out.

"I won't... do it again."

"I hope that's true," Kim Il-sung murmured.

But his Countryhuman was already gone.

The light was fading over Malhwi-ri when North returned. The sky was still clear, the sunset filling the clouds with orange and purple that reflected red off the river.

He climbed into the hills, his boots tracing the path with ease, even though he'd only visited once before. He followed the scent of smoke back to the dug-out in the beech copse.

Choe Jong-mi and her parents were gathered around a small flame, cooking something in a small dented pot. The young woman was already looking his way as he emerged from the trees, having heard his soft footsteps. She reached out for her mother's arm, and the older woman looked up.

"Comrade Korea," she said, quickly dusting off her skirts and standing to bow, her husband and daughter following.

North wordlessly held out the large wooden box he'd been carrying, and Kang Un-jin's gaze went to it.

"Is that...?"

He dipped his head, and she fell back to her knees, her hand covering her mouth as her eyes welled with tears.

Choe Jong-woo approached, his hands trembling as he took the box from North. The Countryhuman made himself relinquish it, and the man stepped back, a lost look flickering in his eyes as he stared down at the coffin that held his daughter. Mechanically, he walked over to his wife, kneeling with it between them, and tentatively opened the wooden lid, revealing the smooth white bones arranged with care inside.

A sob burst from Kang Un-jin's throat, and she threw herself down on top of them, wailing a funeral keen that sent birds flying from the trees. Her husband's eyes screwed shut as he wrapped an arm around her shaking body.

"What's happening?" Choe Jong-mi asked in confusion.

"Jong-ok!" her mother wailed, tearing at her hair. "Oh my little girl!"

Her daughter's eyes widened, and she stumbled towards her, dropping to the ground, her hands searching it until her father took her wrist, guiding her to the box. Her lips parted as her fingers caressed across her sister's breastbone.

She looked in North's direction, a painful hope on her scarred face. "You... You brought her home?"

"I promised I would." Even if it was far later than he should have.

"I- I didn't expect you to do it now," she said, voice trembling. "I'm s-so sorry for all the trouble. I-" Her sightless gaze went back to the box, guilt stark in her milky eyes. "I should have been the one to bring her home. She was my sister. My responsibility."

"You will bring her home," North told her, not letting the weight of the corpses he'd left behind weigh his words. "I only brought her to you. You will bring her home to Osaek-ri."

She stood on quivering legs and took a halting step towards him, then almost fell the rest of the way, throwing her arms around her country, burying her face in his shoulder.

"Thank you," she whispered a sob. "Thank you thank you thank you."

Her mother keened behind her, holding her daughter's bones close as tears streamed down her cheeks, and blood seeped from Choe Jong-woo's clenched fist as he bit back his emotion.

That was good. As deep as their sorrow was, now that they had Choe Jong-ok's body, they could accept that she was dead, and start to move on. Their grief would never leave, but it would fade, become more manageable. They could perform their rites, put her in the ground, and stop her from haunting them.

It was harder when you didn't have a body to bury.

The smell of woodsmoke in his non-existent nose, North raised his left arm, feeling his bullet wound break open again as he wrapped it around Choe Jong-mi while she shook against him, her tears staining his collar.

Maybe there was a part of him that thought it would be nice to be able to forget. To forget the promises he had made and broken, the voices echoing in his mind, the people he had lost. The ones he'd left behind. Not to stagnate, but to move forward with a clear mind. A clear conscience. To carry only the golden moments with him.

But that wasn't how it worked. He had once told Hae that they needed to remember what had been done to them, so that they would remember why they fought. He had to remember the bad, to remember why it was worth things getting worse to get better, to remember why any pain was worth it, and because those days were only so golden because he had something to compare them to.

And he had to remember all those good moments, too. Even the ones that hurt. He had to remember Choe Bong-nam calling him 'Big Brother' when he was little, and he had to remember the look on his daughter's face as she told him he was dead. He had to remember O-geun's big brown eyes as he smiled up at him, and how his hand had felt in his as the life faded from his body. He had to remember the weight of Choe Jong-ok's bones on his back, and that her favourite colour had been blue. Every one of those memories had equal meaning, meaning that couldn't exist the way it did without its counterbalance, dark to light and light to dark, like the taegeuk on Korea's old flag.

He had to remember that South had burned Seoul. And that he still loved him despite it.

North still couldn't answer China's question, if he would rather have never known O-geun and Choe Jong-ok and Dan Hoon and Roe Chul and everyone else he had lost at all. But he did know that since he did know them, he never wanted to forget them. He couldn't. They were his people, and they gave his entire existence meaning. And that meaning was more precious than anything.

He closed his eye, holding Choe Jong-mi tighter as her family mourned.

And he deserved to be haunted.

—

1924

Heavy breathing, heavier body, a bright room- 'Couldn't he at least have turned the lights off?' - rough hands grasping-

SH awoke with a pained gasp, chest heaving as she tried to orient herself.

She wasn't on a futon with soft sheets, but nestled in a drafty bedroll that had been stolen from the Japanese military a couple years prior. She wasn't dressed- or rather, being undressed- from a fine silk kimono, but in a threadbare jacket and man's undershirt. The harsh light of an electric bulb wasn't reflecting off a stranger's flushed face. Instead, soft moonlight filtered through the trees, illuminating the shadowy lumps of her cousins sleeping around her. Their soft breathing and Hwang's occasional snore surrounded her, calming her heart. She could hear the waterfall she had bathed under earlier in the distance, a soft whisper that told her she was free.

'Free. I'm free. I'm safe.'

She swiped a hand across her face, trying to erase the tears that had betrayed her while she slept. They welled back up as she desperately tried to push the memory of fingers clutching at her out of her mind. Her chest shook with that sick hot feeling, and she let out an unwanted sob, stifling it too late.

"You can make them stop."

The sound of a male voice made SH shoot up, clutching at her jacket as terror surged through her. Halfway up, she realized it was only Korea, but it was too late to pretend she wasn't awake.

The fire had died down, and she could barely see him outside of its dim corona of light. He was only a dark shape sitting by the base of a nearby tree.

Unlike when some of the others stood guard, Korea had never acknowledged her late-night crying sessions before. Usually he stayed a silent sentinel while SH tried to sob as quietly as possible, only able to eventually still herself and return to sleep because of his vigil. It was an unspoken agreement between them, one that she was deeply grateful for.

Now that he had broken it, she didn't know what to say. She stared at his outline, straining her eyes to see the look on his face. She couldn't.

"If you work hard, they'll go away."

The woman had almost forgotten what he had first said. Her nightmares. 'You can make them stop.'

"If you're exhausted enough, you won't dream."

Korea's rough voice was cold, revealing nothing. SH wanted to ask how he knew that, then thought of how he always took late-night watch, not closing his eyes until he had to. She closed her mouth, keeping their agreement intact.

She only nodded to him, then lay back down, turning her face away. She could feel him watching her, and it let her return to her slumber.

The next day, she awoke sooner than everyone but Korea, fetching water from the waterfall for Sang to make breakfast, then throwing herself into fighting practice with a passion, not stopping until she managed to put Chungbuk down and they were called to eat, and she was bruised and sweating. When they picked up the march for the next town to resupply, it was she that goaded the others into not stopping to rest, stealing the role from Korea. And when they stopped again for the night, she volunteered to gather firewood by herself, returning with enough to keep the flames going until dawn. Though she was literate now, she practiced her handwriting until her eyes blurred and she couldn't hold back a yawn. Then she volunteered to take first watch, not waking her replacement until her eyelids felt like they were being dragged down by weights.

And this time when she curled up in her bedroll with Korea keeping guard over her once more, her sleep was dreamless.

—

1952

The heavy steel door creaking open put SH on alert, her hand creeping for her pistol. The footsteps down the hall were uneven and soft, but not stalking, which was the only reason she remained seated. Chagang wasn't back from his province yet, and Kangwon was at the hospital. It could be either of them.

It was neither.

Relief blossomed in her breast as Korea opened the door next to her. The light from her flashlight illuminated the bloody bandages peeking out of his uniform, and the shadow under and in his eye. He didn't seem surprised to see her sitting on the floor of his room in full uniform with the dented brass tea kettle from their chosonjip.

He didn't say anything, leaving SH to prompt, "You're back."

"Yes."

"Korea-"

"Don't start," he sighed more than said.

She echoed it. "You know we're going to have something to say tomorrow."

"There's no need."

There really was. But at least he was back. And mostly healthy-looking. Or on his feet anyway.

SH knew asking where he had been was pointless, so she instead asked, "Where's China?"

"The hospital."

Her brows lifted in alarm. "Is he alright?"

"He's fine. He just got himself shot." Korea made a face.

SH- against her better judgement- had actually found herself becoming a bit fond of China. That wasn't to say that she trusted him entirely, definitely not. But...

Well, Korea did need more comrades. And the Chinese man's intentions seemed pure enough, even if they were still suspect. Anyway, she was sure her country at least tolerated the other nation. If China was seriously injured, he probably wouldn't look so irritated right now.

So she dropped the subject.

"Would you like some tea?" she asked, gesturing to the kettle and tin cups on the floor with her.

The tea was the last of the batch South Pyongan had bought from her 'mystery supplier' (SH knew full well she had a merchant smuggling for her- she'd asked Chagang). She had grabbed too many cups in her rush to get inside before Hwang's shift was over and North Hamgyong came to take his post. He knew what her being up in the middle of the night meant, and she didn't want to hear any jabs about it. She hadn't worked hard enough today, only jetting back to the capital after receiving the message this morning that 'the parcel has arrived.' The wall felt thin.

"No."

Knowing him, she sighed. "Korea, this is the third pot I've made from one sachet. And it was low-grade pine needles to start with. You wouldn't be depriving anyone of anything."

She raised her cup to her lips, face scrunching at the watery taste. "You would actually be helping me drink less of it."

Korea hesitated, and she thought he might turn her down and kick her out of his room.

But, grudgingly, he entered, shutting the door and stiffly lowering himself to the ground to sit against the wall next to her. SH could tell each movement pained him. He should probably be in the hospital with China, not here.

'Honestly.'

She went for the kettle, but he slapped her hand away, snatching it. She managed to get her hands on a cup first, but he tugged it from her grasp, ignoring her own efforts to bat him off.

Victorious, he poured his own cup of tea, tossing it back.

"It's tea, not soju," SH said dryly. "And table manners apply to you, too."

She was younger, physically (he insisted anyway), not to mention he was her Countryhuman. She should pour. He never let her.

He ignored her, squinting at the light-coloured liquid, just barely darker than water.

"You were right. This is weak."

SH huffed. "Judging my tea-making skills, now?"

It was true she wasn't as good at it as North Pyongan. Another task her male cousins had stolen from her.

"Did you boil the water thoroughly?"

"Yes, Comrade General."

He glared at her salute. "Then your tea-making is fine." He took another sip, less like he was taking a shot.

Still, SH could see how the swallow pained him, even of this low-quality, overused tea that no one else would drink, and even when he probably hadn't been eating much wherever he was.

She wanted him to eat better, she really did. But she could never convince herself that him starving himself was worse than if he were to overindulge. A behaviour like that would make her think of America, or even South. So she didn't scold him, this time around.

"Did the General fill you in on the peace talks?" she asked eventually.

She could tell by the way his jaw feathered that he had.

America had handed over his list four days ago now. He had been supposed to remove sixteen thousand POWs that were civilians from the south from his list, and add those that had been captured since November. They had had eleven thousand, and he had had a hundred and thirty two thousand. After their lists were revised, they had twelve thousand. The Yankee list should have been somewhere between one hundred and sixteen and one hundred and thirty-two thousand.

And America had only given them seventy thousand.

"I'll deal with it," Korea clipped.

SH didn't ask how.

They sat quietly, her wondering if he would volunteer any information about what sort of mission he and China had been on. It was a vain hope, she knew. But she wouldn't ask, just like he gave her the grace of not asking why she was awake so late, drinking watery tea in his room by her lonesome.

"That soldier from your province. Bang Eul-sik," Korea said suddenly, staring into his tea. "Did he ever find his fiancée?"

Even as a nail of grief hammered SH's heart, it glowed at him remembering a single report she had made over a year ago. He was always like that, though, when it came to their people.

"No," she softly informed him. She had been keeping in touch with the young man, helping him with his efforts to find his lover while he was busy guarding their coasts. "She was either taken to Busan or..."

She trailed off, hand tight on the cup as she painted a burning ship on her wall, trying to quell the surge of emotion she felt at remembering the destruction of Hungnam.

'Anger. It has a name.'

Korea nodded. "If she still hasn't been found once the war is over, I want you to introduce him to someone."

He pulled a piece of paper from his pocket, sliding it across the table to her. SH unfolded it, brows furrowed as she read the characters there. It was a name and directions.

"Choe Jong-mi?" she asked. The name was familiar. "Isn't that... our comrade from the Democratic Women's Union?"

All the way back at the Raktong, on that first Liberation Day during war time.

Grief clutched at her. It should have been the only one. There shouldn't have been one at all.

'Damn America, and damn his miguk-nom.'

Her country nodded. "She plans to join the Worker's Party to carry on her sister's dream. And she's going to need a good husband."

SH shoved aside her sorrow, mustering a smile. "What, are you a matchmaker now?"

Korea stared at her seriously. "She is loyal without a doubt to her country. You say that he is, too."

She nodded, not a doubt in her heart. She had heard about how ardently he'd fought to Liberate Hamhung to free her from the Commands. "Bang Eul-sik has never wavered. He's a good man."

Korea continued to stare at her.

She thought for a moment, realization dawning.

"So their children will be even more loyal."

He took another drink of his tea.

SH hesitated, pondered on that. "Should I... keep an eye out for more opportunities like that?"

"Yes." Korea set his cup down. "Even once we have won, this won't be over. So long as America exists, he will keep trying to destroy us, just like he does to CCCP and the other Socialists. We are going to need to safeguard the Revolution, at all costs."

Trying to stay light, SH replied, "A bit of matchmaking seems like an easy price to pay."

The look in Korea's eye was not light.

"And if the price grows higher?" he asked, voice low as he gazed intensely into her eyes. "Will you pay it?"

SH's smile fell as she straightened up, putting her tea cup down.

"Korea, I will pay any price for our people, and for you," she told him, matching his solemnity. "We all will. Body and mind, you know that."

He might not like it when she said that, but she had to. She meant it.

Her country stared at her, giving her that same piercing look he had when they first met, peeling off her skin and viscera to scrutinize whatever was inside her.

Unlike back then, she didn't squirm. There was nothing inside of her he didn't already know about, and nothing that mattered that he would find wanting.

He nodded after a long moment of this intense observation, leaning away from her.

"Good," was all he said before finishing his tea.

SH allowed her smile to return. "But you could be less menacing when you're talking about good things, you know."

He *'tch'*ed, then failed to repel her attempt to refill his cup with the lacklustre, lukewarm tea.

SH hid her smirk with her own tin cup as he glared at her, and they finished their drinks in silence.

Her Countryhuman might be the most aggravating person she knew (aside from certain individuals who would not be named), who would make all her hair fall out if she had any every time he ran headfirst into danger without telling them. But it was always worth it when he came back. He reinforced the wall just by being at her side.

Despite the talks collapsing around them again, promising at least another long month of war, at least, she didn't think she would have any more bad dreams tonight.

The reason North says he can't give out gifts despite giving his rations away and leaving money or using it to buy supplies for people is because a pig and cow are much more expensive. The other things can pass as little donations, but giving away an entire draught animal and feed animal makes it seem like he's paying Completely Reasonable Prices Kim off or favouring him.

Whereas giving him a 'loan' is more of an official state thing, and they are giving peasants seed and animal loans. So North can just pay off his own loan in the future. It's still vaguely sketchy financially, but it's a special case.

Pyongyang Marathon cancelled. ㅠㅠ From the vague reason they gave, I can't help but think it might have something to do with the current state of the world.

Also the US is pulling their defensive systems out of South Korea for the Middle East, the ones that made SK take an economic hit as well as exacerbated tensions because China was threatened by them (missiles that could easily not be just 'defensive,' making the regional situation more precarious). I bet they'll start with us next (some of our systems actually were already removed, but it was for a different thing). Join us as our ruling classes realize that no matter how good they play puppet, we will always be lesser to America. Taiwan may be the Israel of East Asia, but it isn't Israel. And we may be the best US army bases in the whole world, but we aren't white. And then join us as they still don't get the message and purposefully continue to antagonize our neighbours with an 'if America won't protect us, we have to protect ourselves!' mindset, not understanding that if we just broke from the US and our current imperialistic line, we wouldn't need to defend ourselves. Alas, Americans are not the only people who see others as lesser. The irony is that last year, I didn't think the DPRK, China, or anyone else would have ever struck first against America or its puppets (Japan, SK, Taiwan as big tension points). But America is literally showing that destruction can come at any point, without a declaration of war, without UN approval, without warning. In the middle of a joint military exercise, they can blow up a ship and leave the crew to drown, in the middle of negotiations, they can decide that they need to take a pre-emptive strike for something you might be doing, and no one will move to stop them. What message does that send, but that if you want to survive then you need to strike first?
I still don't think the DPRK would, at least (even though at this point I wouldn't blame them). Their defense pacts with China and Russia depend on them being attacked first, and it would already be a task for either of those nations to get involved since it would be directly and objectively World War III (not that we aren't already basically in it), and would open a new front for Russia. Plus with Venezuela taken over and Iran in tough straits, while China can single-handedly shut down almost the entire American supply line, they don't have consistent access to oil for their own. Though the US is showing it's not as effective as it pretends to be, and is burning through supplies in Iran. I know they would come back SK up no matter what because they can't afford to lose such a convenient base, but... Anyway. One day I hope we all get what we deserve, good or bad.

Just imagine SH's face is covered in burns.

Hold It Close

“We have given our warning.” Korea’s words were clipped. “America has twenty-four hours to hand over the full list of living soldiers. If he does not, we call off the secret sessions and publish their contents to the world.”

The words hung heavy in the cool air of the bunker hall. So did the fog of colour.

“Is that alright?” North Pyongan asked eventually. Olive flickered around him. “Won’t exposing them make other countries cautious about negotiating with us in the future?”

Secret sessions were supposed to remain secret, often even after their conclusion. Just like Chagang’s war table sessions.

“America’s the untrustworthy one.” Dark red bristled around SH. It hadn't been constrained to veins in months. It was a splash of rotten blood that made Chagang’s mouth taste like copper. “He’s the one that lied.”

“If he didn’t want us telling the other nations about what he has done, then he should have kept his word,” Korea agreed. The same maroon wrapped his chest and fists.

The Americans had only been supposed to revise their lists. To count new prisoners and delete duplications or escapes. Instead they said they had individually screened every single prisoner, asking if they wanted to be repatriated. According to them, fifty-five thousand had said they would ‘rather die.’

Chagang did not believe this number. After all, the forty-four thousand ‘reclassified civilians’ had been supposed to be just that. But seven thousand of the seventy thousand names that had been turned over had been from them. And they had been their soldiers after all.

The Americans said the screening had been agreed on. It hadn't. The negotiations weren't a secret from the provinces. Chagang had read the account. It hadn't been discussed at all.

It shouldn't matter. They had agreed to repatriate all POWs, even if force had to be used. But it did matter.

"I did fear something like this," Hwang sighed, resignation colouring his words. "It was why I brought up being cautious about that line that was added to the draft armistice- 'Release and repatriation shall be affected on basis of the lists.'

It meant that if the enemy refused to add prisoners to the list, then they didn't have to be repatriated. And they were refusing. Even since the 19th, their representative and the Chinese had been demanding a full record of every soldier in their possession, the way they had been promised.

And the Americans weren't budging.

"We were cautious," Korea growled, blue-red frustration striking out at Hwang and the low ceiling. "If they hadn't agreed to repatriate all prisoners or had brought up screening, I would have rejected it."

They hadn't because the possibility of the lists being a safeguard had been worth it. Even just knowing exactly who America had in his possession could keep those prisoners safe. And if they were on the list, they had hoped it would mean he wouldn't be able to suddenly say he wouldn't be returning them. But instead he had just omitted them in the first place.

It was all wordplay, the kind Chagang wasn't good with.

"And if we did reject it, it would've just made us seem unreasonable," Kangwon pointed out. He was crouched by Chagang's feet. Heavy exhaustion hung over him like a purple-tinted grey cloak. "They could've just said it was an innocent throw-away line, and we were getting stuck on details on purpose."

"They already act like we're unreasonable," North Hamgyong growled, red-blue like Korea. “Somehow they’re going to make up another bullshit reason to make us look like the ones in the wrong for spilling their guts. And no one’s going to fucking care anyways.”

The rage around SH grew, ballooning out as it tried to devour her brother. But she stood still. Chagang couldn’t see her face anymore since her emotions had broken through his guard.

“So what?” South Pyongan asked, leaning against the wall. “You think we should just keep chatting? That hasn’t helped so far.”

“And it isn’t going to help.” North Hamgyong’s words were angry. But black smothered the red in them.

“We need to do something,” Chagang forced out. “Threatening to go public could-“ Pain stabbed behind his eyes. “Force them to hand over the full list.”

The black deepened. "It won’t.”

“What do we do if it doesn’t, Korea?” Now that their Countryhuman was back, so was Hae’s cloud of pink. It couldn’t be dimmed by bad news. She quivered inside of it, holding herself back from throwing herself at him again.

“We handle it.”

Chagang was working at winding the colours away again, but he caught the flicker of determined azure and indigo inside of Korea’s miasma.

“How?” North Hamgyong demanded.

“How we have been.”

Korea turned for the door, a clear sign they were done.

“A*hem,”* SH said. Her tapping foot echoed off the walls.

Hwang cleared his throat pointedly. Kangwon crossed his arms over his knees. Chagang stared blankly at the wall, temples pounding.

He didn't need to look at Korea to know his reluctance would be visible as he turned around.

“What?”

Hwang scoffed. “’What,’ he says.”

“If you want to take a bet on it, it’s proooobably something to do with you taking off onto enemy territory like, a week after giving Kangwon shit for the same thing,” South Pyongan said. “Something that I think we can all agree that I have absolutely zero responsibility for.”

The guilt that had been clinging to her since North Pyongan had told them all Korea was gone had disappeared. Teal draped her instead. It could have been because Korea was back safe. It also could have been because her life wasn’t in danger from SH anymore.

“All of Korea is our territory,” Korea said stiffly. “It was enemy-held territory.”

“That you took off into alone without even telling most of us.” SH sounded peeved, but Chagang could see that none of her maroon was directed at Korea. Just olive.

“I had a mission to complete.”

North Hamgyong snorted. “Yeah. And I’m sure you just had to do it. Just like every other time, right?”

He was unimpressed by Korea’s glare and SH’s anger trying to throttle him.

Even though it hurt, Chagang let himself peek at Korea’s aura, wanting at least a hint on what he had been up to.

Immediately it was like someone had taken a hammer to his skull. The maroon, chartreuse, purple-grey, and ochre swirled around him, tinted by flax and mahogany that he sucked back inside himself, and deep, deep olive.

And ash. So much ash. Some of it was twined in with the dark red, like smoke and fire. Chagang didn't think that came from the talks. They should only make him angry.

But besides that, he had no clue. The colours were all his usual ones, just intensified to the point that they made Chagang's skull feel like it was cracking open.

"I did." Korea's guilt didn't swell when he said it, so it seemed like that was true.

"And what was it you did?" Hwang asked, pushing his glasses up.

Their Countryhuman didn't answer. The shame and guilt eddied around him.

Hae was glued to his side now that they were out of military mode. She pouted at the rest of them.

"Don't be nosy," she scolded. "If Korea had to do it, then ah bet it was real important."

"It was," Korea confirmed.

Hae looked up at him, batting her big eyes. "How important?"

He glowered at her, shoving her away. Her pink cloud immediately reattached to him.

"It was a classified mission for the war effort," Korea said gruffly. "It can't be shared."

Chagang cracked an eye to look at him again. If he was lying, he didn't see any more ochre at it. Then he shut it before the colours could stab him.

"We aren't asking you to," he heard SH say, likely shooting Hwang and Hae a look. "We just don't like it when you take off and leave us worrying."

"Yeah," Kangwon said from the floor. "You know how worried you were for me and Gangwon."

His voice was easy. But Chagang doubted the grey he had been leaking since the beginning of the month was gone.

"We feel that way when you're gone," he said to Korea.

"I wasn't 'worried,'" Korea snapped, suddenly aggressive. "I was pissed that two of my provinces were willing to compromise our country because they were too stupid to realize the other countries aren't our friends, and went gallivanting off straight into a trap."

North Hamgyong grunted.

"What?" Korea's voice could have melted through the concrete walls.

"Shit and chaff."

Chagang could almost feel the red that spiked off his country. He squeezed his eyes shut tighter. But he made himself keep listening.

"Do you think I do these things just because I feel like it?" Korea hissed. "I only ever undertake a mission like this when I have to. Kangwon and Gangwon did it because they're fucking idiots!"

Chagang didn't look at Kangwon.

"Korea," SH said disapprovingly.

Chagang heard him take a breath. His next words were calmer.

"It doesn't matter," he said. "The General and I have agreed that I won't be leaving for anything like this again unless it is something he agrees is absolutely necessary."

Chagang had cracked an eye to see Korea's colours. If he had seen just guilt, he might have thought he was lying. But the shame was brighter.

"We'll see how long that lasts," North Hamgyong scorned.

SH's refusal to bite back at him hurt Chagang's head. So did the chartreuse and maroon from her brother. And that other more unpleasant colour from both of them.

Korea glared at the Northern Hamgyong. “If you’re all done with your useless commentary, I have work to get to.”

Hae squeezed onto him, preventing him from leaving. “Aren’t you goin’ to sleep here tonight?”

“No.” More guilt tinted in his aura. “I have work to catch up on.”

She pouted. “But ah wanted to sleep in your room.”

A new colour shot from him. The sunset of embarrassment.

“I never let you sleep in my room in the first place,” he hissed, shaking her off and straightening his tunic.

Disappointment bloomed from Hae for a second, but the grey-washed orange was quickly swallowed up by the pink again. She knew just as well as the rest of them that she would get her chance to strike.

Chagang unlocked his jaw before his Countryhuman could walk away. “Korea. China?”

Ochre spiked from his shoulders.

“Oh yeah,” South Pyongan said, like she had forgotten their ally had been shot. “What do we do if he ‘dies?’ Do we hold him up behind a wall and use him like a deolmi puppet to try and trick Mao and them to think he’s alive?”

She went behind her brother, grabbing one of his arms and making him wave, while she used her other hand to open and close his jaw. North Pyongan made no effort to stop the manhandling.

“I’m China,” she said. Chagang could describe her voice as ‘flamboyant.’ He could not describe it as sounding like China. “And I’m perfectly fine and won’t blame Korea for me getting my lung blown out. Also I’m way less attractive than South Pyongan.”

“Your Chinese accent is offensively atrocious,” Hwang noted.

“Please tell me you haven’t been speaking to our Chinese comrades like that.”

“No,” South Pyongan made her brother say, still in her awful accent. “Definitely not.”

“I already told Peng Dehuai's replacement about his condition,” Korea cut in irritably. “He said it was regrettable. But he doesn’t seem to blame us.”

Chagang couldn’t tell if he had misunderstood him on purpose. “But what about him?”

“Mm. Is he alright?” SH asked, olive fizzling around her.

Korea’s colours didn’t change. But they twisted, wrapping together in tangled skeins that made Chagang’s teeth ache.

“Ask Kangwon, not me.”

With that, he left, slamming the bunker door.

Chagang breathed a sigh of relief. He was much better at holding back the colours now, even if it caused his migraines to get worse. But Korea still managed to shatter his defenses without fail.

The provinces all looked at Kangwon. Chagang saw his heavy exhaustion before he tried to push it away again.

“China will be fine,” his cousin said, getting to his feet slowly. “Me and Kim Yong-hwan both checked him over. He was a little dehydrated, and he took a pretty severe shot, but Korea fixed him up okay. It’ll be a few weeks before he’s combat-ready again, but he should wake up any day now.”

“That’s good,” North Pyongan sighed at the same time as North Hamgyong said, “Damn.”

SH’s rage broke through Chagang’s concentration. But she just smiled. “Well, I’m glad he’s awake at least.”

Hae nodded vigorously. “Me too. He said he was goin’ to get more stuff for us soon. Ah mean, just to put around the bunker for anyone to use. Not gifts or nothin'. Anythin'."

"Hae, Korea said you could accept gifts from him so long as you asked for them," Hwang pointed out.

She hung her head. "Ah know. But he doesn't want me to."

"I'm sort of glad he's okay because I don't want a comrade dying in our country," Kangwon said.

"Oh, ayuh. That too," Hae said quickly. "Ah'm really glad Comrade Mao Zhilong is okay 'cuz he's nice an' doesn't deserve to die."

"Who cares if he's okay?" North Hamgyong grunted. "It was his decision to flounce off with Korea. And we all agreed he had something to do with that Chorweon shit, didn't we?"

"Oh." SH turned directly to him for the first time since they had returned to the bunker. "You're still here?"

Chagang winced as maroon and tan flared from her brother.

"Yeah, I am," he growled. "Unless you want to do something about that."

"Mm, no," SH said pleasantly, turning away again. "I don't care enough to."

The hallway filled with the grey-yellow fog of discomfort.

"Anyway!" SH crushed it between her hands before anyone could say anything. "Comrade China is okay. That's all that matters."

Chagang had only been semi-tuned in after he heard China was alright. That was all that mattered. And it wasn't why he had asked Korea about him.

South Pyongan glanced at the women's bedroom door. She lowered her voice. "The Liaos aren't in right now, right?"

"They went to do laundry," North Pyongan said. Chagang enjoyed the little flutter of red and gold as Liaoxi crossed his mind. "Why?"

"I'm just throwing this out there," South Pyongan said. "Completely random thought, just throwing tteok at the wall, but…" She glanced around, even though there was nowhere in the hallway to hide. "How sure are we Korea didn't shoot him?"

SH gaped, horrified. Chagang could see her dismay. "South Pyongan!"

"What?" she asked. "Come on, Korea's had it out for him from day one."

"I like to think Korea is more strategic than shooting our only ally on the ground," Hwang said delicately.

North Pyongan raised an eyebrow. "I like to think he wouldn't do that because Comrade China is a comrade who has helped us out immensely."

"Ahem. Yes, that too."

"Ayuh." Hae defiantly put her hands on her hips. "Korea wouldn't shoot Comrade Mao Zhilong. Not unless he did somethin' to really deserve it. And then Korea wouldn't screw up an' leave him alive."

"Hey, I'm not saying he did it on purpose," South Pyongan stressed. "But how many times has Korea pointed a gun at him? Like twenty?"

"Exaggeration is a tool of the reactionaries," SH said primly. "It's more like eight, I'm sure."

"Okay, yeah, same diff," their cousin dismissed. "Picture it- in enemy territory, emotions running high, Korea's paranoia paranoia-ing. Then China does that slinky disappearing-reappearing trick of his and 'bang!' no more pretty boy." She crossed her arms. "You can't tell me it wouldn't be just like Korea to slink back with him and refuse to tell us that's what happened."

Chagang wished he could deny that. Unfortunately Korea had been radiating enough ochre that it would make sense for him to have shot their comrade. He didn't think he had, but he couldn't tell for sure. All he could tell was that if their Countryhuman had done it, he felt guilty about it. Which probably wouldn't be comforting to Peng Dehuai, Chen Geng, Zhou Enlai, or Mao Zedong. Or possibly China.

"I hope he did shoot him," North Hamgyong said.

"No you don't," North Pyongan scolded.

Chagang nodded. "That would break our alliance. We would lose the PVA."

"So?" his cousin growled. "They aren't doing shit anyways. They've been throwing themselves at the enemy with us for nine damn months and we still don't have a ceasefire."

Chagang had his private doubts about the war ending anytime soon. But he could only speak of victory.

"We will soon."

"Well," SH said before her brother could snap back. "Ceasefire or not, we all need to get some sleep. I think we can all agree that Korea didn't shoot China, wouldn't shoot China, and that he'll be able to handle the Yankees tomorrow. And anyone that doesn't, doesn't really matter."

"I'm not saying he'd enjoy it," South Pyongan griped, following SH into the bedroom. "I'm just saying if he did it on accident, he'd never fess up."

"Ah'll ask him tomorrow," Hae chirped, skipping after them. "He'll tell me for sure."

"Whatever," North Hamgyong grumbled, storming into the men's room.

He slammed the door in Hwang's face, as usual. He had to open it again, sighing.

It was just Chagang, North Pyongan, and Kangwon in the hall now. The latter sank to his haunches again, rubbing his face.

His cobalt-skinned cousin opened his mouth, then closed it.

"Don't take Korea's words to heart," he said instead. "He didn't mean it."

"Yeah, I know." Kangwon rubbed his eyes. "I'm just tired."

Ever since he had returned from Norway, discomfort always crawled across the Pyongans' skins when they were around him. North Pyongan turned yellow-grey now.

"Goodnight," he said after a moment, heading into the room.

The purple-grey exhaustion had already grown heavier over Kangwon, pressing down on his shoulders. Darker grey threaded through it.

"Are you sleeping here?" Chagang asked.

"No," his cousin said. I've got a patient I need to be on call for. Possible anthrax."

"Do you want me to drive you?"

"I'm good." Kangwon climbed to his feet. Flax and mahogany pain crackled off of him. "I've got my guards to walk me."

He had new ones now. His and Gangwon's had been dismissed. They were being kept somewhere. Chagang thought it might be in his province, as far from the 38th Parallel and the coast as possible.

First watch was his tonight, so he walked his cousin outside.

"So what do you think?" Kangwon asked, stretching for the walk. "Did Korea shoot China?"

Chagang didn't think so. He felt a lot of things towards their comrade, but none of them were the inky blue-black that seeped out of South and North Hamgyong even more heavily than before.

But he had been hoping he would see something nicer than all the darker colours. He liked watching people make friends almost as much as he liked watching them fall in love. Children had it come faster. They would meet at a park, and the moment one asked if another wanted to play the mugung flower bloomed or hunt-the-Japanese, pink would explode out of them. Adults were more hesitant. They wouldn't feel anything strong when they met, but the more time they spent together in the People's Committee or working together in a factory, the more spurts of azure and amusement there would be, until they would glow with the emerald of high spirits the moment they set eyes on each other. And pink, though more subdued than in children.

The few times China's emotions had been strong enough for him to see, he hadn't seen pink. But he had decided the colours he had seen at the Foundation Day speech meant he had some sort of affection for his country. Even if some of them were still unnerving. It could be foolish, but Chagang had been hoping to see Korea start to see China the same way. He hadn't been able to witness his Countryhuman making a friend before. He wanted to. As painful as his negative emotions were, his positive ones were just as beautiful.

But out of all the colours that had writhed around him when they brought China up, pink hadn't been one of them.

Still, that didn't mean he thought Korea would shoot him. He at least had better discipline than that.

"No," he said to Kangwon.

His cousin nodded, relief blossoming around him. "Yeah, me neither. I'll see you tomorrow for your blood. Donation. Your blood donation."

Chagang nodded, and his cousin set off, trudging away under his cloud of exhaustion.

He could try and tell him to get more rest. But he knew he wouldn't. Kangwon had a duty to fulfill.

Chagang didn't have as much of one right now. He wasn't needed as often in their military complexes when they were limited to probing and repulsing actions. And despite he and Korea's silent agreement, he was sure his Countryhuman had returned to subtly trying to keep him away from more classified information.

He didn't like that. It felt woven in with Korea taking off for the south again. He had agreed with Chagang that the provinces were more expendable than him, even if he had refused to say it out loud. If he had something that needed to be done, he should have sent Chagang. Because of their agreement from the tactical withdrawal, he knew there was no danger in him being Commanded even if his province was occupied again. And Kanggye becoming occupied again was highly unlikely.

He didn't think it was because Korea still didn't have faith in him. The violet that had bloomed around him when Chagang had all their operations reports organized and ready for him when he had woken up after the fever denied that.

Which meant the problem lay with Korea. That worried his province.

But at least he had said he wouldn't take off like that again. And his colors had said he did seem to have been telling the truth.

At least for now.

—

The door to China's room creaked open. Liaoxi poked her head in, and her sister poked hers over top.

Their Countryhuman was lying on a cot against the far wall, his feet facing them and an IV attached to his left arm. His face was serene in slumber(?).

"Not smiling," Liaotung whispered, more for the benefit of those in the hall than China. If he was awake, he would hear.

"En." Liaoxi slipped into the sterile room, her sister following.

They removed their masks, staring down at the man on the bed.

“We could get rid of him,” Liaotung muttered under her breath. “It would be easy to blame it on the Koreans.”

Liaoxi nodded her head, crossing her arms thoughtfully. “No longer would we have to put up with his folly. We could go home and be jolly.”

Liaotung stepped closer to the bed, her face darkening. “New China should have a new China, don’t you think?”

Liaoxi watched their Countryhuman’s face with bated breath as her sister reached her hands for his throat, wrapping them around it. His eyelids flickered, naturally, she would say.

After a moment, Liaotung straightened up. “I think he really is asleep.”

Liaoxi sighed, resting her cheek on her hand. “’Tis a shame. I was looking forward to telling him North Pyongan and I shared a kiss.”

China didn’t stir, and she dropped her arms.

“Definitely asleep,” she decided. “Gossip he would not miss.”

“Definitely not.”

Liaotung already knew about her kiss with the Korean province. Liaoxi had woken her up to tell her about it the second they returned to the bunker. She’d felt giddy being able to share a story like that with her sister under the covers, whispering so as not to wake up the Korean women.

Even if her sister wasn’t as much a romantic as she, she thought she’d enjoyed it, too. For so long, Fengtian had been surrounded by men- Jilin, Heilongjiang, Manchukuo, China (though he barely counted). And the only romance they’d ever experienced was reciting their poems with other poets before being locked away. It felt novel to be able to tease her sister over a man, just like it was novel for Liaoxi to be teased.

Liaotung leaned back, abandoning her whisper. “Want to investigate him?”

Liaoxi shook her head. “He’ll let us do it when he wakes. Advantage of him we should not take.”

“He’d do it to us,” her sister pointed out. “How about a compromise? Kangwon said he got shot in the lung. We just look at that.”

Liaoxi sighed. “If you knew where he was shot, then why an investigation did you want to plot?”

“Curiosity.”

China was in a hospital gown and pants, an outfit it was strange to see him in. Liaoxi was glad it was striped with pale blue, at least. She knew the Koreans loved their white clothes not just for funerals, but for their everyday for the purity they represented, but white for them was the colour of the grave. Purity was for the dead, not the living.

Liaotung pulled his gown up over his chest, and peeled back the medical tape, revealing the thick scab on the right side, just opposite his heart. Neat surgical stitches stuck out of the red skin.

“Definitely shot,” her sister appraised.

Liaoxi gave China the grace of not touching him while he was asleep (even though she knew he probably wouldn’t actually mind; if anything, he would chide her for not taking advantage of his vulnerability to discover what little story-telling marks the doctors wouldn’t have paid any mind to in their write-ups). She traced the impact crater with her eyes, pretending she didn’t see her sister clearly prodding at their Countryhuman’s sides anyway.

“There couldn’t be another thought.” Liaoxi tilted her head at his injury, observing that he was lying flat with no added bandage bulk on his back. “No exit. A frontal wound for him isn’t a fit.”

China’s hearing verged on supernatural, and his other senses matched. He was still ‘human,’ and it wasn’t like they hadn’t been successfully ambushed before. But it was rare, usually when they were in the middle of a storm or by a particularly loud waterfall.

And never from the front. Even looking at his bare torso showed light pink scars on his sides where bullets had grazed him, and unavoidable shrapnel marks from open combat, but no other bullet holes.

Liaoxi’s gaze dropped to a long, pale scar that curved over his left hip.

And those marks he had came back with from that city, of course. He'd never confirmed their guesses from that examination, just smiled at them, leaving the scene he'd taken all the grievous wounds in a mystery.

“Do you think he did something he shouldn’t?” Liaotung asked.

“Even if I wanted to say no, I couldn’t.” Liaoxi patted the medical tape flat and pulled his gown back down.

Her sister sighed. “What are we going to do with him?”

“Likely continue to tolerate his whims,” Liaoxi replied, perching on the edge of the bed.

China didn’t stir.

Her sister sat on the other side of him. “What did Comrade Chen say?”

Chen Geng had temporarily replaced Peng Dehuai as the commander of the PVA until someone could take the post more permanently. Their Comrade Peng was suffering from a tumour in his head and had to go home for treatment. They didn't know what the prognosis would be yet, but... China would be just as displeased as him that he wasn't able to say goodbye.

Their new comrade was an experienced and steady military man, but hadn't been excited to hear that the China back in Beijing wasn't the real China. He wasn't happy about their Countryhuman being at war, especially not when the first thing he heard about it was that he had gotten shot.

“He wants him to be sent back to Beijing until he’s better.”

“Or permanently, perhaps.”

Liaoxi dipped her head. “I doubt the idea would be much of a fetter.”

Not to him, anyway.

“And?”

Liaoxi arched a brow.

Liaotung shook her head. “He has orders not to send him back if he gets injured, doesn’t he?”

“’Tis the way it be.”

Liaoxi might have preferred that he did go home. She wanted to stay here and fight for the Koreans, and for their people that had been cut down by the Yankees. Her and her sister weren’t as needed as their Countryhuman, and it would be easier to say they’d gone rogue if they were discovered. But China…

Well, he should probably be in China. Though she knew what he ‘should’ do had never been much of a lure for him.

“Do you think he was always like this?” Liaotung voiced a thought they’d often wondered about as one person.

“Who knows?”

Not them. None of the provinces did, she didn’t think. His past was the one thing China dissuaded them from looking into, and meant it. He wouldn’t reward them for figuring it out, unlike most of his secrets and lies. She’d been able to tell that from his sharp smile the first and only time Fengtian had asked. She knew what his old flag had looked like, she was sure it hadn’t been a constant disguise. But she didn’t know if it was his only old flag.

“I doubt he’ll ever disclose,” she murmured.

“En.” Liaotung tugged lightly on his cheek. “Bad gege. Though I guess we know he’s been like this for as long as we’ve known him.”

“Mm.”

‘Like this’ meant a multitude of things, especially with China’s many roles. But when he was lying on a hospital bed in a foreign country with a wound he by all rights shouldn’t have, Liaoxi was thinking of that long march, and him hanging between Comrade Mao and Heilongjiang, his head lolling as songs spilled from his lips, blood stained the bandages on his wrists like plum blossoms, and their soldiers marched on, their pain and exhaustion forgotten.

Or of 1937. Coming back to find him gone, only to see him two and a half months later, like nothing had happened. Alone and carrying new scars.

“Do you think we should try and convince him to go?”

Liaoxi saw no need to deliberate. “Even if we did, ‘twould not be so. He’d just take some of our points away.”

And she was not losing the favourite province competition to Shaanxi again. Agreeing to stay on Korea’s last Foundation Day had scored them major accolades. She knew as long as she wrote an epic ballad about this war, she could take first place once they returned.

Though she wondered if ‘she’ would be around for that.

“Mm.” Liaotung nodded sagely. “So he stays to get shot another day.”

Liaoxi sighed, patting their Countryhuman’s hand. The sleeves on his gown were too short. She could see the pale scar across his wrist.

It really was difficult to care about someone whose greatest priority wasn't themself. Even though she was certain North Pyongan and his cousins were worse off than she, the Chinese provinces did share the same burden. Though it was sometimes difficult for some of her comrades to see past the mask to figure out if China actually did care for things more than himself, or if he was just so prideful that he never actually believed he was in any danger. After all, he was the man that had waltzed straight into Manchukuo's- and thus Japan's- grasp to perform in women's clothing just because he'd decided he wanted his northeastern provinces. There really shouldn't have been any escape from that. If it wasn't China, Liaoxi didn't think they would have been able to. That was either great love for them, or great arrogance.

Liaoxi hadn't been sure herself which it was at first. Fengtian had only been with China for less than a year when the Long March began, and so hadn't been able to get her fingers under the mask's edge yet. If she hadn't been on it, she might never have.

'China's people have given their blood for China. Why shouldn't China do the same for them?'

Liaoxi knew which it was now. And she knew it was that willingness to drain himself dry for their people and their cause that made her realize he was more than another China-contender, albeit one she was incredibly grateful for. Seeing how committed he was to helping people who weren't even theirs only told her they'd made the right decision in choosing him to be the People's China. In the end, no matter how he could make her worry, it was the fact that he wasn't the most important person to himself that made her care for him. That was why she would accept him staying in Korea.

And that was why she would accept whatever fate he had written for her and her sister.

Liaotung was tipping a bit of water from the tin carafe down China's throat, humming one of her jaunty er ren zhuan tunes.

Not for the first time, Liaoxi wondered if she should tell her sister what China had planned.

Her thumb ran across the pink ribbon around his closest wrist. The scar tissue wasn't rippled, he hadn't cut deep enough for that. Just enough to get the blood flowing like poetry.

But even she didn't know exactly what he was scheming up. If she told Liaotung, China would only be disappointed. He had only told her so she could decide whether or not to take the chance for improv he'd given her.

And Liaotung liked surprises. She liked to have her lines sprung on her last minute, or to have to change her role on a sudden whim. As she'd said, she found the idea of settling into one boring. She enjoyed wearing masks.

Liaoxi could remember how it felt to enjoy it as Fengtian. Maybe one day she could again.

Liaotung looked over at her, sensing her stare. Liaoxi smiled, pulling China's sleeve over his scar, reaching over to tuck the blanket over his other one, too, since the IV wouldn't let his sleeve come down.

Regardless, she was just an actor. She would do as the Director directed.

The door opened, and they both looked over, hands darting for their masks before they realized who it was.

Korea stood in the doorway, looking at them with a wide eye, like they'd suddenly ambushed him. Without a word, he turned on a heel like he was about to leave, then swung back.

"I was looking for Comrade Kim Yong-hwan."

Liaoxi blinked at his aggressive tone, and Liaotung said, "The… nurse?"

"Yes."

Liaoxi restrained herself from shooting a look at her sister as she glanced around the tiny room with exaggerated motions before reporting, "She's not here."

"I can see that," Korea snapped, then spun around and actually walked away this time, slamming the door with force.

The two Chinese women exchanged glances.

Liaotung shrugged, miming taking a bite out of a fruit, only to wince as the spines stabbed her mouth.

Liaoxi didn't encourage her by smiling, even if her lips did twitch.

They left the underground complex together, their masks and scarves disguising them once more.

"Are you going to go help North Pyongan?" Liaotung asked in a teasing tone as they descended the hill, revelling in the spring breeze.

Liaoxi flushed under her mask, but shook her head. "Comrade Peng doesn't have time to visit China yet. I told him a report on his condition I would get."

"Mm, well I'm sure you can get lots of cuddling in when you leave for his province next," Liaotung said, ducking as she flicked at her with a gloved finger.

Liaoxi laughed, smiling.

That was another reason she didn't really want to tell her sister about China's plans. She couldn't know if the same lesson about love had been imprinted on her in all their years of fighting at their country's side for their people, or if she just acted like it had. She couldn't know if she would understand her relationship with North Pyongan in that light. If she couldn't understand, she didn't want to lose this.

She wanted to enjoy being sisters for as long as they could, just like she wanted to enjoy being in love for as long as she could.

Hmmmmm. Very scary dream about an endless basement, a creature with empty eyes, and father.

If you want a clear view on 'who' Liaoxi and Liaotung have been, from what I can find it is something like this:
1907- Current Fengtian formed as Fengtian
1929- name changed to Liaoning or Mukden
1932- changed back to Fengtian
1934- the area was split into Fengtian (Liaoxi), Antung (Liaotung), and Jinzhou
1939- Antung further split into Antung and Tonghua

1945-1949- back to just Liaoxi and Liaotung (though Nationalists still called her Antung)
1950- fully officially Liaoxi and Liaotung
1954- …
Also they weren't under real Chinese control in 1934 as they were still under Manchukuo. So basically Fengtian was living life with China as a revolutionary, then split into three people all of a sudden with no choice in the matter. And since I can't find the exact month it happened, there's a 3/12 chance it was on the Long March. Being a Provincehuman is about accepting at any moment that a clerical decision might fundamentally remake who you are as a person. I think that's the core of why old countries didn't get as attached to their provinces, since borders were very fluid back then. Even modern day, that's probably the basis for why most countries have a more coworker relationship with theirs. It would suck to have someone you thought of as a sibling/child/close friend, just to have them suddenly split into two different people or combine with someone else to become another person entirely just because it makes administration easier.

Unscreened

The Americans never handed over the lists. Of course they didn't. Hickman, the staff officer that had been their representative in this stage of the talks, protested against North and China pulling away from and exposing the secret sessions, but made no concessions that would have stopped them.

The officer hadn't wanted to return to open sessions. He hadn't wanted to return to the sessions at all, demanding an indefinite recess, though America was conspicuously silent when it came to the decision that came off as a temper tantrum to the rest of the world. It was repealed only a day later, when Admiral Joy stepped in to call for a full meeting of all their chief delegates on the 27th.

North and China's men went to Panmunjom, reporters from all sides swarmed, more than had gathered in one place yet, each one wanting to capture the moment that could make or break the talks.

And an hour before they began, America cancelled them.

North didn't know if it was because their reporters had made sure the UN pressmen had received the accounts of the secret sessions that exposed his plotting, and he'd had to deal with the blowback, or if the Yankee was just enjoying toying with them.

The next day, Joy asked for secret sessions again. Both North and Nam Il had been reluctant, now that they knew how they could go. But in the end, neither they nor China's negotiators cared how the talks were held, so long as they were held with sincerity.

North didn't expect that. He hadn't expected it two or seven years ago, and he certainly didn't expect it now.

He was starting to hate being right.

Joy came in swinging with America's bat, claiming his country would accept airfields being built in the north during the armistice if they dropped their nomination of CCCP as one of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Committee, the committee that would oversee the POW exchanges and peacekeep during the ceasefire.

Even though it rankled that they thought North had to be 'allowed' to construct anything in his own country, that wasn't a deal-breaker for him. In fact, it was a fair trade. Since one of America's nominations- Norway- had to be eliminated due to him officially joining the war, if that had been the only issue, North would have immediately dropped CCCP, leaving them with two appointments each- Poland and Czechoslovakia for them, and Sweden and Switzerland for America. Both hard-core capitalists, and one a Nazi collaborator. But better than some options he could have chosen.

And the airfields were important. Not only did they need them to bring in aid and supplies quicker, but if they were left in ruins, America could use a ceasefire to fly in more weapons and soldiers and bolster his own air force over the south, leaving him refreshed, and them in the same situation if he called the peace off. The larger and more prepared their own air force was, the less of a chance there was that he could do that.

And there was the principle of it. The Yankee had no right to dictate what could or could not be built in Korea.

So it was a fair deal. Remove CCCP, get their airfields.

Or it should have been. Because there was a price for it- both North and China would have to accept the seventy thousand prisoners whose names they had been given, leaving the other hundred thousand in America's hands.

More than that. North couldn't even shave the number down by reminding himself they had agreed to give up on the forty-four thousand. After the news that just came out of Geoje Island…

He knew a large chunk of those forty-four thousand- 'thirty-eight thousand' now- hadn't been screened the first time. And with the air drops and escapes, and the seven thousand, he had proof that at least a few thousand of them were he and China's soldiers. He knew the others were, too.

And Admiral Charles Turner Joy- his Countryhuman speaking through him- said that if they wanted their other condition, then they had to be abandoned. The deal had to be accepted in full or not at all. He had said outright that they'd only been refusing the airfields and CCCP for bargaining purposes.

But if North and China didn't take the deal, they would make it principle, another thing to block the armistice with.

North had refused to accept it, obviously. They would take the CCCP-for-airfields deal, but he wasn't leaving his soldiers behind. Chen Geng and his negotiators had felt the same way. So had China. Their prisoners weren't bargaining chips and it was the law that every single one of them should be returned. The Yankees had agreed to do it, they'd just used their stupid fucking double-talk to pretend they hadn't.

'Joy' had tried to call for an indefinite recess again a few days ago, on May 7th. North had Nam Il expose the secret sessions again. He didn't care if it made them seem unreliable or unreasonable or untrustworthy or un*anything*. America had damn near admitted outright with his mouthpiece that everything he did had nothing to do with principle and everything to do with drawing the war out and keeping as many of North and China's people as possible to torture them in their camps. It was unfair and the world deserved to know.

They didn't care. Of course. Acheson, Ridgway, Van Fleet, even 'keep the war in Korea' Truman, the British and Canadians and all of America's other United Nations puppets and fucking Japan got together the next day with a speed that said they had already known what was going to happen to announce that they supported the ultimatum, that it was right and just to violate the laws that they had created, that North and China were the unreasonable ones for wanting the rules they hadn't even had a say in to be upheld. They would continue to say it was right even once the Geoje news spread because they wanted his people to die.

They wanted the war to go on, every single one of them. Even as the warhawks cawed for it to be extended to China, even the ones that didn't would risk it just to see Korea destroyed, to see him bow, to see him-

The office door opened, and someone walked into the room.

"Comrade China," Kim Il-sung greeted cordially, looking up from his reports. "I'm glad to see you on your feet again."

"Thank you," China responded, probably dipping his head. "But I'm afraid if you were hoping to get your spare room back, it won't happen quite yet. My Comrade Chen has politely requested that I stay here until I can run the hall without losing breath. And I might have to stay even longer than that, if other accommodation plans don't work out."

There was an insinuation to his voice that the Premier didn't address.

"Anything for an ally," he said instead. "I'm sorry you came to such grievous harm in our country."

"What's a war without a little grievous harm?" China replied airily. "I've been getting off too easily if you ask me."

The Premier didn't confirm or deny that. "Can I assist our comrade in any way? Has Comrade Chen Geng been able to keep you informed on the talks?"

"Oh, don't worry, he has," China said. "Every single unfortunate little detail. I was actually looking to see if your Comrade Korea was in. I'm afraid I haven't had the chance to discuss them with him yet."

Kim Il-sung didn't look down. "I'm afraid he isn't here right now."

"Hm. He seems to be out quite a lot recently."

"There's much to deal with, with the negotiations, military logistics, and attending to the daily affairs of our country."

There wasn't even a hint of judgement in his voice, no implication that China should know that, and be at home doing those exact same things or recovering since he had almost fucking died.

"Mm," China said. "Shame. I wonder how he feels about the news out of Geoje?"

"The heart of every patriotic Korean bristles in outage over what has been done to our comrades, both our countrymen and the brave Chinese sons and daughters that have dedicated their lives to helping us Liberate our country," the man artfully dodged.

"As does the heart of every patriotic Chinese," the other country responded knowingly. "Very well. If you see him, tell him I'd like to have a conversation about the negotiations. Completely professional, of course."

The Premier dipped his head. "If I see him before you, I will."

"Oh, I'm sure you will."

There was a rustle as China inclined himself, then left, the door shutting quietly.

Kim Il-sung sat still for a few moments, then when the Countryhuman had to be far enough away (and Hyon Chol-hae hadn't said anything from the hall about him loitering), he leaned back slightly from the desk, looking down between his feet.

North glowered up at him from the leg well, where he'd dove for as soon as China had knocked and asked if he could come in.

"Not a word," he muttered.

"I would never dream of judging my country's actions," the Premier assured gravely, scooting his chair back so he could climb out.

North brushed his pants off, returning to the seat across from him.

China had definitely known he was in there. If he hadn't heard his scramble to hide, then he had to have heard him breathing, as quiet as North had tried to be. The smile in his voice when he'd said he was sure the Premier would see him first had been too obvious. And mocking.

Whatever. As embarrassing as that was, at least North hadn't had to speak to him.

"Chagang has been asking to attend the negotiations." He hadn't been planning on bringing it up, but he needed to use something to clear the unspoken question out of the air.

The Premier scanned across the reports on the budding cooperative farms. "He has been instrumental in discovering a few of those used by the reactionaries, and guiding them to voluntary surrender. He might have some success in gauging whether or not our enemy's future agreements can be trusted."

"I said no."

Chagang had been useful, just like with the men he'd helped expose after Pyongyang was Liberated. Despite the crippling migraine he had all the time now, he seemed to have a good judge of character. North didn't know what exactly he'd done to himself to go from barely being able to hear his name being called from two feet away to uncannily observant, but it had served them well. He could be of use to Nam Il at Panmunjom.

But the idea of sending him to a location the enemy knew he was going to be, at times they expected, when there were only so many roads that could take him there…

North knew those silent agreements they had made were logical. But that didn't mean he wanted to chance them coming about. Chagang was too valuable in other fields to risk him just to confirm what North already knew- the Yankees were insincere and didn't want peace.

His General didn't ask for his reasoning. He just nodded.

"He can serve just as well in Kanggye, finding volunteers for the cooperative farm," he appraised. "They'll be especially important in the mountainous regions."

North dipped his head, returning to his own work- going through the list of seventy thousand prisoners one by one, searching for names he knew and ones that had been on the last list, but were now missing. Too many were, including a few soldiers he knew personally, men and women he knew wouldn't have chosen to remain in the south, no matter how much they were threatened. Escaped, one of those air-dropped into the north that hadn't gotten lucky when it came to weather, being kept behind for 'screening' until they said what the enemy wanted, or dead- that was the question.

He knew he had to find the answer because no other country would care. They all agreed with America that him wanting an accounting for what exactly had happened on Geoje was 'propaganda,' just like they agreed that he was unreasonable for not wanting he and China's people to be kept by the enemy when they had just admitted to torturing them.

He didn't care. He had expected this. It was what foreigners did. The only people that cared about Korea were… in Korea.

He had to wonder what South thought about Geoje Island. If he'd heard. If he-

It didn't matter. North wasn't relinquishing his soldiers. Not if he had to fight another hundred days or hundred years.

Not after what they said had been done to them.

—

"Tea?" Hwang offered the steaming cup to the man across the table from him.

There was a bit of a nip in the air, even now that it was the last month of spring. And this particular subject- SH had said not to call them that, even in his head- had been through enough conversations with him to overcome his fear of being poisoned. He pulled the tin cup over, blowing on the hot liquid.

"What now?" he asked wearily.

Hwang didn't sip his own tea yet, not wanting to scald his tongue.

"We don't need to get straight to business," he said. "Tell me how you're faring first, Mr. Williams."

He'd always done well with languages, attaining Russian fluency in just a year of self-study, and the months had allowed him to refine his English. He would say he was fluent in it now, too, if he hadn't been before. He might even say he was more fluent than some of the Americans (with absolutely zero classism involved, of course).

"If I have to eat sorghum slurry again, I might kill myself," the man grumbled.

"I understand," Hwang said, semi-empathetically. "And we're working on procuring more livestock for you."

He'd gotten used to having more variety in his diet before the war. Now that they mostly had watery juk every day, with occasional plain rice in between, it did start to wear on his palate. Sometimes he couldn't think too much about the paste-like texture or his mouth would try to reject it. The burdock and other spring namul in SH and Hae's garden were a welcome addition.

"Though I would ask you to consider how it feels for the men that work at this camp to hear you complain," he added. "When they go home, they have to witness their neighbours and, in some cases, their own family and friends consume the same bland food, or even starve. Then come to work to see that the soldiers of the enemy that caused those conditions eat no matter what."

Some of them didn't. They had better provisions now, but in the period right after the tactical retreat, and whenever the supply lines got interrupted, a few had taken to refusing the sorghum, claiming it made them depressed. The younger, more middle-class ones, of course, those who had never had to suffer any kind of hardship before Korea. The kind of entitlement Hwang could never share, even in those early days after joining Korea, when some of their rustic meals could make him want to turn his nares up. Sometimes he was tempted to bring in a bowl of SH's soup to show them what truly awful fare they could be facing.

Luckily, once the American prisoners got hungry enough, they would accept their meals again. Their hunger strike had no personal conviction behind it, only privilege.

Private Robert Williams wasn't one of these. Tall, formerly broad, and brunet, the man had been raised in Oklahoma by farmers who had never quite recovered from the Great Depression, as Hwang had learned in their sessions since he'd been captured at the front in February. He at least had the good grace to look slightly ashamed of his complaint.

"I am sorry about the lack of variety in your meals," Hwang apologized. "We're doing the best we can, given the circumstances." With a casual segue, he added, "Unlike your own leadership."

Williams hand tightened around the cup. "So it is somethin'?"

"We're at war," Hwang said, finally taking a drink of the tea, stronger than that at their headquarters. "It always is."

His job was simple- to educate the American and reactionary POWs on the crimes of the enemy, and make them come to terms with who they'd been fighting for. In their camps, they didn't demand blood petitions or that the enemy fight against repatriation. All they wanted was an apology. For the soldiers to accept what they had been a part of, and write a short essay or give a public apology for it.

It wasn't simply courtesy. There was a pragmatic slant to it, of course- every American soldier that apologized for their grievous crimes was one that was admitting that those crimes had been committed, by their own army's hands. Even if they themselves were only doing it out of a belief they would be treated the same way Korean and Chinese prisoners were if they refused, it was one more body testifying against their own country, one more that would hopefully get them closer to justice someday.

Robert Williams had been refusing to apologize. Not out of any malice or even entirely disbelief, as he'd also been refusing to join the gangs made up of more hardline Americans and rightists, those that had taken to beating up their brothers-in-arms that wrote the essays or attended the classes. The man was simply ignorant. Which was why Hwang was allowed to speak with him, so long as his bodyguards were stationed outside, and one outside observer was inside the small meeting room with them, the camera in the corner keeping a watchful eye at all times.

And that was why Hwang was even more determined to make him crack.

Ahem. In the least threatening way possible, of course.

He'd already informed the man that his allied pilots had come forward to make a broadcast in Beijing confessing to being sent to Korea to conduct biological warfare at the beginning of the month. He wasn't denying it anymore. So Hwang led with something even more topical.

"Your army has been abusing our prisoners on Geoje Island."

"Not exactly a new story," the man replied. He'd also been informed about the earlier mass shootings.

"It is when that abuse is directly tied to extending the war." Hwang pushed his tea slightly away so he could focus on the facts. "You'll recall that your Command asked for an extension of two weeks to get their list to us, the one they didn't end up delivering. Would you like to know what they actually used those two weeks for?"

Robert Williams' square jaw feathered. "I'm sure you'll tell me."

"Quite right." Hwang steeped his fingers on the table. "On April 4th, when the talks were recessed so we could all conduct our revisions, on the Geoje Island camp, your Command unleashed Syngman Rhee and Kuomintang soldiers on our prisoners, alongside the traitors in our armies' ranks."

The Kuomintang soldiers had been brought over from Taiwan for 'translation purposes,' but the real motive was evident- convincing more Chinese soldiers to defect. Chang Kai-shek needed a larger army if he was to have any hope of retaking the mainland, after all, though Hwang would still say the odds were low, no matter how many bodies he recruited.

"Your Brigadier-General Francis Dodd intended to produce the lowest number he could to satisfy your country's claim that the majority of our soldiers wished to defect," Hwang continued, with the slightest emphasis on every 'your.' "He attempted to use these violent elements- akin to your compatriots roaming the camps meting out punishments to the repentant here- to forcibly screen every single one of our soldiers, and coerce from them the claim that they wished to remain in the south, or be sent to Taiwan province. He intended to ship these 'defectors' to mainland camps under the claim that only those on Geoje wished to return.

The camera whirred in the corner as it consumed its film. Robert Williams sulkily nursed his tea.

"What would you do?" Hwang asked, tipping his head at the man. "If I announced tomorrow that you were being made to denounce your country, and that you would be shipped to China, never to see your home again?"

"Fight," Robert Williams muttered, his knuckles tight around his cup.

"Exactly," Hwang said. "Our soldiers fought. They refused to be screened, and they attempted to refuse to be shipped off. Though many were still forcibly loaded into trucks and sent to the mainland, a few of them managed to escape during the transfers, making their way back here."

They'd escaped near the beginning of May, and had been trickling in over the past few days. He'd interviewed Privates Ri Hun-si and Yung Chang-il on their treatment in the camps, and they were set to make a press statement soon. Corporal Choi Song-ok had also spoken to him about his escape, along with a few others.

Hwang pulled several photographs from his bag, laying them on the table. Portraits of the men after they'd returned, hollow-cheeked and ragged, giving the American faces to put to the abuse.

“These men fought their way across enemy-held territory to return to the north, starving and exhausted,” Hwang told the man before him. "Do these sound like the actions of anti-Communists who wish to resist repatriation to you?”

“No,” Robert Williams admitted.

“So why did your country send them to the mainland camps?” the Korean asked. “And why were their names not on the list we received?”

“Just keep talking.”

Dissatisfied, Hwang did. “Because America was lying. They didn’t wish to defect. He couldn’t get the numbers he wanted from our soldiers, so he turned to simply sending them off anyways. Or getting their answer through violence.”

He adjusted his glasses. "I want you to know that what I’m about to tell you came from the testimonies of those escaped prisoners, as well as Chinese POWs that were sent to our coasts as agents- a war crime, if you didn’t know- and were captured or turned themselves in. I interviewed many of them personally. You can believe I’m lying, if you wish. But I don’t believe they were lying to me.”

They’d been too shaken and furious, and some had still borne the bruises and scars.

“Over those two weeks, when our prisoners resisted the unfair screening and reregistering, they were punished for it,” Hwang said gravely. “Kuomintang soldiers would surround their brothers with clubs and blades given to them by your army, and demand to know where they wished to go. And if they answered ‘mainland China,’ they were beaten for it, slashed with daggers and deprived of food until they changed their minds. And if they didn’t, they were murdered.”

He could see that the man believed it. Of course he did. He expected violence and brutality from people ‘like them.’ He just couldn’t see that his country giving them the tools and the chance was just as violent. Or rather, he wouldn’t.

“A corporal I spoke with was kept in a dark compound with nowhere to sleep," Hwang continued, his hands gripping each other tighter. "From his location, he could hear men screaming in other buildings, and had witnessed them being crowded into small cages and scalded with steam. Gibbets hung nearby."

He leaned forward. "Those gaols were not built without permission. Your Command gave the reactionaries the materials, your Command mobilized the prisoners to build the buildings, and your Command permitted it to happen."

"You don't know that," Robert Williams shot back.

"Your General Dodd attempted to get the prisoners to sign more petitions to refuse to be repatriated," the province continued, unruffled. "And when our men refused and rallied against it, your guards opened fire and cut them down. Eighteen more people dead, along with the massacre on April 10th that the International Commission of the Red Cross has confirmed and is investigating right now. When that report is released, I'll make sure to update you on the casualty count."

Robert Williams' jaw clenched.

"I don't think you entirely understand what it is to be a prisoner of war," Hwang observed. "Despite your circumstances." He gestured to the plain, windowless interview room and the village camp beyond it. "Your walls don't have barbed wire, your hunger comes from lack of resources, not lack of care, and you have an international community that cares about you."

He kept his tone clinical. "But you are one. And I could make you disappear."

The man stiffened, and Hwang's observer cocked his head, intrigued.

"I'm not threatening you," the province assured him. The recorder had no audio function, so there was no need to mince his words. "But it's the truth. You are deep in enemy territory, surrounded by people whose homes you've destroyed and lives you've upended."

“I din’t do any of that,” Robert Williams said tightly.

“You did,” Hwang calmly replied. “You helped your country do it. And regardless of how you feel, if I or one of the camp guards saw it that way, we could eliminate you. It would be easy to claim you escaped, or were even murdered by one of your fellow prisoners for being too cooperative. Your life is completely under our control right now. We decide when you eat and how much, we decide when you get medicine, and we decide whether or not you’re inside when your army comes to drop their bombs. And deciding to stop doing any one of those things would be easy.”

Hwang sat silently, letting him absorb how helpless he truly was.

“We of course wouldn’t do that,” he acknowledged. “And in the end, we wouldn’t get away with claiming you escaped. You have an international community that has a vested interest in accusing us of humanitarian crimes, organizations that are paid millions to find or invent proof for those crimes. And you have an incredibly wealthy and influential country that, even though he doesn’t care about you, does care about slandering us.”

The man's eyes flashed at the idea that America didn’t care for him. Hwang didn’t much care.

“Our soldiers don’t have that,” he said. “They are just as vulnerable as you, even more so when their translators are the Japanese and men who want them dead. They have barbed wire and an island to trap them. And you have a list.”

Hwang pulled the copy from his bag, the roughly twelve thousand names of enemy prisoners.

“Your name is on this,” he told one of them, pointing it out halfway down the fifth page. “Indelible proof that you are in our possession, or were. America has this. If this war were to end, and you were no longer with us, he would demand to know why. The world would."

He pulled his hands back, clasping them again. “One hundred thousand of my own people don’t have that.”

One hundred and thirty-two thousand of their confirmed prisoners and the thirty-eight thousand 'reclassified civilians,' a number whose sharp decrease worried Hwang, subtract the seventy thousand America had said did want to go home. One hundred thousand who may as well be ghosts in international record.

"Whether or not they're our soldiers, or the Chinese, or captured civilians, there are one hundred thousand people whose names, ranks, and hometowns are missing," Hwang said, keeping his tone composed. "One hundred thousand people that could disappear for whatever reason, and we would never be able to seek an answer for. How many small massacres are committed every week, how many individual tortures and killings take place every day in your camps that aren't reported? You may think that's-"

For a moment, his tongue almost faltered, the English word evading his grasp as his chest tightened.

"Infeasible," he found, filing the emotion away. "But the press haven't been allowed on Geoje in months for a reason, and the block only became tighter in April. The truth is that any single one of those prisoners could be eliminated, and we would never even know. And even if we did, we wouldn't be able to prove it."

The American's brown eyes dipped.

"Our soldiers resisted being erased," Hwang said. "And they were brutalized for it. Beaten, burned, scalded with hot water, stripped naked and whipped. And this is only the experience of one man. Every single one of my comrades has returned with a report like this, even if it didn't happen to them personally. And your Command lies and says they willingly chose to defect, that a screening was fair and non-coercive.

"But many weren't even screened at all."

Hwang didn't wait for his answer, slapping another report down in front of him, that of what had taken place on Geoje Island last week. The man's eyes reluctantly skimmed the English words.

"Seventeen compounds on Geoje Island were unable to be screened," Hwang told him. "Over eighty thousand POWs, near half of our combined prisoners and most of Korea's, were unable to be screened."

The Chinese had been moved to Jeju Island camps at that point, and the other Koreans sent to the mainland.

"They refused it," he said firmly. "They united against your army and refused to be used as political pawns. This number alone is larger than the seventy thousand your negotiators claim are the only ones that want to return north. These are our soldiers, men and women who have endured abuses and want to go back to their homes, yet your army denies that solely to extend this war."

He was stopping himself from growing heated, but Robert Williams still hunched.

"Every day America lets your countrymen starve in our camps and die at the frontline entirely to ensure that soldiers who want to go home can't," the province stressed. "Do you truly think he's doing that because he fears our prisoners will be in danger when they return here? You've seen how well we try to treat you and your compatriots, even with the blood on your hands. Do you think we would harm our own? Do you think America would care if we did when he allows and orchestrates their murder every day?"

The man's large, pale hands clenched. "Just because your traitors were doin' that shit doesn't mean it was America's fault."

Hwang reached over, patting the document. "Read this. All of it."

It was long, but Hwang was full of patience. He sat still, sipping his cooling tea, as the American grudgingly read through every single page.

He did still wish Korea would come to at least one of these. His passion was a much better device than cold words on a page or Hwang's more restrained explanations. He knew he could at least sway a fair number of Rhee's soldiers from the propaganda they'd been taught.

But his Countryhuman had refused, saying that he shouldn't be around the American prisoners with a dark implication in his eye that Hwang had chosen not to dissect.

Eventually, Robert Williams set the Geoje report and its newspaper clippings down, his expression stony.

"Just so we're on the same page," Hwang began, pulling the paper back. "May 7th, our soldiers in one compound took your Brigadier-General Dodd hostage, not to harm him or even to demand better treatment, but to put him on trial for the treatment they'd already received, and the deaths he was directly responsible for. And despite him being in fact responsible, they still dropped the charges, and simply wanted an assurance that none of it would happen again."

Hwang's chest warmed at the thought. He truly wished he could've seen the sight. Prisoners of war from compounds that hadn't been able to communicate with each other coming together to organize and demand change, even when behind bars (or rather, barbed wire), holding out in the face of overwhelming force for three whole days. He was sure it wouldn't be possible for a less ideologically-awakened army. The Americans had dealt with Nazis and the Japanese fascists, but had never dealt with Communists.

"And despite your army threatening to storm the island and break the prisoners up violently, regardless of what happened to Mr. Dodd because of it- under a complete press blackout, I may add- he gave them that insurance, as did his replacement." Hwang held up three fingers, one by one, to represent the prisoners' accepted demands. The fourth- ending voluntary repatriation- the American camp commanders had no control over. "To recognize and cooperate with their representatives, put a stop to the forcible screening, and cease the rearming of reactionary elements, as well as the insults, torture, mass shootings, forced blood petitions, and biological weapons tests."

This last item worried him most of all. There was an obligation to allow POWs to receive and send mail- Hwang himself had been responsible for vetting some letters to send to Panmunjom from the prisoners in their own camps. But he had no reason to believe the Americans would uphold that part of the Geneva Convention when they'd broken so many of its other articles. And even if they did, he found it unlikely their own censors would let news about the biological warfare in when they were denying it so ardently. There would be new arrivals to the camp that had experienced it, but for seventeen different compounds full of tens of thousands of prisoners to be convinced weapons testing was happening… Hwang didn't think it was likely that it was just paranoia speaking.

"Your commanders pledged to stop these occurrences."

They had tried to deny their crimes wholesale, but Dodd's replacement had ended up confessing to the shootings, at least, as well as to the forced repatriation and rearming of POWs to be used to terrorize other prisoners or sent to fight for America. And they hadn't doubled-down on denying the biological warfare accusations, which, in the eyes of an official agreement, was damning. The same wordplay that had allowed them to say prisoners not on the list wouldn't be repatriated had came back to bite them in the hindquarters.

"Four American army generals, including General James Van Fleet, the commander of your entire Eighth Army, signed off on the agreement," he said. "Your top leadership admitted that they've been slaughtering unarmed prisoners and sending them to the frontline, and that they hadn't screened them in entirety the way they've been claiming. They admitted that those who were screened had been done so under force, which is only a polite way of saying threats and violence. They as good as confessed to torture and murder."

Hwang leaned over the table, meeting Robert Williams' eyes. "So why can't you?"

"Because I din't do it!" the man burst out, thumping his fist on the table and making Hwang's observer shift closer. "So what if the bigwigs are torturin' and murderin' your gooks? They're always doin' crap like that. I din't do nothin'."

"You fought for them."

"I don't even want to be here," the man snapped.

"Yet you are."

"I din't have a choice! Damn Truman had me conscripted."

SH's words echoed in his head, the ones she'd screamed at that man in Hungnam. 'You're fighting for nothing and that was your choice."

"You did have a choice," Hwang said calmly. "You could have refused. You wouldn't have received the death penalty, only a prison sentence and a fine. And you still chose to come to Korea. And you chose to kill. You put your own comfort over the lives of the people here."

Robert Williams was going red in the face. "Look, I din't start this war. The guys up top did. I'm just here to fight it."

*"The men up top couldn't wage it without you," Hwang said, hands still folded, tighter than before. "Your bourgeois have started this war for their own purposes, to line their pockets with money you will never see a cent of, and America sent you here to die so he can claim another colony to line his own. And you can curse and shake your fist at the politicians who spend winter in Miami and whose children lounge on beaches while you starve in a prison camp, you can slander and hate them as much as you wish, but that doesn't change the fact that you are letting them do it."

He stood up, leaning over the table with his palms pressed against it.

"They couldn't imprison my people without you," he said, a note of fierceness entering his voice. "They couldn't arm our traitors or bomb our civilians or murder our prisoners without you."

Robert Williams opened his mouth, but Hwang spoke over him.

"You can say that it's not you personally, but that doesn't matter. It is people like you, people that, when you return home, you will see on the street, in grocery stores, at the cinema. And if you weren't in this camp right now, it could be you." Hwang's nails met the rough wood. "Can you honestly tell me that if you were on Geoje Island that you would have no hand in what happened to the prisoners there, that you would protest or walk away? Or would you pull the trigger and tell yourself you had no choice?"

The man looked down, the fabric of his thin pants bunching between his fingers.

“You are responsible for everything that happens on Geoje, on Jeju, in the mainland camps,” Hwang mercilessly delivered. “Because your country couldn’t be here without you.”

Robert Williams wouldn’t meet his eyes. “I want to go back to the compound now.”

Hwang’s teeth clenched, but he leaned back. “Very well. But remember that that’s something you can do. My people in your camps don’t have the same luxury. Former Generals Francis Dodd and Charles Colson were demoted for admitting to your crimes, and all their agreements were dissolved. Your compatriots stormed their compound and murdered dozens of my comrades. By Dodd’s own admission, they treated him well. And they were broken up violently for it.”

And returned to the forced screening, no doubt.

Robert Williams headed for the door, opening it.

“I don’t want you to apologize for some sense of personal satisfaction, or because I think you’re single-handedly responsible for every crime your army commits," Hwang said after him, remaining by the chair. "I want you to take responsibility for your choices. And to understand that you and every other prisoner within these fences has chosen to fight the wrong foe."

The American closed the door, and his escort took him away, back to the village.

Hwang sighed, seating himself on the chair again, removing his glasses to rub his face.

“You have an admirable temper, comrade,” his observer- Ri Chul-un- said, heading over to end the recording.

“I try.”

Admittedly, he did find himself getting more heated than he’d used to when first assigned to this task. It wasn’t like he wasn’t used to push-back on education- the Japanese and rich Korean students had enjoyed tormenting him over even simple math questions, trying to convince him his calculations were wrong when they weren't, and there was lots of discussion and debate whenever he discussed Marxism and Socialism with their people, as there should be.

But there was a difference between mean-spirited teasing from children who knew they were wrong, those who were recalcitrant when it came to understanding why capitalism wasn't the pinnacle of societal evolution or why they couldn't simply 'advance Communism faster,' and the Americans in their camps. There was a certain despair that came with trying to make a man understand that other humans were also people, and he should at least feel some remorse for the lives he'd taken, and the war machine he was part of. Or that his own country was part of those 'bigwigs' he hated.

When he'd been employed at the Seoul school, Hwang had often entertained a fantasy (usually while fuming over being told that he had the square root of a sum wrong) that one day he would stand up in front of the Japanese students and implore them to realize that what their parents were doing was wrong, and so was their country. He'd deliver a simple and succinct speech, and they would all cheer and become upstanding members of society that would demand an end to the Occupation. He'd thought the problem was that the they simply didn't know enough to understand how unjust it all was, and if he could just explain it to them, they would.

He supposed it was a good thing that had always remained a fantasy, because now he doubted that he'd even be able to get them to understand that their Korean desk neighbours were fellow humans deserving of rights, let alone that they weren't in any way lesser to them. All he would've gotten was fired. Or worse.

"I don't think I could be a guard here," Ri Chul-un said, the camera safely packed away. "I think it might be a little too tempting to knock some sense into their heads."

Hwang understood the sentiment, but couldn't encourage it. "Then it's a good thing you aren't. We can't treat them the same way, whether considering moral or political reasons."

This was actually why he had an outside observer who wasn't fluent in English. He hadn't judged it safe for one of the men who held the prisoners' lives in their hands to have to hear constantly that those same prisoners would likely kill him and his entire family, and call it just doing their duty for their country, or that Korea meant as little to them as pencil shavings. The amount of American soldiers that, when confronted with the photographs of the state they'd left Pyongyang in, or the accounts of the massacres they'd committed, had pride tilt the corners of their lips…

It was demoralizing. And demoralized was not a great state for the guard of a prison camp to be in.

"That was our last session today," he said, straightening his glasses. "Would you like a cup of tea before we head out?"

Ri Chul-un rubbed his hands together gladly, and Hwang poured him some from the kettle on the side table.

SH had actually suggested this tactic to him. He'd been bringing boiled water for his interviewees, mindful of the saying that a liar would take drinks more often than needed, but his cousin had said he should bring tea instead. The only beverage the prisoners usually got to drink was water, so by bringing tea, he would give them something to look forward to, and get them to associate the talks with him as a welcome break from routine and a novel comfort. He'd started having some on hand at the lectures now, too.

Hm. SH finally being able to take her communications class and receive media training was going to turn her into a persuasive terror. Hwang was looking forward to it. And with South Gyeongsang…

His hand wrapped tighter around his cup, and he downed the last of his own cold tea as Ri Chul-un sat across from him.

He hoped her and the others were doing well. As well as they could be, anyway.

A knock on the door turned the two men's heads to it, and Hwang called, "Come in."

A camp guard with close-cropped hair peered in. "Comrade General Hwang. One of the Yankee prisoners wants to speak to you. Permission?"

Hwang raised his brows. "Did he say what for?"

"He said he wanted to apologize."

'Hm.' The apologies were usually done in front of other prisoners, but it was possible he wanted to attempt to curry some sort of favour by apologizing directly to Hwang. Or was worried about doing it publicly when the rightist gang might punish him for it.

"Go get him, please," Hwang decided. "Just make sure to check him thoroughly."

The man saluted, slipping out, leaving Hwang to mull over the gang.

They'd taken to calling themselves the 'Circle,' a name with unfortunate and intentional roots. It harkened to the American Kyklos Klan, or Ku Klux Klan, a racist organization from across the ocean. Understandably, most of their members were white and targeted the black, Puerto Rican, and Mexican soldiers. In an interesting twist, they'd also welcomed the Korean reactionaries, giving them an honorary status as 'white.'

Hwang could never entirely fathom the minds of those that willingly joined organizations that saw them as lesser. With women it was understandable, as they'd mostly been conditioned to believe they were lesser, and that being dominated was their position in life. And for Americans of non-white ethnicities, he supposed they'd been raised to see white as the ideal, and would naturally want some of that privilege for themselves. But he still couldn't understand attempting to find that privilege from men who would never see them as equals.

It had to be a sort of exceptionalism, viewing oneself as the exception, the one who would finally transcend the body they'd been born in to become of the oppressing class. Sad, really.

The Rhee soldiers puzzled Hwang more. Korea was monoethnic on a whole, and while it could be said that those who were hardline Rhee supporters would've also been collaborators and idolized the Japanese in the same way the minority Americans idolized the whites, it was frightening if they'd already developed that same mindset towards the Westerners in less than a decade.

Or maybe it was simply that even under the Japanese, they'd still been the norm, and so didn't fully comprehend being seen the same way as the races they also saw as minorities.

Hwang would ask, but even if he was allowed to speak to the unrepentant enemy soldiers, he doubted that line of questioning would be welcome.

He'd also like to ask the Americans what made them decide to see the reactionary Koreans as at least worthy of allying with when their own countrymen weren't good enough. It was still evident that they didn't see them as equals, calling them 'gooks' and 'zipperheads' (a term whose origin made Hwang grit his teeth), but they did allow them to join in their persecution.

Hmmm. Perhaps it was simply that on a whole, the non-white Americans and Puerto Ricans were willing to apologize and behave, just like many of the conscripted 'NDA' soldiers. And since that was enough for them to be considered hardline Communists by the right-wing zealots, perhaps that hatred of Communism simply crossed racial lines.

'Hatred, the unifying force of humankind.'

It was a grim thought, one he didn't entirely believe. But it did sound suitably dramatic.

Soon, the door opened and a prisoner stepped in. Hwang stood, ready to greet him, and froze.

The man was of middling years, his straw-coloured hair shaved almost flat to his skull, and he looked up from under his deep-set lids with weary blue eyes. He wasn't short or tall, but he was thin, with gaunt cheeks. If Hwang had been told to picture the average American POW, he would have pictured him in his thin cotton pants and white workshirt. The man was exceedingly average.

But Hwang recognized him. It was the soldier from Hungnam, the one SH had almost killed. The one he'd been trying very hard to avoid whenever he came to this camp on the Raktong.

He found his voice after a moment, clearing his throat. "Hello. Take a seat."

Ri Chul-un got up, reaching for the camera case. Hwang gave a small shake of his head.

There was a good chance this could be an encounter he wanted no proof of, even without audio. He actually considered sending the man away altogether, but decided not to raise suspicions.

The American prisoner silently came in, sitting at the vacated chair. Hwang sat back down, biting his tongue on offering tea. Best not to draw this out.

"Can I get your name?" he asked, even though he already knew.

"Private John Davis," the man replied, subdued.

'2nd Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, 3rd Infantry Division,' Hwang finished in his head.

"What did you want to discuss, Mr. Davis?"

The man was quiet, looking down at his lap. Hwang shifted slightly, prepared to loudly interrupt if he tried to say anything about SH. He tensed as he spoke.

"Boys in Compound 2 are planning on beating up the man who apologized yesterday." He didn't meet his eyes as he said it. "The negro, Edwards. They're planning on getting him when they go on honey-bucket detail."

Hwang blinked, momentarily taken aback. “Do you have names?” he managed after a second.

John Davis gave them- eight men from the Circle- and the Korean quickly wrote them down on the backside of a telegraph paper from his bag.

“I’ll make sure they’re not put on any details with non-white prisoners or those who have apologized,” he said when he was finished, then awkwardly added, “Thank you for informing me of this.”

The man nodded, but didn't immediately get up. Hwang side-eyed Ri Chul-un, drinking his tea in the corner.

Should he say something? He felt like he should take responsibility for his cousin, but he knew he shouldn’t apologize for her when she didn’t regret it. In truth, the man didn’t entirely deserve an apology.

‘I wasn’t one of the bombers! I was just following orders!’

He’d wished to deny his own responsibility, just as Robert Williams had, even with the wreckage of Hungnam staring him in the face. He had apologized, yes, once with tears streaming down his face, and apparently again in front of his fellow prisoners. But would he have if he hadn’t had SH in front of him, threatening to execute him, or if he hadn’t been afraid that Hwang might one day try to silence him? Would he have ever looked at what the army he was part of had wrought on their city and truly felt sorry for it? Would he ever have understood that the people throwing rocks and screaming at him in the streets were people who had every right and more to do that?

Would Hwang have stopped SH from killing him if it hadn’t been for publicity considerations?

He wasn’t going to apologize. Regardless of his motivations, he had taken responsibility for his cousin by stopping her. Those only retaliating weren’t those who had the burden of feeling sorry.

So he kept his hands clasped on the table. “Was there anything else?”

The man's brow lowered as he looked down at his lap. "That woman, the Statehuman."

Hwang stiffened, mouth too dry to correct him. "Yes?"

He looked up from under his pale eyelashes, his blue eyes ashamed. Haunted, one could say. "Can you tell her I'm sorry?"

Hwang paused. He'd forgotten that was what the guard had said, that a prisoner wanted to apologize.

After a moment, he nodded wordlessly.

John Davis got to his feet, turning and trudging out, his back bent as if under a great weight.

Hwang stared after him, relieved.

"What was that about?" Ri Chul-un asked.

"He was giving me a tip," he answered, picking up his case. "Come, I need to get some names to the guards."

He didn't entirely know how to feel about the man's apology. It did warm his heart that the working-class Americans were capable of change, and realizing that they were wrong. He was sure Robert Williams would soon learn his lesson as well.

But there was still a more cynical part of him that asked why being able to see his people as equals, and that destroying them and their home was wrong, had to be a lesson at all.

—

"A moment, if you please, SH."

SH reluctantly turned around to face Hwang before she could escape into the shelter for the night.

"Do you need help going through the names?" she beat him to saying.

Her cousin had the December, January, and April prisoner lists spread over the log seats around him, trying to cross-reference them with their operations reports and the names Chagang had brought tonight to see if they'd been cut out of the first one, or if they might be one of the missing forty-four thousand. Or just someone captured since the December list had been made.

America had been dropping prisoners from the camps over the north from helicopters, and bringing them in from the sea on boats, trying to use them as secret agents, like he had with the reactionaries from the youth groups. Unfortunately for him, people who had been trapped in camps and treated like animals weren't as loyal as ones who had made the choice to betray their nation. Dozens of them had defected, turning themselves in to the closest friendly unit.

And because of that, they were fully aware that some of those 'missing names' no longer on the April list were actually the men sent in as agents. Which just made it even more likely that some of the forty-four thousand had been, and could explain why the number had shrank.

'Along with the massacres.'

SH's nails dug into her palms as Hwang said, "No, I've got it handled." He opened his mouth, but again, SH struck faster.

"Anyone we know?" She snatched the telegram strip from his hand.

She'd only been trying to stall him, but as her eyes flicked over the five individuals the Yankees had air-dropped in this time, her eyes flew open.

"Yun Jin-tae?"

"SH, please, I'm not-"

"Hwang, I'm being serious." She read his rank and hometown information again, matching them. "These people were caught alive?"

“They turned themselves in,” Hwang corrected, leaning over the paper like he was trying to see what she did.

“Where are they?”

“Being held for questioning and interviewed on their experiences.” Not finding what had gotten her pulse up, he leaned back, brows furrowed. “Can I ask what this is about?”

SH excitedly told him, and his shoulders relaxed.

“Ah,” he said, rubbing his thin chest. “Some good news for once.”

“Very good news.” SH pressed the telegram to her breast.

She couldn’t do anything right now. If the soldiers were anything like the others, they’d be being held until they were sure they weren’t double-agents and were recovered from the Yankees' abuse. But once they were…

She smiled, smoothing the paper out and handing it back to Hwang.

“In celebration of this good news, can I perhaps get a word out?” he ventured.

SH sighed, but felt light enough to give in. “If it’s nothing to do with North Hamgyong, then yes.”

She had it down to an art. She only had to ignore one or two jabs before he’d go stomping off inside the bunker with his supper. Which really just proved her point that the only reason he tolerated being around her was to try and hurt her.

Anyway! She was done listening to Kangwon or anyone else that tried to bring him up. She’d let him lodge like a loose paintbrush bristle in her mind for too long. She was done worrying about how he was feeling or what he thought about her. If he was out of sight, then she preferred he be out of mind, too. Her life was much more peaceful that way.

Hwang didn’t look entirely happy about that, but he still said, “It isn't about him. It's some more good news, I hope. It's at least neutral news."

"Go ahead then."

"I was at one of the POW camps earlier," he began. "The one with the man… from Hungnam."

SH ran her brush over the wall. "Oh?"

"He spoke to me. He took the initiative," he added. "He wanted me to tell you he was sorry."

Shattered pottery, a soot-stained elementary school placard, the Hungnam People's Factory with its stone and steel entails strewn across the city's edge, the place her people had sweated and laughed and invented ways to feed their country reduced to a hollow-eyed corpse. Rows upon rows of white corpse cloths, a sea of them, and filthy, starving hands grasping hers with desperation, begging her to pull them out of it all, even though she was just as helpless as them.

Her lips thinned. "'Sorry' doesn't fix anything."

The Yank's words didn't rebuild her city or bring her people back to life, just like South's hadn't given Korea two eyes again.

Even if North Hamgyong had apologized to her, or if she'd apologized to him, it wouldn't have fixed anything. It never could have.

"I know," Hwang said quietly. "But at least it shows they can change."

"I don't care if they change." SH realized her fingers were digging into the scar on her chest, and pinned her nails to her palm instead. "That doesn't fix anything either."

"No," her cousin admitted. "But it can make things better in the future."

For who? The Yankee women that served their husbands a last meal before they sent them off to rape and murder Korean women, and who would accept them back into their lives and bodies after? The Yankee workers whose salaries got to go up as the factory owners grew fat over bombing SH's own workers, content to slave away pumping out the bombs and ammunition used to kill her people so long as they had their breads and circuses? The subjugated Yankee races who were so desperate to be like their masters that they would slaughter other oppressed people's across the sea just to try and get a scrap of favour from them?

SH didn't want life to get better for them. Not after what they'd done. She wanted them to die.

"Mm," she said to Hwang, smiling. "I guess."

At least it meant the Yankee man might keep his mouth shut about her.

She thought her cousin might push back at her noncommittal response. He just dipped his head, pushing his glasses up. There was a sad dimple to his lips.

"You work on the lists," SH decided. "I'll take your watch."

Hwang's pencil-stroke brows crinkled. "Are you sure? You'll have to stand two in a row then."

Chagang had insisted on getting a slot tonight, so it still wouldn't be that long. And she'd been planning on staying awake to paint the wall anyway.

"That's better than us getting invaded because you held up a finger and said 'One more page,' to invading Yankees," she joked, and her cousin coughed lightly.

"Yes, I suppose it is."

SH took up her place by the door, gazing out into the midnight blue forest, trying to focus on the good news she'd discovered.

She had to make it special. Like Hwang had said, they had good news 'for once.' And for civilians there was even less. Someone from Hamhung didn't celebrate hearing a county in Hwanghae had gotten planting done on time as much as she did when their own bowl was empty at night. Just like she used posters and speeches to turn that far-away victory into a personal one for them, she needed to turn this pearl of good news into medicine.

But as she thought about the person she was going to deliver it to, and what she'd had to go through, her thoughts curdled again.

She hoped that Yank didn't feel better. She didn't like to think that by apologizing to Hwang in her place, he'd absolved himself of any guilt she'd managed to force into him. He deserved to feel guilty, he deserved to see what he'd done to Korea every time he closed his eyes, the tears running down the faces of the women as they mourned their husbands, the burning eyes of the orphaned children as he was paraded before them, and the hatred in their voices as they called for his death. He deserved to remember what it felt like to be small and helpless with his life completely in her control, the way all of her people's lives were under his country's. She hoped her funeral keen would echo in his hollow skull forever, and that even when he returned to his degenerate country and his slavish wife, he would find no rest.

She hoped it hurt.

Title inspired by Geoje Unscreened by Alan Winnington. I know he was kicking his heels when he came up with that.

For a refresher on the full Geoje Island event, it's in the note at the end of Bird On A Tether in the first book. If you recall it, and how one America guy didn't get captured with Dodd because he clung to the post and refused to let go, the reason he was on guard was because he'd been captured before. The KPA prisoners had taken him, demanded he drink a bowl of the bean soup they were getting, and he hated it so much he couldn't. He was released because he promised to bring the rice rations back. That is so funny to me. Guy clinging to a gate with his nails dug in 'I'M NOT GOING TO DRINK THE SOUP AGAIN, YOU CAN'T MAKE ME!' But not funnily, the prisoner grabbing him seems to have been killed.
Also on the subject of the air-dropped agents, one of them (Chinese) refused to jump out of the plane first, so he jumped last instead. And before he jumped, he threw a grenade back into the helicopter, making it crash. Him and the American handler parachuted down, and he immediately grabbed him and turned them in to the nearest PVA unit. Icon.

ALSO I FINALLY FOUND IT. Okay, listen to this. Read this. You get it.

'After about an hour, the guards came and took me to the commandant's office. The commandant was rather a handsome man, wearing North Korean Army blue breeches and black boots, but a white shirt and a civilian coat. He needed a shave badly, and had the only green eyes I've ever seen in a Korean. Somehow they reminded me of a tiger's eyes. He was friendly and apologetic for having put me in a cell.'

Intervening paragraphs, etcetera.

'He said, 'Well, now you can see how your forces have been driven back. So if you were released, would you continue to fight us?' I said, 'Yes, that's what I want to do. That's why I've been trying to get back, so I could fight again. I know I can do better next time, and kill more of you for the men we lose.' He didn't care for that. Finally he said, 'General, you're a brave man, but you're very ignorant politically.'

That ended the political part of the discussion, but he couldn't resist a little something personal. He said, 'I've seen you before, general, even if you don't remember me. I was a political prisoner right in this same prison when you inspected it as military governor. But I'm going to treat you better than you treated me.''

What do you think this is? Fanfiction I have written where a heavy-handedly written American soldier has an enemies-to-lovers relationship with a KPA army general? Wrong. This is General William F. Dean's personal account of his time in KPA captivity. He was taken in Taejon in 1950 and stayed until the end of the war. Putting aside his 'I want to kill more of you because you killed us,' (despite the US literally starting this and not having to be there) WHY DID HE DESCRIBE THE KPA

COMMANDANT LIKE THAT. I am not insane, right?? You see it???? Even in the intervening paragraphs, he describes another guy and he doesn't do it the same way. It's more offhanded 'He needed a shave even more badly.' This is exactly what I would write if it was doing an enemies-to-lovers tale where the Yankee eventually learned the propaganda he'd been fed was false, and through the power of love became an anti-Imperialist and defected to the DPRK to be with his gay lover.

Comrades, when this is over should I rewrite the entire story from William F. Dean's point of view as he falls in love with the KPA commandant and unlearns his wicked ways? Can I be sued for that by his descendants??

A Woman Is A Gardener

"So, do we get to know where we're going yet?"

"Nope!" SH said cheerily. "But isn't it lovely out today?"

The air was fresh and- out here in South Pyongan's countryside- almost clean, only occasionally tainting her 'nose' with the smell of smoke when the wind shifted. Aside from that, the breeze was refreshing, a real taste of pure spring, finally. The sky above was clear, the same shade of blue as the delicate petals of a dayflower, and had been since the sun rose. The scuds of white clouds didn't mar it, instead picturesquely drifting across the surface like soap suds on water, fitting for what she had planned.

It was so nice she could almost ignore the circling specks of the dogfight over the Chongchon River to the north, even if the burning in her skin was more difficult to.

"It is," Ru Chun-yeon said, puffing a little as she strove to keep up with the more fit soldier women. "But I'd like to know what I'm missing a work day for."

"You're not," SH said confidently. "Your shift at the factory is fully-staffed."

By Chagang. Was it entirely legal? Technically, yes- SH had heavy involvement with light industry and her old friend from the KPRA was a manager at the clothing factory near Hamhung. The Provincehuman had every right to take her aside for a consultation. She'd just have to make sure they talked about clothing production at some point.

"I'd like to know what I'm missing blowing traitors up for," Pak Gyuri grumbled. Even though she was on leave, she was still dressed in her uniform.

SH hadn't kidnapped her, even if she was acting like it. She'd tried to recruit Choe Kang-ok from the Second Corps for this ‘operation,’ since Kangwon had asked her to look after their old comrade's daughter where she could, but the woman had been stubborn about remaining at the front, even though her unit had earned a fifteen-day leave from shooting down three enemy planes in three months. SH couldn’t fault that commitment, so she hadn’t pushed too hard.

But her commander- Ryang Myeong-ae- had recommended someone who had taken the leave. So SH had picked Pak Gyuri up from Icheon in Kangwon province in the middle of last night. That wasn’t kidnapping. She just hadn’t told her where she was taking her. Still.

Her other guests were Hae and South Pyongan, obviously, the Liaos, Pak Yun-hui (who SH had thought might explode when she’d invited her), Kim Sun-ja- one of the young women China would entertain at the river, who’d tagged along with the Chinese women, possibly because of him- and Yun Jin-suk, who was the reason she’d put this together in the first place. No guards, with express permission from Korea and a lot of convincing of the men. Just women who could use a break, though really she could say that about anyone in Korea right now.

She’d asked Kim Yong-hwan and An Il-rae if they wanted to come, but they were understandably busy in the hospitals. She had also considered bringing Zhao Jingjing, since this was the last full month she would be in Korea, but…

She wanted to have a nice day, not spend time wondering about what the woman might or might not know.

“One thing about SH- if she doesn’t want to talk about something, we’re not talking about it,” South Pyongan said, strolling along with her hands in her uniform pockets.

SH had tried to get her to wear casual clothes, until she remembered that they didn’t actually have any right now. That had dashed her hopes, too. It didn’t feel right to borrow a choson-ot or any nice clothing from the theatre, a call that had been the right one, since everyone was covered in dust from the ride halfway to their destination. Only Yun-hui and Sun-ja were in dresses, a blue and white choson-ot with red and gold ribbons in her long braid for the Song and Dance Ensemble woman, and a simple white jeogori and black skirts for the young civilian.

But at least she had managed to sway South Pyongan out of wearing her protective gear. She'd gotten her to stick with just the face mask and emergency gloves.

"We don't need to talk about it," she said to her cousin. "We're almost there."

"But ah want to know now," Hae whined, shifting Jin-suk on her back. SH hadn't wanted to wear the girl out, so her and her cousins had been taking turns carrying her from the highway.

"Me too," Jin-suk piped up, tilting her head around at the fields around them, trying to see anything that looked interesting. There was only the river running beside them, and Kangso Town far across it.

"Patience is a virtue," Chun-yeon said dryly.

"Why don't we talk to pass the time?" SH suggested, forging on down the riverbank.

The Korean provinces knew Ru Chun-yeon from their Occupation days, South Pyongan and Hae knew Pak Gyuri and Yun-hui from the POW camp breakout, and Liaoxi and Liaotung had met the latter before at the theatre, but aside from the two that had been in the camp together, none of the human women were familiar. They'd figured out how to address each other in the truck, but some of them had been too awkward to talk, crammed in with all the soldier men. SH could tell they made Jin-suk nervous, even if they were theirs.

"Did you hear they ditched that Yankee guy?" Gyuri- who had given the women near her age permission to use her first name- asked. "Ridge-whatever got fired."

"Yeah, they've got some new guy in," South Pyongan said. "Our briefing said he sucked when he went up against the Germans. And get this- his name's Mark Clark. Mark. Clark."

"I think it's a fine name," Liaoxi said in Korean. "I approve of his parents' game."

"It's like those parents that name their sons 'Go-hwan.'"

The Chinese women tilted their heads, hearing the name as just a name, and Sun-ja did, too.

"Are those like… actually the same at all?"

"Totally are," South Pyongan dismissed.

"The Yankees got a new negotiatin' guy, too," Hae chirped, skipping as much as she could with Jin-suk on her back. "That stupid awful yellow-belly quit yesterday. Now they've got a new one."

Her face darkened, just enough that SH caught it.

Turner Joy had spent his last days screaming that they had to accept his ultimatum about the prisoners, and that wanting to know the full story about what happened on Geoje and get justice for it was propaganda, then quit. The new man was named Harrison. The same last name Hae had said Yankees were using in Sincheon. The Yanks were insisting he hadn't been there, but even if it hadn't been him, the name felt like an intentional slight.

Ridgway getting replaced felt intentional, too, like America was getting rid of everyone he could say had been 'in charge' when the camp massacres had taken place. Korea had said he was saying he would let correspondents in soon, and invite foreigners to visit. SH just knew he was 'prettying the place up' right now to pretend he'd never done anything, wiping the slate clean without even a useless apology, like all the men that had carried out the crimes weren't still 'guarding' the camps, like the root of the corruption had been burned out when it hadn't because he was still here.

"Comrade SH?" Yun-hui said from behind her, and the province realized she'd outpaced them all.

She slowed herself, taking a deep breath, painting clear blue water over the wall. Today was for relaxation, for getting away from stress and forgetting America and her brother existed. And for helping the others relax, too.

"No more war talk," she said cheerfully. "We're on vacation."

"Aw." Gyuri pouted. "I was still hoping we were going to take out reactionaries or something."

"With a sixteen-year old?" Chun-yeon asked skeptically.

"Jin-suk is fourteen," SH corrected. The year turning had changed her traditional age from fifteen to sixteen, but her physical appearance hadn't changed at all. "I don't think we should count years the old way."

"I'll be fifteen in two days," the girl said shyly.

Sun-ja perked up. "Eh? This is like a celebration then."

It made a good excuse, anyway, when SH had told her father she wanted to take her for the day.

"Happy birthday, meimei," Liaotung said, nudging her side.

The girl flushed at the attention, hiding her head behind Hae's.

"Fourteen is definitely still old enough to hunt reactionaries," Gyuri pointed out. "Never too young to learn how to kill."

"I've literally always said that," South Pyongan said, snapping her fingers. "I knew I liked this chick."

Gyuri flashed her a sharp-toothed grin, then said to Chun-yeon, "Comrade Ru should know that."

The older woman sighed. "Children had to fight against Japan, yes. And they still have to fight in the occupied regions. But that's not really the ideal. Any chance for a child to live in peace should be taken."

SH nodded. “Children should only fight when they have to.”

“Comrade SH has been teaching me how to shoot a gun,” Jin-suk volunteered, peering over Hae. “And how to use a knife.”

SH saw Chun-yeon give her a side-eye.

“But they need to know how to fight so they can if they have to,” she clarified.

If Jin-suk had the training some of the children that had fought against the Japanese or the Yankees and their puppets did, she might not have been- What had happened to her might not have happened. And she still couldn’t live in peace, not with the planes and the reactionaries. At least now she had a very large knife to keep her safe when her father was working.

The women chatted as they passed through the farmlands. South Pyongan took Jin-suk, jogging in circles around them just to show off. SH was relieved to see that they were all getting along well, including the Liaos.

She’d been a little worried about bringing them, both for security concerns and because they wouldn’t be able to join in, since they couldn’t take off their clothes. They were actually the only ones who knew where they were going, because she had wanted them to be able to choose not to, in case they would feel left out.

But they’d accepted her invitation, and China had apparently decided it was safe enough. And their full-body coverage wasn’t stopping the other women from getting comfortable with them.

“Hey, SH?” South Pyongan asked as they left the river, marching across the fields. “Just a question- why does this ‘vacation’ feel like we’re hiking across Korea to get away from the Japs again?”

“I really did think I’d put my walking days behind me,” Chun-yeon huffed.

“We’re almost there,” SH promised.

She felt giddy. The place they were headed didn’t stick out from the land at all, so it got to stay a surprise until they were almost right on top of it. When they were, Sun-ja let out a gasp.

"No way!"

A pool lay in the middle of the Kangso plains, surrounded by a few scraggly poplars. It was a pure, beautiful blue. But instead of being the colour of dayflowers, it was that of polished turquoise, actually only a few tints off from the skin under Liaotung's mask. The waters bubbled peacefully, unbothered by the craters in the nearby fields.

"Jja-jan!" SH spread her arms, beaming. "Mineral spring!"

South Pyongan smacked the heel of her hand into her forehead. "Duh. What else is out here?"

Hae bounced excitedly. "Oh, it's this place!"

SH smiled proudly, glad to have surprised her cousins, even though they'd visited before during the Occupation.

Chun-yeon placed a hand over her heart, like she didn't dare hope. "Does this mean…?"

SH nodded, opening the pack she'd brought with her up, coming out with two items. She held them up to the sky triumphantly- a jar of ointment and a bar of soap.

"A bath," Chun-yeon moaned, tilting her head back.

SH had known she'd appreciate this. The two of them had been bath comrades during the Secret Camp days, and the woman would always complain when they couldn't bathe in the river when it was too cold (for her, not SH) or the camp was on alert. It had been her dream to visit a bathhouse.

They had bathhouses now, but they couldn't waste supplies to build too many, and most of them were for the schools and army units. Factories had them, too, but they usually couldn't be built underground as easily. And buildings near Hamhung never lasted very long.

“Eh? Soap?” Sun-ja’s honey-coloured eyes widened. “Really?”

They were trying to get household goods out to keep people’s living standards up, but they were more focused on things like salt and soy sauce, and a lot of the soap was low-quality. Plus it wasn’t really a necessity, especially when disinfecting chemicals were readily provided, so most families would save their money for something else.

Yun-hui’s eyes were even wider. “A bath? Together? I mean, all of us?” she quickly added.

“SH strikes again!” South Pyongan threw her arms around her. “Sorry Hae, she’s my favourite cousin now.”

“Mine too!” Hae joined the hug.

Jin-suk peered curiously at the pale ivory bar. “I’ve never used soap before.”

“It makes you smell nice,” Liaotung said.

“If you’re not using the kind that’s mostly fat,” Liaoxi added. “Avoid that.”

“This is jasmine and osmanthus,” SH said, holding it out for Jin-suk.

She sniffed it like a wary cat, and blinked. “This one smells good,” she declared.

“I would assume so.” Liaoxi arched a brow at SH from under her scarf. “From whom you got this, I think I know.”

“Oh, is this the stuff-? Ah mean, never mind.” Hae pursed her lips, turning her head away from Chun-yeon’s curious look.

SH nodded to both of the province women. The soap and ointment were both part of China’s latest care package. She knew he’d been bringing in soap for himself ever since the bathing tub was built (he usually smelled faintly floral), but he’d got extra this time. He must have heard one of South Pyongan’s many complaints about not having it.

That was… a little thoughtful, actually.

"I don't really care about that stuff, but what are we waiting for?" Gyuri demanded. "Water!"

"Oi! Wait!"

They all spun to South Pyongan.

"Yes?" SH asked.

Her cousin thrust a finger in the air. "Health and safety check!"

SH sighed. "I came here yesterday to make sure the spring was clean."

"Don't care, Yanks strike at night. You heard about those clams."

"Clams?" Chun-yeon asked, brows furrowing.

Hae wrapped her arms around her stomach.

It was her job to spread the news of the crimes America and his puppets had committed, so while South Pyongan prowled around the spring, looking around rocks and in the water for bugs or anything else, SH explained.

On the 16th, a woman in Taedong County, just a few ri northwest of here, had found clams on a hillside. She'd brought them home to make a meal for her husband, and by the next day, they were both dead. Kangwon had been sent to investigate, and he said it looked like cholera. The lab results had confirmed it.

More clams had been found in the area, saltwater ones found ri inland. It seemed strange to SH that the Yankees would commit so heavily to hoping that people would eat raw clams they found in the wild, but Kangwon had said they were near a pumping station that took water from reservoirs and springs like this for the locals. They'd been aiming for these.

As the infected saltwater clams died, they would breed more bacteria. And when they went, it would be released into the water, drawn up through the station, and distributed to their people.

“That’s awful,” Yun-hui murmured with a shudder.

It was. And it wasn't the only try. Kangwon had told them that dead fish infected with cholera had been found in Pyongwon County back in February, scattered in the mountains by the reservoir, likely on accident.

He hadn't told them that before. It made SH wonder how much her cousin had to deal with that they never even heard about.

“Does that mean we can’t drink water anymore?” Jin-suk asked, eyeing the spring fearfully.

“Just keep boiling it well,” SH soothed, painting a pot of simmering stew on the wall. A pale hand stuck out of it.

“The Yankees are bastards, but what idiot eats a raw clam they found on a random hill?” Gyuri complained.

SH went to scold her, but Hae beat her to it.

“People get hungry,” she said, squeezing herself tighter. “It makes ‘em do stupid stuff.”

“Mm, you’re getting fed fairly well at the front,” Chun-yeon said grimly. “Don’t forget that.”

Gyuri sobered a bit. “Right. Sorry.”

SH rubbed Hae’s shoulder comfortingly.

She wondered if the clams her cousin had eaten had been a test. Had America somehow learned she’d died from them? No one should have known she was in the hospital, but even her absence would be reported by any spies.

The dark thing stirred as she heard the Yankee calling Hae ‘the little one’ in her head, asking what she’d do to keep him from her.

She would do anything to see Korea smash him like a clam.

"Okay, clean," South Pyongan announced, dusting her hands off as she walked over. "But I found a beetle under a rock."

"Likely place for it to be," Liaotung noted.

"Killed it anyway. Now- what are we waiting for? Bathtime!"

With a speed SH couldn't hope to fend off, her cousin snatched the soap out of her hand, dropped her guns, stripped naked, and threw herself into the spring, wailing a battle cry.

Sun-ja yelped as water plumed up in her wake, then again as Gyuri shouted, "Ura!" and threw herself in after.

The other women quickly took their clothes off before they could any more wet, rightfully sensing South Pyongan's evil intentions. They were already soaked when they got in, courtesy of her deadly accurate splashes.

"Fuck yeah!" her cousin cheered, hitting Hae with a wave of crystal-clear water.

"Language," SH called, putting her hands over Jin-suk's ears. "There's a child here."

"I don't mind," the girl said. "My brother used to swear all the time."

She looked down, and SH moved her hand to her shoulder.

"I'm sure you'll see him again soon."

Jin-suk nodded. But she didn't look like she believed it.

SH bit her tongue. "Come on, let's get in."

The girl clasped her hands, anxiety filling her face. "Do I… have to take my clothes off?"

SH's heart panged. "Not if you don't want to."

Jin-suk's knuckles whitened. "It left… stripes on me."

The thing growled, remembering the way her stomach had unnaturally distended, splitting the pale skin. Now that the girl had more colour, the scars would be even more noticeable.

"How about we both wear our shifts?" SH suggested, painting tiny bones and ashes over the wall. "That way you won't be the odd one out."

"You wouldn't mind?"

"Of course not."

SH had been planning on it anyways. She'd gotten permission from Korea for this, since he didn't want their people seeing too much of their burns, but even though he had said the morale the women would get from this was an acceptable trade, she still felt… uneasy.

Truthfully, as much as she liked Ru Chun-yeon, she'd never felt comfortable disrobing entirely for their baths, usually staying in her underclothes, then bathing properly alone. And she tried to keep them on when changing at the theatre. It wasn't a problem around her female cousins, but with their people…

SH didn't like showing them her body. She didn't like the idea that anyone in a crowd, even someone she was friends with, could look up at her as she vowed to defend their country and implored them to keep fighting or rebuild, or to take their future in their own hands, and know what she looked like under her uniform.

So she stayed in her white shift and grey military briefs (the one thing she'd admit she loved about Western fashion coming to Korea- the underwear). She took a peek at Jin-suk as she took off her blouse.

Her hands were steady on the buttons.

SH relaxed, smiling at the girl as she turned around, now in her shift and cloth underwear. The province held out her hand, and led her carefully into the spring.

The girl gasped as it hit her legs. Even in the warm spring sun, the water that came bubbling up from the depths of the earth was frigid. SH sighed as she settled down into it, her legs numbing.

She had always wanted to bathe here, but they could never stop in the plains too long during the Occupation. And she'd been too busy these last few years to take the time. The water felt just as good as expected, far more cleansing than the boiled river water in their tub.

It wasn't too deep. On the rocky edge where SH was sitting, it only came up to her chest. She arranged her shift around her, making sure it didn't float up from her stomach in the bubbling water.

Jin-suk's teeth chattered as she wrapped her arms around herself.

"Cold?" Chun-yeon asked sympathetically, and she nodded.

"Cold water makes you feel cleaner," Hae declared. "It's more pure."

She beamed at SH, who dipped her head.

"This one would agree with that," Chun-yeon giggled. "I remember that one time you went swimming in Chon Lake in winter. Comrade Kim Yong-hwan almost had a fit."

Kangwon had, too. But SH had needed to be clean.

She had actually paid for that one. There was a blizzard on the way down the mountain, and she'd almost frozen. She had spent the night huddled in Kim Jong-suk's cabin while the woman rubbed her shoulders.

SH's heart squeezed in her chest. There was almost nothing she wouldn't give to have been able to invite her today.

'No sad thoughts.' She brushed them away.

Sun-ja was happily rubbing water over her arms. "Aren't the eonnis coming in?" she asked, looking over at Liaoxi and Liaotung on the edge of the pool.

“I’m afraid of water,” the teal woman said with a mock shudder. She actually sounded like she meant it, even though SH knew she had no problem in the washing tub.

“And I don’t want my sister to feel alone in her fright,” Liaoxi said. “Rest assured, it was enough to receive an invite.”

She turned her head to give SH a friendly squint that the others couldn’t see past her scarf.

“You’ve shared enough bitters with us,” she said, squinting back. “You should get to share the sweets, too.”

“Are eonni and eonni bodyguards like Comrade Mao?” Sun-ja asked curiously.

Liaoxi gave an embarrassed laugh as SH’s look turned dry, though she couldn’t deny ‘Comrade Mao’ being Korea’s bodyguard when that was the cover story he liked to tell people.

“We’re Comrade Mao’s bodyguards,” Liaotung said. “To keep him safe from threats.”

Her and her sister exchanged glances. SH couldn’t help but think they might be implying to each other that Korea was the threat. She also couldn’t help but agree with them a tiny bit, even though she knew he hadn’t shot him. China was awake now, so surely he would have complained if he had. Surely.

Yun-hui floated over to SH’s side, looking down at the water in surprise as she ran a hand through it. “Does this feel like it’s tingling to you, too?”

“Ayuh!” Hae said excitedly. “It’s bubbly water!”

“It’s carbonated,” SH explained more clearly. “It’s something about how the water reacts with the minerals and gases in it.”

Hwang had explained it all, but she wasn’t confident enough to repeat it in more detail. At some point he’d started talking about how all of the minerals were discovered in the first place, and Korea had made him shut up.

“It’s special healin’ water,” Hae proclaimed. “The Gen’ral said so when he came to visit.”

Yun-hui perked up. “The General visited here?”

Hae nodded so fast she sent water spraying. “He got Pyo, Pyobu, and a bunch’a comrades to find more springs an’ build rest houses around here. He says we’re goin’ to start sellin’ the water someday so everyone can drink it.”

“Yeah, he basically said South Pyongan province has the best water ever,” South Pyongan said casually, smoothing a hand across her shiny azure head. “No big deal.”

Jin-suk looked alarmed. “Are we going to get in trouble for swimming in it?”

“It’s fine,” SH soothed. “Spring water is always moving, so it’s always fresh. You can even try a sip now, if you want.”

“Before we get it too soupy,” South Pyongan added, mischievously flicking water at Liaotung, who started looking for rocks.

Jin-suk was cautious, but she half-floated over to the side of the spring where no one was to scoop some of the water up, sipping it from her cupped hands.

Her pine nut-coloured eyes flew open. “It’s fizzy!” Her nose wrinkled. “And… sort of salty? It’s weird, but it tastes good. I think.”

“I want to try.” Gyuri plunged her head underwater, then came up with her cheeks bulging, swallowing. “Oh yeah. Those’re minerals. It’s sort of like the water from the Kumgang springs, but if it was trying to stop you from swallowing it.”

The other human women tried some, and SH had a sip, too. She enjoyed the dense mineral taste, and how cold it felt on her to tongue.

Hae looked longingly at the water, but there wasn’t any assurance that could convince her it was okay to drink when Korea had told her to never drink unboiled water. South Pyongan, too, gazed wistfully at it, her germ issues stopping her.

SH caught Liaoxi and Liaotung looking at the blue water curiously, but they couldn't even take off their masks to try some. But the Korean province didn't feel bad about that- she'd made sure to think ahead for later.

"Okay, water tasting done," South Pyongan proclaimed. "Time to get soapy."

She grabbed the bar she'd set on the rocks by the edge of the pool, but SH darted over to grab it from her.

"Ah ah," she chided. "Jin-suk's birthday is coming up. She gets to use it first."

"My birthday's soon, too?" her cousin tried.

"We don't even have birthdays. And if we did, they'd be in August." SH floated over to Jin-suk, handing her the bar.

"Is it really okay?" the girl asked, peering past her at South Pyongan.

"Yeah," she sighed dramatically. "I guess."

"She just likes being annoying," SH assured, and Jin-suk started to rub the soap between her hands like Yun-hui showed her. "Her and Hae go last."

"But SH," South Pyongan mock-whined.

"No 'buts.' No one wants to use the soap after you. You're disgusting."

She turned, eyeing her cousins' scorched bodies pointedly. They'd taken off their bandages, exposing all of the damage they'd taken.

Provincehumans couldn't crack the same way Countryhumans could (except for in very specific circumstances involving separatist insurrection, according to Hwang), but the deep red lines across their bodies still didn't look natural. Even though napalm could do the same thing to a human, someone's skin blackening and bursting, peeling away from their flesh, could never look like something that was supposed to happen. Even as she watched, SH could spot one of the burns on South Pyongan's stomach shifting, the scabs splitting open as the air battle at the Chongchon ate away at her.

If one of them rubbed the soap across their skin, their blisters would burst, leaving pus, blood, and scraps of flesh stuck to the bar that other people would have to use after. SH wanted to avoid that, thank you.

"Ouch," South Pyongan said, leaning back to sling an arm over the edge of the pool. "But fair."

The other women had been trying to avoid looking at their burns, but now that SH had acknowledged them, they all turned to lock eyes onto South Pyongan and Hae.

"Is that all from just your provinces?" Chun-yeon asked, her eyes sorrowed as they shifted to SH.

She was from the Hungnam area. She knew how the towns and cities there looked.

"They're kind of really gross-looking," Sun-ja said, torn between disgust and sympathy.

Gyuri's finger hovered an inch away from South Pyongan. "Can I touch?"

Jin-suk looked up at SH, her brows crinkling. "Do they hurt?"

"No," South Pyongan said immediately as Gyuri poked her arm.

"Ayuh," Hae confirmed.

"They aren't too bad," SH said, not wanting to give an obvious lie, but also not wanting to garner pity. "What's happening to our people is far worse."

"Ayuh," Hae said again, more subdued as she drew her knees up to her chest.

There was an awkward silence. Yun-hui had looked strangely disappointed when she'd seen SH was wearing a shift, but now she was looking at it with new eyes, like she understood.

She didn't, but that was fine. SH would rather she just think she didn't want to show off her unappealing burns than start to question why she had changed facing the wall during their costume changes on International Worker's Day.

SH moved to sweep the sudden quiet away.

"Why are you suddenly so into soap now anyways?" she asked South Pyongan, keeping her voice light. "Didn't Sang and I used to have to drag you into the river if we wanted to get you clean?"

"Ayuh," Hae said, poking South Pyongan on a less burned part of her cheek. "Pyo hated baths."

Their cousin crossed her muscular arms. "Did I hate baths, or did I hate that that was the one time North Pyongan couldn't be with me, which meant I'd have to keep an eye out for Japs and worry about whether or not he was off getting bayoneted while I washed my pits?"

"You definitely hated baths," SH said. "And don't say 'pits,' it sounds gross."

South Pyongan was unbothered. "Okay, and now I've experienced soap and nice bath oils. And I don't want to catch some weird disease."

"You really don't realize how much you hated being dirty until you get clean for the first time," Chun-yeon agreed, scrubbing at her arms as Jin-suk handed the soap to her.

SH had a flash, dirt ground into her knees, her clothes heavy with filth, grime smearing her cheeks every time she rubbed at one. And the stench of fish soaked into her very being.

She'd never felt dirty back then. Not until that first hot bath.

“Comrade Ru was with the Anti-Japanese Army, too, right?” Yun-hui asked curiously.

“I didn’t fight,” Chun-yeon demurred. “I was just a washerwoman.”

“No ‘just,’” SH chided, banishing the memory behind the wall. “If it wasn’t for you, our soldiers would have been going into battle with holes in their pants.”

“Yeah, it’s not like SH could’ve fixed them.” South Pyongan stretched out a leg to nudge her.

She shot her a look. “I could sew by then.”

Just not the same way Ru Chun-yeon could.

“But you always made those little cross-stitches,” she said, keeping her twinge of jealousy out of her voice. “Our comrades really appreciated them.”

Chun-yeon gave a small smile. “When my father would come home, he’d always say it was the luck trapped in the thread that kept him alive. He said he liked knowing his clothes hadn’t just been fixed, but that his daughter had fixed them.”

The edges of her full lips sorrowed. “There wasn’t any luck in them, in the end. But once I joined, I wanted to make the other men feel the same way. Someone wasn’t just fixing their clothes to send them back out to fight- Ru Chun-yeon was, hoping they’d make it home so she could fix them again.”

“That’s so romantic,” Sun-ja breathed, her eyes wide. “Did it ever get you a husband?”

Chun-yeon laughed, scaring off the heavy quiet that had tried to fall again. “I didn’t chase men back then. Not when there was a chance they wouldn’t make it back. But I am married now.”

“How is Comrade-“ SH took a deep breath. “Yong-gol Antonovich Zaitsev?”

“Oo, Russian?” San-ja tilted her head.

“Half,” Chun-yeon corrected. “And you know you can just use ‘Comrade Zaitsev.’ He also wouldn’t mind if you just used his given name.”

“I like to be polite.” There was also maybe a part of her that enjoyed saying the full thing. It wasn’t her fault he hadn’t even made things easier by choosing a one-syllable Korean name.

Chun-yeon shook her head. “He’s well, anyways. Hard at work making ammunition.”

“That’s good.” SH knew that already. She had done a bit of sleuthing before she'd sent for her last night so she would be ready to steer the conversation away from him if he was dead.

“How’d you meet?” San-ja asked excitedly.

“In the Soviet Union,” Chun-yeon said. “He was from a village near the unit I was working for. I saw his jacket had a bad tear, so I offered to mend it. I told him he didn’t have to pay, but the next time I came back, he brought me some syrniki- Ah, sort of… cheese jeon?- Anyway, this was when the Nazis were invading the west, so food was tight. It sort of became a habit for me to go fix his clothes, and him to pay me back with whatever he made. Then when Liberation came and I said I was heading back to Korea, he asked if he could come with me.”

Sun-ja leaned forward, half in the older woman’s lap. “What did you say?”

Chun-yeon smiled. “I told him that would be entirely improper since we weren’t married. So he grabbed my hands right there by the Aldan River and asked me to marry him.”

“Waaaaa, that’s like a love story,” Sun-ja breathed, eyes shining.

“It hasn’t been that perfect,” Chun-yeon said, taking her bun out and combing her fingers through her long black hair. “We’ve had our struggles. But I love him.”

Sun-ja paddled the water with her hands, looking at Gyuri and Yun-hui. “Are these eonnis married?”

“I’m going to be a spinster,” Yun-hui said proudly, the soap in her hands now. “I only like drawing men.”

“I had my claws in a boy,” Gyuri said, then her gaze fell to the water rippling over her legs. “He was in my unit. We both got taken to the Seoul holding camp. His compound wasn’t able to fight the transfer.”

Even the civilian Jin-suk and Sun-ja knew what that meant.

“I’m sure he’ll be fine,” SH said, trying to force it into existence. “We’ll get him back with our other prisoners.”

“We better.” Gyuri’s nails dig into her legs. “I’ll shred that Yankee bastard myself if we don’t.”

‘Get in line.’

“What about everyone else?” Sun-ja asked, looking around the spring. “Married?”

“Depends how much of a loser the brother you’re trying to pawn off is,” South Pyongan said, splashing water in her direction.

“I haven’t seen my brothers in… years,” the woman said, then shook her head. “I’m just interested.”

“I’m married to the cause,” Liaotung said, leaning back on her palms.

Liaoxi fiddled with the end of the scarlet headscarf that draped over her shoulder. “I perhaps… have a lover. But I can’t discuss him with another.”

“Mmmmmmmmmmmmmmm.” South Pyongan smirked. “Forbidden romance?”

Liaoxi ducked her head away from her, and SH gave her cousin a warning look. Even if the other women didn’t know the Chinese women were Provincehumans, she didn't want them to know one of their provinces was courting a foreign woman. Or even think he was courting a human woman.

'No state secrets,' she said with narrowed eyes.

South Pyongan winked.

"One little thing about him?" Sun-ja asked Liaoxi hopefully.

"He's… very kind," she said, avoiding South Pyongan's waggling eyebrows. "And a poet, of my same mind."

"Ah, you're a poet." Chun-yeon nodded sagely. "That explains the way you talk. I should have known. I grew up in Manchuria, and you can't spit in China without hitting a poet."

"We do love our words," Liaotung said with pride.

Satisfied with her hint, Sun-ja turned to the Korean provinces. "What about you? Is Comrade SH on the market?"

The phrasing made SH tense.

"We should refrain from using words like that," she said lightly. "Women aren't commodities."

Yun-hui nodded. "Our futures aren't for sale anymore, thanks to Comrade Korea and the General." Leaning towards SH, she boldly asked, "Is Comrade SH on the hunt?"

SH folded her arms across her chest. "I don't think it's proper for Provincehumans to have relationships with our people. It would be an abuse of station."

Yun-hui sat back, frowning. "That's a shame. Comrade SH is very pretty."

Sun-ja nodded vigorously. "Even with all the burns, it's still really clear. I bet Comrade SH could have any man she wanted."

South Pyongan cut it. "Yeah, but no men are good enough for her.

And even less of them are good enough for me."

SH gave her cousin a grateful look as the attention switched to her.

"None of them?" Sun-ja asked skeptically, rubbing soap suds across her chest.

"Hey, it's not my fault," South Pyongan said. "Obviously like, a hundred men have asked if I'm available. I told them all that if they could beat me in an arm-wrestle, we could get married. How many do you think won?"

She lifted her arm out of the water, flexing her biceps. SH winced as the sky-blue skin cracked open more.

"None?" Jin-suk guessed, and South Pyongan grinned at her.

"Birthday girl wins!"

Chun-yeon sighed. "I'd really like to assume you're joking, but now I'm remembering all the arm-wrestling competitions and ssireum matches you got into, and I'm worried."

"Eh?" Sun-ja tipped her head. "Women never fought in ssireum matches in my village. I thought we weren't allowed."

South Pyongan held up her other arm, flexing them both, making the muscles on her chest and stomach ripple. "Who's gonna stop me?"

Gyuri leaned forward, her eyes gleaming. "Can we have a match?"

SH floated between them. "Wrestling matches can wait until after the war is over, I think. Or at least until we have clothes on."

Gyuri huffed, leaning back. "Yeah, I guess."

"Ah'm not married either," Hae told Sun-ja proudly. "The only man ah like is Korea. And the Gen'ral. And all my cousins an' my brother. And Comrade Kim Tu-bong. And-"

“Basically she likes every guy in Korea that isn’t a traitor, but not in that way,” South Pyongan cut in, and Hae gave a firm nod.

“Ah also like Comrade Mao Zhilong,” she added, reassuring the Chinese women.

“That makes one of us,” Liaotung quipped, and her sister flicked her in the head.

“I take it Jin-suk isn’t married?” Sun-ja asked.

Jin-suk shook her head, and SH felt her hand grab the side of her shift under the water.

“Jin-suk’s much too young,” she said firmly.

“Almost everyone else here is boring when it comes to love,” Sun-ja sighed. “Do you want to get married someday?”

“I don’t… know,” Jin-suk said quietly. “Maybe if I really liked someone.”

SH squeezed her hand comfortingly. She wasn’t sure how the girl could even consider that after what she’d been through. But if she did want to get married one day, then once she was old enough, SH would make sure to find her a good man. Loyalty didn’t have to be the only thing she considered when match-making.

“What about Sun-ja?” SH asked, stopping her from pushing Jin-suk more. “Are you married?”

She sighed. “I was.”

“A widow so young?” Chun-yeon asked. “I’m sorry.”

The woman shook her head. “No, I was married before Liberation. The law on Sex Equality dissolved it.”

SH bit her lip. For her marriage to have been dissolved…

Yun-hui said it for her. “You must have been sixteen at most then, right?”

"Mm." Sun-ju looked down, running her the soap over her legs. "I was married for three years. When my dad died, we lost our land, and mom was too sick to keep us. She pretty much sold me and my sister off. I don't really know what happened to my brothers."

'She probably kept them,' SH thought bitterly.

The yangban almost always married younger than the peasantry, and that proclivity had never left the landlords and bourgeois. Sun-ja's mother had likely sold her young daughters off to some old degenerate in exchange for enough money to buy more land, or at least a house in the city. Enough money to buy more women for her sons without losing them.

Gyuri wrinkled her nose. "Was he at least a kid?"

Sun-ja confirmed SH's dark thoughts, shaking her head. "No, he was a landlord, and old. I think thirty."

The Kangwon woman wrinkled her nose. "That must've been weird."

Sun-ja nodded. "But he wasn't the worst. I was his third wife, so I didn't really even see him that much. I mostly did chores for the older girls. His first wife had it out for me, though." She pouted. "She'd always make me clean the agungi twice. She said I never got it right the first time."

The note of distaste in her voice made SH frown.

"You shouldn't blame her," she said. "How would you feel if the man you were married to kept taking other wives, and you couldn't stop him?"

"She didn't have to take it out on me," Sun-ja muttered.

No. But there was no one else to take it out on. With two other wives, her husband could easily decide to get rid of her if she protested in any way. She would either be a 'used' woman with nowhere to go, or dead.

"It's not fair that happened to you," SH told the woman gently.

“But she isn’t the one you should save your resentment for. He’s the one that put you both in that position. She was a victim, too.”

A bit of guilt flickered in her honey eyes. “I guess.”

“You seem to value love a lot,” Liaoxi noted. “Can you imagine if you found a man to love, then another woman he bought? You might still love him too much to fight, so you would turn to the other women out of spite.”

“I… didn’t really think about it like that before,” Sun-ja murmured.

“She was in the wrong, too,” SH assured you. Especially since she couldn’t fathom that someone could still love someone that did something that despicable and clearly didn’t love them. “But men like to create systems to make women fight each other so we never fight them. The real problem wasn’t either of you- it was him.”

South Pyongan nodded. “You should’ve all teamed up and beat him to death with the laundry.” She mimed smacking someone with a paddle.

“Too nice,” Gyuri criticized. “Each get a knife, stand over his bed at night, stab stab stab.”

“Hell yeah. Then pour soy sauce on him.”

“Food waste,” Hae declared disapprovingly.

There was another natural question to follow up with. Sun-ja had been married for three years, and ‘didn’t see him that much’ didn’t mean ‘didn’t see him at all.’ And you didn’t seek out a child for deep conversation.

Jin-suk had her hands clasped on her drawn-up knees, looking tense. SH spoke before anyone could ask it.

“At least no one has to do that now,” she said brightly. “We can thank the Law on Sex Equality.”

They all nodded in relief, including Sun-ja.

"I'm really glad," she said sincerely. "I didn't love him at all, and I didn't want to be someone's spare wife. Now I get the chance to find the other side of my red string."

She wiggled her smallest finger. Then her face fell.

"But it's hard." She passed the soap to South Pyongan's grasping fingers, resting her chin on her knees. "I don't have a family, so I don't have anyone to market me. And when men find out I used to be married…"

"Well, if a man rejects you for that, then you don't want to be with him anyways," SH said, relieved that a child wasn't one of the reasons she couldn't find a husband after all.

"That's what Comrade Mao says." She sighed. "But there's a lot of men that I would want to be with, if it wasn't for that."

It didn't matter if the landlord had visited her at all. Even taking her as his wife, a simple, selfish choice from him that had probably only cost around the price of a cow, had stolen Kim Sun-ja's future choices.

"I could help you find someone after the war is over," SH volunteered.

Though if she went around asking all the men she thought were good if they would accept a wife who had been married before, and they told her 'no,' she might have to remove them from the 'good' list.

Sun-ja brightened. "Really?" Before SH could say anything, she eagerly asked, "Could you put in a word for me with Comrade Mao, maybe?"

"No," SH said immediately.

"You do not want him," Liaotung told her. "And if you do want love, you probably shouldn't choose the man who is going to have to leave someday."

She turned her head suddenly. SH couldn't see her features, but she thought she seemed awkward.

Liaoxi didn't wince. "I'm afraid being of age won't be a saving grace, for you have a baby face."

Sun-ja frowned, touching her cheek, plump despite her slim frame. "I thought men liked round faces."

"Comrade Mao has…" Laioxi lingered, searching for a word.

"Cute aggression," her sister deadpanned.

Liaoxi nodded. "Over these weeks, I'm sure it's been a struggle not to pinch your cheeks."

SH had visited a dug-out recently with China (before he'd gotten shot) to give her approval to a child's mother to let the man watch her daughter when she was busy. He had almost made her change her mind by squishing the girl's face in his hands and rubbing them really fast across her cheeks. The child had enjoyed it, but 'cute aggression' was a good term for it.

Sun-ja pouted. "So basically he sees me as a kid?"

The Chinese women nodded.

"That fact you shouldn't hate," Liaoxi told her. "There are definitely worse fates."

"What about our Comrade Provinces' cousins?" Sun-ja said, batting her eyes as she moved on with speed. "Are they available?"

"None of us should be-"

"Wait wait." South Pyongan held up a hand to SH. "Don't scare her off. Comrade, if you can cook, I would be willing to sell my brother to you to get you into the family."

Liaoxi cleared her throat.

"Wait, crap, right." South Pyongan whipped around to her. "Wait. Random totally unrelated question- can you cook?"

The Chinese woman turned up her chin. “Perhaps.”

“No,” Liaotung said, earning a look. “We know the basics- rice, plain soup, roast meat. But our comrades seem covered on that front.”

Chun-yeon bit her lip. “Comrade SH, I hate to ask, but have you not learned to cook yet?”

Yun-hui looked startled. “Comrade SH can’t cook?”

SH pursed her lips. “I’m improving.”

Her oldest comrade put a hand over her mouth. “I thought those hotteok you brought to the Women’s Union conference were just a bad batch.”

SH gaped in dismay. “So you actually didn’t like them?”

“That’s okay!” Sun-ja lunged across the pool to grab SH’s hands. “Comrade SH, I’ll do the rest of the household cooking forever if you introduce me to one of our provinces! It doesn’t have to be Comrade North Pyongan.”

“I don’t know about that,” Chun-yeon mused. “I know all of them fairly well, and I would say he’d make the best husband.”

“North Pyongan is taken,” Hae protested for Liaoxi.

“Oh? By who?”

Hae froze. “Ummmm.”

“The Lord,” South Pyongan cut in. “He’s married to Jesus Christ our saviour, or however that goes. Amen.”

“Then I’ll settle for someone else,” Sun-ja said, not letting SH get a word out.

“Comrade Kangwon’s great,” Gyuri suggested. “But if you want someone bigger, I’d go with Comrade Chagang or Comrade North Hamgyong.”

SH stiffened.

"Isn't Comrade North Chungcheong tall and broad, too?" Yun-hui asked. "Comrade SH talks about him a lot, and he sounds nice."

"Chungbuk's the best," Hae enthused, scrubbing herself vigorously with the soap.

"But Comrade North Hamgyong led the defense of Chongjin, didn't he?" Sun-ja's eyes were sparkling as she leaned in to SH. "And he's head of heavy industry. That's so cool! Can I marry your brother?"

South Pyongan snorted. "Trust me, comrade, you want that even less than you want Mao."

"Then what about Comrade Korea?"

"Headhunter!" Gyuri accused.

"No one's marrying anyone!" SH cried, her voice echoing over the spring as she pulled her hands free. "Do power imbalances mean nothing to you?!"

There was a soft noise from beside her, and she whipped over, worried that all the talk about men might have upset Jin-suk. Her chest tightened as she saw her with her face buried in her chest, her shoulders shaking.

But then her sounds got louder, and she realized the girl was holding back giggles.

Sun-ja giggled, too, sitting back. "Well, if anyone ever does want to get married, let them know I'm an option."

"I'll find you a husband," SH promised, calming. "Just not a Provincehuman."

'And definitely not North Hamgyong.'

"I could introduce eonni to my brother," Jin-suk offered shyly. "I don't think he'd mind that you used to be married."

“You have a brother?” Sun-ja asked.

The girl lowered her head. “I… do. He’s just missing right now.”

“He’s going to come back.” SH tilted her chin up to smile at her, biting her tongue again. “I promise.”

Jin-suk nodded, cuddling closer, warm in the cold water.

Sun-ja tilted her head. “Now that I think about it, you said your dug-out was near Pyongyang earlier, right? But I’ve never seen you at the middle school when me and Chang-i pick up her little sister.”

Jin-suk looked away, knotting her hands in her lap. “I got… sick. A teacher comes and visits me now.”

“Eh, does that mean you don’t get out much?”

Jin-suk shook her head. “I have Father, and Comrade SH sends people to visit me.”

Yun-hui frowned. “That’s no good. You should be spending time with more people. I know the planes are scary, but you can’t be underground all the time.”

SH had been trying to get her to socialize more, and reunite with her old schoolmates. But…

Jin-suk’s shoulders hunched. “Father works hard all day to get firewood and gather herbs. And I… don’t like walking alone.”

SH took her hand under the water, and she gripped it tight.

“What if you came with me?”

Jin-suk looked up at Sun-ja, startled. “Where?”

“I work at the Synthetic Fibre Factory, but I volunteer at the rest house to help wash soldiers’ clothes and stuff-“

Gyuri nodded sagely. “Trying to get them to hit on you.”

“-so I go to the river a lot,” Sun-ja finished primly. “There’s always a lot of girls there to talk to. I could bring you, then walk you back home."

Jin-suk's eyes widened. "Really?"

"Yeah, it wouldn't be any trouble." She smiled kindly at the girl, and she tentatively smiled back.

SH revised her opinion of Kim Sun-ja, and felt a weight on her shoulders lessen.

"Y'know, factory worker wasn't the vibe I was getting from you," South Pyongan pointed out.

"Hmph." Sun-ja crossed her arms. "What man would want me if I wasn't doing everything I could for our country?"

"Whatever gets you to clock in in the morning," Chun-yeon sighed.

The women bantered and laughed as they soaked in the spring. There wasn't any cover around them, but they were far out in the fields, and Liaoxi and Liaotung were keeping watch, so no one was worried about anyone trying to peep, though SH made sure to keep an eye open, too. She brought out the dosirak she'd packed eventually, and everyone got to eat one jumeokbap, seasoned simply with sesame seeds and shoyu. She'd been planning on using plausible deniability to pretend she made them, but now had to admit that 'a comrade' (Kim Song-ae) had.

There was kkakdugi, too. SH smiled at Jin-suk as she offered her the spicy cubes of radish. The girl hesitated, but ate some, closing her eyes in bliss as the flavourful vegetables crunched under her teeth.

Hae brought out her scissors at some point and eagerly persuaded everyone with hair into letting her cut it, while the rest of them passed around the jar of ointment.

"Is this whitening cream?" Sun-ja asked, squinting at the porcelain container.

"Just softener," SH said. "And you shouldn't care about being lighter."

"Easy for you to say." She eyed the province's unnatural snowy skin enviously.

"Careful, if you're too white, someone might think you're a Yank and… shoot ya!" Gyuri pounced like a tiger, making the other woman shriek as she wrestled her under the water, Yun-hui saving the ointment at the last moment.

Jin-suk laughed, not hiding it anymore, and the clear bell of her joy made SH's heart swell.

She'd been wrong earlier. Yun Jin-suk's appearance had changed. Her face was fuller now, her cheeks rosy, and even with how little they had to eat, it was clear that under her shift, her body looked like a body again, instead of a host for something to feed off of. Her brown hair wasn't stringy anymore, but glossy, the shoulder-length haircut Hae had given her slicked back behind her ears and out of her face. The little green flecks in the depths of her eyes shone like emeralds.

SH blinked hard, unable to resist sliding an arm around her shoulders and resting her cheek on her head. Jin-suk beamed, leaning into her.

"Comrade SH, here's the ointment." Yun-hui tried to hand it to her.

SH made sure her smile didn't die. "That's okay. I don't want any."

Her comrade tipped her head, puzzled. "You didn't use the soap, either."

"SH doesn't like smelly stuff," Hae piped up. She was artfully cutting the ends off of Chun-yeon's hair, trying to convince her to go shorter.

Yun-hui looked scandalized. "Does that mean the perfume I've been wearing at the theatre's been bothering you?"

SH hurriedly shook her head. "No. I like them on other people. They're just not for me."

No matter what temperature the water was, the sickly floral scents would always make her lungs feel too big for her chest. They clung to her skin like oil.

"You sure?" South Pyongan asked. "I think there might be burn-relief crap in this."

Hae nodded. "Ah feel all tingly now. Even more tingly."

Another thing she'd have to thank China for. But SH would choose the pain.

"I'm alright," she said, and Yun-hui shrugged, using some more on herself.

SH pried her nails out of her leg.

A reminder. She could help these women forget about the war raging around them, and help her cousins forget about their responsibilities for a day. But she would never be able to forget.

They stayed longer than she had planned, long enough that the walk back to Pyongyang would be completely in the dark. But she didn't make any effort to keep to the schedule. He would be sent for no matter what time she got back to the Pyongyang checkpoint.

They spoke about random things, SH steering them away from the war where she could. Talking about their jobs (SH fulfilling her 'discuss light industry' requirement with Chun-yeon) led to Liaotung revealing she was an er ren zhuan performer and pulling out her silk squares to toss around for them, gracefully spinning them on her fingertips and sweeping low to the ground to catch them, though she couldn't do her comedy act without her partner.

"What do you want to be when you grow up, Jin-suk?" Hae asked when the woman flopped down next to her sister again, after taking a grandiose bow.

Jin-suk puffed out a cheek. "I don't really know. I never thought I'd get to go to school."

In her announcer's voice South Pyongan declared, "Thanks to the Worker's Party, women in the People's Korea can now be anything they want! Except for married to a Provincehuman," she finished normally, making Sun-ja pout.

"I think…" Jin-suk went to fiddle with her bangs, but didn't have them anymore. "Machines are cool. I always liked watching the tractors. And- And my sister took me to her factory once. All the stuff in there looked really interesting."

"You could be an engineer," South Pyongan suggested. "We need more women engineers so someone can put the males in their place when I'm not there."

Hae chirped, "Ayuh, and the Gen'ral says we've got to get more women into science stuff."

Jin-suk shook her head, cheeks dusting red. "I'm not smart enough for that."

"Hey, don't sell yourself short," Yun-hui protested. "You don't know unless you try. I thought I'd never be a good artist, but Comrade SH encouraged me to try."

SH blinked. She hadn't met Yun-hui until recently, and she'd already been making art by then. "I did?"

She bobbed her head so fast her trimmed hair flew. "I felt like I was never going to get better at drawing, but then I saw one of Comrade SH's posters. It was the one for the Law on Sex Equality actually, with the worker, peasant, and intellectual women holding the hammer, sickle, and inkbrush."

"The one that said 'Korean women's futures are in their hands?'" SH asked.

"Mm." Yun-hui clasped her hands together at her chest. "When I saw it on the newsboard, I felt my heart beat faster. For a moment I really felt like my future was in my hands, and I could be anything I wanted."

SH hadn't been so sure about that poster. She hadn't finished honing her craft yet, and felt like her art wasn't up to the task of promoting something as important as women's rights. But Korea had told her to make designs anyway.

"And I realized I didn't just want to draw," Yun-hui continued, her pretty brown eyes sparkling. "I wanted to make art that would make people feel the same way Comrade SH did."

"Passion is required in art," Liaoxi murmured. "You found the passion in your heart."

Yun-hui nodded. "If I messed up after that, I'd just remind myself that my future was in my hands. If I set the brush down, I'd never get better. And now I get to make portraits of Korea and the General themselves."

She turned to Jin-suk. "So even if you aren't good with machines at first, if you're passionate about them, keep trying. And if you're not, find something you are passionate about."

"I want to be like Comrade SH, too," the girl said, glancing shyly at her. "I want to make the country better."

SH's heart was full to bursting. "You will," she predicted.

"Mushy talk," South Pyongan muttered.

"Yuck," Gyuri agreed. "Everyone knows a soldier is the best thing to be."

South Pyongan leaned back, staring up at the sunset. "It's the easiest, anyway."

They stayed a little longer, all of them reluctant to leave. Even with the explosions echoing from the north, the little spring felt peaceful, secreted away from the war. SH watched the riot of crimson and tangerine painting the sky fade into a pallet of soft violets and lavenders, like the Chungcheongs' flags.

She wished their other female cousins could be here. Even South Chungcheong.

"You know, I was kind of thinking about not agreeing to go on this," Gyuri said, floating on her back in the middle of the water. "And I was regretting it when I found out we were just taking a bath. But I'm actually glad Chief Gunner Ryang made you get me. This was nice."

"You didn't want to come?" Yun-hui asked, yawning.

"I wanted to get back the front." Gyuri gazed up at the stars as they began to bloom in the veil of night. "I didn't know why I'd taken the leave at all. I didn't really think about it when Command offered. But once I got back to my hometown…" She let out a humourless laugh. "I realized I took a leave to see family when I don't have any left."

"Bombs?" Chun-yeon asked quietly.

"For my uncle, when the Yanks first came," Gyuri said. "The rest of them…" The water rippled as she shrugged. "The Second Corps kept a big part of Kangwon Liberated during the tactical retreat. But we couldn't hold all of it. And I'm a loud commie," she said after a moment. "There were a lot of reactionaries in my town that wanted to get even once Rhee's guys let 'em out of prison."

"I'm sorry," Yun-hui murmured.

The woman shrugged again. "It's how it is. I was gonna end my leave early. Still am. But thanks for making my last day a good one."

She sat up, giving SH a grin with her sharp canines.

"You're welcome," the province said, smiling back. "I'm glad you said yes."

She was glad she had thought of this.

Eventually they had to leave. They all climbed quietly and reluctantly out of the water, getting dressed in their uniforms and workshirts and choson-ot, not caring that they soaked through. The air carried the sharp tang of minerals and damp earth.

"My fingers are all pruney." Hae laughed quietly, running them along South Pyongan's arm.

"Ewww, you know I hate that."

SH snagged Liaoxi and Liaotung's canteens, jogging away.

"Okay. We die of dehydration, I suppose," the latter remarked.

SH followed the quieter bubbling sound to the smaller spring she'd found yesterday, another place the water welled up from the earth. She dumped the regular water out, filling the canteens with the clean mineral kind.

"So you can try some when we're alone," she explained to the Chinese women, handing them back.

"Thank you," Liaotung said, sounding touched.

"Comrade North Pyongan spoke forsooth," Liaoxi lilted. "You really are kind in truth."

SH ducked her head, pleased that her cousin had been talking about her that way to their comrades.

When they were all ready, she did one last check to make sure they had everything and to admire the spring one last time, and the way the stars caught in the dark water. One day soon, there would be a factory on top of it, siphoning the bottomless wellspring so people across the country could try the healing water. She was glad she'd got the chance to sneak in a little personal use, and make her comrades feel better.

She took a headcount, then looked over, finding Jin-suk standing off to the side with her head down.

"Did you have fun, Jin-suk?" she asked gently, padding over.

"I did," she whispered. Her shoulders were shaking. She wasn't laughing this time. "But I miss my sister."

She turned suddenly, grabbing onto SH's uniform and burying her face in her chest as sobs started to wrack her small body.

"I had a lot of fun and I really like everyone and I- I really miss my sister!"

Her legs gave out, and SH let her drag her down to the ground. She stroked the girl's back, holding her the way she always did when she cried, the way Jong-suk had held her in that blizzard. South Pyongan looked away, but the other women crowded in, even Gyuri.

Hae hugged Jin-suk in distress. "Don't cry! Today's supposed to be happy!"

"Let her cry," Chun-yeon said, her hand joining SH's. "It's good to get it out."

Yun-hui threw her arms around the girl from the other side, burying her face in her hair. "You've got a lot of sisters now, Jin-suk. If you ever need to talk, you can come to the theatre. Even if I'm out performing for the troops, the other women will be there."

Sun-ja nodded, clutching at her skirts. "And I meant what I said about taking you to the river. I'll make sure you aren't so alone anymore."

Liaotung squatted next to the huddle. "You've got Chinese jiejies, too."

Joining them, Liaoxi said, "Grief shared is grief paired."

Gyuri reached in to ruffle her hair. "And if you ever need anyone killed, I can do it. No questions asked."

"I can kill people, too, but I've got to ask a few questions," South Pyongan called. "Politician, y'know?"

"We can't replace your real sister," SH murmured, running her hand along the crying girl's spine. "Or your mother. But you do have a lot of sisters looking out for you now, Jin-suk."

"Okay, that's enough disrespect," Chun-yeon grumbled. "I'm forty years old. I'm an auntie, not a sister."

"A lot of sisters and an auntie," SH corrected, and Jin-suk half-laughed, half-sobbed into her breast.

They clustered around the girl, holding her while she cried her heart out, a knot of grief and comfort. The shadows of planes rippled overhead as the Yankee fighter jets soared back from the Chongchon River, heedless of the women below and what they had taken from them, and the bombers flew north to take more, as always.

But for the moment, those on the ground ignored them.

There needs to be at least one Girls' Day chapter in every fanfiction I write. It's in my contract.

Also I probably should have clarified this awhile ago, but for the Korean ages, back then they would add an extra year for the time spent in the womb, like was said in an earlier chapter. But I'm usually using the modern system where someone born in 1900 would be 51/52 in 1952, unless I clarify traditional age, like with Jin-suk. This is because I have enough trouble with figuring out how ages and dates work with my own age, let alone adding in womb years and the age only changing with the year. I am time-adverse. So when they say Kim Sun-ja was 16 when her marriage got dissolved, they mean 16 flat, unlike when they say Jin-suk is 16 now, which is adding the womb year and the year change. I think I worked that out right for her. I would say sorry for the confusion, but no one is more confused than me. I genuinely cannot tell you how old I am without doing mental math.

So here are the ages in this chapter:

SH- 41 ('birthday' in August)
Hae- 41 ('birthday' in August)
SP- 41 ('birthday' in August)
Liaoxi- technically 44/45 (depending on which month Fengtian's 'birthday' was Liaotung- same as Liaoxi, 44/45
Yun Jin-suk- 14 (birthday in May)
Ru Chun-yeon- 40 (birthday in September)

Pak Gyuri- 23 (birthday in February)
Pak Yun-hui- 23 (birthday in October)
Kim Sun-ja- 22 (birthday in June)

Also because I can't talk about women without talking about the suffering we have to deal with, I just learned more about the giant child sex trafficking ring the US had at the Subic Bay Naval Base and Olongapo in the Philippines. I say more because I already assumed American men did that to Filipina women without knowing anything, as they have done to Vietnamese, Koreans, Japanese, and many other women. And just like all our governments, the Philippines let it happen. Tens of thousands of women, half or just under half children, that were used by their military men. They kept their pictures on a board like a menu. And they didn't stop doing this when the base closed. They left behind sexual diseases and half children and kept visiting without responsibility. They also poisoned the water there with waste that has apparently caused cancers in the local population. Now the American Navy wants to open a storage facility there again and have higher presence, and the government wants to let them to counter the 'China threat.' But to girls and women, the Americans are the threat. Remember- American soldier is synonymous with rapist. And to most men, woman is synonymous with worthless.

A Spirit We'll Pass Down

[image]

SH's transport papers would be good until tomorrow, but with night having spread its soft black wings over Korea again, most trucks would be bound for the front, carrying vital supplies to the defenders. The Nampo highway was quiet. So the women chose to stick to the more rural roads, meandering their way across the fields and low hills under the shadow of the new moon, in no hurry to reach the pass between the ridges that would narrow their path to the highway again.

Even though the civilian women were tired, none of them complained, too lulled by the much-needed rest day to actually feel their legs start to ache. Jin-suk dozed on SH's back, her chin resting on her head until she startled back awake, only to slowly start to nod off again. The province was torn between walking as swiftly as possible, eager to see her scheming come to fruition, and enjoying the calm.

She did choose the second one, though, keeping her gait slow to match the others, letting herself linger in the warmth of the vacation. Whether America gave in and signed the ceasefire or not, there wouldn't be any chances for another day like this for awhile. Chun-yeon and Sun-ja would need to devote themselves to their labour to make clothes and fabrics, whether for soldiers or civilians, Yun-hui would either keep maintaining their army's morale or turn to rehabilitation work, Gyuri would be kept at the front as an active fighter or in defense against another assault, and Jin-suk would be working at getting back into proper schooling, then her compulsory schooling with all the other children of Korea. And Liaoxi and Liaotung would leave Korea one day.

And SH, South Pyongan, and Hae... They had to keep fighting, no matter what. The work would only get harder when they were finally able to rebuild.

SH was looking forward to it. But it was still nice to take these little moments where she could. These small glimpses of a future normalcy that should have been theirs long ago.

But as they neared the taller peaks of the hills that would curve them towards the highway, the tranquil night was disturbed by a rhythmic beating sound.

SH frowned, stopping in place to try and hear better. It didn't sound like a plane, and the droning from towards Hwanghae province wasn't getting louder. It sounded like...

"Is that a helicopter?" South Pyongan asked, stopping next to her.

"Sounds like it." Gyuri tilted her head towards the dark sky. "Thowmp thwomp thwomp. The Yankee commanders that come to scope out the front use them."

Helicopters were quick and stealthy, or at least stealthier than jets or regular planes. They were better for transporting high-ranking officers to observe fighting at a safe distance, or small bundles of soldiers. Not bombing missions.

Uneasiness bloomed in SH's chest, and her hold on Jin-suk's calves tightened.

"What's going on?" the girl asked, yawning sleepily.

"Nothing," she assured her cheerfully. "We're just all going to get down for a second, just in case."

Even if they weren't equipped with bomb chambers, that wouldn't stop a passenger from strafing the ground with a machine gun.

They all hustled into the field to lie flat, pressing themselves into the short spring grass sprouting between the rows, nightdew soaking their fronts.

The moon's absence made it hard to see, but after a few minutes of straining her eyes up at the sky, SH saw it- a small shadow coming from the west. The 'thwomp'ing sound grew louder as it came towards them, then evened out, the shadow hovering over the rugged hills to their north.

Keeping an arm over Jin-suk, SH craned her neck, watching intently as the barely-visible helicopter beat its blades to remain stationary. After a few seconds, it looked like something dropped from the bottom.

"Somethin' came out," Hae gasped.

South Pyongan was already rummaging in her pockets, pulling out her emergency gloves. "Ssi-bal, do you thinks it's bugs?"

"No," SH said tightly.

Something had bloomed over the shadow that fell from the helicopter, slowing its descent, and a second later, something else dropped, the same shadow ballooning out over it. The shapes under the parachutes were too large to be insect containers.

SH's languid feeling evaporated like paint thinner and she shot up, her rifle already in hand. "Paratroopers."

They must have came in from the coast.

"Shit," South Pyongan cursed. "Another gang? In my province? Really?"

SH watched three more parachutes bloom before the helicopter started to move again, dipping its nose as it wheeled around, heading back for the sea.

"Too few," she clipped. "Not a gang."

"They must be infiltrators tryin' to sneak into the units 'round Nampo or Pyongyang," Hae said, her voice flat and militant as she rose with her gun in hand. "We've got to get rid of 'em."

It wasn't a question. According to the men that had been caught or turned themselves in after being sent on operations just like this, they'd been sent to Tokyo for training, then given orders to infiltrate units using fake identity cards. America couldn't use Rhee's butchers or the Kuomintang because they had no idea how Socialist jargon worked, so he depended on the insider knowledge of POWs. They had a much better chance of succeeding, and could use their position to do any number of things- pass on information, sabotage weaponry, commit crimes to tarnish the KPA's image, or even interfere with the anti-germ warfare measures. They had to catch them before they could do any harm.

"Jin-suk, stay with Comrades Ru and Kim," SH ordered, getting to her feet and passing her pistol to her old KPRA comrade. Even a washerwoman knew how to use a gun. "Comrades Pak Yun-hui and Pak Gyuri, with us."

The soldier women saluted, falling easily back into line.

The Song and Dance Ensemble had personal sidearms to protect themselves, but Gyuri had to leave her firearms behind on leave. SH jerked her head at Hae, but Liaoxi stepped in, holding out her pistol.

"Take mine. With my rifle, I'll do fine." She unslung her Mosin-Nagant.

"You shouldn't be involved in this operation," SH advised.

"They could be spreading all over those hills," Liaotung said, her submachine gun ready. "Comrade Shī and I will scout. We won't engage."

SH nodded. "If you are forced to, be careful. And don't shoot recklessly," she added to her cousins and the two soldier women. "If these men are as unwilling as some of the others, we don't want to kill them. We'll attempt to figure out if they're hostile first, but don't hesitate to shoot if you think you're in danger."

"Are you like, going to be okay?" Sun-ja asked, her brows furrowed as she pulled a shaking Jin-suk into her side.

"Please," South Pyongan scoffed, spinning her pistol around her finger. "Five guys? I could take them with one hand."

"W-What if they f-find us?" Jin-suk asked, the whites of her eyes gleaming in terror.

If these men were hostile, SH was going to make sure they regretted it.

She smiled, crouching in front of the girl, softening her tone. "You'll be alright. Comrade Chun-yeon will protect both of you. If anything goes wrong, she'll get you to Kangso."

"Hey, kid. You've been learning to use a knife- take this." Gyuri threw her blade at her feet.

Jin-suk hesitantly picked it up. "Don't you n-need this?"

The woman gave her a feral grin. "I like using my hands better."

"You'll be okay," SH assured the girl again, standing back up and slipping back into her officer's voice. "Any questions?"

"No, Comrade General," the military women chorused.

"Then move out."

They left Jin-suk, Chun-yeon, and Sun-ja amongst the fields and started the march towards the hills, moving double-time. There was no knowing which units the men would head for, so SH kept a sharp eye on the horizon between them and Kangso, in case they headed for the post there.

It took ten minutes to reach the slopes, scattered with rocks and scrub trees. Liaoxi and Liaotung slipped away to recon the perimeter while the rest of them headed for where it looked like the helicopter had been hovering, moving carefully into the rippling terrain.

They were all on high alert, hands wrapped tight around their firearms, ears and 'ears' straining for the slightest sound.

As they reached a creek that ran out of the hillside and down towards the plains, SH twitched. She made no moves, other than to send a silent finger sign to Hae as they prowled along the water.

Yun-hui suddenly stiffened, her head pivoting towards the other side of the creek. "I saw something."

SH went to signal them on, planning on circling around, but before she could, someone burst from the bushes across the water, pointing a submachine gun at them.

It was a man, dressed in a KPA uniform. He came out confidently, hoisting his gun with assurance, but it almost faltered as he locked eyes with SH. Almost.

"Put down your weapons," he growled, aiming his firearm at her.

SH aimed her rifle back, as did the other women. "You can put your weapon down instead," she suggested sweetly.

He lifted his lip at her. "Put. Them. Down."

Next to her, South Pyongan and Gyrui exchanged skeptical glances.

"Seriously?" the province asked. "Why would we do that? There's like, four of us. Even if you get a shot off, you're going down."

His eyes flashed. "I'm not asking again. I don't care if you've got a couple of provinces. Put-"

SH shot him in the kneecap.

He screamed, falling to one knee, but kept his grip on his gun, raising it again. But before he could shoot, Hae burst out of the bushes behind him, where she'd gone when SH signalled, wrapping an arm around his throat and dragging him back, sending his spray of bullets into the sky. South Pyongan and Gyuri were across the creek in a flash, the province crossing it in a single bound to smash her foot into his gut, and in his moment of agony, Hae tore the submachine gun out of his hands.

Gyrui smashed her fist into his face, bursting his nose in a spray of blood and knocking him over as Hae released him, darting aside with her new gun. As the two women fell on the man, beating him into the ground, she scuttled back in.

"'Scuse me, pardon me," she chirped, unbuckling his belt as South Pyongan straddled him, driving her fists into him while he hollered.

Hae came up with his belt, holding it like a snake as she trotted away with his pistol, grenades, and submachine gun.

SH kept on guard, scanning their surroundings as she and Yun-hui crossed the creek, water seeping into their boots. The man's screaming was thankfully muffled as Gyuri took off her boot and shoved her sock in his mouth.

"Don't kill him," SH advised as she and South Pyongan stopped beating him and dragged him over the stones to the water's edge, shoving his head under.

"Just trying to put him to sleep without cracking his skull," her cousin said cheerily, dunking his head under a few times more than necessary before holding him there.

"I think he can take a few more hits," Gyuri said as he thrashed. "Yankee skulls are pretty thick. Have to be to try and take on all of us alone."

SH was pretty sure he'd had the arrogance because all of them were women. He hadn't came out until he heard Yun-hui's soft voice after all, and had only faltered when he saw she was a province. Believing this might have had some influence on why she hadn't just waited for Hae to grab him.

"Type 49, Tokarev, and Tokarev," Hae reported, pocketing his identity card and tags and frowning at the guns she had. "Stupid traitors are usin' our stuff."

"It's the weapons they get captured with," SH said, head swivelling around the hill. "And they need to blend in."

As South Pyongan dragged the now-unconscious man out of the creek, she could see that he didn't quite fit one of their soldiers. He looked more well-fed, likely having been eating better in Tokyo than the average POW or frontline combatant. And his uniform was both too unworn and too messy. It clearly hadn't been lived in for very long, but no KPA soldier should have as many loose threads as he did.

Of course, he probably had been a KPA soldier. But his uniform would have just been handed back by Yankee suppliers.

"I'll carry him," Gyuri whispered. "I'm strongest."

"Okay, actually I'm strongest," South Pyongan said, grabbing for the man's arms. "So I'll carry him."

"I can, really." Gyrui grabbed his feet.

"I outrank you, I'm carrying him."

"Whoever carries him can't fight," SH interrupted their squabble before they could tear him in two.

Both the women looked at each other, then dropped the man onto the stones face-first. "You carry him," they both ordered at the same time.

Yun-hui sighed. "I'll carry him. I have less active combat experience anyway."

"Good deal." South Pyongan hustled over to load the man onto her shoulders, wrapping his arms and legs around her the way SH had carried Jin-suk. The small woman huffed, bending under his weight, but got him settled.

"If he wakes up, just fall back and smash his skull off a rock," the province advised. "He'll be fine."

"We need to find the rest of them," SH ordered, marching away. "His noise will have attracted attention."

They were a small group, so it was more likely they would run instead of engage. But they shouldn't have dropped too far away from each other, so should be in the nearby area.

Sure enough, as they skirted over the hill, a light whistle came from above, and Liaotung's masked face peered down, gesturing them up.

The women silently followed, letting her lead them to the low rim of a shallow valley filled with slender poplars, not yet cut down for their wood.

"Comrade Shī is on the other side," the Chinese woman whispered, pointing to the taller opposite rim. "The other four are clustered in the middle. The shooting spooked them."

She didn't need to ask about it. Yun-hui had the man splayed out at her feet.

SH nodded, adjusting her grip on her Type 49. "We'll head down. There's enough cover to launch a melee attack. With five on four we should be able to take them. You stay here with your rifle to make sure none get away."

Liaotung saluted, and they holstered their guns, army crawling down into the valley, moving slow so as not to crack any twigs or rustle the undergrowth. SH tested each spot before she rested her elbows on the rocky soil. As she got closer, she could hear voices filtering up.

"Do you think that was the other guy goin' after someone or someone goin' after him?" one of them murmured uneasily.

"Ssi-bal," another cursed. "We should've moved faster."

"We should go now," the third whispered. "Before there's any more trouble."

The women were close now, bellies pressed to the ground in the thin undergrowth around the poplars like tigers. In the light of day, they would have been spotted, but the moonless night hid them completely. As the men cautiously started to move out, they sprang.

SH leaped up, smashing her rifle across the face of the man closest to her, sending him sprawling to the ground. South Pyongan went for hers, opting for a graceful and powerful kick directly to his groin that sent an oddly operatic scream echoing over the hills, and Gyuri grabbed her target by the arms, tearing his rifle away and bending him over so his stomach could meet her knee. Hae barrelled into the last one, smashing him back into one of the trees with enough force to make the leaves shake. Yun-hui moved to help her, but the other woman had already twisted him around and locked his arms behind his back, pressing him into the forest floor, so she went to make sure Gyuri wouldn't go too far with her beating instead.

SH had lunged onto the man she'd knocked down, locking her legs around his waist and pinning her rifle against his throat. His hands came up, clawing for her face, and she slammed her firearm down with one arm, making him choke, while the other tore his grasping hand away, bending his wrist back. Her heart leapt as she felt the bone creak in her grasp about to break.

"Wait!" the man gasped, throttled by her gun. "I didn't mean to... do that! Instinct! Long live... Korea!"

SH's hold tightened, then she let go, leaning back and lifting her rifle from his neck, though she kept him pinned. The man didn't take advantage of the pressure lessening to escape, his hands going to his throat instead, rubbing it.

"Comrades, it's Comrade South Hamgyong!" he rasped. "These are our guys." He turned his head, spotting the rest of the unit, and corrected, "Our women."

The other two stopped struggling, the one Hae had pinned to the ground craning his neck back with difficulty. His eyes widened as he saw her, and he went limp. Hae kept him down until Yun-hui had gathered all their guns, then let him go.

"Identify yourself, soldier," SH ordered the man under her, shifting so she had a boot planted on his chest.

"Private Kim Hyo-gon, comrade," the man said, his voice still slightly strained. "82nd Regiment, 2nd Division, First Corps. I was captured at the front last year."

"And what are you doing here now?" SH demanded.

She knew of course. But she wanted to see if he would tell the truth.

"This is goin' to sound crazy, and you might want to shoot us 'cuz'a it," the man Hae had caught said. "But we just got dropped by a Yankee helicopter."

"They want us to infiltrate our army and act as saboteurs," Kim Hyo-gon continued.

"But we weren't gonna do it," the soldier under Gyuri said nervously, squirming. "We were gonna turn ourselves in."

"But there's another guy out here," Kim Hyo-gon said urgently. "He was a real bastard in the camps, and I think he might be heading out to a different unit. You need to catch him before he hurts anyone. We heard gunshots-"

"He's been dealt with," SH said. "And now you will be, too. If you were going to turn yourselves in, I take it you won't have a problem if we do it for you?"

The man relaxed. "None at all, Comrade General."

SH finally got off of him. And since she believed him, she held her hand out, helping him up.

"Gyuri. Off," Yun-hui ordered. "Let the poor man breathe."

Grumbling, Gyuri got up.

"Ee, sorry about that," South Pyongan said to the man she was sitting on, getting up and hauling him with her. "On the bright side, if you can't have kids anymore, there are tons of orphans around. And you can tell everyone you experienced a genuine Pyongannam-do Dick Kick."

"Honoured, Comrade General," the man gasped miserably, doubling over as he clutched his loins.

Liaoxi and Liaotung trotted down the slopes, the latter with the unconscious man over her shoulders.

"He woke up," she puffed, setting him down unceremoniously. "But he's out again."

"Let's use his belt to tie him up," Hae suggested, already wrapping it around his wrists.

"Here, take mine for the ankles," the soldier she had gone after said, handing her his waist belt.

"Thank you," Hae chirped. "Sorry for twistin' you up. We thought you might be traitors."

"Just men who are super glad to be home," he sighed. "Despite the bruises."

"We're glad you made it home, too, comrades," SH assured them. "And also very sorry for the bruises."

She believed that they'd been going to turn themselves in. Their conversation before they had been ambushed fit in with it. They had wanted to move faster so they could report the other man, and the 'trouble' had been the trouble he could get into.

"We'll take you to Pyongyang with us," she told them, making sure all their supplies were gathered.

"Do you want me to carry him?" the burly man Gyuri had been mauling asked Liaotung.

"You just got out of a prison camp, comrade," she said. "I can handle it."

"We were at a training camp," he corrected. "I'm bigger, let me take him."

"Thank you, then." The Chinese woman handed over the prisoner, and he put him over his shoulder like a sack of rice.

"I can carry you," South Pyongan offered the man whose chances of continuing his bloodline she had destroyed.

"I'll be fine," he said hastily, cringing away from her, still hunched over.

"Suit yourself."

SH proudly led them out of the hills and back down to the plains, where Chun-yeon and the other two were waiting. Jin-suk quailed as she saw the men, hiding behind the older woman.

"They're comrades," SH assured her.

"Hi there," Sun-ja said eagerly, darting towards the burly man with the prisoner. She tucked a strand of neatly-trimmed hair behind her ear coquettishly. "I'm Kim Sun-ja."

"Down girl," Gyrui chided, dragging her away.

SH sighed, shaking her head. "Let's get going. We've had a long day, and our comrades have had a long few months."

"A long year," one of them murmured.

They all headed towards the highway, the men speaking over each other as everything they'd been through rushed to come out. The POW camps, the abuse they'd witnessed, the comrades they had left behind, the training camps, and the moments of defiance- singing songs on Army Foundation Day, refusing to be screened, flying flags with Korea's face on them.

"Ah wish ah could've been like them," the one from Hwanghae murmured. "Ah gave in too easy. That's why they thought ah'd make a good agent."

"It got you home," Sun-ja comforted.

"And everyone else is still there."

SH wouldn't make a judgement on that. She knew what she would have done in that scenario, but even the men who were cowards or willing to pretend to renounce their country in the moment to make it home later had a part to play. Soldiers should be braver than that, but the stories they brought with them were useful, like the General had said. And there was another kind of patriotism in believing at their core that their country wouldn't punish them for their choices, even after the Yankees had spent months or years trying to convince them that their People's Government was bloodthirsty.

Not all of the men that turned themselves in had been innocent victims. Some of them had played along with the cruelty of the Yankees and their puppets, torturing their fellow prisoners. They had confessed to it. And some of them had done it because they were traitors that supported Rhee or Chang Kai-shek, and only after the cruelty had started to wear on them had their hearts changed.

So long as these men weren't like that, she could forgive them.

A lone truck made its way down the highway from Nampo, and South Pyongan ran to flag it down, the driver's eyes widening at the ragtag unit. SH's transport papers didn't cover the men, but she used a little of her provincial authority to get them all in. She could give her explanation when she gave her report.

The soldiers were in high spirits as the end of their long journey neared.

"I can't wait to eat my mother's cooking again," Kim Hyo-gon sighed, tipping his head back.

"I'll never complain when my wife makes fish soup three days in a row again," the burly man agreed, and Sun-ja pursed her lips.

"Ah hope my kids haven't moved anywhere too far away," the one from Hwanghae said. "As soon as Command lets me go, ah want to find them."

"I just want to see my mom," the soldier South Pyongan had kicked murmured. "I hope she's still alive."

The mood dimmed. They had all been gone for a long time. And when every day was filled with death in Korea, there was a good chance it had taken someone they loved with it.

SH grit her teeth, the dark thing stirring for the first time in hours.

"I'm sure they're all fine," she said confidently. "You'll see them again soon."

The words weren't enough to dispel the pall, so SH stood up, smiling.

"When I broke free from America's camp, I didn't really feel like I was home until I sang our anthem," she announced. "Why don't we sing it now to welcome you all back?"

She didn't wait for an answer, launching into the first verse.

"Shine bright, dawn, on this land so fair."

The other women scrambled to join, Yun-hui singing the words boldly and Jin-suk almost whispering them.

"Full of silver and gold."

SH smiled at the men, and after a moment of hesitation, they joined in.

"Three thousand ri of my beautiful homeland

In a long history of five thousand years."

They grew more confident as they went, until they were all singing at the top of their lungs, from deep baritones to Sun-ja's high clear voice to South Pyongan's imitation of a dying seagull. Even the driver joined in, and their voices streamed behind the truck like banners, welcoming their soldiers home.

They sang until they reached the checkpoint, 'The Internationale,' the 'Song of General Kim Il-sung,' and several of the tunes the prisoners had written in the camps, the men having been holding them in their breasts, unafraid to sing them now.

As they slowed to a stop, the soldiers looked out at the ruins of Pyongyang, the Taedong River gleaming darkly as it flowed towards them, and they quieted.

"Home," Kim Hyo-gon whispered, roughly rubbing his eyes, the single word containing a heartache and relief that SH knew intimately.

"Home," she confirmed, smiling as she climbed out of the truck to explain the situation to the checkpoint guards, and to send off the message she needed to.

The others got out with her, a few men coming to escort the former prisoners away. But before they could, Jin-suk grabbed Kim Hyo-gon by the hem of his uniform.

"Wait, please." She hurriedly let go of him, reaching for SH's hand instead. "Did... you meet anyone named Yun Jin-tae when you were in prison? He's my brother."

The men all thought for a moment, then shook their heads.

"A few Kims and a Pak," one of them said. "But no Yun."

Jin-suk hung her head. "Was it... really as bad as you said in there?"

"I won't lie to you, little comrade," Kim Hyo-gon said gravely. "It was. But if your brother's a strong solider, he can make it out of there. And if doesn't, he'll be avenged."

Jin-suk's lower lip wavered, but she gave a brave nod. "Thank you."

The former prisoners saluted, then walked away. The man from Hwanghae was weeping as he went, deep, relieved sobs that shook his frame, as one of his comrades rubbed him on the back in rough comfort.

And SH knew they couldn't let a single one of their soldiers stay in the south.

The spring breeze gently rustled the grass on Moran Hill, bringing the briny scent of the Taedong up to them. SH watched the explosions in the distance as the rail line between Pyongyang and Sariwon was severed again, brief bright sparks lighting up the horizon and extinguishing lives. Her fingers carded through Jin-suk's short hair as she dozed in her lap, gently untangling the knots the spring water had tied in it.

The other women had gone home, Sun-ja to her dug-out, Sun-hui to her Song and Dance Ensemble unit, Chun-yeon to the place SH had arranged for her to stay before she left for Hungnam tomorrow, and Gyuri to the front. The small taste of combat must have brought her lust for battle back in full-force.

That was what she had said anyway. But the spark in her dark eyes hadn't been bloodthirsty, but determined. SH thought it was more that seeing the prisoners return home and hearing about what they'd been through had brought back her desire to free the boy she'd lost, and all of their other comrades, the way Korea had freed her.

SH was left feeling a soft melancholy, the way she always did after celebrations. When the fireworks or songs had died down and the company had trickled away, leaving a gentle ache in their place. She'd had a good day. She hadn't forgotten about the war, but for a few moments, laughing and splashing the other women with water, she had been able to pretend to forget everything else.

But it always came drifting back down, settling over her like a shroud, bringing a quiet dread with it. No matter how good a day she had, that wasn't what kept the nightmares away.

Hae shifted beside her, watching the bombs and feeling them echo in her skin. She was being oddly subdued, her arms wrapped around her legs with her chin on her knees. South Pyongan, too, had sobered on her other side, her arm slung over her leg, her gaze far away. For once, they also seemed to feel her after-party blues.

"SH?" Hae asked quietly, not raising her head. "Are we ever goin' to be done fightin'?"

SH blinked at the sudden question. It was a little dark to have come from her usually cheerful cousin. "Of course. This war won't last forever."

"Ah know that," she complained. "We're goin' to win. But ah mean... the Liberation against Japan, shuttin' down all the reaction'ries that tried to mess with our Agrarian Reform, now fightin' the Southern One... And America an' all the other sabo-tee-ers."

Her voice on the next sentence was low, with none of its standard bubbliness. "Is it ever goin' to stop?"

SH opened her mouth to repeat 'Of course,' but halted. She knew Hae wasn't a child. And she wasn't asking for a comforting lie right now, but the truth.

She thought of Korea saying that they would always need to safeguard the revolution, already sketching out new tactics for once the war was over, loyal bloodlines and soldiers who would never waver.

"No. It won't ever stop."

In the end, there was no future 'normalcy.' Not the way there would be for their people. The provinces would always have the struggle.

Hae blinked for a little too long, but looked as if she had expected the answer.

"We're always going to need to defend the Revolution," SH continued, looking out over their city and country. "We're always going to be fighting. Because that's what we're made for. To fight for our people."

Ever since she had told America that the day she had fled the camp, she had been thinking on it. 'We don't exist for ourselves. We exist for our people.' The words felt right in the same way that those from Korea and the General did. They settled into place under her breastbone, filling an empty space there comfortingly.

"Korea an' the Gen'ral say we're the masters of our own destiny," Hae protested.

"Our people are the masters of their own destiny," SH corrected, looking down at Jin-suk as she ran a hand over her cheek. "And we're here to guide them and protect what they create. As long as the Korean people exist and strive for their futures, we'll be here to fight for them. And that fight will never end."

Every Countryhuman and their subdivisions had their own theory on why they existed. Much like humanity, it wasn't something they could prove or quantify. And this was SH's, one that had been derived from years of listening to Korea and his ideas. He was everything a Countryhuman should be- one who fought for his people and put nothing else above them. Even if they truly didn't have a purpose, then this was as good as one, and she would be honoured to share it with him.

The three women were silent as they contemplated this.

"That might be true," South Pyongan eventually said. "But just because we'll always be fighting doesn't mean we can't have fun while we do. Y'know, play sports, eat good food, go to a real spa."

"You would go to a spa with us?" SH asked dubiously. Even if her cousin liked baths now, she had trouble picturing her in a real bathhouse.

"You know I love doing nothing," she replied with too much pride. "Doing nothing while floating in hot water is even better."

SH smiled despite herself. "Then we'll go to one once the war is over. It will be worth it to see you with a clay mask."

"You're on. And Hae-" South Pyongan leaned around SH to slug her on the shoulder. "Look at it this way- life would be boring if we had nothing to fight for. Sitting around doing nothing only feels good when you've been working hard to get there."

"And it won't always be like this," SH added, trying to make up for how blunt she had been. "With guns and bombs. It will get easier. One day we'll be able to go back to farming and painting and designing strange buildings."

Fighting for Socialism with art instead of weapons, the way she longed to.

"Cool buildings," South Pyongan corrected. "But the point stands. That's all part of the struggle. And as Provincehumans and commies, we need struggle to keep ourselves busy."

Hae bit her lip and slowly nodded, the truth of their cousin's surprisingly comforting words washing over her. "Ah guess you're right. Fightin' ain't always about actual fightin'. And it would be pretty borin' if we had nothin' to do."

Then she gasped, eyes flying open. "Pyo! Ya said the c-word!"

South Pyongan looked stricken, flinching away from SH like she expected a slap. "Wait, when?"

"No! Not that one. You said you're a commie!" Hae beamed. "Did ya really mean it?"

"You're sure you didn't mean 'Korean' or 'freedom fighter' or even 'people's revolutionary?'" SH checked with mock concern.

"Yeah yeah, laugh it up." South Pyongan rolled her eyes. "Just don't tell Korea yet. I want to make him sweat for a bit longer."

SH shook her head fondly, looking down at Jin-suk to make sure Hae's outburst hadn't disturbed her. She shifted a little, and the province stroked a hand over her hair, soothing her.

"Y'know, you've gotten pretty good with kids," South Pyongan observed, leaning back on her palms.

Hae nodded, resting her head on SH's shoulder. "Like Comrade Jong-suk."

The words made SH's chest glow and her heart twinge.

"I wish she was here," she murmured.

It was so unfair. Twenty-eight years of surviving Japanese prisons, starving in Korea and Manchuria, and fighting the Japanese, even serving as the General's bodyguard and saving his life more than once, and she had only known four years of freedom before the bad pregnancy had taken her life. She hadn't died to a bullet or bomb, but her own body. She had lived a revolutionary and still been rewarded with a women's death.

And SH couldn't even resent it properly. She knew she had wanted to get pregnant again. Her friend had loved being a mother.

"Me too." Hae buried her face in her knees again, her cheer fading. "Ah want everyone to stop dyin.' What if somethin' happens to Chun-yeon an' everyone, and we never see 'em again?"

"Then at least you knew them to feel the pain."

SH looked over her shoulder to see Liaoxi and Liaotung descending the hill, back from visiting China.

Hae hurriedly wiped at her eyes, not wanting the Chinese women to see her crying.

"No need to hide the tears," Liaotung said. "Didn't SH say we should share sweets and bitters?"

Liaoxi came to stand next to them, smiling down at Hae, her face mask down for the moment. "It's better to feel love and have tears fall, then to never feel it at all. If they all died tomorrow, would you regret today?"

Hae hesitated, then shook her head. "No. Ah had a lot'a fun."

"Mm. For love, grief is just the price we have to pay." Liaoxi pulled her mask back up. "And it's usually a worthwhile one."

She gazed into the distance, towards her country. Her sister watched her with unfathomable eyes.

"Comrade Liaoxi is right," SH said, putting her arm around her cousin. "Even when our people die, our... friends, we can't let that drag us down. We need to keep moving forward, to fulfill their dreams and avenge them."

"To carry them forward," South Pyongan murmured, her fist clenching.

SH nodded. "And the more we love them, the harder we'll work to do that."

Unlike North Hamgyong, who never even bothered to learn their names.

Hae shook herself like a horse swishing flies, then nodded in determination. "Ah know. Sorry for gettin' all sad. It just hurts sometimes."

"I think for a good province, it's supposed to."

She knew America never hurt when he lost one of his people. She knew he didn't weep for the Yankees shipped back home in boxes or those trapped in their camps. She doubted those dead eyes behind his aviators had ever shed a single real tear.

And when their own country wouldn't cry for them, why should she? South Hamgyong province was full to bursting with the weight of the tears she held for her own people. The wall swelled with them.

Liaotung's eyes squinted as she yawned. "This was a nice vacation. But I think I'm ready to sleep."

"You can all head back," SH said, standing. "I need to get Jin-suk home."

He should be there by now.

She turned down their offers of company, and South Pyongan helped get the sleeping girl onto her back without waking her.

"Thank you for inviting us, jiejie," Liaotung said, dipping her head.

SH returned the gesture. "Thank you for coming, comrades."

The other woman smiled under her mask. "I think you can all just use our names now." Liaoxi nodded in agreement.

SH's heart skipped happily. "Then you can use ours. Not that you weren't already calling me 'big sister.'"

"Now it's 'SH-jiejie.'"

"Korea says ah need to use your code names," Hae said gravely, clearly grieved by actually getting permission to use someone's given name for once and not being able to use it. "But after the war, ah will."

"Looking forward to it," Liaotung said. Liaoxi nodded silently.

The others started down the hill as SH started across it for the other side. But a call stopped her.

"Hey, SH, one sec."

SH turned back to South Pyongan as she jogged back over. "What is it?"

The other woman looked suddenly uncomfortable. "...Never mind."

SH caught her before she could turn back around. "Oh no. No acting dodgy. What did you want to tell me? Or do I have to tell Korea about your newfound fervour for Socialism?"

"Oh, so you can do the whole 'pretending you never said that' thing, but I can't?" she complained. "But fine. It's just..." She actually appeared to squirm for a moment before blurting out, "I really admire you."

SH blinked, taken aback. "Um, thank you?"

Honestly, if she had been talking to anyone other than her cousin, the words might have sounded like the precursor to a confession. As it was, they were just... unsettling. South Pyongan- skilled, arrogant, strong South Pyongan- admired her?

She opened her mouth to ask if she was about to be asked for a loan.

South Pyongan held up a hand. "Don't talk until I'm done or I'll leave. You've been through a lot. Me and North Pyongan had it easy compared to you."

SH looked away. She never could have imagined that out of all people, it was South Pyongan bringing this up. During the Occupation, no one had directly acknowledged her time before joining the fight but South Chungcheong. And ever since the Division, Kangwon had been the only one. And even he always tried to maneuver her into it, like when they were gathering herbs for Jin-suk. Aside from that, her cousins pretended like her life before Korea gave her her chance might as well not exist.

She had always wished that was true.

"You could have turned into someone like South Chungcheong or your jackass brother," South Pyongan said. "But you didn't. You're always trying to keep us in good spirits, or do crap for us. I know you're freaked out by everything that's going on, obviously, we-" She faltered a bit. "Everyone else is. But you still took time to do this for all of us, and cheer Hae up earlier."

"You're the one that cheered Hae up," SH protested. "I was just being depressing."

"I said don't talk. You're the one that brought us out here. We're in the middle of a war, and you took the time to organize an entire day to make us- and all of those chicks- feel better. All by yourself." South Pyongan took her by the arms, then immediately let go. "You're a really hard worker, SH, and it's always for other's sakes. And I think awhile ago I would have told you to focus on yourself instead, but..." Her lips thinned. "I think you're right. I think we exist for our people, not ourselves."

SH bit her lip. She hadn't meant that to come off that way. To her, it was a good thing, an inspiring thing. They had a purpose, and that purpose was to help their people. But she could see how for her more individualistic cousin, it could be a bitter medicine to swallow.

South Pyongan shook her head briskly. "But we're still the masters of our own destinies, even if it's different for us. And... look, while I'm being all touchy-feely I'll just get it all out." She huffed, fidgeted a little, then said, "I know you feel like you need to do stuff like sew and cook and shit that women 'should do,' but you don't. You let it get to you too much. I don't want to tell you how to live, but if you're bad at something and you don't actually want or need to do it, then don't. Like Pak said earlier- if it's not your passion, kick it in the gutter."

She had been avoiding eye contact, but now she looked at SH straight-on. "Since we aren't here for ourselves, if we want to be masters of our own destinies, we should get the reins on the parts of our lives that are actually ours. Don't waste time on crap we don't like or... can't change. Stop worrying about the past... Am I making sense?"

She was. SH considered how much of her spare time had been spent frustrating herself over soggy rice or underseasoned kimchi, not to mention how much time she spent while working having that frustration niggle at the back of her mind, and all her jealousy of Chun-yeon during their camp days, and now, if she was being honest.

And for what? Korea had never asked her to, neither had the General or any of her cousins. Generally, they actually pleaded for her to stop. And while she wanted to master sewing and learn how to knit, to make beautiful clothes for herself and her people, she didn't actually want to learn to cook. And she was the only one who had assigned the 'need' to herself. Korea didn't need soup to know she appreciated him.

Here she was, a woman in the Democratic Womrn's Union in the People's Korea, which had passed the Law on Sex Equality so soon after the Division to sweep away the cobwebs of feudalism, and yet she was festooning herself with them still.

'And I always accused North Hamgyong of clinging to archaic traditions.'

But while she could accept the overt part of her cousin's surprisingly touching message, the underlying one was harder. Attempting to stop wasting time on 'crap she didn't like' was a matter of avoiding kitchens and not letting her thoughts stray towards the subject. But the past was not so easily dismissed. There were ruts in her brain that certain memories ran in like wagon wheels. The painted wall and the dark rage it contained existed for a reason. They had to.

"And outside of our personal lives even, we're still our own masters," South Pyongan continued. "We choose how we fight. It's like..." She gestured vaguely. "I think we can exist for our people, but live for ourselves. Ugh, don't talk to me. That sounded so corny." The blue-skinned woman clapped her hands to the sides of her head, trying to abscond again.

"Wait." SH caught her again, her cousin reluctantly letting her pull her hands back down, even though she could only use one to do it, the other holding Jin-suk steady. "It did sound a little corny. But..." She sighed. "You're probably right."

"I am?" South Pyongan blinked. "Oh, yeah, obviously. I always am. And while we're at it, Korea could stand to hear it, too. Not that I'm going to be the one to tell him."

SH smiled at that, shaking her head. "I think I was trying to prove that I..." She sighed. "I don't know. But whatever it was I was trying to prove, I wasn't enjoying the process."

Her cousin gave her a lopsided grin. "So does that mean no more oversalted rice?"

SH narrowed her eyes. "Was this all an elaborate ploy to get me to stop cooking?"

She had been joking, but South Pyongan answered seriously, "No. I really do admire you, SH. Way more now. But..." She grinned. "If you never pick up a pot again, I'll consider it a win."

SH smiled back, cheeks aching with joy. "Thank you, Pyo."

"Tch. Don't mention it." She kicked at a rock, looking suddenly embarrassed. "Seriously. Do not mention it, especially to your brother. I have a reputation to uphold."

SH laughed and linked their arms in lieu of a hug, before she let her go so they could go their separate ways.

But South Pyongan hadn't gone far before she halted in her tracks.

SH frowned back at her. "Something wrong?"

Her cousin bit her lip, something poignant- almost like grief-flashing across her face, alarming SH. It was an expression she was unused to seeing on her.

"South Pyongan?"

She shook her head. "Yeah, I'm good. But I'm going to let the others head on back without me. And could you tell Korea I'm taking a longer leave when you get back?"

That was a little alarming.

"He's going to say no."

South Pyongan smirked, looking a bit less somber. "Yeah, which is why I'm making you tell him. I have something I've gotta do."

SH hesitated, unsure if she should insist that she stay. But there was something in her cousin's expression that told her to let her go.

"Okay," she assented. "But since I'll be the one taking the blame for it, you'll owe me half of your rations when you get back."

South Pyongan grinned, knowing that she was joking. "Half my dinner to avoid Korea yelling at me? Hard bargain, but I'll take it."

SH laughed a little. "Be safe."

"Yeah, yeah," she muttered, abashed again. "I will. I promise I'm not going out to cause trouble. Tell that to my brother, too, so he doesn't have a stroke. And... tell the kid I hope she gets her brother back."

SH smiled, shifting Jin-suk on her back. "I'm sure she will."

She watched her cousin walk away into the night, back up the hill with her hands in her pockets. South Pyongan usually had a spring in her step, a jaunty little swagger that implied she didn't have a single care about where she was headed. She would keep that bravado whether she was striding into a mass meeting, a rally, or the battlefield.

She didn't have it now. Her shoulders were bowed as if the weight of the world pressed down on them, and each step she took up the hill was dragging, reluctant. If SH were to paint her right now, the title of the piece would be something along the lines of 'Burdens of Conscience.' Or maybe that was too flowery. 'Reluctant Woman,' would be simpler. Clearly she wasn't eager to do whatever she had to.

Surely she would be fine. She knew South Pyongan wouldn't take off for no reason, and while her cousin was a troublemaker, SH had never seen her as dangerous. And she had even been taking more responsibility lately. Admitting that she was a Communist was a sure sign of that.

She would be okay. So would Hae.

Jin-suk stirred on her back, yawning in her 'ear.' "Are we going home?"

SH smiled back at her, squeezing her leg gently. "Mhm. Let's go home, Jin-suk."

—

South Pyongan stood outside the door, taking a deep breath.

This was stupid. There was no way she'd be able to find her. She probably wasn't even alive anymore. She'd been what? Forty or something? She'd looked it anyway. So had he.

She should just walk away. It would be easier. Like being a soldier. Soldiers didn't have to say sorry for the people they killed.

But South Pyongan couldn't be just a soldier anymore.

She opened the door, sauntering into the General's office.

He was sitting at the desk, rubbing his face. Hyon Chol-hae had woken him up for her, and he clearly felt like crap. He'd probably only got an hour's sleep, even though it was so late. Him and Korea were workaholics, something she'd never get, even if she managed to make herself work that hard someday.

"Comrade South Pyongan," he greeted, sounding more awake than he looked. "Is everything well?"

She'd save the report on the guys they'd brought in for SH. She didn't waste time, strutting over and placing her palms on the desk.

"I need Korea's list."

The General raised his brows. "I might be able to help, if I knew what my province was talking about."

"Whatever thing he uses to know who literally everyone is," she said impatiently. "I know he has some sort of list with everyone's names and faces or something."

And crimes. Like that landlord. 'Neglectful but not cruel,' or whatever.

Kim Il-sung smiled at her. Wordlessly, he reached into his desk, pulling out a book and placing it in front of her.

It was bound in brown leather, the thin kind that didn't cost much, but the pages were thick. They looked swollen and well-handled, the edges not lining up right. The person that made it either hadn't been good at cutting, or a couple extra pages had been added. Maybe both.

South Pyongan realized she actually recognized it- it was the notebook she'd seen Korea writing in once and awhile during their time with the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. She'd asked him what was in it once, and he'd snapped at her in that way that meant he was embarrassed, which meant she had devoted a few good weeks to attempting to steal it away to see if he was trying to be a poet like her brother or a songwriter like the General. But he always kept it too close, and she'd lost interest after awhile.

'Huh.' She would admit- she'd kind of been bluffing. She hadn't expected him to actually have a real physical list, if that's what this was.

She snatched it up, flipping through it.

Page after page of names, all crammed together in Korea's tight, no-nonsense handwriting. Some had scrambled syllable blocks next to them, clearly some kind of code. Some were slightly longer than others. Some had none. But each one had a little drawing next to it.

"Y'know," she said, looking at the General over the book. "If I was looking for someone, this wouldn't actually do shit for me. I'm not. But if I was."

"If you were, there might be something in there that could help you," he replied.

"Or, hear me out- because I'm your favourite province, we could just talk straight."

The man blinked patiently at her, and she heaved a sigh, flipping through the pages more carefully. As she did, something fell out into her lap.

A telegram strip. It was covered in syllable blocks, too, and Hanja. They were phasing those out, but she guessed they still would've been using them when Korea started this book. It was easy enough to guess it was the clue to the cipher. But...

"What about these little doodles?" she demanded, showing the General one that looked kind of like a cow if it had been halfway turned into meat.

"I won't profess to knowing the inner workings of my country's mind," the man said gravely.

Liar. Him and Korea had that little picture code of theirs.

"Korea just sucks too much at drawing for you to read these," she muttered.

The man didn't deny it.

South Pyongan didn't have to look as hard as she'd dreaded to find the name she wanted. It was at the bottom of the other side of the first page, between someone called Kim In-ho and a woman's name- Ok Su-jin. Unlike the others, this one didn't have a symbol next to it. It looked like Korea had started to draw something that was either an eye or female bits (and knowing him, it definitely wasn't the second one), but had changed his mind, wiping it out with a smear of charcoal. There was just a name.

Guk Gun.

Her eyes lingered on the name under it. This one had a code, and the two rectangles with a line through them that a ton of the other names had.

"I'm borrowing this," she declared, snapping the book shut as she dared the General to challenge her.

"Very well," he said easily.

Too easily. It wasn't like him to give away their country's secrets so casually. Or their Countryhuman's.

South Pyongan narrowed her eyes. "Did Korea tell you to give this to me? Actually don't answer that."

She still didn't know how much they told each other. She didn't want to.

The General's face betrayed nothing as he leaned back. "I hope my birth province can accomplish what she needs to."

"You know South Pyongan province," she said, pushing off the desk. "She can accomplish anything she wants."

Not that she really wanted to do this. She'd rather be in the place of the guy whose balls she'd wrecked earlier than what she was about to try and do.

"By the way," she said as she strolled out. "I wouldn't go to sleep again. SH should be by soon to tell you about a little scuffle we had, and you know she's not a 'this can wait until the morning' person."

She shut the door on the General's sigh, heading off to find somewhere private to read the book, trying not to think about what it meant if Korea had given him permission to give this to her. If he'd known she would come looking some day.

'Gross.'

There was no clue on where to start deciphering the symbols. It wouldn't be easy, even with the code. And if she managed to figure it out, what came next would be even harder.

What was that saying? 'We Communists do not fear difficulties?'

'Bleh.' Embarrassing. South Pyongan didn't fear difficulties, commie or not. She was the best at everything, so if something was hard, she had to conquer it. Sticking with what was easy was little bitch behaviour. And she wasn't a little bitch. If not talking about her tank crew was easier, then she had to tell Oh Renjiro how they'd died, how she had failed them. If being a soldier was easier, then she had to be a politician.

And if pretending she had never murdered one of their civilians and would have murdered another if she hadn't been stopped by the same person she had killed for, that she had chosen her brother over their people the way a reactionary traitor would, was easier, then she had to confront the fact that she had.

—

SH led Jin-suk along the path to her dug-out on the field's edge. She had let the girl down from her back so she could walk, stumbling along on sleepy feet, her hand in hers. They stopped a few paces from the mound, and Yun San-jin almost immediately poked his head out, his face slackening with relief when he saw Jin-suk.

"We're late," SH said, then made herself add, "I'm sorry."

The father had clearly been worried. Even if it would have been nice if he'd shown some of that worry for his daughter before he'd forced her to go through eight months of having her life force sucked out by a Yankee parasite, she should still be gracious towards him. Or civil, at least.

"It's alright," he said as he rubbed his chest. "As long as she's back."

He had to be alone or he would have said something. SH raised her head and caught a glimpse of movement from down the path. She had still beat him here.

She looked down at Jin-suk. "We had a good day, didn't we, Jin-suk?"

The girl nodded happily. "Thank you. It was a really nice birthday present."

Definitely better than last year. She was healthy, back in schooling, getting used to socializing again, and was going to be making new friends with Sun-ja.

And her family was coming home.

SH smiled. "That wasn't your birthday present."

Jin-suk tipped her head, puzzled, then turned to follow the province's gaze as she looked over her head. She froze as she saw the man coming down the path, instinctively going to hide behind SH before she halted, her eyes widening.

"Who is that?" her father asked tightly, heaving himself out of the dug-out.

The man pulled something from his shirt, holding it up in the air. It was too dark to see it, but SH knew it was a patchwork jogak-po, like the one Jin-suk's mother had made for her, stained and ragged from the months of being kept hidden.

"Oppa," Jin-suk breathed.

The girl looked back at SH, disbelief and hope welling in her eyes. The province beamed, pushing her forward gently, and she didn't need any other encouragement.

"OPPA!" She tore down the road and launched herself at him.

Yun Jin-tae caught her in his arms, and her stubby legs went flying as he spun her around. When her feet were flat on the ground again, he enveloped her in a hug.

"Jin-suk-ah!" he cried, crushing her to him. "I missed you, you little brat!"

Jin-suk laughed and sobbed, burying her face in him as she clung to her brother with all her might. She tried to speak, but just ended up crying harder, wailing into his chest.

SH was pleased to see the dim light glint from something on his wrist, glad he had made sure to wear his welcome home gift.

Behind her, Yun San-jin took a shaky step forward. "That's really...?"

SH held out her arm, stopping him for a moment.

"If she doesn't tell him on her own, then it never happened," she told him seriously. "It's for her to decide. Her choice."

Jin-suk's father's hesitation was far, far shorter than before.

"Always," he whispered, and SH let him go.

He half-walked, half-jogged down the road, like he was holding himself back. When he reached his children, he stopped.

"Jin-tae," he said awkwardly. "Welcome home."

His son raised his face from his sister's hair, formally holding out his forearm to clasp. Yun San-jin stood there, and the younger man's gaze fell to his missing arm.

He laughed then, and grabbed his father, pulling him into the hug, one arm around Jin-suk and one around him. And after a moment, Yun San-jin hugged him back. The last members of the Yun family held each other tight, like they would never let go again.

SH smiled, still with that bittersweet melancholy hanging over her, but satisfied. Another tear mended, as close to before as it could ever be. She turned to leave.

"Eonni!"

SH turned, and Jin-suk hit her like a missile, embracing her with all her might.

"Thank you," she whispered, her tears staining her uniform.

"It's what I'm for." SH stroked her hand over her hair again, then pulled away, and the girl ran back to her family, being folded into them again.

There would always be moments like the ointment for SH. When someone offered something small and innocuous that should have made her happy- bath oils or matcha, a roast fish- and she would be brutally reminded of what lurked inside her, what fed the dark thing, that she would never be able to feel silk against her skin or have a hot bath without being back there, huddled in the pile of clothes, screaming underneath the water. She would never be able to forget.

But it didn't have to be that way for Jin-suk. SH couldn't bring her mother or her sister back or make it so that what had happened to her had never happened. But she could make it so that when the girl unbuttoned her blouse, she didn't think about a Yankee man tearing the last buttons off, but of sliding into a pure spring, and when she ate kkakdugi, she wouldn't remember buying radish with the money that had been thrown at her, rather how it tasted in her mouth as she laughed watching South Pyongan overpower Pak Gyuri and spin her over head. And she could make it so that when she saw a watch, instead of counting thirty-two minutes and fifty-six seconds, she would think about how it felt to feel one press against her back as her brother embraced her again.

She could help her forget.

SH watched Jin-suk sob into her brother. And as she did, a feeling of guilt fell over her.

Kim Jong-suk had been a good mother, and not just to her own children, or theirs, but to the Chinese, and to the Russian children in the Soviet Union. She had never even been unkind to the Japanese, even when she knew they would grow up to be like their parents. She was better than them.

And so was SH. She was better than Yankee women. Even if she wanted them dead, even if she wouldn't cry for them, she didn't want them to suffer in the ways that all women suffered. If she had ever met an American girl like Jin-suk, she knew she would have wanted to protect her.

But there was a girl like Jin-suk. Or at least similar. One who had led them to the identity of their leak at the risk of her own life, but had allowed herself to stay caged.

Of course she had. You didn't leave the cage because someone else told you to. You left it because you told yourself to, because you had a chance.

But when you thought you were under a curse, how could you ever believe you had one?

SH walked away, leaving the family to their reunion, South Pyongan's words in her head.

'Masters of our own destinies.' She had needed to hear that.

And there was another woman that needed to hear it even more.

Kim Jong-suk was both SH's best friend, sister, mother-figure, and bisexual awakening. She haunts her narrative. And mine. Don't ask me about Revolutionary Heroine Kim Jong-suk or I'll start crying.

Post-Warring Pyongyang SH walks into the bathing room, turns on the light and sees Korea is sitting fully clothed in a bath of ice water. She turns the light off again and they sit in the freezing cold tub fully clothed in the dark together without saying a word. At some point Y/N walks in, turns on the light, they all stare at each other in silence, then she turns the light off and leaves, reminding herself that she chose to marry into this family.

I refuse to listen to those 'women living alone safety tips.' I will buy my single ice cream. I will walk home alone in the dark. I will answer the door. I will get into the elevator first. I ask the gods every day to send a male to test my mettle. No sword formed against me shall prosper, and no man that thinks me prey will walk away unscathed.

I know this seems contradictory to the great distrust I have expressed for men before. It is not.

For Your Sake

North slowly opened the door to his room, his muscles rigid, ready to slam it closed at the slightest sound.

Nothing.

He warily peeked his head in, before realizing that if he was in there he would be making a fool of himself, peering around the door like a child who wanted to go out, but was afraid of being scolded by their parents.

Luckily the room was empty.

He slid in, moving fast, rolling his bedroll up and fastening a cord around it before grabbing his folded uniforms and packing them into his bag with his few mementos. He tucked SH's birthday painting of the bellflower under his arm since it was too large to fit in his pack with everything else. Then he took his clothes out, putting the canvas in instead. He would rather be seen carrying his uniform.

He paused with a photo in his hand, running his thumb across the letters carved into the paper by the pencil.

'The 63rd Army Lives Forever!'

Chest squeezing, he carefully tucked it in with SH's art, and the photograph he still couldn't let himself look at.

North Pyongan said Liaoxi had told him China was ready to emerge from Jonsung complex, which meant he would be coming back here. Which meant North would start sleeping in the office complex instead of splitting his nights between the military one and the bunker.

He was not letting China chase him out of his own headquarters. He was just… relocating for convenience. There wasn't any reason for him to sleep here with his provinces and make the journey into and out of Pyongyang every day. That was all.

He buttoned up his pack, casting an accidental look at the other side of the room as he did, and the pile of gutted electronics.

As he did, something flashed. The glimpse of red clearly wasn't China's skin, but he still instinctively jolted, baring his teeth at it.

It was one of the handheld radios.

North cautiously approached, then shook himself, more aggressively picking it up. It wasn't like the man was crammed inside the military green casing, waiting to ambush him.

The radio looked finished, like China had said, though North assumed he still hadn't had time to test them, all things (getting shot) considered. It was ugly, the casing swollen with technology that almost bulged from it. Plastic panels had very clearly been cut and soldered to extend the housing chamber so it could fit the jumble of wires that had stuck out from the back before, and a weird grip jutted from the side, like plier handles. They might have actually been plier handles.

North gave them a tentative squeeze, and the radio emitted an aggressive whirring noise that made him scrunch his face in distaste.

Did they have a purpose or was China just making something to annoy whoever had to use this? North couldn't see the point of a combat radio that made a sound like that.

He found the antenna, unfolding it from the back to examine it. It was a little longer than China's last model, but far shorter than that of the BC-611-F transceivers that had been dismembered to make this one, only about forty centimetres. He wondered if it could still get good range, but definitely wasn't going to seek out China to ask.

The flash came again. A small bulb had been installed above the switch on the side that you would press to transmit and receive. It had a sort of hood that could be pulled down over it to hide the light.

Running out of battery? North was a little smug that China hadn't figured out how to solve the battery issue before remembering that it had been lying in here since they left for the south, almost seven weeks. Even if he'd extended the battery life, that was still plenty of time for it to run down.

Admittedly, he wanted to know if China had succeeded at making a 'new' type of handheld radio, so he moved the switch up to see if it would hum with an empty frequency.

Instead he realized too late that the other radio was missing, moved since the last time he was here, just as the one in his hand crackled and China said, "Ah, there you are."

North threw the radio at the ground, leaping away from it and straight into the door, slamming the lock shut with a force that tore his burns open.

"Please be careful with your radio," China's voice said mildly. Unfortunately the thing conveying it had landed on his bedroll, remaining intact. "I worked hard on it."

North lunged for the device, but just as he grabbed it, the other country said, "If you turn me off, you're going to have to talk to me for real."

Gritting his teeth, the Korean demanded, "Where are you?"

"Maybe I succeeded at extending the range, and I'm on the other side of Pyongyang," China replied mischievously. "Or maybe I'm right outside your door."

North twitched with the urge to check, but didn't want to risk it. The man's voice was coming through with an amount of static that said he should be at a distance, but the thick concrete walls of the bunker and the stone of the mountain around it could be interfering.

"But I know where you are," China continued. "Hiding in our room."

"I'm not hiding," North snapped.

"Oh? Didn't you lock the door just now?"

"No," he lied, making sure it was still locked, just in case the other country had figured out how to get it open.

"Mm," China hummed, sounding as convinced as all the times the Premier had told him he wasn't in while he was crammed under one of their desks. "Regardless, I still know where you are. Which means we can finally talk."

"I can hang up on you." North's thumb was already up against the switch.

"And I can wait outside all day," China breezily countered. "I'm a very patient man. I think we both know I'm at least more patient than you."

North grimaced.

"So we can either have this conversation like this, or face to face," China said. "Which would you prefer?"

He didn't have any right to give him an ultimatum in his own country. North's thumb pressed harder against the warm plastic of the switch, quivering with the desire to slide it off.

Then he dropped the radio onto the bedroll, sitting back on the floor. "There isn't any conversation to have."

"I wouldn't think so," China said. "Yet I get the distinct feeling you're avoiding me. And I have suspect the only reason you would come here in the daytime is to pack your things and move out."

North eyed his bedroll and pack. "Stop acting like you know me."

"Everyone tells me you didn't even visit while I was bedridden. I was very sad when I woke up and you weren't sleeping on the chair, waiting faithfully for me to recover."

A mournful little sniffle emerged from the radio. North bit his tongue on telling him there wasn't even a chair in his room.

"I have a job to do," he said stiffly. "I don't have time to waste worrying over idiots who get themselves shot."

"Well I do," China said, bouncing back to normal. "How's your arm, by the way?"

His provinces must have told him about it. North flexed his shoulder. The bullet wound was mostly healed, but all the strain it had taken while carrying China had torn the muscle. It would take awhile longer for it to fully mend. And he knew he would have another ache to look forward to in winter.

"Fine," he clipped.

"That's good. Interested in telling me what happened after I passed out?"

For a second, North could see how he looked on Song Dong-nyo's table, all the colour in his face drained into the bright red blood spilling from his slack lips, feel the impact of his palms on his chest, only silence inside.

"No."

China was unbothered. "Thank you for getting me home in one piece, anyway."

"You aren't home," North said tightly.

"And I still won't be going there until this war of ours is over," the other nation lightly replied. "So let's not bother flogging that dead horse again."

"You were almost the dead horse," the Korean growled at the radio. "And your debt is paid."

It had been a long time ago.

"You still aren't the one who decides that," China said. "And you seemed to at least tolerate that until our little trip."

North pulled his legs up to his chest, putting a barrier between him and the radio.

"I wasn't lying to you," the Chinese man said more seriously, softly enough that the static almost swallowed his voice. "And I wasn't trying to drive you and your brother apart. I just thought you should know, Chaoxian."

North grit his teeth at his name.

"But I don't think that's why you've been avoiding me," China said when he hadn't answered.

No. It wasn't. If it had only been about what he had told him about South, North would have just refused to talk about it, like he was refusing to think about it.

"You got shot."

"Mm, I'm aware," China said. "I have a nice little scar from it."

North drew his legs in tighter. "You took a bullet-" His arms wrapped around his knees, then dropped. "That bullet was meant for me. You shouldn't have made them target you."

"I'll point out that you wandered right into an ambush," China said, not sounding the way he should. "You were surrounded."

"Exactly." North's bandaged fingers scraped at the hard floor. "I was careless and walked into an ambush. The consequences should have been mine."

"I took a single bullet. You would've been filled with enough holes to be used as a xiao flute."

He deserved to be. He'd lost his temper like a child and stormed off. Having his organs turned into smooth tofu was what he deserved for violating military discipline. And personal discipline.

"I think it would be better for your nation if I was unconscious for a couple weeks, rather than their Countryhuman for half a year," China replied. "You were aggravated enough at missing a month. I doubt you'd feel happy missing more, especially now."

"You shouldn't care about what's better for my nation!" North snapped, lurching forward onto his hands and knees to face off with the transceiver. "You shouldn't care about how I 'feel!' You got shot, China. For- another country. What if they had shot you in the head? What would your people do then?"

"They're managing well enough without me right now. I think they could last until I recovered."

"Countryhumans shouldn't risk their lives for other Countryhumans," North growled, gripping the radio like it was the other nation's neck.

The static crackled in a pause. Then China said, "So if I'm getting this right, the reason you're mad at me is because I saved your life."

"You didn't save my life," he denied. "I would have lived."

"But that is why you're angry."

North didn't respond. He should have choked him to death after all.

"I hate to ruin- Please hold me up, our connection is fuzzy."

The Korean angrily thrust the radio at the ceiling with both hands.

"Much better," China said with approval. "I always hate to ruin someone's melodrama, but I can't help but point out that I've saved your life- or stopped you from taking injuries severe enough to send you into a coma, if you prefer- what has to be a few dozen times by now. And you've done the same for me seventy-three times, by my count. You fight very recklessly, by the way."

"I'm not reckless," North snapped. "And it's different."

"How so?"

In the thick of battle there wasn't time to think things through, only to act and react. There were only enemies and comrades. And China was a comrade. If North saw a gun aiming for his back or a knife coming for his ribs, then he had to get between them. It had gotten… easier. But it had never been a choice. China was a soldier. He had to be the same way. All the times he'd came between an enemy and North's blind spot were just reaction.

"Because I know I won't be taken out," he told him. "You knew you were. You chose to- make them shoot you."

'Comrade!'

If he wanted to warn North, he could have called from the other side of the ridge, where he would be safe. He had stood up there on purpose, trying to startle the reactionaries towards him, give them another target to shoot at.

He abruptly stood, storming to the door and throwing it open, needing to yell at China in person.

The hall was empty, so he went outside, glaring around at the clearing and forest.

"Where are you?" he demanded again.

"You're coming through clearer now," China noted. "On the hunt, are we?"

North picked a direction at random, storming off through the woods with the transceiver gripped tightly in his hand.

"So you're the only one allowed to risk himself for others?"

"I never risk myself," he snapped, looking around the bathing clearing and continuing on. "If you had been the one stupid enough to walk into an ambush, I wouldn't have done the same for you. I would have let you get shot."

"You would have?"

"Yes."

China laughed quietly.

"What?" North asked, voice tight as he started up the mountainside.

He bet he was somewhere high up, spying on him. He was going to push him off.

"Nothing," the other country answered, less staticky now. "I don't need to know you'd do the same for me anyways. Kindness solely for the sake of reciprocity bores me."

"It wasn't 'kindness,'" North growled, struggling up the steep side of Jangsan without using his hands. "It was stupidity. I didn't want you to do that."

"I don't see why that warrants giving me the cold shoulder. You know I hate the cold." China made a mock shivering sound.

"I'm going to kill you when I find you," North warned.

"Exciting. Need a hint?"

North ignored him. "I don't want to be around you and I never have. That's why I am avoiding you."

"Says the man I believe is currently scaling the side of a mountain to find me."

The Korean whipped around, looking back down the rocky ridge, eye darting over the treetops and the fields beyond them.

"Don't bother going back down," the radio said before he could. "You're getting warmer."

North bared his fangs at the transceiver. "I am not a man. I am a Countryhuman. And so are you."

"Observant as ever."

"I am a foreign Countryhuman," North reiterated, his jaw clenching as he had to use his sore arm to help him up the final metres to the mountaintop. "One who can't stand you, has pointed a gun at you seven times, and would be thrilled if you told me you were leaving tomorrow and I never had to see you ever again."

'And got you shot.'

"So why would you fucking do that?" His voice echoed down the ridgeline as he staggered up onto Jangsan's spine, the abused burns in his thighs easily bursting. "Why would you take a bullet for me?"

He hadn't meant to say it like that. Immediately he switched the radio off and almost threw it back down the mountain, only stopping himself at the last second.

North swung around, scanning both sides of the bladed peak, on high alert for the slightest bit of movement to send him careening in the opposite direction. Nothing.

He ground his teeth, then switched the radio back on.

"You missed my deep, heartfelt monologue," China said immediately. "It was very touching."

North started down the other side of the mountain, mincing his steps to avoid falling flat on his face. That would be his final fucking straw.

"Do I need some deeper reason?" China asked after he had been descending for a few minutes. "Can't it just be that I didn't want my friend to get shot?"

But why?

"For the last time," North growled, his legs aching. "I am not your friend. I am an allied. Countryhuman. There isn't any reason for you to want me to get shot less than yourself."

"Isn't there?" China lilted, the signal stronger than ever. "Our fates are linked, aren't they?"

'Ssi-bal.' His provinces must have given him the damn transcript of the General's broadcast from a few days before International Worker's Day, or North's speech on the day of.

"That wasn't about you," he muttered. "It was about the entire democratic Socialist camp."

"Ah, but the part about being united closely was about me. I believe I heard we have 'unbreakable friendly relations' and a 'militant friendship."

"That was about our countries, not us."

China's teasing made North take bigger steps so he could kill him sooner, and as a rock slipped from under his boot, he had to thrust out his arms to stop himself from going over.

"Careful, don't trip."

North showed his teeth at the piles of waste rock from the mines at the bottom of the ridge, hoping the bastard could see it from wherever he was.

"The speeches were about proletarian internationalism," he enunciated. "Because it was International Worker's Day."

"I heard that in your speech you said, and I believe I quote, 'The Korean people love the People's Volunteer Army for their self-sacrificing spirit and their unwavering bravery in the fight against American imperialism,'" China recited. "Interesting that my people are praised for their self-sacrifice, but not me."

"Pro-le-tar-i-an in-ter-nat-i-on-al-ism," North spelled out through his teeth as he neared the bottom of the slope. "Do you read Lenin?"

"And I believe you also said, 'Korea is proud to link fates with China.'"

"I never said that."

"I was lying when I said 'I believe,'" China said with amusement. "Someone from my Xinhua News Agency recorded it, and my Chen Geng and I had a listen."

North wanted to bash his head off the rocks as he immediately shoved everything else he'd said that China would have heard out of his brain.

"'Proud to link fates with the People's Republic of China,'" he hissed, face burning.

"That isn't what you said~"

Ssi-bal, he knew he should have said the full name. He had been trying to show the Chinese soldiers and reporters he was speaking to at the theatre that he saw their claim to China as the only one, like when their news referred to him unequivocally as 'Chaoxian.' And he had only been echoing his General's words about fate from before.

"If our fates are linked, then shouldn't I be equally worried about one of us getting shot?" China asked as the ground evened out under his boots. "And when you consider that I have a body double and you don't, don't the practical considerations mean it's better me than you?"

"A Countryhuman should never think it's better for them to get shot than another Countryhuman," North growled, swivelling his head as he tried to listen for his response beyond the crackling air waves.

"I did," China said softly. "Is it really so strange that someone wouldn't want you to take on any more pain?"

North opened his mouth, then managed to retort, "I haven't taken on any pain to begin with." His skin burned as he stalked through the towering piles of waste rock. "Look out for yourself because I don't need anyone to look out for me. And I am not looking out for you."

The air waves hummed.

"China?" he demanded. "China?"

Ssi-bal. He had probably just led him on a vain search. He'd probably managed to extend the damn range on these stupid radios and he was across the Taedong, or halfway to Beijing, hopefully.

North gave a frustrated growl as he switched the radio off, turning around and immediately flinching back.

China smiled at him. Beamed, wide enough to show off the yellow spots on his canines.

"Impressive, isn't it?" China asked before the Korean could say anything. "We weren't that far apart, but the fact you were underground at first had to count for something."

North blinked dumbly, not understanding what he was talking about until he darted forward to pluck the handheld radio from his hand.

"I managed to combine some of your gifted radio parts with the parts from the Yankees' long-range tech that I hadn't mangled yet," China gushed, turning the radio in his hands. "We'll need to test the limits more, but I think I've succeeded. I dealt with the battery issue, too. See this?"

He showed the handles on the side to North, then started to rapidly squeeze them, making the radio emit that grating whir.

"I took inspiration from the foot-controlled generator on the set you gave me and installed a smaller hand-controlled one in the transceivers," he explained excitedly. "I had to use a lesser battery in order to fit what I need in it without making it too bulky to be practical, so the battery life is actually shorter than it was before, but now it can be charged anywhere. Did it get hot when you were using it? Because my prototype blew up."

He thrust the device at him, tapping the bulb on the side. "I took away the sound it makes when it starts receiving, too. The light is much more subtle. And you'll notice I added a way to hide it. It could be inconvenient for a field soldier since he never knows when a comrade is going to contact him, but since these are just for you and me, it should be fine. And you'll have an excuse for not answering, so you don't have to hurt my delicate feelings. So- what do you think?"

China should be glaring at him. His glare should be filled with resentment for North's carelessness getting him shot, killing him, if only for a few minutes.

But instead he was nearly vibrating as he tapped the handheld radios together, his eyes glowing.

North looked away. "…Don't do it again."

China tipped his head. "What do you dislike most about me- my dishonesty or my tendency to say things that make you incredibly uncomfortable?"

"The second one," North muttered immediately, growing even more uncomfortable as some of the things he had said over their acquaintance crept into his mind.

'I'm with you to the end.'

He hadn't asked for that. He didn't want it. Just like he hadn't wanted him to take that bullet.

"Then I promise I'll never risk my life for yours again," China said with perfect solemnity. "I regret it deeply."

North grimaced, snatching the radio back as it was offered before barging past him, making sure to shoulder check him hard enough to be satisfied.

"You wanted to talk about the negotiations and Geoje, didn't you?" he asked bluntly, staying far enough ahead of China that he wouldn't have to look at him. "Then let's talk."

"Mm, and how did you know that?"

"My General told me." At least North wouldn't have to hi-tactically camouflage himself under his desk anymore.

Even if it did mean he was going to have to keep putting up with China.

Ssi-bal. When they got close enough to the bunker, he would have to sprint in and put his things back where they belonged. He didn't want him to know he had been right about his plan to move out.

"I suppose you weren't very happy about the Yankees pulling us around on their string again," China remarked.

North grimaced. "No."

Them and that stupid wording. Even now that Joy and Ridgeway had been replaced, and the indefinite recess fought off, they still wouldn't hand over the lists or agree to repatriate all prisoners.

"Think we'll have any future luck with the new batch?"

"Harrison is the same as Joy," North told him, eager to move away from… personal topics. "Comrade Nam Il inquired about the names missing on the newer lists, and was told they had escaped since December. But your Chang Wenjung was on them."

The man had been air-dropped over Korea in February. He'd managed to take out the helicopter that had brought him with a well-timed grenade, heading to the nearest friendly unit and allowing them to capture his Yankee handler and root out the other men that had been brought with him, most of whom had turned themselves over willingly, like SH's recent captures.

"All the Yankees are the same," China mock-sighed, following him up the mountain. "Consider me shocked and surprised."

North snorted.

As much as embarrassment was still itching under his skin, it was… good to be able to talk to the other Countryhuman again. He had- found himself annoyed that they couldn't have their debriefs the way they usually did at night in the bunker or at Jonsung complex while China was unconscious and he was not avoiding him. They were useful. A good way to summarize the information they had in a place where his every word wouldn't be examined, and he could theorize without accidentally instilling wrong conceptions in any of his officers' heads. And he didn't have to keep his wording as professional with China.

That didn't mean he liked talking with him. He shouldn't have used the word he had for it that first night he'd let him sleep in his room. He was just looking forward to being able to say he wanted to beat the Yankee generals to death with sticks without Choe Yong-gon raising his eyebrows at him.

But there were some things he wasn't looking forward to discussing. Rhee had redeclared martial law in the south and started arresting assemblymen, clearly in a lead-up to the elections he was sure to lose without interference. Now that the press were allowed in certain areas of Geoje again, they had leaked another massacre of thirty-three prisoners on April 10th to the world, painting the picture some of the escapees that had came back to the north carried of being punished for resisting screening in more detail, and definitely more than the Red Cross had been willing to share. And-

"Boatner is worse."

The man that had replaced Dodd on Geoje Island had an unpleasant reputation for training Kuomintang soldiers to fight the People's Liberation Army during the World Anti-Fascist War, when the Chinese Communists and Nationalists had still been allied against the Japanese. He had already made it clear that his predecessors' pledge to stop the abuses of prisoners was null and void by breaking up the compound and militarizing the prison camp even further- more guns, more tanks, more soldiers.

In the two weeks and a few days since the Geoje uprising had happened, there had already been more massacres. Eighty-six prisoners had been killed in a camp near Busan after being starved for over a week for refusing screening. The Yankees had said it was a handful of agents that had snuck in, but the British press had brought out the full story before the press ban was slammed back over that camp- out of the one thousand six hundred prisoners, one thousand and one hundred had actively fought, and even more had sided with them. In one of the 'anti-Communist' compounds, only supposed to hold those who had promised to kill themselves if they were sent back north or to mainland China, only three men hadn't resisted.

And it had been a hospital compound. The Yankee officer making his statement had proudly described deploying tanks and armed soldiers against men on crutches and missing limbs.

And every day there were stories of small killings making it out of Geoje Island, where Haydon Boatner ruled.

"A dog with rabies is worse than a dog with distemper," China said. "They both need to be put down."

North's jaw feathered. He would if he could.

He had been close to Geoje by the Raktong. He should have-

But he hadn't. There wasn't any point in regretting it. He just had to move forward and rescue as many of his soldiers as possible with the armistice.

"America sent in more units," he reported.

American, British, Canadian, and Greek soldiers had all been flown in to reinforce the island prison camp this week.

"En," China hummed, picking his way up the ridge. "They don't seem to care much for the Geneva Convention either."

North had been right. Even after the Geoje news spread, even when the American commander of the hospital compound had said himself that all five thousand five hundred prisoners in the entire 'anti-Communist' camp were all Communists, even now that the International Commission of the Red Cross had gently chided the Americans for 'possibly' sending POWS back to war and starving prisoners, more violations of the Convention, no one cared. No one stopped their soldiers from being sent to the camp to join in the carnage. The Red Cross and the United Nations didn't lift a finger to prevent it. And even with the admittance that America was violating international law in all those ways, they refused to listen to Korea and China telling them that they were violating it with biological warfare, too.

Enemy prisoners starving to death in North and China's camps because they didn't have enough food to feed them when they didn't have enough food to feed their own people because the prisoners' army had destroyed their fields and murdered their peasants was a crime. But doing it intentionally was fine. Because it was America.

"It's unfair, don't you think?" China asked softly. "When someone else sets rules you have to play by while they flout them. Makes you wonder why we should bother following them at all."

"Because if we didn't, they would make us pay for it," North clipped. "Only the nations with power get away with flouting the law."

"Just like only the bourgeois and the Japanese got away with it," China said. "And we both took care of that. If you don't want to get punished, there's a simple solution- don't get caught."

He murmured the last words directly in North's 'ear,' making him jolt and walk faster.

"Is that what you're planning on doing?" he asked, already regretting his decision not to move out.

"Hmm." The other nation sounded like he was considering it. "No. I intend to become one of those countries powerful enough to flout the law. And I intend to do it by the rules. Don't you think it's much more fun to beat someone at their own game when you're playing with a handicap?"

"Life isn't a game," North said, tense as he remembered America leaning over the 38th Parallel with that grin on his face. "I'm not trying to win anything other than this war."

He wasn't as greedy as China. Or greedy at all. He didn't care about being the most powerful country or being able to do what he pleased. He just wanted to be able to give his people the best life possible.

"Life shouldn't be a game," China corrected. "But if it is and you don't play, then you'll lose."

"You can't lose if you don't play," North countered. "And I will not play America's games."

He would aid the rest of the democratic camp in the way they were aiding him, but he wanted nothing to do with grand alliances and risky moves. He had seen the stress it brought CCCP.

"Then I suppose you'll have to become powerful enough that you can deny your stage cue," China said after a moment. "Or turn, if you will."

That North did have every intention of. Like he had told South Hamgyong- America would still be out there when they had won and Korea was Reunified. So would the enemies of the Revolution. Rebuilding was important, but building up Korea's military might was going to be even more so. No matter how many new houses or factories they built, it would mean nothing if America decided to darken their skies again. It was why the foreign country didn't want him building airfields- so he couldn't defend his people.

But North would. It was unfair that America could freely violate international law while Korea got attacked and embargoed for fighting a civil war his government hadn't even started, and China was embargoed just for helping. North didn't want to flout the law like the Yankee- if he did it would only make his people more of a target. He only needed to become strong enough that they wouldn't be punished for any more made-up crimes, or the very real one of wanting to be free.

Though no matter how strong Korea became, no matter how impenetrable North made his country…

America still had the atom bomb.

—

China watched his friend tilt his head to the side, his single eye narrowing. He would say his poorly hidden expression was one of his usual anger mixed with a little dread. But there was a thoughtfulness in there, too.

'Thinking about how to get off stage, no doubt.'

Unfortunately for his friend, that wasn't something one could do. Life wasn't a game- it was a play. And they were all chained to the stage.

But he had no doubt North would think of a way to go off script. He might not have very much (or possibly any) artistic creativity, but China knew if it came to his people, Korea could surely think of something.

He took advantage of his distraction to slink around to his seeing side and ask, “By the way, before we get too into our debrief- did I happen to die?”

North stiffened, his eye darting to him.

“…No,” he said after a moment.

China hummed, dropping back again. “That’s good.”

His friend looked away, shoulders tense. He only looked back over as they crested the mountain, standing on top of the narrow spine with a full view of the plains sprawling around them like a great green and gold cat. One that had been thoroughly peppered with birdshot.

North’s gaze lingered over the right side of his chest, then darted away as he plunged down the hill.

The Chinese country was relieved to see no pity in his eye or on his face. Guilt yes, but no pity. And if he could manage the ocean of guilt his friend felt for his people, then his guilt over him was also manageable.

He wondered between the two of them, which hated the idea of being pitied more. North, most like. China had played roles meant to be pitied before- as much as he disdained them, he had performed them when necessary, though he was thrilled they never would be again. He knew his friend well enough by now to know he could never bring himself to even act in a way that drew pity, even if it brought gains with it.

If he had met him back then, the Korean country likely would have faced him with cold professionalism and a steely veneer, even more severe than two Novembers ago. He would have wanted to avoid being treated like a pitiable child or refugee.

And if the other one were here now…

China laughed silently. Well, then he wouldn't be. And be definitely wouldn't have a new 'souvenir' across from his heart. Or a whole host of them over his body.

He eyed North. From this angle he could just see the sharp curve of his hunger-pang cheek and a sliver of his eye whenever he turned his head to make sure China wasn't creeping up behind him.

Hmmm. Even if he wished he'd know his friend sooner, it was probably for the best they hadn't met back then. China would have had to treat him with respect, not wanting to offend his pride, which would surely be even easier to do since North would need to compensate for being in a young body. And considering that he had looked so cute in that little photograph of his that China had wanted to cut the other one out of the picture and make it vanish into his sleeve, it would likely be very difficult for him to resist offending him just a bit. The Chinese Countryhuman might be a good actor, but if North's cheeks had been even half as squishy as his brother's, it would have been near impossible.

North twitched to look over his shoulder again, then looked cross with himself.

"Get up here," he ordered, pointing to his side, likely paranoid that China was considering breathing in his 'ear' again.

Smart. He was.

He smiled, drifting up. His friend had pointed to his seeing side, but he slid up on his blind one, and the Korean didn't protest, only gave him another wary side-eye, like he was waiting for him to say something.

China wouldn't. He had told his friend what he knew. The rest was up to him. Even if what he'd surely decided was unfortunate for his own sake, the South wasn't his country and he wasn't his brother. There was only one Korea he was invested in.

“Did you get your Choe Jong-ok where she needed to go?” he asked, enjoying the little look of surprise and something deeper his friend gave him, the same one he wore every time China remembered one of his people’s names or something he’d said about them.

China knew how it felt.

“Yes,” North muttered, looking down. His banded face softened, just slightly.

“Good,” the Chinese country said, pleased.

He might’ve had to head off on a little side quest if his friend had had to leave one of his people behind for him, even if she was already dead. And he was on thin ice with his Xiao Mao as it was.

Knowing North had somehow managed to accomplish his mission and carry him all the way from the south likely while starving and in pain made China want to paddle his feet, though he kept his footing in steady rhythm with his friend’s.

Of course, he did feel bad that he had to put him through that. He’d been trying to spare him pain after all. But it was still exciting.

China’s gaze slid to the handheld radio North had unthinkingly buckled to his belt, lips curling.

Overall, this war wasn’t a good thing, obviously. China would have chosen to meet his friend back then instead of his boring brother and instead of now, for both of their people’s sakes. No matter how hard it would be to resist pinching his cheeks. But since things had happened this way…

He leaned over slightly, and North slammed his ear slit into his shoulder, twisting himself awkwardly to glare at him. Smiling innocently, he leaned away.

China was also proud to finally link fates with the right Korea.

Once again, I try to do through technological research for this time, but not for China's radios. He can just do that. Is it realistic? I don't know, but he did it.

Something 'funny'- the person to suggest voluntary repatriation at the meetings for drafting the Geneva Convention was the Austrian delegate. The British, Soviet, and American delegates said no, and so did everyone else because obviously it's common sense that POWS shouldn't have the option to give up their rights as a POW because they could be tricked or threatened into losing that protected status, and there isn't any way to prove that they weren't, or that they weren't forced into choosing to stay (or it was common sense until America decided they didn't like it two years later). The only one who agreed with him was the Israeli delegate. I wonder... why a nation of settlers would want to be able to let POWs 'choose' where to go... It's almost like they have to recruit people to populate their fake country...

If North was a normal human, he would be the type of man to ghost his girlfriend of five years that he lives with. They would have one bad argument where either he hurt her feelings by accident or she said something that made him feel too vulnerable, and she would come home to find he had taken his clothes and nothing else, and she would never see him again. Avoidant. He would advise 'If you don't like something unnecessary (like personal relationships), leave,' but as a Countryhuman he can't walk away. Unfortunately for him.

The Wrong Brother

1938

Stand, pace, sit, stand, pace, sit.

South was starting to feel like North pacing the floor of the-

"No, no, get it together, South." He slapped his cheeks. "No thinking of stuff like that when you need to be calm."

Calm, he was calm. Why wouldn't he be calm? It wasn't like he was going to be meeting the only other Countryhuman he'd ever met or anything. Well, the only other one that wasn't-

Not thinking about it!

Stand, pace-

Door!

Hearing the polite knock, he shot for the door of his suite, then stopped. Did he get it? Did he wait for someone else to? He reached a hand out, shaking.

'Three, two-' He yanked it open, blinking at the person on the other side.

He blinked back, tilting his head and smiling warmly. "Korea, I presume?"

"I, uh, yes!" South realized he'd been slightly hunched over, gripping the doorknob, and shot up. "Korea! That's me!"

The name still felt clunky, even when the members of the Provisional Government had been using it for the past couple years.

'South, I'm South,' he wanted to say to them. 'I'm only half of Korea! My North is out there!'

He thought. He hoped. He prayed. 'Please.'

He had told them. He'd told them he was missing North and he hadn't been alone in there at first. He didn't think they believed him. They wouldn't call him South. They thought being locked up for so long had made him go weird.

But Kim Ku had promised to look. He'd promised to find North. He'd promised to bring him back to South like North had promised to come back. Hopefully Japan's invasion of China wasn't distracting him.

China!

The man was still standing patiently in the doorway. "I brought gifts." He hefted the bamboo basket in his hand.

"Um." South looked both ways down the hall. "W-Where's Mister Pak?"

"I thought we could talk alone." China was still smiling. "Is that alright?"

"Um…" Was it alright? He wasn't really allowed to talk to people. If Japan found out he was here…

But the Provisional Government had set this up, and one said he knew China, sort of, so this was probably fine, right?

"Of course," he said, trying to sound calm. "Yeah."

He continued to stand in the doorway. China's smile widened.

"Oh, right, sorry." South flushed, ducking inside with the other man following.

Maybe the years locked up had made him go weird.

China laughed, but for some reason it didn't sound like he was laughing at South. "No need for apologies."

He held the gift basket out, and South blanked. Etiquette, etiquette. Korean etiquette or Chinese? He'd been taught Chinese etiquette for this specifically, but now it was all fleeing his head like rabbits and he couldn't remember if accepting with both hands was just a Korean thing or not and oh God China was going to think he was rude and leave-

"Don't worry about etiquette, by the way," China said airily. "You can take the gifts out now, too."

South sagged in relief, taking the basket with both hands, the way he took stuff from Kim Ku and the others. After a panicked second of hesitation, he added a small bow. The men said since he was their Countryhuman, he didn't have to bow to them, but China was another country, so he should probably show proper respect.

"Thanks. I, uh, got you something, too, by the way."

Well, the Provisional Government had. He couldn't really go shopping or anything.

He set the basket down, heading to the desk, his hands shaking as he pulled out a black lacquer box to present to China, who took it with both hands. Chinese etiquette? Or was he just better at foreign manners than South?

China opened the box, examining the glossy smoking pipe in it. He uttered a soft laugh that made South nervous.

"Do you, um-" He tried to make his swallow as quiet as possible. "Do you like it?"

"Did you make it?" the man asked, examine the pipe.

"Um, no." South rubbed his arm. "B-But it's briar."

Why did he stutter? He'd never stuttered with North, but it just kept happening with everyone else.

He nervously watched China while he ran his finger down the curved stem.

"It's lovely," he said after a moment, smiling genuinely. "I actually needed a new pipe. I'm sure I'll get good use from it."

South sagged with relief. "Oh, good. Um, you can sit."

China sat at the small table by the paper-covered window, blinking at him, and the Korean quickly realized he should sit, too, practically throwing himself into the chair across from him.

"I asked your friends what you liked before I got here." The other man reached into the basket, pulling out a few bottles. "They said you fancy sweet drinks and cakes, so I brought you some plum juice, chrysanthemum tea, and some extra sweet huangjiu rice wine. And a red bean bun, of course."

He set the little package in front of South, who eagerly pulled it close. He preferred the little European cakes he was sometimes given, and the rush of sweetness that came with them, but he would never turn down food. It was still a novelty, getting to eat whenever and almost whatever he wanted.

"Thanks," he said, biting into the still-warm bun.

"I'll pour us drinks." China went to the glass-faced drink cabinet of the parlour, coming back with crystal glasses.

South watched him, chewing on his bun. The man looked older than him, physically twenty-sixish, maybe, though who knew how old he really was. Japan had looked maybe thirty-five, but he'd actually been-

'Not. Thinking. About. It.'

China wasn't wearing as nice of clothes as he had expected. While South was wearing white silk with a blue jeogori over it, patterned with darker embroidery, the man was only dressed in a bluish uniform and hat, the brim of which covered his flag design. It didn't even look like an officer's uniform.

He was tall, a lot taller than South. And slender, with long limbs. The Korean was kind of jealous, sitting up straighter in his chair.

He was sort of jealous of his face, too. His complexion looked really nice, and he had high cheekbones, even if his cheeks looked a little hollow, like Nor- like hollow cheekbones looked. But on an adult, it made him look less malnourished and more dramatic.

South poked his own round cheek, feeling it squish. He guessed he was just happy that he wasn't starving anymore, but he wished he could be well-fed and pretty, like China.

"What drink would you like to share?" the man asked, swishing back over. And he was graceful. Some things really were unfair.

South almost pointed at the plum juice before his finger curled in.

That would be way too immature, right? The Provisional Government people always drank alcohol with each other and with him when they visited. Alcohol was a business drink and this was… business? He thought it was, anyway.

So he pointed at the rice wine, even though he didn't really like the way alcohol burned, or how even the sweet stuff was still kind of bitter.

Actually, if the man had asked the Provisional Government about the stuff he liked, he was surprised they hadn't told him he didn't like alcohol. He'd gotten hungover once and it had sucked. Like really sucked.

China examined him for a minute, making him nervous, then smiled, setting South at ease as he poured them each a glass. He had a nice smile, warm and friendly.

He had called the Provisional Government South's friends, and that felt good. South had never had any friends. Maybe China could be…

"Cheers." China held up his glass and South clinked his against it with only a few seconds of panic.

"Yeah, ch-cheers," he said, bracing himself before taking a sip of the rice wine.

'Eugh.' It burned, like he'd known it would, though he did his best to hide it.

“Do you like it?” China asked, watching him.

“Yeah, it’s really good.” South mustered a smile. “Thank you.”

The man smiled. “I’m sure you’ll get as much use out of it as I will my gift.”

“I will.” He could just give the rest to Mister Pak as thanks for standing outside his door all day. He took another drink to be polite.

“You’re not worried about poison?”

“Um.” South blinked, holding his drink in his mouth. “Wha?”

China’s lips curled over the rim of his own glass. “A joke.” He took a little sip, which meant it probably had just been that.

“Oh. Haha,” the Korean quickly laughed, taking another drink. It didn’t taste sweet at all, and he kind of wanted to ask the man if he was sure he’d gotten extra sweet.

But everyone had stressed that he had to be really polite. China was powerful and could be a big help against Japan (and they were kind of crashing in his country). So South made himself take another drink without making a face.

“So.” China swirled the deep golden liquid in his glass. “What’s your favourite colour?”

South paused at the random question. No one had ever asked him that before. Did he even have a favourite colour?

The sky above as North hustled him up a tree, the scrap he could see out his barred window, the wide expanse that had made him burst out sobbing when he had been pulled out of the cargo trunk, only setting foot in China for a brief second before collapsing to his knees, overwhelmed.

‘Free, finally free.’

“I guess blue,” he said shyly. “Sky blue.”

“Why?”

“Uh, I just… like it,” South murmured, fidgeting with his glass. “I… didn’t get to see the sky much until recently.”

“Courtesy of our mutual antagonist, I suppose.”

He nodded quietly.

China didn’t poke anymore at that, asking instead, “Do you prefer silk or cotton?”

South was more confident on that one. “Silk, definitely.”

China kept asking him questions, nothing really important, just things like:

“What’s your favourite food?” “Those little French cakes with jam.”

“When it comes to meals, do you feel flavour or presentation is more important?” “Uh, flavour? But I think it needs to look nice, too, or you won’t want to taste it.”

“How do you like your tea?” “Um, with honey.”

“What do you think of Trotsky?” “Who?”

“Something I wish I could say.”

It was actually kind of fun. South hadn’t really thought about the answers to most of them before, even though so many of them were mundane. China wasn’t as scary as he thought he would be, aside from that little poison comment. South liked the way he smiled while he talked, genuinely invested in what he was saying.

“What do you think of the arts?”

South brightened. “I love art! Mister Ri brought me a few. They’re on the wall.”

He pointed to the landscapes and still lifes- Mount Kumgang, Seoul, Mount Jiri, the Taedong River, Paektusan- little snippets of a country he had still never seen, aside from glimpses out a window and while being ferried across the border. Places he hoped to see with North someday.

China had seemed to brighten, too. “Do you paint?”

“Um, no, but I want to try.” South rubbed his arm. “Mister Ri promised to send me some paints and stuff. And- And I like to sing and dance.”

That… was a little embarrassing to admit. But he felt like the man had almost seemed… disappointed in his answer.

“Show me.”

“I, uh… I don’t think I’m drunk enough for that yet.”

China laughed, making South flush with accomplishment. “Well then tell me when you are.”

South poured another glass, wanting to get drunk now to gain the courage, even if it gave him a hangover tomorrow. He’d only ever sang for North before. Maybe if he did it for China, he could be bold enough to sing for Kim Ku and Mister Pak and the others. It might help take their minds off the invasion.

Should he ask about that? Was it rude to question your ally about the fact that he was being invaded as they spoke?

South was mulling this as China leaned over the table.

“So, I’ve heard a little rumour.”

“About what?”

“I hear that the Korean Countryhuman is waging a resistance war against Japan,” the man said casually, trailing a finger over the table, examining it for dust. “Leading armies in Manchuria and Korea.” He cut his eyes to him. “Is that true?”

South's eyes widened. "Me? Fighting in a war?"

That sounded more like something North would do, and for a moment, hope flickered in his heart.

But no. His brother wasn't really the type of person to lead armies. Army commanders should be charismatic and confident, and while North was definitely the second one, he was too gloomy and quiet to make people listen to him.

'Only you.' Only him. And it had lost him his brother.

It was something his brother would want to do, not something he was capable of.

But still South asked, "Where did you hear that?"

"Just around," China said idly. "But I suppose my information was wrong. Pity."

The hope curled up and died. Of course, it couldn't be North. If North were out there leading armies, he would have come back to rescue South. He would have come back even if he was alone. The only alternative was that he was…

'Maybe that would be better.'

South was horrified at the thought, shoving it away with all his might, taking another swig of not-so-extra sweet huangjiu to take the edge off the bitter voice. It hadn't meant it.

"Do you have any intentions to fight?" China asked casually, thankfully distracting him.

South laughed nervously. "I'm not… really a 'fighting' person. That's what Mister Kim Ku and the others are doing."

"I see." China took a sip from his drink, which was somehow still mostly full.

The Korean twiddled his thumbs in his lap, unable to tell what the other man was thinking. "So… are you saying that you fight?" He looked at the blue uniform with new eyes.

China smiled. “Occasionally.”

South couldn’t imagine that. Being alone with Japan was bad enough, but being on a battlefield with hundreds, maybe thousands of people trying to kill you?

“But isn’t that, well… scary?”

The dark-red-skinned man laughed lightly, taking another sip of his wine. “I suppose it might be, if I were afraid of dying.”

Blinking, South asked, “You’re not afraid to die?”

“I have many goals. Living for nothing has never been one of them.”

There was something sharp this time about China’s smile, and his eyes almost seemed to… glow. The intensity in them made South lean back a little, suddenly nervous.

“Victory is,” China said, his voice low. “Liberation is. For all of us.”

“Oh,” South said, unsure of what else he could say. “Well… I really hope you win, then.”

China examined him, his eyes almost seeming to pierce into South’s soul.

Then he sat back, his voice light again. “I will. More wine?”

South let him refill his glass. That had been… weird. He thought. Maybe other Countryhumans were just like that.

Aside from the little bit of weirdness, he liked China. He made jokes and told little stories as they ate the steaming bowls of rice noodles that Mister Pak brought them, and even plucked one of his pork slices up to place it in South’s bowl.

And he looked him in the eyes. Even if China had… kind of an intense stare, it was still nice to have someone look directly at him.

The Provisional Government men were always bowing their heads and dodging his face, even Mister Ri Dong-nyeong, the Chairman. South knew it was polite, but it always made him think of those nurses, pretending he didn't exist as they treated his bleeding back. And Japan. The way he would stare through you instead of at you.

The only one that had ever looked him in the eyes before was North. And even if it made him squirmy to have someone that wasn't his brother stare at him so directly, it was still… nice.

And when South finally got drunk enough that he was filled with the urge to sing, China joined in, teaching him a Chinese song, something about an international… something. It was fun, anyway. More fun than South had had in... a long time. Maybe ever. Though of course he wished his brother were here.

God, he wished he could do this with North. Get drunk and stuff themselves on noodles and cake, sing at the top of their lungs and fall into the big soft bed and sleep with their backs pressed against each other like they always had, except this time uninjured and full and happy and together-

"When the tears start to flow, that's usually the time to put down the bottle."

South was vaguely aware of his fingers being unclasped from the neck of the huangjiu before he could pour the last of it into his glass, and someone straightening him up before he slumped forward into them.

"North," he murmured into their chest, clutching at his cotton shirt.

"Is that someone I should know?" China asked.

Right. Not North. North was still gone. He had left.

Suddenly, South wanted to tell China that. He wanted to tell him all of it, the beatings, the shack, Japan, the March First Movement, that small cement room where he had- North. He thought this man with his sharp eyes would believe him. He could tell him it was awful that his brother had left him and reassure him that he was alive, that he would come back.

But his tongue was too tired to do more than mumble an incoherent response, and all he wanted was to curl up and sleep. The bed felt soft as China helped him into it, tucking the blanket around him.

He would tell him in the morning, when he wouldn't embarrass himself. Maybe he could convince the man to stay for a bit and keep him company. They could sing more and maybe he could help South learn how to paint. Hadn't Mister Pak said that the Chinese Nationalists might move to Chongqing if Japan took any more land? That meant China would be nearby. That meant they could see each other more often.

South could finally have a friend.

When he woke up in the morning, his head was pounding from what was only his second real hangover, and his mouth tasted like gravel.

And he was alone.

—

1952

South wasn't a bad person. He knew he wasn't a bad person, no matter how much Kangwon wanted to convince him he was.

'There's only so many bad choices-'

'It wasn't bad!' South cried, maybe out loud as he slammed his hands on the table he was kneeling beside. 'I had to do it, I had to!"

Gangwon had made him do it. If he'd just came back when South had called, if he hadn't deafened himself like a crazy commie, if he'd just renounced North, he wouldn't have had to do it.

South wasn't a bad person. He felt guilty about it. He couldn't even walk by the house the province was being kept in now without feeling a little stab of it, he had to go the other way the rare times he went outside or he'd get so upset he had to turn around and go home and drink until he forgot what it felt like to have the impact of the whip shudder up his arm, those cold eyes boring into him, full of-

Japan had never felt guilty. He had never felt guilty, not after breaking South's ribs, not after dropping North's mangled body on the floor after he was done with him or tearing his leg out of its socket, not after locking him away and stripping the flesh off his back. He'd just stared through him with those cold empty eyes as South cried and wailed and pleaded for it to end, his arm rising and falling, rising and falling and it wasn't anything like when South had done it to Gangwon. He wasn't anything like Japan.

'You could have fooled me.'

"North fooled you!" South didn't remember picking up his glass, but suddenly it was shattering against the parlour wall, shards of glass spraying the room. "North tricked you all into thinking he's kind and caring and good and I'm bad!"

'He said you were kind.'

"You're liars!" South screamed at the stain the whisky dregs had left on the wallpaper. "You lied to me! You never did anything but lie to me!"

Just like North.

Even when he'd been so nice, bringing them food and company and that scarf that Hwanghae had thrown away as soon as she could. And they'd still hated him. They didn't have a right to stare at him the way they did when he'd removed their silent Commands or say the things they did until he Commanded them to stop. They acted like he'd done something unforgivable, but they already treated him like he had before it, so what was he supposed to do? Why should he keep being nice, why should he just give them a slap on the wrist when they would hate him no matter what, and he knew that if their positions were reversed, North would have done the exact same thing. Worse.

He was the violent one, not South. He was the one that liked hurting people. South didn't. He didn't, and he knew he didn't because he felt bad about it. Even after the provinces had been so mean, even after Gangwon had abandoned him, even after South Chungcheong had betrayed him, he still felt bad. He wasn't looking forward to punishing the Communist provinces and he didn't want to have to Command the ones here to stop being mean to him. He wanted them to not want to be mean to him. He wanted to be nice, to be friends, to be family the way they were supposed to be. He wanted to say sorry, but why should he when they would just tell him that sorry didn't fix anything?

Why did he have to feel this way when he knew he shouldn't? Why had those blisters on his palms scarred and left ugly little marks when he knew Japan's never had?

South wasn't a bad person. He knew he wasn't a-

There was a sound outside, and he scrambled up- when had he fallen back to the floor?- heart slamming against his burned ribs.

'North.' He'd heard about what South had done and he'd come here to punish him for it and he was right outside-

"Don't be stupid," South muttered to himself, slapping his cheeks. It didn't sober him up, but it did knock some sense into his bleary brain.

There was no way North or his commies could've made it into the heart of Busan. The martial law that Rhee had slammed down on the southern counties again would just make it even harder. The only people on the streets right now were the ones that had permission.

America, maybe.

He was exhausted and felt sick, but he staggered down the hall anyways. If he didn't want his friend to question his Commanding of Gangwon, then he had to be obedient. If America wanted to drink at two in the morning, South did, too. If America wanted to take him to see the prisoners being driven to the camps in trucks and forced out at bayonet point, South did, too. And if he wanted to watch a movie when all South wanted to do was curl up in a ball and drunk until he forgot the smooth heft of leather and the shock through his arm, then no he didn't. He wanted to watch a movie.

Because if he didn't, America might start to get suspicious. He knew he was already visiting Gangwon. He'd seen him doing it late at night as he stared vacantly out the window, searching for his brother's shadow in the dark.

Luckily South had Commanded the province not to tell him about China, or that South had lied to him, no matter what.

South knew his friend wouldn't leave. Not forever. He would always come back for Korea. It was why this was all necessary.

But he didn't want to risk him leaving at all. Even if his soldiers stayed, he didn't want to find out if he would, or if he'd go to Taiwan, start watching movies with him and buying him gifts and calling him 'kid.'

He didn't want to know if he would choose Red China over him, the way China had chosen North over him.

South grit his teeth as he leaned against the wall, trying not to slide down it.

He couldn't believe Red China was really here on the ground after all. What did it mean? He knew the guy was a soldier, but he had been a Nationalist soldier, hadn't he? He shouldn't like Communists now. He shouldn't be a Communist now.

South had had a momentary flicker of hope that it wasn't the same Countryhuman. That civil war had been messy after all. There had been like, ten. Maybe the one he'd met had died. Maybe he'd meant to come back and visit South, but the Chinese commies had killed him.

But no. America had let him look at a newspaper from the trial last year. South would recognize those slanted eyes and little smile anywhere. Or at least on any China.

It was him. The China that had drank with him, laughed with him, made him think maybe he'd finally had a friend, that he wouldn't be so alone, then left him without even a goodbye was the same Red China fighting at his brother's side.

It didn't even matter if he was puppeteering him for the Soviets because South knew North wouldn't take that lying down. He might have left to be with CCCP, abandoning South in Seoul again, but he hadn't been nice to the man. He'd been rude and bossy and aggressive, the way he always was. He had to be that way with China, too.

So why was he here? Surely he didn't need to do the puppeteering himself. He had to have… people for that. America was in Korea, but that was because he was South's friend and had been since before the war. China didn't even know North. He had known South.

And he had left him.

South had been sad at the time, he might've even cried. Okay, he did cry. He'd nursed his plum juice and cried like a baby once a day had passed and Mr. Ri told him China had said he had no interest in allying with them. But now…

It filled him with that sick dark feeling, the same one that would bubble up when Japan left without even looking at him, only paying attention to his brother, or when North had told him the reason Japan had let him out of his isolation for a day to take that photo for the paper was to lure him out.

He hadn't wanted to be around Japan, and he didn't want to be around China. He was a commie, probably just as crazy and bloodthirsty as the rest of them-

'I have many goals. Living has never been one of them.'

-but that knife was still lodged in his ribs, twisting. Maybe if China had been friends with him, South could have stopped him from being brainwashed into being a Communist, the same way he could've stopped North if he'd just stayed. But he would never know because for some reason the other Countryhuman had decided he wasn't good enough. It hadn't even taken him more than a few hours to realize what everyone else eventually did- that South was broken inside, that something was wrong with him, wrong enough that people would choose North- violent, rude, disobedient North- over him, no matter how nice and fun he was.

And his brother had left. For 'more important things.'

So why, as South finally managed to reach the front door and throw it open, did he have to feel disappointed to see it really wasn't him out there?

It was a man. Wesson had him pinned to the ground on the other side of the gate, while Smith was showing Ku Cheol-moo some sort of card.

"What'sh… going on?" South slurred, blinking as the bright sunlight stabbed his eyes.

"Nothing, sir," Seok Ki-cheol said coldly from his place beside the door. "Go back inside."

But the man on the ground had seen him, and shouted, "Look, he's right there! Just show him the damn thing. If he drops dead, you can arrest me then."

"You will be arrested regardless," Ku Cheol-moo shot at him. "You are violating martial law by being on this street without proper papers."

"I have my identity card," the man griped. "I told you that the only reason I'm here is to deliver Mr. Korea's mail. Have you tried to get a permit? If it was something important, by the time I got one, the letter could be out of date. And guess whose head would roll for it?"

Were they executing people for late mail or was he just being dramatic?

If they were, South guessed it was necessary. Messing with the news could mean someone was a commie, trying to sabotage the flow of information, or something. Someone would have to investigate at least.

"Look, I don't even know what the letter says," the postman huffed in exasperation. "You do. If it's a threat or whatever, come to the station and I'll let you look through our records to find out who sent it. If it's not, then let me up."

A letter? Maybe it was from one of the countries whose armies were here, wanting to finally talk. Or just another nation that wanted to see how he was doing.

"Can I see it?" South asked, interested.

Seok Ki-cheol looked like he might say no, but Ku Cheol-moo glanced at the card again, then said, "It should be acceptable."

At Smith's nod, Seok Ki-cheol went to grab it.

"Good," the postman said. "Now get this American off me."

Ku Cheol-moo turned cold eyes to him. "You're still under arrest for travelling without the proper permits and possible Communist sympathies."

"Comm-?" The man's face paled and he started to struggle under Wesson, his annoyance changing to fear. "No! No, please, I was just trying to do my job, I have no idea what's in that letter, please-!"

Wesson dragged him up, shoving him at the other American gate guards, who slapped handcuffs around his wrists.

"You can't do this!" The postman's voice went high as he was dragged away. "I have family!"

"Rest assured, they'll be investigated as well." Ku Cheol-moo turned on his heel as the man was hauled off, still screaming.

South paid no attention. He'd be fine. If he really wasn't a commie, he'd be let go once they investigated. And if he was…

Well. He would get what he deserved.

The Countryhuman snatched the card out of Seok Ki-cheol's rough hand, but froze as he saw what was on it.

He didn't recognize the square or the tower in the background. But he knew what the red star on top of it was. The same one on the medal CCCP had worn pinned to the shirt underneath his jacket when he came here, and that South had confiscated from South Pyongan's brother's hat before giving it to her. The one echoed on his own brother's flag.

The Soviet star.

His eyes flicked to the word on the front. He couldn't read it, but the language was vaguely familiar from some of the books in his borrowed house. Russian.

"Is this from the Soviet Union?" He tried to smooth his pulse and not sound nervous. Or maybe he should sound nervous. He let his brows furrow, just in case.

"Yes," Smith clipped, emerald eyes boring into him.

They all were, watching him without seeing him, only wanting to see what he would do.

South switched to holding the card by the corner, pinched between two fingers like he was afraid it might bite him. "Can you go get America for me? Please. He should know about this."

Wesson's blue eyes flashed with approval. Slowly, Smith nodded.

"Thanks." South smiled, turning around and taking the postcard inside.

None of them tried to stop him.

Inside, he went to turn the card around, but stopped. He should wait until America was here.

He went to the kitchen, setting it on the table. Then he moved it to the counter, trying to make it look like he'd tossed it there without caring what it said.

But it would be weird to not be a little curious, right? Maybe it would look like he was trying too hard to be unsuspicious.

He wasn't suspicious. He had no idea why he would be receiving mail from the Soviet Union, unless it had some sort of tiny bomb attached to it or was covered in one of the weird powders South Pyongan had tricked him into testing her brother's hat for.

But what if North was trying to frame him for something? What if he'd realized South was too smart to let him use Communist tricks on him to make him hate America, so he'd turned to trying to make America hate him?

His friend would have to know he'd never work with CCCP. But he was really… Not afraid. America wasn't afraid of anything, he didn't think. But he was paranoid about Communists. For good reason. But no matter how good the reason was, South still didn't want to end up being investigated with that post guy. Being in a cold, dark cell, on a cement floor just like-

Yeah, no. He didn't want to let North set him up for anything.

South picked the postcard up, moving it to the table again, setting it down carefully far enough away from him that he would have to reach for it. That was good, he thought. He'd just have to stare at it fearfully when America walked in. Easy to do. He'd tell his friend he was too scared to touch it, in case the commies were trying to use the germ warfare they'd been accusing America of using on them.

South heaved a sigh as he slumped into the chair, burying his face in his arms as he waited.

He wasn't a bad person, he reminded himself, the way he had been since that day. He knew he wasn't. Bad people didn't feel awful about the stuff they had to do. They just did it. North hadn't been torn up when he'd killed those people.

It wasn't like South thought it was wrong that he'd killed their guards. They'd been trying to hurt them. They had hurt them. That second guy had been going to-

They had deserved to die. He knew that. But he still thought North should have felt bad about it, or at least felt a little guilt. It wasn't normal not to. Gangwon would heal and be perfectly fine, but the memory of punishing him still made South feel sick after all.

He... He wasn't saying North was bad. He was just brainwashed. He was South's brother and he loved him and this wasn't about him and whether or not he was a good person. It was about South, and he was.

Punishing Gangwon had been necessary, for him, for the province, for all of them, for Korea. It had been necessary and he hadn't liked doing it and he knew if he hadn't the province would just find some other way to rebel, some way to help North, so why did he keep thinking of how it had felt to be locked in that room, his knees grinding into that man's blood, his back tearing open as the Japanese watched him, as Japan's arm rose and fell over and over again until he lost count and knowing that there was an end in sight hadn't stopped him from begging for it to stop, please stop.

South shot up, grabbing the postcard and flipping it around, needing to feel something in his hand that wasn't warm leather.

The word on the front was Russian, but the ones on the back were in carefully written Korean. He stared dully at them.

'Please take care of my brother.'

There was no signature. If there was a return address, it was on the envelope his guards had kept. But South knew who it had to be from.

Kangwon. Telling him to look after Gangwon.

The words stared up at him mockingly. 'Please take care of my brother.'

South felt the smooth heft of the whip, the impact up his arm, the burn of the blisters on his hands and down his sides as they broke open, heard the disgusting choking gasps and was crushed under the weight of those silent, hateful stares as he punished Gangwon, as he flayed his back open the same way Japan had once flayed his open.

An awful pressure formed in his stomach, surging up into his throat and into his mouth like vomit, until it burst out of his lips.

And he started to laugh.

South's body shook with it, from his shoulders to his toes, the feeling too big to contain, and he knew why America always hit him when he laughed now. He slapped at the tabletop, pounded it with all his might and drummed his feet against the floor as he threw his head back at the ceiling, howling long piercing shrieks of laughter that sounded and felt more like screams and it still wasn't enough to get the feeling out.

It was funny! It was really funny that Kangwon thought he had any right to ask him to take care of Gangwon when he had turned himself into a cripple forever just to stay away from South, when just like those prisoners he could have just renounced North, could have at least pretended to renounce North, and everything would have been fine, when Kangwon had lied about Hwanghae and lied about South Pyongan and lied about seeing him as Korea and gone running back to North as soon as he could.

Because why should he? Why should he take care of Gangwon when Kangwon hadn't even taken the time to add to take 'take care of yourself' or that he hoped he was okay? Why should he take care of Kangwon's brother when his own brother had left him to die and never even tried to rescue him? Why should he take care of the provinces or the arrested assemblymen or the prisoners of war when no one would take care of him?

South laughed and laughed, slamming his knees off of the table and rattling it so hard that the vase of peonies toppled over and shattered on the floor.

The ceramic crunched under America's heel as he trod over the powder-pink flowers.

"Hey, kid," he said chipperly, not even questioning why South was seizuring like he'd been cursed. "Heard ya got a letter. Must'a been a funny one. Keen on sharing?"

South pushed out of his chair with a scraping noise, so hard that it toppled back, and threw himself at America, grabbing onto his jacket, clinging to it with all his strength as he howled into his broad chest.

He wanted him to wrap his arms around him the way he had the night South had his breakdown back when he'd been so naïve, to hold him tight until he felt safe again. He couldn't breath, he was drowning in his laughter, drowning the way he had been for years and he didn't just want to cling to him like flotsam, he wanted him to pull him out of the freezing water and back onto dry land.

America put one hand on his shoulder, but the other reached over his hand, plucking the postcard off the table.

"Huh," he said. "Looks like the nurse has Big Red running mail for him. Guess we'll have to figure out how that happened."

South's shoulders shook as he slid down America until his knees smacked into the floor, and he was gasping into his stomach.

America sighed. "I'm glad you're starting to find the humour in things, kid, but you've got forty-two seconds before this gets too weird for me."

South gripped tight to the back of his suit, pressing his face into his waist, peaks of uncontrollable laugher spilling from his lips. He could taste blood in his raw throat and yearned to wash it away almost as much as he yearned for America to take his hands off his shoulders and put them around him, as much as he yearned for his brother to come back and hold him the way he'd used to, as much as he wished that this was all over already.

It was unfair. Unfair that Kangwon would ask him to take care of Gangwon when North hadn't asked anyone to take care of him, when there hadn't been anyone to take care of him because his brother had left him all alone.

He couldn't breathe and he didn't want to. He wanted to run out of breath, to choke on his own blood and 'die' so he could wake up when North was defeated and everything could go back to normal.

But he didn't even know what normal was. Normal was him and his brother and no one else, no war or politics or more important things. Just the most important thing, just them.

But he knew North would never treat him as normal. Not after what he'd done. No matter how necessary. His brother wouldn't understand until they were Reunified.

And when they were, it would just be Korea. Alone.

"Gangwon deserved it," he rasped, raising his face to look up at America, his words muffled by his suit jacket.

He'd wanted to see his friend look at him with pride, to accept him, and he did. But it still wrapped around his heart and squeezed.

He knew North wouldn't look at him that way if he told him. He'd look at him like he had that day in Seodaemun, as South pulled the trigger to save his life.

"Yep," his friend said, grinning down at him. "And you did a good job givin' it to him, Southie."

The words went in warm, but twisted inside, another ice cold knife between his ribs. He buried his face in America again.

"China deserves it, too," he muttered.

"Yeah?" America asked after a moment.

"Yeah."

China did deserve to be punished. For breaking international law to help North, for sending his soldiers when if he hadn't South could have been reunited with his brother before this all happened, before he'd burned Seoul and punished Gangwon and crossed the line. And for leaving.

And the Chinese needed to be punished for being Communists, for letting themselves get brainwashed like the northerners had.

"I'm glad we see eye to eye on that, kid," America said eventually, patting him on the head.

He wouldn't find out China was here, not from Gangwon or South. He wouldn't leave Korea- South wouldn't let him.

But once the war was over, once him and his brother were one and all the Communists were gone, South would be more than happy for America to make China regret ever helping North. He had the provinces, he had thousands of people that loved him so much that they cheered as he told them he wanted them to die for him. He didn't need friends. South did.

And China was going to pay for choosing his brother over him.

South pressed harder into America, trying to soothe the ache inside him.

He didn't really know what he was aching for. He would say a home, but he knew where home was. He just didn't know how to get back to it.

He was starting to think he couldn't.

—

America petted South on his little round noggin. The kid had started to shake again, chuckling wildly to himself, but it was less 'Anna Ecklund' now and more 'guy you crossed the street to avoid.'

He'd ran over his allotted weird time, but meh- at least he wasn't ruining another suit with his tears.

And he thought Red China deserved to get his own punishment, just like the little deaf commie. He guessed he could stop trying to make him sing now.

Hey, it wasn't like America was torturing him or anything like that. Finding out if the chink was here was definitely torture-level information, but not when South could still use the Commands to find out. Between Little Red and the hand-talker, Seoul, and the POWs, his Southie was ahead, and this was the one race America had no intention of winning.

Well, he was winning, obviously. But no one needed to know that. He didn't need South to start eyeing the scales and take a chance on blabbing to certain Northern parties. Good thing his belief in God was paperweight stuff and he wouldn't go confessing to the nearest Cat-licking priest to unburden his guilty soul, either.

But *any*way, the kid had pretty much given his seal of approval for locking the guy up and 'forgetting' the key before. Keeping him boarded up in a room with no windows wasn't torture- it was just for his own safety, in case he tried to take out his eyes or his tongue or something next. And if South disagreed, he could just play the tape back for him.

'Yep, gotta love modern technology.' He had enough material that with enough splicin' and dicin', he could pretty much make South say whatever he wanted.

Not that he probably couldn't anyway.

America smiled down at his Korea, a wolf holding a docile little lamb between his jaws, not drawing blood, but firm enough that there wouldn't be any breaking free.

And South didn't try to.

The wolf bared his straight white fangs as the Moscva postcard crumpled in his grip.

I had to go to city yesterday and now I feel ill. If I go dark for a day or two it means I am suffering for the crime of making sure my number card had no issues. Ironically.

North and South's biggest dream is to stop existing. Neither of them would phrase it that way, but their biggest desire is to be Reunified. And no matter how you look at it, to be Reunified is to stop being themselves.

For the Provisional Government's sake I want to clarify they weren't rich. They were struggling in China. South just makes it seem like they can get him anything he wants because they try very hard to, and he doesn't know what goes on behind the scenes. Many of them weren't Communists and had the more traditional view of 'He's our Countryhuman so he needs to be doing well even if the normal people (and us) aren't,' so they would seek out French bakeries or buy expensive meats just for him. Keeping him in silks and suites was a very crowd-funded effort, helped along greatly by a few Korean capitalists who were aware of North and wanted to make sure they had a non-Communist Korea once Japan was gone.

I also think there were some Korean foods South would avoid during his time in China, even when he could access them. He loved trying new things (and always immediately thought 'I need to share these with North,' keeping them in mind so they could have a feast when (if) he ever saw him again), but he wanted to save at least one of theirs foods to experience with North. He purposefully avoided songpyeon because they were more celebration foods to be eaten with family, and he wanted to try them for the first time with his family. Not knowing that North already has.

Chronic Masquerading As Acute

Korea's book was confusing as hell.

If someone normal was making a list of seemingly everyone in their damn country, they probably would have crossed out the names of dead people to make it a little less confusing, right? But noooo. Clearly that wasn't how he was operating because not a single name out of what could literally be thousands was crossed out, and South Pyongan knew some of them were dead. Son Du-soon, Dan Hoon, Kim Chaek. Guk Gun.

Her tank crew were in there, towards the end. All with that symbol that was definitely an eye next to them.

And she couldn't figure out what the rectangles with a strike through them meant at all. They showed up almost as much as the eye, but while she was pretty sure that one meant someone was dead (she didn't recognize any living names with it anyway), she had no clue what they could represent. A couple didn't even have the line through them, confusing things even more.

She'd found them next to a few people she vaguely recognized- the wives of some of their comrades from the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army who lived in the north, an old farmer she remembered solely because after he'd let them hide in his woodshed while he faced down with the Kempeitei, telling them he hadn't seen anyone come this way and sending them in the opposite direction, she'd joked she would never forget his name, and Chungbuk had challenged her on it so she had made sure she didn't.

But she also found them next to names she recognized for sure. Kim Sok-won, a few dozen pages in, who stuck out because it was darker on the paper than the others. Paik Sun-yup, for the same reason. Jo Man-sik.

So- rectangles next to people that had helped them and they definitely liked, and next to dog's son bastards that even the thought of had made Korea almost tear through the page with the pencil he'd gone over the charcoal with. Plus the fact that the traitors didn't have an eye next to them threw a spanner in her 'eye means dead' theory.

She guessed it didn't really matter. She'd already used the cipher to crack his code and read the words some of the names had next to them while hunched over in the Party Foundation building with her flashlight. They were addresses, giving her a rough idea of where to go.

But trying to work out the secrets of Korea's sucky drawings kept her mind off the destination. Maybe she should be thinking about what to say, but she wasn't going to do that. No way. She'd just psyche herself out, and South Pyongan did not get psyched out. Better to handle it in the moment, like always, instead of thinking about that smudge of charcoal next to Guk Gun's name, or what the 'relocated' part of the address next to the one below it meant.

'Relocated from Seoncheon County to Inhung County.' Relocated like 'she moved here' or relocated like 'she's been relocated?' What did those crossed-out rectangles next to her name mean? Why did Korea know her name at all? Guk Gun, yeah. She'd been hoping to find him with maybe an address so she could check if his family still lived by the sea. But her?

She knew it was the right person. Seoncheon County was in her brother's province, on the coast halfway between Sinuiju and the Chongchon. She hadn't known what villages were nearby at the time, but she recognized them now. The location matched.

So here she was, trekking across the fields of South Hamgyong's province, close enough to the east coast to hear the ships pounding it.

She wished she could go man the anti-ship batteries with their soldiers. It would be better than this. Easier.

Which meant she couldn't. Even if she would admit (to herself) that she'd chosen to walk specifically to kill a couple of days, and that maybepossibly the stops she'd taken in the villages on the way to make sure they were conducting anti-epidemic work right weren't entirely just because she was trying to be politicianly and maybe more because she was trying to stall even longer. Maybe.

But she was almost there now. She was in Inhung County anyway, in the shadow of the mountains that covered the west of South Hamgyong, pretty-looking but deadly, like the cousin they belonged to.

For the next couple days she asked around Inhung Town and the nearby villages for a lead. She didn't have to information-gather the way they'd used to, stealthily, judging each mark before deciding if it was safe to speak to them. She could just strut in and demand to know if any of the local People's Committee members had heard of Ok Su-jin.

But she still tried to be subtle. It wouldn't exactly look good if anyone looked into why she might be asking. Their official story was that the Pyongans had ended up in the Pyongyang Men's Prison just for refusing to bow to Japan. If anyone asked about the murder rumours, they'd say the Japs had obviously just been trying to justify it.

No one had ever asked.

It'd never been common knowledge. The Japs hadn't really cared about the farmer. All they cared about was the 'sedition.' They'd just wanted to make them disappear. So they never had much of a paper trail on them, and had burned most of their crap when they'd left anyway. But there could still be enough evidence out there to sniff out the truth. And that would suck.

She knew Korea didn't like lying to their people, the same way her brother didn't. Since he'd lied for her sake, she didn't want to end up being the one to get him busted.

Well, probably not her sake. More their image's sake. But still.

Toward the end of the second day, she started to think it was a vain effort, that maybe the woman and her family had been killed or fled south when the reactionaries left, taking the chance to put distance between them and the Provincehuman that had murdered her husband and got away with it.

South Pyongan hadn't got away with it. She'd been caught and thrown in jail for a month, and would've been killed or something if Korea hadn't came to get them. But she doubted that would be enough for the woman. It wouldn't be for her. Even if she'd had a husband that was an idiot that tried to sell out their country, that would be her issue to deal with. Not someone else's.

Part of her wanted to give up. 'Oh well, I tried' and hitch a ride back to Pyongyang, satisfied that she had given being responsible a chance, but it hadn't worked out this time.

But South Pyongan province didn't give up. If she wanted something, she got it. And she wanted to be strong enough to face this. She wanted to be a good politician.

And she was the master of her own destiny.

She found her lead as the sun started to dip, in a few peasants at one of the camouflaged market areas. They had used to buy produce from her target.

In 1946, Ok Su-jin had moved onto a small patch of farmland to the east, closer to the sea. But the farmhouse had been destroyed in the bombings, and the coastal bombardment meant it was still gone.

She had also died a few years back, in 1947. Old age, apparently.

Part of South Pyongan was relieved to hear it, even if she wouldn't even admit that to her brother. But the feeling just made her more determined to force herself through.

One of the women knew which direction to point her in, towards the mountains that bordered Chongpyong County to the north. So off she went, forcing herself not to stop when war refugees called out to her, inviting her over. She could do it on the way back. They could wait. She'd probably left this long enough.

The place was near the entrance to the path to Anbulsa Temple, tucked away in foothills that had used to be covered in forests, but were now dead, scorched by napalm that left them bald as her brother's head, just like everything else. The orange light from the setting sun made them look like they were still burning.

Surprisingly she didn't find a dug-out. It looked like the local government organs had managed to get the building materials for a small hut to her, at least.

South Pyongan had reluctantly taken off her protective suit, not wanting it to look like she was hiding behind it. She didn't hide.

She'd thought about bringing her rations or picking something up from Completely Reasonable Prices Kim, but had decided against it. She didn't want the chick to think she was trying to bribe her into forgiving her, or that she thought a few bags of rice could make up for what she had lost.

She stared at the straw door to the hut, her fists clenched tight.

Maybe she'd get lucky. Maybe he'd been one of those husbands like that Kim Sun-ja's, or worse. Maybe he'd beat his wife and kids and they'd toasted with rice wine after she'd left. Maybe she had freed them from him.

But remembering how the woman- Ok Su-jin, she had a name for the face that had looked at her that way now- had called 'Yeobo?' with a trembling voice, and the tears that sprang to her eyes, she didn't think so.

There was movement at the hut, and a woman pushed the flimsy door open and stepped out. She looked around the same age as the woman back then had been. Which meant she would've been what, ten or something when he'd died? Been killed.

'Old enough to remember.'

South Pyongan took a breath, strangling her fighting instinct, and strode forward.

The woman startled, turning to face her. Right away, the province could tell that yeah, she knew the full story. And she remembered.

She took a step back, laying a worn hand over her chest, her woven basket held tightly under one arm.

Her eyes looked just like her mother's, the same dark orbs that had stared at her in shock and confusion. And accusation.

'Creepy.'

As she stopped a safe distance away, South Pyongan awkwardly said, "Hey," because how else was she supposed to start this? 'Don't worry, I'm not here to shut you up for good so you can't tell anyone what I did'?

The woman bowed her head stiffly. "Comrade South Pyongan."

It wasn't too late to run. Cold-cock her and hope it gave her a concussion bad enough to forget she'd ever been here.

No. Korea had totally told the General to give her that book if she asked. Which meant he expected her to be responsible enough to do what he wanted her to. No- what she should.

She took a deep breath.

"Yeah," she said to the woman. "South Pyongan province."

She took her hands out of her pockets and straightened her back so she didn't look so casual, going for professional and apologetic, something she'd never really had to look before. It felt awkward and unnatural on her, like everything else about this.

"And you're Guk Gun's daughter, right?"

—

Those clams in Taedong County, more flies carrying typhoid east of Kunu-ri, blighted leaves in Liaotung, case after case of high-fatality pneumonia in Liaoxi, thousands of fleas dropped on Song-dong in Hoeyang, enough that every single dug-out in the area had to be evacuated and sprayed down with chemicals, and the inhabitants, people already poor and suffering, had to be isolated for over a week, along with everyone who brought them supplies and cleaned the area. And if even a single flea hadn't been burned, a single germ had missed being doused in DDT, a single vaccine wasn't strong enough, someone could still catch the plague and spread it. Even if didn't infect anyone else, it could still kill them, like Pak Yun-ho.

They were doing well, they were keeping on top of it. But Kangwon could admit that the effort to stay on top was starting to wear on him. Not to Korea or his cousins or his patients- they needed to feel like the germ warfare was handled so they could do everything they needed to do. Especially Korea.

But Kangwon couldn't close his eyes without seeing those frothy white sprays of cholera diarrhea crusted on the floor in that house in Taedong, or masses of fleas writhing on a hillside or swirling in a jar like a thousand glistening black eyes, saying he'd missed one, that there was going to be another patient coming soon, another house filled with bodies and the dank smell of death and someone he couldn't save.

It clogged his nostrils, mixing with the sharp smell of chemicals and the sickly sweet stench of disease, the only thing he could smell lately. Escaping to the military hospital, replacing the cloying scents of illness with the tang of blood, had almost become a relief. Even his own burning flesh was starting to smell better.

Kangwon took a deep breath, finishing his disinfecting and going to sit on the edge of the cot in the break room, holding his head in his hands, shutting out the harsh white overhead light with his palms, trying to ignore the pain wracking his body from today's heavy attack on Wonsan, like usual.

It was going to be alright. Keeping everything under control was difficult, but him and everyone in the Epidemic Prevention Corps were still managing it. They were getting a steady supply of chemicals in from their allies and putting them to good use. There were pretty much no stray animals left to spread disease, and the insect population had gone down majorly, which was good for crops, too. The International Association of Lawyers had been by to conduct their own investigation and act as another voice confirming to the world that biological warfare was being used in Korea. A couple of the American pilots that had been shot down while dumping their germ bombs had given their testimony in Beijing, and even if America was still denying it, it put more pressure on him, especially with the prisoners on Geoje making the rumours of biological weapons testing there an actual accusation. And the World Peace Council had made their appeal to the UN and all the American people to call on their government to stop. The more attention that was called to it, the more eyes would be on the International Scientific Commission when it arrived to investigate at the end of June.

The cold list of facts didn't make him feel any better when it was weighed against feverish eyes and rotting skin.

Kangwon took deep breaths, drawing each breath in and holding it for six heartbeats, trying not to taste the sterile air, before slowly letting it go.

He was usually pretty good at compartmentalizing all the trauma he had to face in the hospitals. But every once and awhile he could feel the walls of the compartments growing thin under the weight of the patients he hadn't been able to save. Even if he'd done everything he could, it didn't change anything. They were still dead.

He could say now that he'd never dealt with anything like this before Liberation. It was one thing to have a battalion or a small village of a few dozen sick people depending on you. It was another thing to have the entire country. If almost everyone in a village made it through an illness, the small percentage that didn't would be seven or eight people. Now, even though he was doing good, even though they were saving the majority of the infected, a 'small percentage' was still hundreds. And even one was too much.

It all became a kind of pressure that built up inside him until he felt like if he didn't let it out, he would explode. And it had started building faster in the past few weeks as he shuttled between the hospitals and investigation spots, only seeing his cousins to take their blood and Korea to give him his reports. Everything else blurred together into white walls and bloody lips and last words. He didn't have Gangwon to help him shoulder the burden anymore.

But he was alright. He just had to take his ten minute breaks to breathe deep and remind himself of all his successes. Kim Do-bom had gotten better and it didn't seem like his brain had been affected by the malaria, and… He'd think of more in a minute, when his shoulder muscles didn't feel like they were about to snap from tension.

He had to center himself before Korea got here for his blood donation later. If he picked up on any anxiety or anything, he'd get paranoid over how the anti-epidemic work was going and start trying to involve himself again. He needed to stay focused on the peace talks.

And Kangwon wanted to keep him away from germs. Thanks to his screw-up, his Countryhuman would reject a recuperative coma even more aggressively if he got sick. He couldn't let him run himself into the ground again.

Even though he hadn't given Kangwon his final strike and forbidden him from treating him ever again, he still hadn't been by to have his burns cleaned since then.

The door opened, and the short heels some of the nurses wore clacked unsteadily on the tile floor. Kangwon raised his head to see Kim Yo-mi stagger in, falling against the wall, her braced back the only reason she didn't end up on the ground.

The woman's eyes were wide and glazed, and she stared at him like she didn't recognize him or the hospital she practically lived in around them.

Kangwon was on his feet in a second and at her side. "Comrade, what's wrong?"

"I- I-" Her breathing took on the ragged edge of someone about to reach their limit, and he hurriedly placed a hand on her back.

"Deep breaths," he soothed. "You're alright."

“No,” she whispered, tears welling in her eyes. “I’m- I’m…” Her head curled into her chest as she started to shake. “I can’t do it, I can’t do it, I can’t-“

“What room?” Kangwon asked gently.

“T-Twenty-two,” she whimpered, her legs giving out.

She didn’t make any sound as she hit the floor. Just sat there, shaking quietly.

Kangwon wanted to comfort her, but if there was a patient in a condition that could make a nurse that had worked here since before the war began break down like this, he needed to get to them. He grabbed his coat and a clean pair of gloves and took off, not stopping to rebandage his hands, only to direct one of the nurses in the hall to the break room.

They couldn’t afford to lose a good nurse.

The door to Room 22 hadn’t been shut right. As Kangwon pulled it open, dread-filled resignation settled over him, and the pressure he hadn’t been able to drain strained at his ribcage.

There was a shape on the bed. A mottled mass of charred black and wet red in the shape of a person. A small person. All the hair had been torched off, the lips burned away, exposing the glint of teeth on one side, and one arm had been fused to their side, melted to it by extreme heat. Their body was exposed, too burnt for bandages or clothes, and all features were blackened beyond recognition, besides one incongruous patch of untouched brown skin on the left ankle. Someone else could’ve said that they weren’t even recognizable as human. But Kangwon had seen enough bodies like this that he couldn’t see them as anything but.

And he knew they were a child.

He smiled, softly shutting the door. “Hey there.”

One of their eyes was gone, their lids merged together into a rippled expanse of flesh that drooped down their face like tallow that had melted and congealed. That was exactly what had happened. The fat in their body had boiled like water.

America was using a lot of chemical weapons on them. But there was only one Kangwon knew that could do this.

Napalm. From the attack last night. City Hospital One was full, so the worst cases had been brought here.

The lids on the other eye had been burned completely off, leaving the brown orb exposed. It rolled towards Kangwon, filled with an agony so deep and all-encompassing that it made his throat close.

He made himself walk forward, kneeling at the bedside. He reached for the chart. Male. Between five to eight years of age. Severe fourth-degree and third-degree burns. A long list of everything in his body that had been destroyed.

But his name wasn't filled out. And the room was empty, only a puddle of water and a tin cup on the floor, left behind by Kim Yo-mi.

"Can you talk?" Kangwon asked, keeping his tone low and reassuring.

The boy only looked at him with that devouring agony in his eye.

There was confusion in it, too, like he was asking Kangwon why he was doing this to him. Children didn't even understand how the world worked yet. They couldn't understand feeling that much pain. Or why.

Kangwon smiled at him. "That's okay. I'm Doctor Kangwon. I'm here to keep you company."

He didn't know if he could hear him. The ear on the other side of his head had melded with his skull, and the one on this side was sagging and disfigured. But he kept talking, hoping he could at least pick up the steady tempo.

"Sorry your nurse had to leave," he said, reaching for the cup and setting it upright on the floor. "But I'm here now."

The boy's breathing was thick and wet, his thin chest struggling to rise and fall, something rattling inside it every time.

"You're very brave for dealing with this," the province told him, not shying away from the shiny burnt mask his face had become. "And we're going to have you better in no time."

He spoke slow and calm, maintaining eye contact and a smile, and he saw the eye return a bit of that calm.

"There we go." Kangwon shifted onto his knees. "You'll be alright."

He didn't reach for the carafe of water. He'd have to peel the child's head off the pillow and help him swallow. It would just hurt him more. For the same reason, he didn't move to set up a blood transfusion.

The arm on this side, the one that wasn't melted to his body, twitched, fingers scraping at the stained sheets, and a gurgling choking sound came from his throat. After a second, Kangwon removed his gloves and took the mangled hand trying to reach for him in his. He tried to be gentle, but the boy gripped tight.

His skin cracked under Kangwon's, wet warmth soaking his palm, and the blisters on his fingers popped as he twined them with the province's, but he didn't let go, grabbing desperately onto him.

Kangwon smiled, not letting his eyes fall to the blood and pus seeping between their clasped hands.

"You'll be alright," he soothed, heart cracking. "I'll take care of you until you're better, okay comrade?"

The boy stared at him with all the pain in the world.

Some of the American pilots said they'd received briefings on what they were dropping over Korea. How the germ bombs worked and that they were germ bombs. Others claimed they'd had suspicions, but hadn't been told. And some insisted they hadn't known at all, and wouldn't have taken the flight if they had. They had thought they were just dropping normal bombs.

Bombs like the one that had turned this child, and hundreds of others like him, into masses of dead flesh, making sure they could never live normal lives. Kaesong was full of them, the disfigured children taken to the neutral zone so they wouldn't have to go through any more suffering. The wards were full of boys and girls who couldn't walk, couldn't talk or blink or move and never would be able to again. Children that had survived, but would never be able to live.

Kangwon thought of that feeling he'd had in the sky, of soaring over the Soviet Union and China and Norway and feeling closer to the people down below than ever before, and squeezed the boy's hand tighter.

He didn't know how long he was in there, holding it. There was only the depths of the pain-filled chestnut eye, the warmth of the hand in his, the bombs rippling through his own body, and the empty reassurances coming from his mouth in the same soothing tone, telling him everything would be fine and he'd be better soon.

No one came to treat him. There wasn't any point.

Kangwon wished his brother was here. Not to do this while he went and treated patients he could save. Just to keep him company, to hold his other hand steady. To have someone that understood.

He hoped South had got his postcard.

The boy's breathing grew shallower, thicker. Every inhale took seconds to shudder into his swollen throat and heat-ravaged lungs, and every exhale came with a shaky whistle from between his exposed teeth. Blood stained the inside of the lips he had left.

Kangwon stared into his eye, smiling, and wondered if the pleading look he got back had been what Sip Tal-sun's son had seen.

He could pull the pillow out from behind the boy's head. He could make it quicker. Gentler.

But he wouldn't. He'd never been the type to mercy kill, no matter how badly his patient wanted it. Maybe it was selfish, not wanting to lose a patient. But he knew the pain they were in didn't let them think straight. And he couldn't let them make a decision like that when it was talking for them, like it had been talking for Sip Tal-sun.

No one wanted to die. They wanted to get better. Kangwon couldn't take that chance away from them, no matter how small it was.

Even when there wasn't a chance at all.

He held the boy's hand as his grip grew tighter, flesh giving way under his, and his single eye stared feverishly into his, pleading for it to end.

"It's okay," Kangwon soothed when he was sure he could. "It's going to stop hurting soon. I promise."

As a doctor, he couldn't give promises lightly. But he could make this one.

"You'll be better soon."

He kept holding tight as the boy started to convulse, his organs shutting down from the shock, or his damaged lungs giving out. He choked and spasmed, what was left of his skin peeling off of the bedsheets, leaving scraps of flesh behind.

"You'll be okay."

A choked sob escaped his mouth, the first real vocalization he'd made, as his fingers dug into Kangwon's, the burnt scraps of his nails sloughing off. Kangwon held tight, not letting go.

"You're going to be alright."

The boy couldn't cry, his tear ducts fused shut. He stared at him with his wide unblinking eye, so terrified and hurting and confused. Kangwon gripped onto him as hard as he could, hoping he could feel it past the dead nerve ends, hoping he understood his province was here, that he wasn't alone.

“You're alright. Doctor Kangwon's got you.” Kangwon leaned forward, placing his other hand against his melted cheek, making sure he could see his smile, see something warm. “You’re alright.”

Skin crackled and flesh squelched, and tiny finger bones broke between his.

“It’s going to be alright." 'Please.' "It’s going to be okay.”

The eye stared up at him, finally emptied of pain and everything else. Another hollow corpse on a hospital cot, another empty body in the room.

The worst part about being a doctor was losing your patient. The second worst part was when the first thing you felt was relief.

“It’s alright,” Kangwon murmured, still crushing his hand in his as his forehead met the cot. “It’s okay.”

He repeated the words to the dead boy over and over, until the door opened, and a woman said, “Comrade Kangwon? Comrade Kim Yo-mi told- Oh.”

Her voice softened with sorrow.

“It’s alright,” he said, giving her a reassuring smile. “I was here.”

He gave her the instructions for dealing with the biohazards in the room calmly, still holding onto the boy’s hand.

“I’ll see if we can find any family,” he said, the words sounding muffled somehow. “I’ll-“ Right. He couldn’t send South Pyongan to look. She was still gone.

And for a moment, his mind went blank, losing his next words, along with everything else.

His comrade was avoiding looking at the boy, looking at him instead. Her brows were furrowed, and he made himself speak before she could get worried.

“I’ll send someone,” he finished.

“Alright,” she said quietly. “And I’ll… get someone to take care of the body.”

Kangwon had to unlink their hands. It was harder than it should’ve been. Rigor mortis hadn’t set in yet, but the boy held on after death. So did he.

Slowly he pried his fingers free, feeling skin tear under his, bits of flesh coming off on him like they had on the blanket. Kangwon stared at them, red and black crusted under his nails and ground into the lines of his palms.

“Comrade Kangwon?” The nurse’s voice wavered.

He smiled up at her. “I have to wash my hands.”

His legs prickled with paresthesia, but he couldn’t feel it. He walked steadily down the halls, his hands held out at his waist, palms down, lips curved peaceably up.

Halfway to the break room, he turned on a heel and headed for the blood lab, in case Kim Yo-mi was still there. He didn’t want to upset her any more. They only had so many nurses.

The lab was empty. He went in and shut the door. He turned on the sink, water gurgling through the hastily-installed pipes. He put his hands under it, starting to scrub.

The water was cold. They didn’t have hot water here. It had to be boiled over the stoves. The water was cold. It wasn’t cleaning him right. The scraps of flesh washed off, but the grease of melted skin and fat stayed caked into his life line and his open burns. Kangwon couldn’t feel the water. He could feel the pressure in his chest. He kept his nails meticulously short, too short to use them to get the grime out from underneath the rest. The stench of cooking meat filled the room as his skin and more children in his province burned, invading his senses, nauseating and inescapable and he wondered how he’d ever thought it was better than the smell of sick.

The flesh wasn't coming off. He couldn't get it off. His breathing was coming faster, taking on a ragged edge he couldn't get under control, his inhales shallow and shuddering like the boy's had been, exhales coming out short and sharp.

He tried to grip the sides of the sink, but his palms slid against it, leaving smears of human grease, and the feeling made something inside of him recoil.

The water streamed into the sink with a hollow drumming sound, splashing up around the edges, where the boy's flesh had settled. It caught a piece, dragging it towards the drain, and the idea of letting it go into it suddenly seemed like desecration.

He grabbed for the scrap, but it was too small and all he managed to do was spray more water everywhere, splattering against the metal sides, washing them clean the way it refused to do to him. He grabbed for the flesh, a panicked sound leaving his mouth as he tried to stop them from going. But they slid through his fingers, disappearing down the drain.

Kangwon slammed the water off, staggering back, hands thrust out in front of him. The light overhead felt too bright, piercing through his lids even when he closed them, but he couldn't cover them, couldn't touch anything.

The boy's eye had to have been so dry, it had to have hurt to have the light beaming down on him. He should've dripped water in it, should've shut it off, should have slit his wrist and made him drink his blood to dull the pain. He hadn't done everything he could have and he'd died and maybe if he had did that it wouldn't have saved him but it could've made it hurt less.

He grit his teeth as pain flared across his skin, not ending quick, but going on, the endless pounding from the naval bombardment or fields of napalm dousing his land, razing fields and towns and flesh the way it had been for over a year.

It was all suddenly too much. The boy whose name he'd never know, the empty farmhouses, the endless march of sick patients, the blood staining Sip Tal-sun's wrists, the constant beating pain he was never free from, his brother. His compartments were crumbling, all the things he'd been keeping neatly stored to let him deal with everyone else's pain falling onto him. He wanted Gangwon. He wanted-

For the first time in his life, Kangwon's eyes started to burn like the boy's had. But the burns hadn't claimed his tear ducts yet, and he could feel hot liquid forcing its way out.

He collapsed to the ground like Kim Yo-mi, burying his face in his knees, his hands splayed on the floor next to him, as far from himself as he could get them without amputating, itching with an awful feeling he couldn't wash away, trying to calm his jagged breathing as his tears soaked his pant legs, the salt stinging his searing burns.

'It hurts. It hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it-'

The door opened, and Kangwon jerked up, hoping it wasn't one of the nurses, hoping he'd see green skin and a golden province.

Korea stood in the doorway, here for his blood donation. He had frozen at seeing Kangwon, standing rigid as he stared at his tear-streaked face.

"Korea." His name came out in a croak without even thinking about it as Kangwon looked helplessly up at him. "It hurts."

He didn't know why he said it. He didn't know what he was hoping for, when he knew Korea wasn't the comforting type, even if some of South's stories had made it sound like he could be.

His Countryhuman stared at him with a single wide eye, terrified. Then he slammed the door on him.

Kangwon hung his head between his knees, his eyes screwing up as the tears kept flowing.

'Stupid.'

Korea already felt guilty about how long the war had been going on for, and how damaged the provinces were. He could see it in his eye every time he looked at the bandages on Kangwon's face. He'd just made him feel worse.

Kangwon's shoulders shook in silent sobs, but still there was a part of his mind that remained separate, calmly telling him he'd already been on break for too long, that he had to get off the floor and back to the Quarantine Hospital. He had lives to save.

He didn't want to go back. He didn't want to face more children with lesions and failing organs and scared confused eyes. He wanted to crawl into the woods and hide like he'd wanted to when the villagers had brought that man with the sword wound in his stomach to him.

'And then he would've died.'

He knew that. He wasn't going to hide. He was going to keep trying to save people, even if he couldn't.

But he wanted to cry for a little bit longer first.

He watched wet spots bloom on the tiles between his feet as his tears struck them, and saw the door open again, black military boots appearing in the edge of his vision. He kept his head down so he could pretend he was just resting, not crying.

"Kangwon?" North Pyongan asked, confused.

He slid his lab coat sleeve across his eyes, trying to wipe the tears away. "Yeah," he said, his voice still too thick. "What's up?"

"Are you… crying?" His cousin sounded surprised. "What's wrong?"

"I…"

What wasn't wrong? He'd just had to watch another kid die, he'd lost a patient and upset Korea, his skin was burning off his body, and he had to go back to the Quarantine Hospital, to immerse himself in the smell of people's bodies rotting around them while he could still smell the boy's flesh and his own cooking and he always would.

And his brother was gone.

"It won't come off," he said, and his voice cracked as he held up his hands.

North Pyongan's eyes filled with sorrow as he saw the mess of burnt flesh, blood leaking from his palms where he'd scrubbed too hard.

"I will be right back," he said, gently shutting the door.

Kangwon rubbed his face hard against his arm.

He'd been trying so hard not to let his cousins see how this was affecting him. He didn't want them worrying about him while they were doing their jobs.

The door opened a few minutes later, and North Pyongan slid in, carrying a large clay bowl of steaming water from the kitchens that he set down on the ground before closing the door and coming to kneel next to him.

"Thanks," Kangwon rasped, reaching for the cloth in his hand.

His cousin pulled it away. "Let me do it."

Kangwon pulled his legs flush to his chest, one hand still lying on the floor as far from his body as he could get it. North Pyongan took the other one, rolling up his sleeve and dipping the cloth in the boiled water before gently rubbing down his palm.

Kangwon kept his face buried in his knees, fighting back more tears, and the calm voice telling him he could do this faster, get back to the other hospital sooner.

He wouldn't let himself fall into the same habit Korea had. This wasn't about cleaning his hands, it was about bringing the pressure down.

North Pyongan carefully rubbed at his life lines, using the hot water to cut through the grease. He didn't ask what it was from.

Kangwon closed his eyes again, still seeing the boy's staring into them.

The American pilots had sounded so calm as they gave their broadcasts. The handwriting in the testimonies he'd looked at had been steady, even if he couldn't read the English letters well. Even the ones that regretted it.

They'd been so horrified to learn they'd been dropping germ bombs, but how was the napalm any better? They didn't like to think they'd caused someone to get sick, but burning people alive, melting all the fats in their bodies and searing the skin from their bones didn't make them miss any sleep?

And some of them had known what they were dropping.

Would the Americans be able to do it, if they had to look the children in the eyes? If they had to pour the plague-infected fleas on them by hand and watch their flesh blacken and their buboes split open, if they had to press the smallpox-ridden feathers into their hands to play with and feel the blood they hacked out spray their faces the way Kangwon did, if they'd had to hold that boy's hand and watch him die? Would the Norwegians and the Turkish and the Canadians keep fighting if they did? Would the countries that sold the United Nations Army weapons and food and supplies keep doing it if they had to face what they were being used for themselves?

Kangwon wanted to say no. He wanted to say that the distance was the only thing that let them do it, that if they all had to face what they were doing to Korea's people, they wouldn't be able to. They would stop.

But after Taejon and Pyongyang and Sincheon and Wonsan, after all of their protests about the germ warfare and the massacres had gone unlistened to, after their POWs had been brutalized and ignored, after Oslo…

He couldn't.

"Do you think people are good?" he asked desperately, raising his head to his cousin.

North Pyongan paused in his cleaning, holding his hand in his as he stared down at his bloody palm.

“I have to believe that they are,” he said eventually, his white eyes far away.

Kangwon rested his forehead on his knees again as his cousin went back to cleaning him, gently rubbing all the residue off his skin and using the tip of his knife to clean under his blunt nails, until the only thing left was the fresh blood coming from his burns. Then he moved on to his other hand.

“I’m sorry,” North Pyongan murmured as he traced the palmar creases with the cloth.

“For what?” Kangwon’s throat still felt clogged.

“You lost your brother.” He kept his gaze on his hand, wiping his knuckles. “And I haven’t tried to comfort you.”

Kangwon shook his head. “It’s alright. I get it.”

He’d seen the way he looked at him in the bunker, and when he came to get his blood drawn. And when South Pyongan had come to pick up their blood results before he’d started sending them here to Kim Yong-hwan instead, she’d always shift in place, opening her mouth before making an awkward joke and slinking off.

“No,” North Pyongan said. “It isn’t. I knew words won’t bring him back to you, so I didn’t know what to say.” His eyes raised to his, ashamed. “But I also know if you had been with us on the tactical retreat, you would have comforted me over my sister. I should have found the words and done the same.”

“You know we don’t really talk about things.” He said it with a faint lip pull to show he was quoting South Pyongan.

“No,” North Pyongan admitted. “But you and I can. So I’ll say it now- I’m sorry about your brother, Kangwon.”

He looked away, eyes stinging again. “…Thanks.”

“We will get him back.”

Kangwon nodded wordlessly, his heart squeezing.

His cousin cleaned the nails on this hand, too, then wiped them down. Then he wound clean bandages around his palms. Kangwon had a better technique, but he didn’t correct him, flexing his fingers. They felt clean again.

But he could still feel the boy’s hand in his.

North Pyongan didn’t stand up. “You know I meant that. You can talk to me whenever you need to.”

Kangwon pulled his sleeves down, finally letting his hands touch his legs again. “Yeah.”

“Kangwon.” He laid a hand on his shoulder, making him meet his eyes. “We don’t like that you’re always working so hard, and you can’t even join us for meals most of the time. That isn’t healthy.”

Kangwon opened his mouth, but he gently interrupted, “I know you can’t stop when your work is so important. But that’s even more of a reason to talk. Instead of always asking us how we’re doing when we visit the hospital and saying you’re fine or tired, share how you’re really doing.”

He couldn't talk about how he was doing without talking about everything he had to face in the hospitals. He didn’t want to think about it any more than he already had to during those few minutes where he got to see his family again and take his mind off it with their problems. Personal issues were easier to solve.

And he was the one without personal issues. He didn’t have to struggle with his faith or his codependency or inability to work things out with a sibling or whether or not he was too clinical or crippling headaches or a deep fear that they’d lose everyone they had ever loved. If even he could be brought to tears by dealing with the weight of the germ warfare and the bombings, then he didn’t want to place it on top of the burdens his cousins were already putting up with.

He couldn't say all that, though. It was easier to just say he was tired.

“You’re always trying to help us with our problems,” North Pyongan said gently. “Let us help you with yours. At least once and awhile. Please don’t become like Korea.”

Kangwon’s lips parted, then flattened wryly.

He was acting like Korea, wasn’t he? And he always tried to get him to share his burdens, even though he had more of them than anyone. He'd gladly share some of the weight his Countryhuman had to bear, even if it broke him, so long as it broke Korea a little less.

“Don’t worry,” he said, a little clearer. “I won’t. Next time you come to donate, I’ll… tell you what this was about.”

Not right now. Not when he could still see the boy’s chestnut-coloured eye so clearly, and his charred body was in the same building.

But he didn’t have Gangwon anymore. There wasn’t anyone to chuckle with as they almost choked inhaling their rations or know exactly how to comfort him because he knew exactly which patient he’d lost and how he'd really feel about it, or to press his back to at night. If he wanted to stop another breakdown like this, he needed to relieve the pressure. And he couldn’t do that if he was only ever helping his cousins relieve theirs.

“Good.” North Pyongan shimmied over to sit next to him, putting an arm around his shoulders. “I’m always here for you, Kangwon. We all are.”

Kangwon hooked his arm over his, squeezing his shoulder from behind. “Thanks cuz. I’m here for you, too.”

North Pyongan gently rubbed his back while he wiped his eyes with the backs of his hands.

“I think I scared Korea,” he sniffed, tears dry. Mostly.

“Korea?” North Pyongan asked, raising his brows.

“Yeah, he was here.”

And now he’d probably never come back again. He would probably start making Kim Yong-hwan draw his blood full-time, too.

“Ah.” North Pyongan almost sounded amused as he patted him lightly.

Kangwon let himself lean against his cousin for a few more seconds, then pulled away.

“I’ve got to get back to the Quarantine Hospital.”

He couldn’t help the dread he felt at the idea. But he could put it away in a compartment again. He had people to fix.

“Alright.” North Pyongan helped him up, picking up the bowl and cloth. “I can take care of these.”

“What were you doing here anyway?”

His cousin looked mildly embarrassed. “I was looking for Comrade Kim Yong-hwan to see if South Pyongan was back yet. I know the first thing she’ll do is come get her blood tested.”

Kangwon still couldn’t bring himself to chuckle, but his lips twitched up. “Yeah. She hasn’t been by yet. But I’m sure she’s alright.”

“Mm.” North Pyongan turned away, the bowl in his hands. “Korea must have got the wrong room.”

Kangwon paused in putting his gloves back on. “What do you mean?”

“I ran into him in the hallway. He told me Comrade Kim Yong-hwan was in the blood lab.”

His cousin smiled over his shoulder, and Kangwon finally mustered a real one back, a little more pressure leaving him.

North Pyongan left, and he finished snapping his gloves on, loosening his shoulders. He'd wasted too much time. He had to get back to saving lives.

Kangwon marched through the halls, his lab coat swishing. He didn't let himself linger on the small shrouded shape being carried by on a stretcher.

He couldn't save everyone. He just had to keep pushing forward, cure the people he could, make sure the International Scientific Commission got the information they needed to make their case and make it so that the world was unable to look away from what America was doing and what they had helped do to his people.

Whether they would care, or if they'd brush it off the same way they had all the reports from the International Association of Democratic Lawyers and the Women's International Democratic Federation and the World Federation of Democratic Youth and the World Peace Council… Kangwon didn't know.

He wished he could believe they would.

Sobbed writing this. Every story about Korea or Vietnam where they talk about what the napalm did to anyone, but especially the children messes me up very badly.

Also if you're interested in the American pilots' testimonies, some of the handwritten ones are in the ISC report linked in the germ warfare source chapter.

This poor woman was murdered at her work by a man with a knife. I go online and there's several (men) saying 'I bet he wasn't Japanese.'
No. He was Japanese. He was her ex-boyfriend who had been stalking her and the police didn't deal with her stalking complaints as harshly as they should have (though rarely they did actually listen to her). A big majority of Japanese men genuinely have the worst view of women for a lot of reasons (porn culture being one). But these men only care when immigrants rape and murder women because that's their job and they hate when immigrants take their jobs. This is not specific to Japan. Men in every country bluster about immigrants with backwards views on women but completely ignore the crimes their own men commit. Because they don't actually care about women, they just don't like immigrants. The man killed himself too by the way. He could have saved the trouble and just offed himself from the start and left her the fuck alone. He did it in a Pokemon Center where she worked. Where children go.

Rest in peace Harukawa Moe-san.

So You May Be Healed

It sucked. It was awkward and uncomfortable and made South Pyongan want to throw herself into a dug-out and collapse the roof. She'd known it would be. But it sucked even more than she'd thought, and she wasn't going to get into it ever, no way. She was pretty much never going to think about this again if she could help it.

And that was fucked up, wasn't it? She could forget bashing that guy- Guk Gun's- head open with a rock. But she bet his daughter would never forget how it felt to have her mom stumble into the family farmhouse with her father's blood on her apron, or helping haul his corpse up from the beach.

'When we kill them, we affect more than just their lives.'

Guk Gun had been a greedy bastard willing to betray his province and country for a few yen. He'd deserved to be bashed over the head, knocked out and left on the beach with a nasty concussion for his wife to find later, maybe to tell him he'd been an idiot while she cleaned his wound the way North Pyongan had cleaned the blood from South Pyongan's hands.

But he wasn't a real traitor. Not like the collaborators or the Rheeites. He hadn't deserved to die.

And she hadn't done it because he was a traitor. In the moment, all she'd been thinking about was saving her brother.

He had had kids. He'd had two daughters and three sons. She'd left all of them and his wife without a man in the house for most of the Occupation, a bad time for a woman to be unsupported. Ok Su-jin had to struggle through everything that involved, and the World War, sending her sons off to be conscripted by the Japs and losing two of them, alone.

South Pyongan was lucky she hadn't ran south and sold her story to Rhee's chumps. She was lucky she hadn't told people around Seoncheon or Inhung to turn them against her, and Korea for covering it up. South Pyongan had barely even thought about that day up until she lost her tank crew, but the Guk family had lived with it and the consequences of her actions for thirty-three years.

They were good people, she guessed. They understood why it was covered up. They hadn't let her actions turn them against Korea, even before him and her brother had…

But they could have. Her one second of thoughtless fury could've seriously screwed them all over. How would Korea be supposed to look their people in the eyes and say he was fighting for them when they knew he'd let her get away with killing one of them?

So she got it now. She got why even though she knew Korea wanted everyone that had ever hurt their people dead, they couldn't just kill all of them. Because even a traitor could have loyal family members, who could stay loyal if their husband or whoever was dealt with more lightly. Or could turn traitor, too, if they weren't. Even if she still didn't really like it, she got it.

She didn't get how they could forgive her. That was the worst part- that they did. Guk Gum-yeong said she'd hated her when she was finally old enough for her mom to tell her who had really killed her dad. But Ok Su-jin had told her not to.

'She said she wanted to, too. But when she looked at you, she hadn't seen hatred or viciousness. All she saw was a scared little kid. And she couldn't hate you for being afraid.'

South Pyongan guessed she had been (not the scared part). Even if she'd never really been a kid, she'd only been nine or fifteen that day, depending how you looked at it.

It still didn't feel like an excuse. She hadn't been scared- she'd been about to kill the woman, too.

She told Guk Gum-yeong that. Maybe she shouldn't have. But she did. The woman just said she didn't know if her mom had known that.

‘And you didn’t.’

Only because of North Pyongan.

South Pyongan didn’t say that one out loud. Their people didn’t need to know about her and her brother’s crippling codependency, even if it was… in the past. Or trying to be.

She didn’t feel satisfied when she left. She’d thought maybe it would feel like crossing something off a list- ‘steps to becoming responsible.’ But it didn’t. Maybe it was because she hadn’t been able to apologize to Ok Su-jin herself. Maybe it was because this was the first time she’d ever bowed in apology, let alone got down on her knees and touched her forehead to the ground.

Or maybe this just wasn’t the sort of thing that felt satisfying in the end. Killing on the battlefield was final and clean- the problem was gone. But maybe things like this lingered like bloody wounds, even if you tried to sew them up.

Then again, she guessed killing enemy soldiers lingered, too, for their families and friends. Even if they deserved it.

Maybe she wouldn’t forget about this as easily as she hoped.

She didn’t want to stop to talk to the refugees on her way back. She felt crappy and just wanted to get back to her- Y’know, the bunker and stuff.

But they probably felt crappier, crammed in holes in the ground. And when the war was over and she had to be a politician full-time, she’d have to get used to doing shit even when she didn’t want to. Might as well start now.

So she meandered her way back to Pyongyang, stopping to talk to peasants and workers, joking and reassuring them that they’d kick America’s ass out of the south any day now. She wondered if they’d smile at her less if they knew she’d killed a farmer.

It would be sort of worse if they wouldn’t.

Guk Gum-yeong had smiled at her. A small one as she said goodbye.

South Pyongan wished she'd taken up on her offer to slap her instead. Maybe then she'd be able to feel like they were a little more even. Maybe her last brother would do it if he survived the war.

She was still killing time. Even though she wanted to get back to… headquarters, she wasn't really looking forward to seeing if Korea would say something to her about her absence. Or bringing up what she'd learned with her brother.

She didn't feel satisfied. But she did know what those little struck-out rectangles in Korea's book meant now. After what Guk Gum-yeong had told her, she'd gone back and looked at the first names to ever have the symbol next to them- Kim Sun-hon and An Yong-un, some of the first names in the book at all. She probably wouldn't have recognized them without that little hint, but after wracking her brain harder than she'd ever wracked it before, she had a vague memory.

It was during their 'mapping Korea' time. Korea had snuck away near Seoul. Maybe he'd been looking for info about where his brother was being kept, too, but he'd came back with two sacks of rice. Big ones. He'd refused to let Sang cook with them, even when they hadn't been able to catch anything that night.

It was somewhere between Gyeonggi and Kangwon when he'd snuck away again, creeping off into the dark. South Pyongan had been awake to tease her brother on watch, so she'd followed, naturally. She hated leaving North Pyongan without her, but the others were there, and the lure of snooping on their Countryhuman had been too good to pass up.

It'd been a little farmhouse. She hadn't been able to see what happened after he was invited in, but she'd been close enough to hear him greet the man that answered as 'Kim Sun-hon.' And he'd looked past him to say 'An Yong-un.' He'd entered, stayed for a few minutes, then left without the rice bags.

South Pyongan had been a little curious- she'd asked Kangwon if he knew the names, since he was the only one that had been with Korea longer than her and her brother. He didn't. All he could give her was that maybe it was the couple that had pointed Korea towards his village. Mystery solved, she'd tossed it aside. Korea didn't like when they pestered him about the time before they'd met him (completely understandable now), and it hadn't been interesting enough for her to bother doing it anyway. Yeah yeah- Korea wanted to help out their people. She knew that already.

But now, between that and Guk Gum-yeong, she thought she could decode that symbol. They had to be two rice bags. Them being next to a name meant Korea owed that person. And the strike meant he'd paid them back.

That was why it was next to people like Paik Sun-yup and Jo Man-sik, too. They owed Korea something- their lives. She was glad to see they'd paid up, at least. It was comforting to know they could still kill some people that deserved it.

It was the last day of May by the time she made it back. She thought. She hadn't really been keeping count. Maybe Korea would accuse her of shirking her work and she could make him mad enough to fight her. It could help blow off some of this uncomfortable feeling and make her feel like herself again.

She went to give her blood sample to Kim Yong-hwan (not being able to check it these past few days had been making her feel… itchy), then actually caught the General on his way back from directing the troops or hugging orphans or whatever he got up to. He pulled up in his grey car on the outskirts of Pyongyang, smiling at her out the back window.

"Here." She thrust the book out at him.

It disappeared into the vehicle without him breaking eye contact.

"I trust my birth province accomplished what she needed to?"

"Yeah yeah," she muttered, shoving her hands in the pockets of her protective suit. "South Pyongan province can do anything."

His smile made her shoulders hunch. "I'm aware. Would Comrade South Pyongan like a ride?"

And risk him delivering her straight to Korea? Nooo way. Their fight could come later. Three days wasn't enough to time to feel normal again. She didn't want to say anything embarrassing like that one night she'd jumped him.

"The exercise is good for me," she said, inching away.

The General nodded with mock solemnity. "Revolutionary vigour can only spring from personal vigour. Your dedication to staying fit is admirable, comrade."

Definitely planning on kidnapping her.

She stuck out her tongue at him as he slowly cranked his window up. Crossing her arms, she watched him drive off for Moran Hill, then turned for the north highway. It was both too late and too early to do fieldwork, so she figured she'd visit refugees or something until it was time to meet up at the GAZ.

Ugh. She wasn't looking forward to her cousins asking her where she'd been. She knew SH would mind her business, but the others were definitely going to push. Especially Hwang and Hae. And North Hamgyong, just because he'd sense he could embarrass her. She'd better think of a good lie. Assassinating reactionaries in her province, maybe. That sounded cool.

She stopped at the rest house to check in on North Pyongan's boys, Han-jin and the pretty one. He was a man now, so it probably wasn't too smart for her to be around him, considering how delicate his features were. They kind of made her think about punching him, like Korea's brother, or any other pretty guy.

But he was crippled, so it would be kind of unfair to take away what he had going for him. So she could resist the urge to rearrange his features a bit. Especially today.

"Comrade South Pyongan." Tae-min's dark eyes lit up when he saw her, and he hobbled over from the rest house.

Huh. That was livelier than she'd ever seen from him.

"Are you here for uniform repair or just to visit?" he asked, leaning on his cane. “We’ve got soup on the fire. I helped make it.”

There was a prideful tinge to his voice.

“Little landlord’s learned how to cook, huh?” she asked, ruffling his hair. She loved doing that to men. They pretty much always hated it.

Tae-min leaned away from her, giving an embarrassed half-laugh. “Yes. I know I should have learned growing up. But I’ve caught up to Han-jin now. Do you want some?”

‘Soup…’

She’d been semi-foraging, semi-accepting-small-meals-from-people-that-invited-her-home for the last few days, so the idea made her mouth water.

But since she’d already been taking stuff from people, she knew she couldn’t now. The rest house supplies should be for their soldiers and the Chinese.

“I’m good,” she said, sucking her saliva back (gross).

His gaze dipped down. “Do you want me to sew up your suit?”

“What?!” South Pyongan’s head jerked down, her eyes shooting open as she realized there was a small tear in her white protective suit.

Ssi-bal, it must have torn when she was going through the hills. That’s what she got for fucking wasting time.

She stripped off the suit and her uniform quickly followed, but she stopped short of her undershirt and pants, remembering Korea’s warning not to let people see too much of her burns. She patted herself down aggressively, making sure no bugs had crawled through the gap.

Tae-min watched, bemused. “Is that a yes?”

“Yeah yeah, Sewing Boy, fix my suit.” She ignored him walking off with it, turning in circles as she checked herself for ticks or fleas or anything with more legs than it should have.

She didn't find any, but ssi-bal, she was going to feel itchy for the next week. She needed a bath.

Shuddering, she went to lean against the wall of the rest house outside the dug-out part, sheltering under the eaves so bugs couldn't get dropped on her. It'd been bombed a few times, but the aid women were used to taking cover. They hadn't had any fatalities yet.

One of the women nodded to her, but her and the others were preoccupied with feeding a few soldiers, so unfortunately none of them came over to force her to accept the delicious-smelling soup filling the air with the scent of doenjang and radish.

Hm. Now that she thought about it, she'd sort of taken off without telling her guards. Korea couldn't exactly blame them for that one since SH had gotten his permission for her to ditch them, but she hoped she hadn't given them an aneurysm. They were just starting to respond to her teasing.

It was a little relieving to be out of her suit and able to feel the air on her face, even if it was starting to get uncomfortably warm. General, she was probably going to start melting once summer really got going. Kangwon's foreign investigation squad had better blow this germ warfare shit open when they got here.

Her eyes lingered on the magpie head carved into the top of Tae-min's cane, then flicked away.

There was probably someone else she should say sorry to. Not today, though. Not until she was more… settled.

She watched Tae-min sit on his haunches by the stove, starting to sew her suit. He was working fast, and his stitches looked good. Not as skilled as hers, obviously. But good. He even kept working as he responded to something one of the aid women said, making her laugh and putting a slight smile on his own (unnaturally pretty) face.

It looked like he was finally cheering up. She'd have to tell her brother. He probably already knew, since some of his weekend rations went to them, but it would reassure him to hear it from her, too.

"Looks like your comrade's doing well," she said to the person standing next to her.

"Yeah," Han-jin muttered, his brown eyes fixed on Tae-min. "He's great."

One of South Pyongan's eyebrows went up. "Wow. You sound thrilled about that. Someone piss in your rations?"

He tore his gaze away from his friend. "It's nothing."

Unfortunately for him, South Pyongan needed any excuse to stop thinking about her own crap.

"C'mon, Farm Boy. I'm a government official. Don't make me order you to tell me."

Totally not an abuse of power. She was trying to be helpful. With zero ulterior motives.

Han-jin crossed his tanned arms, looking away. "It's just…" His jaw feathered. "When we were growing up, Tae-min depended on me for everything. I'm the one that did his farm chores for him, I'm the one that made sure he wasn't bullied, I'm the one that carried his stuff and defended him from Kim Kang-sim. And now…"

He put a hand over the right side of his chest, where he'd been shot, looking frustrated.

"I can't do none of that stuff," the young man said bitterly. "And it was the only stuff I was any good at. I'm not even as crippled as Tae-min, but I'm way more useless than him. I knew how to mend stuff and cook before he did, but he's already better than me. He can sew and cook and sing, and I can't even build us a house or catch us food. All I can do is chop wood." His fingers tented over the old wound, nails digging at his workshirt. "And even that leaves me feeling like I got run over by a horse."

South Pyongan's hand went to her xiphoid process, thankful that she'd listened to Kangwon and not savaged any of the bastards in the holding camp.

"I can't take care of him anymore," Han-jin said, his eyes on his friend again. "I can't protect him. And he doesn't need me to." His voice cracked. "He doesn't need me anymore."

He ducked his head away, hiding his freckled face in his shoulder. South Pyongan looked away too.

Yeah, she shouldn't have asked. Those words hit… just a little too close to home.

But she guessed that meant she knew what to say.

"Kid."

Han-jin looked over at her as she slapped his broad shoulder, but his eyes darted to the side like he could hide their glistening that way.

"You can't seriously think it's a bad thing that he can take care of himself."

"No," he muttered. "But I just…"

He trailed off, and she hated that she could almost hear what he was thinking.

'Who am I if not his protector?'

"No 'just,'" she scolded. "It's pathetic that you want him to stay useless just so you can feel needed."

Han-jin's cheeks darkened in shame. "I don't! That's not what it's about."

"Could've fooled me," South Pyongan retorted. "You're watching him grow out of being a spoiled landlord's brat and actually start to be useful to people, and you're over here moping about it."

His expression turned indignant. “Tae-min might not have been good at farm work or anything, but he’s never been useless.”

She could have asked if he thought that just maybe his friend might feel the same way about him, but she knew that wasn’t what he needed to hear. Even when she’d known her brother would always want her by his side, even now that he didn’t need her there, it hadn’t been enough.

“But he was weak, right?” she challenged. “He needed you to protect him because if you didn’t, he’d end up beat to shit or dead.”

Han-jin looked down.

“And what happened when you couldn’t be there for him?”

His lips thinned as his hands balled into fists.

“That’s what I thought.” South Pyongan crossed her arms. “We’re literally at war, and the Yanks are raining all kinds of bullshit on us. You could die any day and Tae-min would be left alone. Would you want him to bumble around without you until he fell into a hole and died?”

Obviously her and her brother would look out for him in that case. And Liaoxi, she guessed. But that didn’t make a good threat.

And it wasn’t like they could make up for losing him.

“No,” Han-jin muttered, and he looked so dejected that even she softened a little.

No. Wrong word. Chilled a little.

“Look, Han-jin-" Ugh, she hated saying names directly. “You’re best friends, right? Like brothers, basically?”

“…Yeah, I guess,” he said eventually, kicking at the ground.

South Pyongan nodded. “So he’s never going to want to get rid of you just ‘cuz he’s better at everything than you now. He’ll keep you around while you find new ways to look out for him. Beating assholes up isn't the only way. You've just got to find new tactics."

Like her.

"Plus I'm pretty sure 'no manual labour' doesn't mean you can't throw a punch or two," she added, trying to keep things light.

"I'm just…" Han-jin looked down at his work-worn hands, flexing them. "I have no idea what other tactics there are. I've really… only ever known how to protect him. And I couldn't do it when it counted." His eyes dulled. "I couldn't even protect my own family."

She was not getting into serious crap like that. She'd had enough of it to last a lifetime, thanks.

"You can figure them out eventually," South Pyongan told him, focusing on the first part. "But until then, you should be glad you don't have to protect him anymore. "

If she'd been able to count on her brother to defend himself back then, maybe she wouldn't have killed Guk Gun. If North Pyongan had known how to disarm him, or even if she'd just been able to trust that he wouldn't let himself get stabbed just to stick to his pacifism, maybe she could have held off for just a second more, and he could have handled things. Guk Gum-yeong and her siblings would have grown up with their father. Ok Su-jin wouldn't have had to shoulder their family on her own. South Pyongan wouldn't feel like this now.

She wasn't blaming her brother. She wasn't like Korea's, trying to shove the blame off like a little coward. South Pyongan could take responsibility, when she needed to.

It was her fault, for coddling him, for letting him remain gentle for so long. She had only wanted to protect him, but in the end it was selfish of her to always throw herself into danger, fight after fight after alleyway mugging, when she couldn't even feel assured that he'd punch a guy with a knife out to save himself. Obviously she was too good to get taken out by some schmuck. But if one of them had ever gotten lucky, her brother would have been left alone, defenseless.

The Hamgyongs had never told anyone the full story about how exactly SH had ended up where she had, except for maybe Korea. But it was easy enough to put the pieces together with all their quips and jabs. If she'd ever been taken out, North Pyongan could have ended up in a position like that. Not the exact same, obviously. But similar. Desperate measures. And that was if he hadn't been knifed in an alleyway by whoever managed to off her.

She wished they could have lived a life where her brother could have kept his gentleness. Where he never needed to worry about the blood on their hands and she didn't need to worry about whether or not he could get it on his hands if he had to.

Well, not really. She didn't regret all those fights or battles. And the only life she truly regretted taking was Guk Gun's. She wasn't bloodthirsty, she didn't like killing. But she was made for combat, and she could never regret that. She was a damn good soldier, even if that wasn't all she could be.

But she would give her past of thrills and violence up, and replace it with one of tranquility, one where she was someone else entirely, if it was for her brother's sake.

But it wasn't possible. They'd been formed into violence and they would live in it until this war was over. They had lived a life that broke gentle things. And by sheltering her brother, she'd been setting him up to be broken. Hadn't she realized that years ago, when she'd first told Korea about his pacifism? Hadn't that been why she'd told him, why she'd made that suggestion?

'Demand.'

Maybe she'd known that lesson long before Korea had taught it to her. She just hadn't wanted to learn it.

"It's good Tae-min can protect himself," she said to Han-jin, and she felt that final little bit of discomfort that had been clinging to her liver dissipate. "You shouldn't have to need to protect him. You should have to want to."

It was a little embarrassing to quote Korea like that. But it wasn't like the man would ever know. Either of them.

Han-jin lifted his eyes to his friend again, who was tying off the thread on her suit. “I do,” he said earnestly, his throat bobbing.

South Pyongan nodded in satisfaction. “Then you’ll find a way. And you know he’ll be fine until you do.”

It was good that her brother wasn’t dependent on her anymore. Now they could both depend on each other, and so could their people. So could Han-jin and Tae-min. It’d just take them a little time.

Probably. If not, she’d done all she could. Any further help would be in North Pyongan’s hands.

“Yeah,” Han-jin said quietly. “I guess I do.”

“Comrade South Pyongan.” Tae-min limped over with her protective suit. “Here you go. I… hope I mended it well enough for you.”

“As long as germs and bugs can’t get in, it’s great,” she said, snatching it back and shoving herself in after putting her tunic back on.

‘Phew.’ She adjusted her hood and face mask. ‘Much better.’

She’d still need to get a new suit, but now this one could last until she requisitioned one.

It wasn’t like she was afraid of germs like North Hamgyong kept saying to her. She just didn’t want to end up comatose like Korea. Or all gross and rashy.

Tae-min’s gaze flicked warily to Han-jin. “He wasn’t saying anything strange to you, was he?”

“Oh yeah, totally,” South Pyongan said, tucking her sleeves into her gloves. “He’s worried that now that you’ve got life skills, he’s useless to you and you won’t need him anymore.”

Tae-min's eyes narrowed, and Han-jin whirled to her, gaping in shocked betrayal. "What?!"

She shrugged, smirking. "Sorry, if you wanted me to keep quiet, you should've made me swear a vow of secrecy before he got over here."

Yeah, she'd throttle someone if they did that to her. But she'd had a long week. Let her have this.

Tae-min glared at his friend, his lips pressed into a disappointed line. "You're still being like this?"

"I didn't- I mean-" Han-jin gave South Pyongan a look like a kicked puppy.

"Bye," she chirped, waving as she walked away. "Have fun with your awkward conversation."

Tae-min reached up to grab Han-jin by the collar, dragging him behind the rest house, and maybe she'd been wrong about him being able to still throw a punch because it looked like he wasn't even able to escape the grasp of a man with one good leg.

Joking. She was never wrong.

"I'm sorry," she heard Han-jin say shamefully as she left. "I know you hate-"

Tae-min cut him off, hissing, "How many times do I have to tell you you matter to me, no matter what?"

Yep. Definitely an awkward conversation. And finally one she wasn't a part of. That made her feel a little better.

But she hadn't made it far down the road before that weighty sense of, ugh, responsibility crept back in. She stopped, chewing on the side of her cheek.

Then she did an about-face back towards the city, strutting off with purpose.

This shouldn't take long, right? She was sort of already primed for it. Korea had been pretty much grooming her for the job since those first years, even if she'd been ruffling her fur back up after.

'Learn new tactics.' New ways to protect her brother and their people.

She couldn't just say that crap to Han-jin then not use the obvious tactic she had. Like Korea and the General said, they had to win over the masses through deeds, not words. In this case, that basically meant putting her money where her mouth was, right? Sure.

It had been their deeds that kept Ok Su-jin and her children from turning against their People's Government because of her deed after all.

General, wouldn't it be embarrassing if she screwed up and got rejected? She would never be able to face Korea again. She'd have to go into hiding, maybe run back to Anbulsa Temple to become a Buddhist monk or something. She could do that. She was already bald.

She shook her head until her brain rattled off the walls of her skull.

No. She wouldn't screw up. South Pyongan province didn't screw up. Not anymore. She would get in, even if it wasn't today. She had to. She needed to find new ways to protect her people, to make life as peaceful and good as possible for them, to try and make it up to Guk Gum-yeong for what she'd done as best as she could by making their country the best place possible for her and her children and grandchildren. To make a world where people with her brother's gentleness could live without being broken.

She wanted to.

—

'I have to believe that they are.'

North Pyongan sat upright in his cot, his legs folded under him and his back against the cool wall as the words he had said to Kangwon yesterday ran in his mind like a river.

Were people good? He couldn't know. Humanity was inherently sinful, but he didn't hold to the view that some did where that meant they were inherently bad. Even the most upright person sinned simply by being born. What mattered was not committing sins of your own free will.

God's creations were all supposed to be good. But he had seen enough to know that even if that was true, that they could grow warped on the way through life, like the roots of a tree growing for water, only to rot once they reached it, until they weren't. People like Paik Sun-yup, Syngman Rhee, and Kim Kang-sim and his father couldn't be said to be good.

And where did people like Kim Pan-suk, who would lie on the Bible to protect her neighbours and make sure justice was served by executing a boy, fit in? Or Pak Chae-eun, who had truly thought he was doing the right thing, even if he had taken money for it?

Where did he fit in?

He didn't have his Bible anymore. He couldn't look through it to try and find an answer in words he had read before. Perhaps there wasn't one. It had been written by men after all, trying to communicate God's word. They were imperfect and flawed, and likely didn't have a better answer than him. Perhaps it was easier to divide the world into black and white, Good and Evil, than it was to try and convey what a deity truly saw as behaviour worthy of Heaven.

'Imperfect and flawed.' Maybe that was what humanity was.

But as imperfect and flawed as they were, they were theirs.

North Pyongan had always turned away from the passages in the Bible that portrayed God as cruel or vengeful. He had always seen them as men ascribing vengeance to justice, or misinterpreting. He couldn't believe that the Lord, the one that had created them and watched over them, was corrupted by the same petty hates as mortals. Because how could he feel safe in His hands then?

But their people were vengeful. And sometimes what they wanted was justice to him, but to them, it was so often just vengeance. Han-jin had wanted to see Kim Kang-sim dead to protect Tae-min and Ahn Chun-hui, but he had also just wanted to see him dead. No matter what had occurred between them, that was still vengeance. Even the people that had never lifted their hand against another or had only done it for pure justice or liberty were prey to the same petty hates as mortals because they were mortals.

The people they were guiding were people, with all the flaws and imperfections and hatreds that entailed. And so were they.

So he had to believe they were good, didn't he? In the same way he had to believe that if there really was someone watching over them, He had to be good, he had to believe that the people he was guiding, and that were guiding him in turn, were good. Otherwise he would be looking over his shoulder the way Korea had been looking over his at him, questioning their every step, fearing that he would be allowed to head down the wrong path.

He had to believe god was good.

The door to the men's room creaked open, and he relaxed. It was pitch black, but he knew who it was. She brought the smell of ozone and sweat with her.

"Sister," he said softly.

She didn't answer. The door shut, and she padded over. His cot sighed as she climbed onto it, and he lifted his arms so she could curl up with her head in his lap. He rested a hand on her shoulder, waiting for her to speak.

"I went to talk to Guk Gun's family," she said eventually.

He had thought so. Korea had hinted at it after he had caught him at the hospital.

"And?" He kept himself at a whisper. His sister would get violent if one of their cousins woke up and discovered her like this.

“When were you going to tell me you visited them?”

“I wasn’t,” he admitted.

Soon after Liberation, Korea had asked him for the location Guk Gun had died at, so he could find his family and relocate them to South Hamgyong, far from bad memories. North Pyongan had gone with him to gift them with rice and livestock, and to try and make up for that day.

It hadn't been enough. Not for him.

“You apologized for me,” she accused.

“I didn’t think you would.” His cheeks burned with shame as he confessed. “I wanted Ok Su-jin to hear it before she passed. I’m sorry.”

“They forgave me,” she said after a moment, quietly.

“Yes.”

He had always wanted to tell her. But then he would have had to tell her he had gone to see them. And… he didn’t think she would believe it from him. Not when he had told her so many white lies before.

His sister was quiet for awhile. He stroked a hand over her firm shoulder.

“Do you think they would have if I wasn’t a province?”

“I don’t know,” he said truthfully.

He had wondered the same as they presented the Guk family with their new home, land, and gifts. Would Ok Su-jin have carried that sympathetic look as she said they were forgiven if they had been human instead of Provincehumans?

“We can’t know,” he said. “All we can do is be worthy of their forgiveness regardless.”

And to hold themselves and each other to the standards that their people might not. To hold each other steady on their path.

"You don't need to be forgiven," she muttered into his leg. "You weren't the one that offed him."

"I could have stopped you."

"No, you couldn't have."

No. He couldn't have. But if he had been stronger, he might not have had to.

"I would stop you now," he promised.

"I wouldn't do it now."

"I know."

South Pyongan drew her legs up until her knees dug into his thigh. "Do you think I'm…?"

North Pyongan smiled, even though she couldn't see it. "Yes."

Regardless of whether or not his sister would have been forgiven if she wasn't a province, she was worthy of it.

She was still for a long while as he ran his hand over her side.

"It was my idea." Her voice was the quiet susurration of a wellspring.

His hand kept up its rhythmic motions, waiting for her to finish.

She turned her face further into him, warming his stomach. "I'm the one that came up with the idea for Korea to hit you, and to beat the crap out of me to scare your pacifism out of you. Not him. It was all a set-up."

"I know."

Her head shot up. "What do you mean 'I know?'"

He smiled. “You never would have gone down so easily.”

She was silent for a moment, her arms caging his legs in, then, “It was messed up.”

“A little.” Even if he had never been able to feel proper resentment for it, towards either of them. “But it was something that needed to happen.”

He didn’t know if he would have been able to shoot that brothel guard if it wasn’t for that lesson. And if he had let that girl be dragged back inside when her eyes had been gleaming with that desperate hope, he would have been committing a greater sin than ending a life.

It was shameful that he had to have his sister threatened for him to realize that. But at least he had. Out of all the times South Pyongan had protected him, the time she had let him get hurt was the one that had truly protected him, and others.

“You should hate me.” She sounded smaller than he had ever heard her.

“I could never hate you,” he said simply. “You’re my sister.”

South Pyongan let out a shaky exhale, then planted her face in his lap again. “Gross,” she muttered.

He chuckled.

“…You know I’ve never thought you were useless, right?” she quietly asked.

“I do.”

Even when he sometimes had felt it, he knew she hadn’t. Because if their roles were reversed, he could never feel like she was useless. Like he had told Tae-min- they weren’t ever not good enough for the ones that loved them.

“Good. You can’t be useless. You’re my brother.” To make it sound less sappy, she added, “No one related to me can be lame. Even North Hamgyong.”

Speaking of people related to them…

“The next time you see Kangwon, could you give him a few words about Gangwon?”

His sister squirmed, but didn’t protest the way he had thought she might.

“Yeah,” she said, subdued. “I’ll… try.”

“Thank you.” He couldn’t help but still feel guilty that he had let his cousin go uncomforted for so long. He knew it couldn’t be the only reason for his distress yesterday, but…

He had never seen him cry before.

“Oh, check this out,” his sister said, more upbeat as he heard her rummaging around in her clothes. “Boom.”

She didn’t say anything else helpful, so he had to reach around in the dark above her for whatever she was holding out, eventually having to start at her shoulder and work his way up once he realized she was moving her hand around.

When he did, he felt something like a card in her hand, thin, with pages inside.

He raised his eyebrows. “Is that…?”

“Yep,” she said, whisking it away. “And I bet it’s cooler-looking than yours.”

“They all look the same.”

“Yeah, but yours is a little lamer.”

North Pyongan shook his head fondly, heart glowing. “I’m proud of you, Pyo. And not just for this.”

She *‘tch’*ed, suddenly embarrassed. “Whatever. It was nothing.”

He knew that wasn't true. It was hard for his sister to apologize to people that weren't him. It was harder for her to be vulnerable, even with him. He knew what she had done must have taken an incredible amount of determination and bravery from her.

He should have known she would be able to do it someday, he thought, running the side of his hand over her ribs as she shifted to stare up at the bottom of the upper bunk with a weighty sigh.

After all, his sister had always been the bravest person he knew.

—

One last embarrassing thing, then South Pyongan would stop putting herself through humiliation torture.

She snuck out of the men's room before morning, acting like she'd slept in her own bunk all night, then left for the city with the others. Everyone wanted to know where she'd been, obviously, so she told them she had a top-secret mission to hunt down more reactionaries, and they totally believed her.

Okay, except for SH. She gave her a knowing smile.

'Bleh.'

Korea was waiting for them as usual, arms behind his back in a military brace. His eye flicked to her as she jumped out, but he didn't say anything, just launched right into their orders for the day.

The main crops were all planted by now, but the fields still needed tending, and namul could be grown all summer. Plus there was stuff to get done for the scientific commission thingy that would be visiting at the end of the month. They needed to head to their provinces and look for more people that had seen the Yanks dropping shit.

South Pyongan had thought that was Kangwon's job, but she guessed he was probably wrapped up in hospital work.

'Great.' She was going to have to expose herself to more germs.

But she didn't complain, just saluted with all the others. Then loitered around after they'd left.

Her brother gave her a curious look back, and she hunched. He smiled, padding away with Liaoxi.

Keuda and Jakda were waiting nearby for her, so she made it her first order of business to order them to walk twenty metres away and face their backs to her. She did not need an audience for this.

Finally, she turned around.

"You're back," Korea said.

The General had probably already told him, since he'd been at Jonsung last night. South Pyongan didn't bother searching his face to see what he thought about where she might've been or what she might've done. She rarely found anything that didn't make her squirmy there.

Instead, she reached into her protective suit and pulled something from her tunic pocket, flicking it at him. He deftly caught it out of the air, examining it.

It was a small red booklet of good quality cardstock, printed with the words 'Worker's Party of Korea,' along with the hammer-sickle-inkbrush. A Worker's Party membership card. She hadn't stolen her brother's this time- this one had her headshot and full signature and on the first page.

'Pyongannam-do.'

Korea stared at it while South Pyongan tried not to fidget. Then he snapped it closed, handing it back.

"Well done," he said, dipping his head.

Some tension left her shoulders as she smirked. "Got in super easy, by the way."

"Good. I won't help you get back in when you lose it."

“Good thing that’s not gonna happen.”

Korea watched her spin the card in the air, catching it between two fingers. “I give you two weeks.”

“Okay, rude,” she said indignantly. She was sure she could go at least three.

Her Countryhuman met her eyes. “Prove me wrong.”

South Pyongan wrapped her fingers around the card, pressing it to her palm. Then she tucked it back into her pocket.

“You’re on,” she said, grinning.

The corners of his mouth did something that wasn’t anywhere close to a smile, but still made her look away. Then he set off in the direction Pretty Boy had gone earlier.

South Pyongan made sure her card was tucked safely away (she had to make sure she didn’t lose it now), then zipped up her protective suit. She strutted a few steps away, then looked over her shoulder at her Countryhuman’s retreating back.

Part of her wanted to say something. About Guk Gun, about his book, about how him and North Pyongan had taken responsibility for her when it came to the family. About how even if he would always be Korea before anything else and needed to exist for their people, he could find ways to live for himself, too.

“Oi, Korea!”

He turned to meet her, but he was just a little too slow. Her fist took him right in the gut at full force, doubling him over. She felt one of his burns split under it.

“What the fuck is wrong with you?!” he gasped, glaring up at her.

Before he could straighten up and get revenge, South Pyongan danced back and away, taking off at a sprint.

“I don’t know, but I doubt you can expel me from the Party for it!”

she cackled. “C’mon, Guard Boys- keep up!”

Her guards (who were so totally glad she was back) broke into a run after her as she pelted down the road, ignoring the threats Korea shouted after her.

“I’m going to put you up against the wall!”

“You wouldn’t kill a card-carrying commie!” she yelled back.

“I’m raising your dues!”

But he didn’t give chase. He glowered after her, probably regretting ever wanting her in the Party in the first place. Hehe, sucked to be him. South Pyongan had decided she wanted to be, so now he wasn’t getting rid of her. She couldn’t wait to find ways to annoy him at the Central Committee meetings. It would make up for having to go to them now.

One last embarrassing thing, that had been the deal. She’d hit her limit and was done talking about mushy stuff for another year or seven or ever.

And Korea probably wouldn’t have listened to her anyway.

South Pyongan grinned, picking up speed. She felt motivated enough to run all the way to Anju, though she’d still get the ride Korea had waiting for her.

She had a job to do after all.

‘Therefore, confess your sins to one another so that you may be healed.’
…Why does it sound like the Bible line about confession doesn’t imply confessing to a priest or god for forgiveness, but actually sharing your sins with your fellow humans so that guilt can be dealt with and healing can be done interpersonally?

Something I ‘love’- so many websites say things like ‘most churches/temples in the DPRK were destroyed after its foundation.’

…By whom? Go on. Who destroyed the churches? Was it perhaps the same people that bombed every building over two stories into the ground and destroyed countless historical artifacts? (it was, because if you search out information specifically on those old churches and temples, they all say things like 'they were damaged heavily/destroyed in the Korean War;' they just want you to read that and fill in the blanks as 'the evil Communists stifling religious freedom by tearing down churches,' when in reality it was the 'good American Christians' that ruined all their houses of worship)

Every time someone implies Tae-min and Han-jin have a brotherly relationship, they die a little inside. But obviously they can't deny it. 'Yeah we sleep in the same bed I mean room because we're brothers. Why else would we?'
Also they aren't together. So the energy of them sleeping in the same 'bed' (straw mattress) can best be described as awkward and stiff.
lying on the very edges of the mattress so they won't touch even on accident
'…'Night Tae-min.'
'I'm going to kill myself.'

Also again can you believe I invented their part in this story literally in the first sentence they showed up in? They didn't exist until I thought 'Hm, I want North Pyongan and Liaoxi to encounter locals here,' but now North Pyongan, Liaoxi, and South Pyongan's relationships and arcs couldn't exist the same way without them. Maybe one day I will visit Ganghwa in their honour.
Wait. When this is finished I should take a huge inter-Korea tour. Go visit all the South Korean spots (the cave North and China stay in during their trip south is Yongyeon Cave, a tourist place now), then get a private tour of the North Korean spots. See if I get any questioning looks for my incredibly specific and sporadic itinerary (yes I would love to visit the Kangso Mineral Water Factory and then Sincheon). Hmmmmm.

Always Another Day

“I’ll miss you, Little Sister.”

“I’ll miss you, too.” Zhao Jingjing leaned up, wrapping her arms around China. “Be safe.”

“When am I not?” the Countryhuman asked, and the woman gave him a dry but fond look.

North lingered nearby, scanning their surroundings. They were just north of Uiju, and while there weren’t any soldiers stationed on the wide-open floodplain, there also wasn’t any cover, and they were near an airfield.

“I mean it,” Zhao Jingjing said, her husky voice slightly thick. “I want to see you come home, gege.”

“I will,” China said breezily. “When I feel like it.”

North’s shoulders hunched. He knew he could hear him. He really meant, ‘When I’m done here.’

The sun beat down with a gentle whine, and he could taste dust and year-old blood baking under it as a crow offered him its feast.

He should have been done here a long time ago.

Zhao Jingjing cupped her Countryhuman’s masked face, and her gaze went past him to North, who quickly tried to pretend he wasn’t watching.

“Comrade Korea, if it’s not too much trouble, could I ask you to look out for him?”

He shouldn't have to. China should be going home with her today.

He couldn’t say no and he didn’t want to say yes. He just dipped his chin, stiffly.

“Thank you.”

“Gege will be just fine,” China told her. “You just worry about becoming my clever little doctor for real. And help this investigation team understand what’s being done to us and our comrades.”

“I will.” The woman smiled up at China, the wrinkles at the corners of her deep brown eyes crinkling.

Would things have been any different if they had said goodbye?

Then her hand slid away, and she hoisted her bag over her shoulder, jogging over to the rest of the lab team waiting for her. She lifted her arm in a wave as they started to head for the pontoon bridge, escorted by a duo of border guards.

China watched his her go, a small smile on his face. North didn’t disturb him until the woman was on the far shore.

“How do you know her?” he finally asked, coming to stand a few paces away from him.

His comrade didn’t take his gaze off the distant smear of the medical team, like he could still see her with perfect clarity. “Your pretty province already told you, didn’t she?”

She did. And he had been right about Zhao Jingjing’s past.

North’s teeth clenched. “Why did you send her to talk to South Hamgyong?”

“I didn’t,” China said, finally taking his eyes off his ‘little sister.’ “She only told me she ran into her.”

The Korean searched his face. The only thing he found was a lingering reluctance that made him look away.

He didn’t trust him. But he would still tell South Hamgyong he didn’t think he’d had anything to do with Zhao Jingjing approaching her that day. She hadn't said anything outright, but he knew she would hate the idea that someone could have their suspicions about her past the same way North had his suspicions about the Chinese woman's just from the way she talked.

His jaw creaked at the memory of those newspaper articles. He had been keeping his eye out for more, but there still hadn't been any since last year. But who knew how many people had seen them before they stopped being published?

He would deal with it when Reunification came, just like he would deal with it if the real reason the Pyongans had been in prison was ever exposed, though that seemed more unlikely than ever now.

He was proud of South Pyongan. Not that he was going to say that to her face, especially not after she'd split his damn burn gash again. Once she got back from her province, he was going to put that face into the steel door of the bunker. But he would make sure to take her Party membership card out of her pocket first so it wouldn't get ruined.

He was pleased with SH, too, after she had told him about the message she'd had sent, even if it carried a slight risk to whoever passed it. She proved once again that Korean women were superior to Yankee women.

"You can go," he told China tightly, realizing he was staring across the shore again.

'Go, get out of here.'

The other man shook his head, turning his back on the Amnok and the mountains across it. "And leave you to be bored during this little intermission? Perish the thought."

North had been hoping seeing Zhao Jingjing leave Korea for good might tempt him into following her. He should have known better by now.

He turned on his heel. "Come on then," he ordered. "We're wasting time."

"You didn't have to come," China pointed out.

North didn't answer. He hadn't liked the idea of the other Countryhuman heading back from the border alone. The skies were quiet enough during the day, but that didn't mean a fighter jet wouldn't decide to strafe his vehicle, or another air-drop wouldn't happen.

And there had been more pamphlets dropped on them last week- June 8th, an exact year after China had unmasked himself at Chorweon. America had a clearer photo of him now, taken from the UN trial.

And the reward had gone up. One hundred and fifty thousand American dollars. That was what China was worth now. That was the price America would pay for war with him.

North scanned the sky again, starting with towards the North Pyongan coast and ending northeast, looking up the Amnok River. He could see MiGs circling in the distance above the Supung Dam and its hydroelectric facilities, on guard against something he couldn't see.

They were supplying almost all of their power right now, more than usual with all their other power facilities being struck on a daily basis. The Supung had been remaining untargeted so far, since bombing it would be a direct attack on China's energy, too, which wouldn't look good for America when the other nations were already antsy about Korea remaining unconquered, and the possibility of the war spreading.

And Geoje.

The foreign correspondents were still banned from some of the mainland camps, but they were back on the island now, and more reports to make North grind his teeth were coming out. Mock raids on empty compounds demonstrating their might to the prisoners, and how easily they could crush them if they wanted to, the destruction of buildings when the camps were still in desperate need for housing, likely 'cleaning up' those places that had been accused of being torture chambers before anyone could stick their mouth out where they weren't supposed to, another compound that refused to be called traitors broken up and destroyed, leaving forty-one dead and almost three hundred wounded as the Yankee prison guards and their backup smoked them out with tear gas and concussion grenades, burned down their buildings and tore the resisters open with their bayonets. The Yanks had only lost one man, killed by his own 'harmless' grenade.

The news the articles conveyed should have been filled with the sense that the reporter was breaking some horrible story, a great injustice for the world to protest. But as North had slowly worked his way through the English words of the Associated Press, he couldn't help but feel that the tone was decidedly gleeful.

Maybe that's why when China asked, "Do you think this little scientific commission is going to be able to do anything?" North had to bite his tongue.

"If they're any good, they'll come to the same conclusion our scientists did- germ warfare is being used in Korea." Anything that came after had nothing to do with their skill.

China's brows raised knowingly under his scarf. "Not exactly a direct answer."

"Do you?" North countered.

"I trust my Committee of Reception to assist them properly," China said, angling his head back towards his country, like he could see the medical men that had volunteered for the job. "I trust my scientists and yours to present their evidence well. And I trust my Jingjing to pass on my remarks to them. You'll notice that she never sold me out, by the way."

Not yet, anyway.

"And what about the foreigners?"

The number of necessary men for the Commission had been reached, and they were on their way to China now to begin the investigation. A Soviet and a Brazilian were part of it, but the rest were Western European men.

"I try not to mistrust scientists of any nationality," China said. "It can be bad for the health."

"And that's a direct answer," North muttered.

His comrade smiled. "If I don't mistrust them, then doesn't that mean I trust them?"

He said it in a teasing tone. North hunched, walking faster.

"No."

"Hm." China kept pace as they crossed the farmland-covered floodplain for their vehicle. "I've read all their biographies. I trust that they're capable men with capable assistants. I'm choosing to trust that when they're confronted with the evidence, they will believe it. But I don't trust that it will be the tidy little conclusion to this germ warfare arc that your blood-hungry province thinks it will be."

"Don't call Kangwon that," North muttered, flinching as he saw wide eyes glimmering with tears.

'It hurts.'

He'd never seen his province cry before. With that wobbling lip and helpless expression, it made him look like-

"And it had better be," he said, his palm burns bursting as he curled his fingers in.

Or at least it better get enough attention that America's attempts would have to get subtler, and there would be less of them.

"En." China looked upstream, towards the MiGs above the Supung. "Let's hope it's the straw that topples the camel and makes our antagonist sign the armistice while we're at it."

"It won't."

North was past the stage of thinking that anyone would care even if the proof of germ weapons being used on his people was shoved in their faces. All the other nations would care about was that it impacted their image, not that it was killing Koreans. And if they wanted to make up for their image, then they needed to be able to claim 'victory' in Korea, or at least trick their own people into thinking they had.

"Geoje has been disgusting them," China pointed out. "Truman's little visitation proposal getting turned down proves that."

After breaking up the other compound on the 10th, the Yankee president had invited Sweden, Switzerland, India, Indonesia, and Pakistan to send representatives to Geoje to 'offset false Communist propaganda.'

Except for Pakistan, they had all turned him down.

"They just don't want to be associated with it." It was about their reputations again, not their soldiers' lives.

"I won't argue with that," the other Countryhuman conceded. "But there's no harm in hoping that some of the nations involved in this war might decide they don't want to be associated with it badly enough that they'll turn their backs on it, regardless of the reason."

North bared his teeth at the rich soil of the floodplain.

He knew any waning of support for the war from any of their enemies or the 'neutral' nations was good, but the reason still mattered. They knew North and China's soldiers were being tortured and killed, that was why they didn't want to come. But they wouldn't speak out about it, wouldn't condemn it, wouldn't summon America to the UN to put him on trial the way they'd put China on trial, or Korea, without even allowing him to defend himself back when they had voted to invade him in the first place.

When this war was over, and Korea was accepted into the United Nations, how was he supposed to stand in a hall and hold debates with a room full of the countries that had made his people suffer? How was he supposed to make trade deals and forge alliances with people and nations that had tried so hard to make it so that he never could, so that Korea's people would once again be reduced to slaves whose only job was to ship Korea's resources to them?

‘If they even lift the trade embargo,’ a dark voice whispered.

Even if the International Scientific Commission convinced the international community that biological weapons were being used in Korea, how was he supposed to tolerate that the rest of the world only cared once it made them look bad, not because it had killed hundreds of his people, and that they had killed millions?

“I know it’s unfair,” China said quietly when he didn’t respond. Then said nothing else.

It was unfair. Unfair that they didn’t have a ceasefire yet, even with the correspondents on Geoje calling all eighty thousand prisoners there ‘diehard Communists’ while America still insisted only seventy thousand wanted to go home. Unfair that even when his prisoners could smuggle a document out of Geoje detailing the abuses they suffered, comrades being driven towards the sea or dragged into buildings never to be seen again, promises that they would be returned north only to open fire on those who lined up for it, electrical currents ran through the people still refusing to denounce him, no one would listen. Unfair that as North struggled to make sure that the Yankee prisoners stayed fed, giving them pigs to slaughter and villages to stay in, his prisoners were living every day in fear in their own country, helpless in the hands of invaders, knowing that every day could bring a new torment, every hour could be their last.

“Would you kill them, if you could?”

North broke from his locked-jaw seething to jerk over to China. “What?”

His comrade stopped, tipping his head at him. “If you could annihilate every single Yankee, would you do it? Hypothetically, of course.”

Taken aback, North demanded, “What kind of question is that?”

“A curious one. America’s people have done yours a great injustice,” China said. “Not just his soldiers and his capitalists. His workers might be being exploited, but they’re still making more money than our people, profiting off this war. And they're making the weapons that have wiped so many of your villages off the map. It couldn't be done without them."

North grit his teeth, looking away. It was true. There had been strikes in America, the steel workers threatening to grind the steel industry to a halt. Not because they couldn't stand to see the things they made be used to end his people's lives, but because they weren't seeing enough of the profits their bosses made from it.

"We can pretend they're just as much of victims of their ruling class as we are, but…" China looked around pointedly at the craters in the farmland and the old ruins of villages before back to him. "We both know that isn't true. And we both know they don't care about that. The truth is that every single Yankee, man, woman, and elder, is part of the machine devouring your country. And no matter how much blood spills out, they run it willingly.

"So would you do it?" China asked, tilting his head farther to the side, eyes narrowing. "If you had the chance to reverse the roles, to wipe them off the map, to cage and abuse their men, humiliate their women, and make sure their children never grow up the same way yours won't…"

He took a step forward, and North had to fight the urge to step back, letting China loom over him as he lowered his voice.

"Would you?"

North's eye flicked to the side, away from China's, which were too close for comfort. "...No."

"Really?" the other country asked, something that wasn't quite skepticism in his tone. "After all they've done to you?"

Even if North had wanted revenge on every single Yankee and been willing to carry it out, he wouldn't want his people to do it. America's people had chosen to destroy his without them ever having done anything to them. Korea's wouldn't stoop to their level even after being driven into the ground. They would only kill the ones here that were killing their kin and neighbours, and the politicians that sent them, if they could. They were better than the foreigners- Koreans didn't need to grease their system with the blood of other nations. They would run it with their own power. And…

"A Countryhuman's duty is to protect his people, not destroy others'." North put a hand on China's chest, avoiding where the bullet wound was.

He had been going to shove him away since he refused to back down, but found himself grabbing his shirtfront instead, fingers digging into the rough fabric.

"But if it meant that this war would end tomorrow and my people's lives would be spared, I would eliminate every single Yankee myself." He stared coldly up at China from under his lashes. "There is nothing and no one I wouldn't destroy for my people."

He would never want to wipe out another people for revenge, even the Japanese or Americans. But if it would save the life of even one of his, he would do it. No one else would.

The other country's eyes squinched up. "Noted."

North internally winced as what he'd said sank in.

China didn't seem irritated, even though he should. "And understood. I'd do the same, after all."

North had no right for the words to make him bristle, especially when he had been the first one to say them. So he forced his hackles flat and released China's uniform, pushing him back the way he'd first intended, maybe a little harder than necessary.

China was silent the rest of the way to the truck, and it made his teeth grind.

He shouldn't have said it. He didn't know why he did. It was true, but it should go unspoken, especially around another nation. And especially with what anniversary had just passed.

He had said similar things on purpose when China first arrived, to make sure he knew that if he overreached when it came to his role in Korea, he would regret it. But he… didn't need to do that now. China should know he would pay if he ever harmed North's people in any way. And he should know that North would never want to harm his. But still, he couldn't stop threats like that from leaving his mouth.

He should be able to. It didn't matter if China really was unaffected by them. It denigrated the spirit of his soldiers when they were still fighting so unflaggingly, and suffering the same injustices the Korean soldiers were in America's camps.

North side-eyed China, his jaw loosening. Then he pressed his teeth tight together again.

He had meant it. Anything he added would just seem like backtracking.

But as they climbed into the Jeep, North taking the driver's seat, he did ask, "What about you? Would you eliminate them?"

China smiled. "I'm putting on a performance tonight at your theatre. Would you like to come?"

North huffed. "Would you like to answer a simple question?"

"It's not a simple question," China countered. "I asked it first, and I don't ask simple questions."

"Says the person that spent an hour quizzing me on my favourite colour and food," North scorned.

His comrade's eyes narrowed mischievously. "I like asking all sorts of questions, just not simple ones. In the spirit of that, I'll ask another one- do you think I would want to genocide America's people the same way they want to genocide us?"

They had driven through the Gauntlet on the way here, the place where they had destroyed the US 2nd Division and their lackeys. The hills of the pass south of Anju were still cratered by artillery, no grass having dared to peek its head out of the napalm-scorched soil again, like North's feverish musings had been right and the Yankee blood had poisoned the very earth where it spilled. He could remember the wariness that had prickled down his spine as China gleefully cut the foreign soldiers down.

And he could still hear the way he'd laughed at Chorweon, his voice ringing clear with his soldiers'.

"No."

China's lips curved higher behind his mask. "Care to explain your verdict?"

"No."

'I'll never not enjoy seeing my people create.'

North still didn't understand how combat could be creation, but he knew whatever China got out of killing on the battlefield, it wasn't quenching bloodlust. Not in a way that lent itself towards destroying an entire country just for vengeance. More like...

'We're similar people.'

He should crash the Jeep and hope it put him through the windshield.

China examined him for a moment, then looked out the glass he was fantasizing about sending him through. "Mm."

"Am I right?" North asked.

"I'm putting on a performance tonight," he repeated. "You should come watch."

The Korean grimaced, throwing the Jeep into motion, careful to keep its tires on the path out of the hills so no crops would be crushed.

'Whatever.' It was a stupid question anyways. It would be impossible for them to erase every Yankee from existence, so there was no point in knowing what he would do.

But America was killable. And if North could do it without consequences, he would in a heartbeat. He knew China would, too. That was what mattered.

"That was a genuine offer," China said as they drove back towards Pyongyang. "I'll be singing tonight. Alone, so don't worry about someone trying to collect that bounty."

"I don't have time to listen to music," North said irritably, distracted by checking the sky every other second. "Especially not if it's just you singing alone in a theatre. What's the point of that?"

"It's for the anniversary of the Chorweon Blocking Battle," China said softly.

North stiffened, his hands throttling the steering wheel.

"It's technically a few days late for the actual thing, but a year ago today, I sang a song for my fallen soldiers," his comrade said. "You were still unconscious then." He paused, then added, "I'd like it if you were there this year."

He was on his blind side. North turned his head slightly so he would be even more so.

"I don't care what you would like," he said gruffly. "…But I'll be there."

For Meng Yuyu and Zhang Guangqiang and all the others. For Hong Hongjun, whose body was still in enemy-held territory.

China should have been able to bring him home by now. He should have been able to bring all of them home.

"Thank you," his comrade said contentedly, settling back in his seat.

North didn't look his way, trusting that he would watch the sky in that direction as he looked towards the north. An enemy reconnaissance craft soared back towards the south in the distance, and with the threat gone, the MiGs banked in formation, heading to Manchuria to refuel.

Anxiety tightened his jaw. The Supung should be safe. It wasn't just the jets keeping it that way, but the political fallout if it was destroyed, and the renewed accusations that America would face about trying to start a war with China.

But he was trying to start a war with China. Raising the bounty while stalling the talks over the weeks since Ridgway and Turner had been replaced was proof that he hadn't given up his aspersions.

Like North's soldiers had said in the letter smuggled from Geoje, the next day was yet to come. But it would come.

And they could always expect some new torture.

North crept down to the Moranbong Underground Theatre around midnight, past when China had told him to. The more he thought about it, the more he didn't want to be there when he began. Or at all.

The performances had ended long ago, but the men and women that carried them out still lingered in the dark halls, listening to the strains of song seeping under the door from the main hall. They didn't even call out to North when he passed, only dipped their heads. Some didn't react at all, spellbound. As SH had told him, the performers admired 'Mao Zhilong,' enough to let him commandeer the theatre.

North already knew he would regret this before he could even make out the words China was singing. He knew he would regret it even more once he did.

"At the edge of the heavens, the corners of the earth,
My close friends have scattered, wandering in loneliness."

He grit his teeth, wanting to turn around and leave. But with eyes on him, he could only open the door to the hall and slip in.

The huge room was dark. The only light came from a flashlight on the stage that had a red scarf draped over it, casting a bloody glow that illuminated the person on stage. China, of course.

North was glad to see three shapes huddled down in front of the stage. Liaoxi, Liaotung, and North Pyongan. He… hadn't liked picturing just him and China in here.

The three looked back as he came in. He couldn't see their faces, but he knew North Pyongan was puzzled to see him.

He didn't join them, or head up to one of the boxes. He took a seat on a bench at the back, close to the door.

China's song was winding down, and his next words were the last. "This evening, don't dream of coldness."

They lingered in the hall, falling gently to the floor like snow, leaving a hush in their wake. North had time to hope he was done and he had missed most of it before his voice was raising again, his pitch morphing, shifting from the poignant, but unfamiliar tone to one that was definitely him, but raw and bleeding in a way North had never heard him.

"When you head through the gate, don't let it close,
Linger awhile in soft twilight.
When your feet carry you away, look over your shoulder, Meet my eyes."

North's chest panged as he saw wide white eyes staring at him from the threshold, refusing to step over it.

He shouldn't be singing songs like this. They weren't good for morale. But North couldn't protest because there weren't actually any soldiers or civilians nearby. Just the provinces. And him.

"Even if your shadow never darkens my landscape again, It's imprinted on my heart."

China's voice was somehow bringing memories cascading in, O-geun's hand in his, not bloody and cooling, but wrapped in a PVA mitten as he dragged him along; Bong-nam carefully splitting an apple to give him half; He Sengqi reaching for Wang Wei's milk candy, knocking them both over into the trench as they laughed; South napping on his shoulder while he practiced his characters,

South balancing their water ladle on a fingertip, diving for the floor so fast he skinned his knees as he dropped it, South laughing as he flicked him on the forehead, teasing him for being grumpy, spidering his fingers across his arm while he tried to work out, singing to him when he asked, song after song, as many as he needed, even when his voice grew raspy and started to go because that was just another thing North could tease him for to cheer him up. Memories that he hadn't forgotten, but just… hadn't been thinking about welled into his mind in an inescapable assault, dragged out by China's song, and North was horrified to find that he was about to-

"Come drink wine with me, even if it's a thousand miles away."

He rucked up his tunic, tearing his undershirt out of his pants and shoving a hand inside it, finding the burn gash on his torso, not hesitating to tear off the bandages and gouge at it with his fingers, ripping the scabs and sending a deep throb of pain through his entire body.

But it wasn't enough to drown the memories, dozens of them from dozens of people he had lost. Dan Hoon, Son Du-soon, Kim Jong-suk, Roe Chul, South, South, South.

"Come raise your voice, even if I can't hear you For I heard you once, and that was enough."

'Not enough.' North's legs twitched. He wanted to leave, wanted to escape the song, to get away from the memories it was making him relive. Not because he wanted to forget, but because he didn't deserve to feel the warm glow they brought, not when he had failed the people in them. He didn't deserve the sweetness they brought.

But he did deserve the bitter. So he made himself stay, anchoring himself with the nails of one hand sunk into the bench and the others in his wound, feeling sour blood gush between his fingers, digging deeper until the pain overwhelmed the burning elsewhere in his body.

China kept singing his mourning song, heedless of North's struggle, and of his own provinces at his feet.

“No pearl has ever been so precious.”

The words left his mouth in a mix of pain and relief, like they hurt to sing, but he needed to get them out.

“I won’t let your echo fade.”

China gasped for breath, audibly drawing it in with a ragged exhale, tipping his head back to cry out the final lines.

“So don’t be afraid to let go,
You’ll still be carried home!”

He stood there, panting, in the red glow and ringing echo. North couldn’t see his eyes. But he could feel him lock gazes with him.

Then he dipped forward into a bow, sweeping his long sleeves out at his sides as Liaoxi and Liaotung started to applaud. North Pyongan did, too.

North got up, and fled from the theatre.

I couldn’t find a Chinese song with the lyrics I needed. So I made one. I found this easier than the poems as I did not have to rhyme. And somehow a song isn’t embarrassing the same way a poem is. Also the first song is Sòngbié/Farewell, which actually answers North’s earlier question. But I won’t be elaborating on that, ehe.

Cousin wants me to move to Russia and join the army. I’m not saying I wouldn’t do that, but I do think it probably would be smarter to convince me on the ‘move to Russia’ part first. Especially because she doesn’t want me to move to Moscva or somewhere nice. She wants me to move to her depressing industrial city (that I do love, it's just not a place people choose to move to). Unfortunately she’s halfway convinced me because Russians are some of the only people that can go to the DPRK right now.

Also Russia got the oil to Cuba!! They broke the blockade. It’s not a final solution, but it’s gotten Cuba a bit of power back. This why I will always love Russia and Putin, despite our differences.

Nescitur Ignescitur

North Hamgyong didn't just hate giving speeches- he fucking hated listening to them, too.

He hadn't felt any relief after the tactical retreat was over because he'd known even if his serious speech-giving days were done, he'd still have to listen to a hundred Korea speeches. And he had. He could remember every fucking one, even if he didn't want to. Every assurance that they'd be in Busan a year ago, every time he said the miguk-nom would tuck their tails between their legs and sign the armistice any fucking day now, every promise that they'd still be free soon when they weren't.

Kim Il-sung was one of the few people he didn't mind listening to usually, but he still couldn't stand his speeches.

So it fucking sucked that Korea had chosen him to guard him today. He'd literally just headed to Jongju County in North Pyongan's province, where the Kim Chaek Polytechnical Institute had been moved, and the majority of the bombing wasn't anywhere near here. But if the Party Central Committee had their way, the General would spend all his time in their underground complex, never leaving. And if Korea had his way, he'd be locked in his office, probably in a padded chest while he was at it.

'It's not like he wasn't fighting for his fucking life with the rest of us for over thirty damn years.'

Being treated like he was suddenly made of glass must piss him off, even if he never showed it.

North Hamgyong didn't know what Korea expected him to do if the man did get bombed. How the fuck was he supposed to stop it? He hadn't been able to save any of the hundred people he'd lost working on the rail lines.

"It is important to educate the students to cultivate national pride and conviction in victory.” The General’s voice boomed around the underground auditorium carved into the hills, the students and staff that packed it listening raptly. “The institute should let them know clearly that our people are sagacious and valorous, with a long history and a shining culture.”

How he managed to sound so damn boisterous when their history could end tomorrow with the press of a damn button by America, North Hamgyong didn’t know. Him and Korea really were two fish in a tin.

His lip twitched in disgust at the thought. He hated the taste of fish.

“Especially, it should educate the students by the use of the factual information which shows how our people are winning the Fatherland Liberation War by bravely fighting the US imperialists who boast of being the ‘most powerful’ in the world and the troops of their satellite countries." Unlike Korea, the General used his hands when he talked, gesturing grandly behind his podium. “This will heighten the national pride of the students and inspire them with greater confidence in victory.”

North Hamgyong bit his tongue on his ‘tch.’

It was one thing to make sure all their engineers would be loyal to the country and Worker’s Party. If it kept them from being fucking idiots and selling out to the miguk-nom, he'd make sure they all knew how to dance ilmu. But did they have to raise an entire generation of people like South Hamgyong?

More than half of the young men and the handful of women in the hall had been at the front before being called back in order to make sure they at least had a couple people left alive that knew how to hold a wrench. They should know how fucked it was there, how fucked they were.

But as the General spoke animatedly about studying hard so they could lead the charge on post-war reconstruction and building a new society, they all hung to his words like a damn hangman.

"We must adhere to the principle of solving everything for ourselves even if we have to face difficulties and obstacles," he said, moving on from the teaching shortage. "The success of the Korean revolution depends on how the Korean people, its master, strive. Only when our people themselves strive to carry out their country's revolution can they receive better help from other countries. Only when a fallen man does his best to recover his legs will others have the sympathetic urge to help him get up."

'Sympathetic.' North Hamgyong did his best to hide the face he made at the word. He hated the idea of that Chinese bastard pitying them. And it was worse than that. The fucker was smug that they'd had to come crawling to him. He knew it from those little smirks he gave him when Korea wasn't looking.

"Our people are enjoying the assistance of the fraternal countries today," Kim Il-sung declared. "Because we are fighting heroically against the US imperialists and their lackeys, conscious of being the masters of the country. We should allow full scope to our spirit of self-reliance and make what we do not have, and find what we lack, and solve everything for ourselves."

North Hamgyong caught himself leaning forward on the bench, and irritably pressed his spine to the back of it.

"As long as there exists imperialism on the globe, we should continue to strengthen our defence capability to safeguard the country and nation."

The General went off about developing the ordnance industry towards defence once the war was over, leaving the province to grind his teeth.

There was that little bit of realism that no one else fucking picked up on. The teacher next to him hadn't even twitched at the words as he attentively wrote them down in his little notepad.

There was always going to be imperialism. The other nations were too pacified to ever stop it. Did anyone really still think that the Yanks who raped their women and butchered their men, then complained when they had too much sorghum to eat would one day overthrow their own government? They were sheep, fat, selfish sheep who were so addicted to their bread and circuses that they'd never willingly give them up for someone else's sake, or even their eventual own.

He wasn't being a pessimist. Even Marx, Engels, and Lenin had talked about it, calling it the 'labour aristocracy.' They'd just been too hopeful about it being overcame. And they had plenty of fucking proof that it wouldn't- the Japs hadn't overthrown Japan, he'd had to be overthrown.

And there was no one to overthrow America.

North Hamgyong's arms crushed tighter against his torso as the talk went on. Increasing rations for the staff and students, reclaiming more fallow land for them to work to keep fed and make cash on the side, making the bathhouse bigger, building a dormitory instead of housing students in scattered farmhouses. All technical shit, but the last one made his ribs creak.

"I firmly believe that the teaching staff and students of the Kim Chaek Polytechnical Institute will carry out the Party policy of training technicians by achieving successes in education and studies with indomitable fighting spirit."

As he closed out his speech, the audience burst into applause, their cheers echoing in the hall. The General surveyed the crowd with a warm smile, before his dark eyes landed on North Hamgyong.

'Shit.'

Over the ruckus, he said, "Now, I believe Comrade North Hamgyong has a few words for you as well."

Another reason he fucking hated speeches. It was too easy for someone to drag you into one.

Korea would string him up if he did something like deny the General and their people in public, so North Hamgyong grudgingly climbed to his feet, his teeth creaking as a jolt of pain shot through his spine.

'Ssi-bal.' He'd been holding it too fucking straight. He needed a treatment (not a massage) from Kangwon, but he was busy with the germ warfare. And he'd been too out of it to when he went to donate blood recently. North Hamgyong wasn't going to put more bullshit on his plate by whining about a little back pain.

He tried not to hobble on his way up to the stage, waves of aches running down his spinal cord like someone was hitting the segments with a hammer. He couldn't hunch behind the podium, so he dealt with the throbbing as he forced his back straight again by gripping onto the sides of the wooden stand as he looked out at the sea of expectant faces.

'Fuck.' He hadn't known he'd be talking, so he hadn't written a speech. And this wasn't like Chongjin where he'd been able to say whatever he wanted. Not when he was dealing with a bunch of college students with the Supreme Commander lurking off to the side of the stage.

North Hamgyong tried to glare at him sideways without making it obvious. He smiled 'obliviously.'

The province internally glowered, looking back out at the audience, his gaze straying to the placard over the doors of the hall.

'Kim Chaek Polytechnical Institute.'

It'd used to be part of Kim Il-sung University, before being split off as a college for engineers and technical scientists. It had been renamed last year, after Kim Chaek's heart had given out, just like Songjin- Kimchaek now.

North Hamgyong had never got naming shit after dead people. Now every time the General saw the college campus, he'd be thinking about how his close comrade had died, the same way North Hamgyong would have to think about it every time he visited the Kim Chaek Iron and Steelworks, or passed through his birth city.

Then again, one day Kim Il-sung University would be named after a dead man. The General would die, along with every single person he was looking at right now. Either in a few decades as their bodies failed like Kim Chaek's, or tomorrow, violently, like all the men he worked on the rail lines with.

The podium protested under his grip as another throb of agony twinged in his spine. He made himself speak before anyone could start thinking he was simple.

"Engineering is one of the most important jobs there is," he announced, internally grimacing at the contrast between his voice and the General's. "We're going to need a lot of them for when we- it's time to rebuild."

'Especially after the rest all fucking died.'

They'd barely had any engineers before Liberation. The ones trained after were mostly working-class or peasant men who'd finally had the chance to be educated under the Worker's Party. They'd been patriots. Which meant the ones that hadn't died at the front or in the air raids had been strung up by the traitors during the retreat.

"And if we ever want to say that Korea is the best when it comes to automobiles, transportation, or anything else, then you're all going to have to study hard," he told them seriously. "No slacking off or quitting when it gets difficult. You have the chance to run our country and to learn how to keep it running. The people before you would've killed for that."

Was that aggressive enough that Korea would get on his ass for saying it? Whatever. The crowd seemed to agree. One man was nodding to himself, and the teacher had added it to his notebook.

And it was true. North Hamgyong had worked the line with dozens of men that should've been engineers or mechanics, not breaking their backs in a Jap factory. They had the wits and the skill, just not the money or opportunity.

He'd been fucking thrilled when he was finally able to take his own night classes, to study real textbooks instead of depending on intuition and what Hwang remembered from the ones he'd read to cobble together guns and explosives. So had everyone in the classes he'd visited.

He wondered how many of them were still alive. He didn't see any familiar faces in the thousand plus students packed into the room, or the teachers.

'Probably none.'

Gritting his teeth, he said, "So take your chance and use it to become the best damn engineers Korea's ever seen, and make our country the best the world has ever seen."

He thumped his fist on the podium, and everyone thought it was just for emphasis and not because his spine was fucking killing him. They broke out into cheers, just like they had for the General.

North Hamgyong looked out at their beaming faces and the hands clapping so fast they blurred, and wondered how many would be dead before graduation. All of them if the future dormitory got bombed.

'Don't build it aboveground!' he wanted to shout. But he kept his mouth shut. He'd bring it up to Korea later.

"Well spoken, comrade," Kim Il-sung said as he pushed away from the podium, unable to help the way his spine curled like a metal shaving.

North Hamgyong sank his teeth into the side of his cheek to stop himself from cussing him out. He had his limits. Even if the man didn't care, Korea would beat his ass.

"Did Korea put you up to this?" he grumbled under the roar of the cheers that were still going on. He was going to get a headache to match his backache.

The General didn't answer, lifting his head to look out at the auditorium. "I think there are comrades who would like to speak with us. There's Ri Byong-do. He taught you at your night classes, didn't he?"

North Hamgyong looked over to see that it really was the man making his way down through the rows. He'd been one of the few able to go to Japan for an education, and he'd brought his skills back to teach their people. And him.

Maybe a few of the people from the classes were still alive. But he wasn't going to search the room for more. If they were, he didn't want to know. It might just encourage someone to tell him when they died for real.

He went to ask the General if they could fuck off now, but the man was already talking to a few of the staff, one man clasping his forearm tight, his eyes shining with tears as he looked up at him.

Great. They were stuck here for at least another hour.

North Hamgyong groaned, his spine bending further.

"Comrade North Hamgyong." Ri Byong-do reached him. "Good to see you."

North Hamgyong clasped his forearm. "You too, you bastard."

Even if he would've rather not known he was alive.

'For now.'

The thirty-something man *'tsk'*ed disapprovingly. "Is that any way to talk to your teacher?"

North Hamgyong made a face. "You aren't my teacher anymore. And I have rank."

"Hmph. Well, try to watch your tongue around my current students. I don't want them picking up the audacity." Ri gestured at the group of college kids hovering by the edge of the benches, and they immediately scurried over.

'Who said I wanted to talk to them?'

But he still couldn't deny their people. If Korea hit him over the head with his boot right now, he'd crumple like a fucking tin can.

The students swarmed, crowding eagerly in to greet him, enough of them that he knew they couldn't all be Ri's.

"Comrade North Hamgyong!" a man with a shaved head chirped in Hamgyong dialect. "Hey!"

"That ain't how you greet a Provincehuman," another man said. "It's 'hello.'" From the way his thick Hwanghae accent stretched the word, it was clear he was more used to saying 'howdy' like the dokkaebi.

North Hamgyong could tell he'd been one of the soldiers at the front, and not just because of the shrapnel scars that peppered his cheek and neck. It was in the shoulders and spine. Lucky bastard could hold his perfectly straight.

"Comrade North Hamgyong doesn't mind informality." Ri gave him a pointed look, and he curled his lip in return.

He did actually. Some of his cousins might be fine with throwing away tradition, but he wasn't. Even if he talked casual with the men on the line, students just out of high school should have some respect for someone older and higher-ranked than them.

'Whatever.'

A few of the other students pressed in to greet him. He'd be especially pissed when the ones that greeted him formally died.

"Back, back." Ri shooed them. "A man is trying to show off his prodigies here." He slapped a hand on the thin shoulder of the Hamgyong man, and the other on the muscular Hwanghae man. "These here are Kim Yung-sam and Bing Man-gol."

The family name was rare enough to get a grunt of acknowledgement out of North Hamgyong.

"Mr. Ri is bragging about Comrades Kim and Bing again," another man sighed.

"Maybe if you brought me better test results, I'd brag about you, too, Mister Pak," Ri shot back. "These two have got perfect marks on all their theoretical and practical exams."

Kim beamed and Bing shifted, his scarred cheeks tinting pink.

"Along with-" Ri stopped, looking around at the ring of students before over at the rows of benches. "Miss Oh, stop lurking and get over here."

After a few seconds, a small chick with a thick black braid and wire-rim glasses that looked like Four-Eyes' slunk out of the crowd to stand at the man's side.

"There she is," Ri said proudly. "She has the temperament of a stray dog that's taken a few too many kicks, but our Miss Oh is as clever as they come."

"Oh Jin-bok, Comrade North Hamgyong." Oh bowed deep enough that she had to push her glasses back up with one hand. The other was gripping so tight to a wrapped parcel that it looked like she was about to strain something.

"She doesn't look like much, but you know what they say about the small pepper," Ri said proudly.

The girl cringed at the attention on her, not exactly looking like the spiciest of the bunch. Unless you thought salt was spicy.

'Great.' Three more names North Hamgyong was going to have to dread hearing in Hwang's stupid fucking school obituary announcements he gave every time he came back from one.

One of them was familiar, but he refused to think about why.

"Comrade North Hamgyong!" The man from his province threw himself in front of the girl. "It's so cool you came to visit us. I've been telling people you're an engineer, too! My dad's actually met you before, he works at the Chongjin Steelworks."

'Don't fucking say it.'

But Kim's face didn't fall. "I'm really glad you said that thing about the people before us killing for a chance to have what we do now. He always wanted to be an engineer, but he was never able to afford schooling."

Since it sounded like he was still alive, North Hamgyong said, "If he can still see and hold tools, he should become one now."

They needed as many as they could get.

"That's what I told him," Kim sighed. "But he says he's old and settled. So I'm going to pick up the flag and become the best engineer in Korea for him, like you said."

He puffed out his chest, then yelped as one of his classmates pounded on it, laughing.

"Good," North Hamgyong grunted before they could start wrestling. "Don't waste your opportunity."

For as long as he had it.

Kim's eyes gleamed. "I won't."

"Mister Bing here used to serve at the front," Ri volunteered, thumping the tall Hwanghae man's shoulder.

"What division?" Fuck. He didn't actually want to know. Fucking military talk just slipped out.

"3rd, Comrade General." Bing snapped off a salute. "Ah was in the battle for Taegu." His eyes darkened.

No shit. He was lucky he hadn't died there.

They'd fought so fucking hard to take the city. North Hamgyong didn't know how the soldiers that'd been told it was fine to abandon the hills they'd lost tens of thousands of men to take because they'd be back soon hadn't mutinied.

"Ah'd still be at the front," Bing said, fist clenching. "But they called me back."

"You were called back because you showed too much promise with the machines, kid," Ri said. "We couldn't have you dying out there."

North Hamgyong understood the bitter look on Bing's face. It was bad enough sitting through meetings and working on the rails when he could be at the front. He couldn't stand sitting in a fucking classroom while people were dying.

But it was still important shit, so he said to the man, "Anyone can fight to defend the country. Only some people have the heads to learn the shhh- stuff we need to rebuild. If you've got one, you need to put it to use."

And not get a bullet lodged in it.

Bing nodded determinedly. "Ah am. Ah don't like it. But ah am."

North Hamgyong fielded more questions from the students, and learned info about their lives that he didn't want. He wanted to growl at them that he didn't care that their mother had sent them into engineering against their will, but now they were dedicated to it to honour her memory, or that he'd been the one to inspire them to take up the trade at one of his lectures pre-war.

He wasn't like Korea or his idiot- stupid fucking South Hamgyong. He didn't get attached to people the way they did, because he knew it was stupid to. He'd been right, hadn't he? The one-armed woman had died and Korea had moped about it. He was probably still moping over it. And worrying about whether or not Bang Eul-sik found his fiancée was just another thing for South Hamgyong to chase her tail over.

But it wasn't like he was a fucking emotionless monster the way she thought. The shit people said to him stuck- all the little bits of students' lives he was inflicted with lodged like metal shrapnel in him. Now he was going to have to think about crap like if Kim's dad was going to live to see him achieve his dream for them or if Bing was going to head straight back for the front once he graduated.

That was why he didn't want to get attached. And South Hamgyong and the others acted like that was so fucking unreasonable.

But he couldn't tell the people around him to shut the fuck up and keep their lives to themselves. So he just tried to deflect what they told him like sheet metal, even though he knew it wouldn't fucking work. He knew because he still wondered about how Oh's wife was doing after he'd been blown to bits, or if his son was in this room somewhere.

Eventually Ri and the other teachers reined them in, allowing him to escape. The General was just about finished with his chatting, so North Hamgyong waited by the corner of the stage, ignoring the eyes still on him.

That was the worst part about being a politician. Someone was always looking at you. To you, like you had any idea what to fucking do. Like in Chongjin.

But he guessed it'd been that way in the past, too. The moment his or South Hamgyong's cloaks slipped, all eyes would be on their green and white skin. It was better to be looked at like someone in charge than like a piece of meat.

Thinking about her put him in a worse mood, which made him even worse at controlling his face. So he tried to stop, even though she was the worst fucking piece of shrapnel there was.

'I wish I hadn't missed.'

Yeah, he shouldn't have said that shit. But she shouldn't have wanted him to. And now even with her treating him like he didn't even fucking exist, she still couldn't be honest.

Two damn months and she hadn't even tried to talk to him. He really had severed their last tie.

North Hamgyong swung his head over as he caught someone sidling towards him.

It was the girl, Oh. She jumped when he looked at her, stumbling back towards the benches with her parcel in her hands.

Stray dog? More like a fucking mouse. He didn't see how someone like her was supposed to last around the male engineers, good marks or not. It was already a hard field for women.

It was South Hamgyong that should say something. But he wasn't going to her for anything. If she wanted to act like he didn't exist, then he could do the exact same thing. South Pyongan was out since she was barely a woman, and Hae didn't know shit about engineering. And the others were gone. Korea didn't know how to talk to women like women, but he could talk to them like men. But he was too busy for something like this. Not that North Hamgyong didn't think he would come if he asked. He would, because he was an idiot.

'Fucking fine.'

While the General was finishing up, North Hamgyong stomped over to the girl, who shrank down like she was thinking about running.

"U-Um, sorry for staring," she stammered, holding her parcel to her chest.

"Why are you here?" he demanded without ringing the rim. "Why do you want to be an engineer?"

She finally straightened up, a glint of defiance entering the eyes behind her thick glasses. "Because I'm good at it, and I want to use what I'm good at to improve our country. And I belong here just as much as all the men."

Satisfied that she wasn't just forcing herself because the Worker's Party said they needed more women in science, North Hamgyong growled, "Then act like it. No one here is going to think you belong with them if you scurry around like a mouse. If you're really better than most of the people in here, then make sure they damn well know it."

She looked a little surprised at his words, which pissed him off. It made him think of South Hamgyong making that stupid quip after Liberation, when Korea had said they needed to encourage women to take up engineering. Something like 'Oh? You actually think women can do 'men's jobs?'' with her grating voice dripping with sarcasm.

She acted like he was one of the idiots that hated women and thought they shouldn't be allowed to do shit just because he'd been against them fighting over two fucking decades ago at the time. He'd been against women fighting because they were usually weaker than men (South Pyongan was a freak), and at risk of way worse shit happening to them than just dying. Shit that she should be well fucking aware of. It had been about protecting them. Even if he still thought like that, what the fuck were they supposed to need protecting from in civilian engineering?

"Sorry," Oh said, dipping her head. "I'm… a little shy."

"Shyness won't get you anywhere," North Hamgyong told her mercilessly. "An engineer needs to be able to say the shhh- stuff she needs to. Pick up your head and grow your liver."

He might not give a damn about whether engineering was a man or a woman's job, but it was a male-dominated one. Seven out of ten people in here were men, and that was with most of them off in the army, and the calls to bring more women in. And the types of men that took up trades like this tended to be the sort that would already have trouble respecting a woman, let alone one that didn't respect her own ability. North Hamgyong would be pissed if they lost a good engineer because she couldn't stand her fucking ground.

Oh's tanned knuckles whitened around her parcel, her lips firming. "I will."

"Good." North Hamgyong went to turn away, but she called, "W-Wait!"

Fuck, he just wanted to get out of here before his spine disintegrated.

"What?"

"There's… another reason I want to be an engineer," she said, looking down. “My father was one. He, um, worked with you in the Railway Rehabilitation Corps.”

‘Ssi-bal.’ He’d recognized her name after all. Even though he hadn’t wanted to.

“Oh Chol-jin?” he forced through his teeth.

Her eyes lit up as he said the name, and she nodded vigorously. “You really remember him.”

Why the fuck wouldn’t he? They’d worked together for months, and he’d only died three of them ago. And he’d had to carry the fucking body for his wife.

He'd thought the kid going to engineering school to follow in his footsteps that the man always talked about was a son. Could you blame him? What kind of name was ‘Jin-bok’ for a girl?

“He taught me everything I know,” Oh’s daughter said, her eyes dipping. “I want to make him proud, even if… he’s not around to see it.”

She already had. The man had never shut up about her as they worked. North Hamgyong knew what her first damn words had been, and that she’d gone past the money, string, and everything else at her doljanchi to hug him.

“Then don’t let the bastards here steamroll you,” he said gruffly, the word slipping out.

“I won’t,” she vowed. “I’m going to be an engineer, no matter what. And, um, when mother heard you were coming today, she gave me something for you.”

The girl shyly held out the parcel.

“They’re gaetteok,” she said, making his jaw lock. “She wanted me to say sorry she never thanked you for helping her get him home. She wasn’t thinking right.”

No fucking shit. She’d been wailing over a husband she wouldn’t have even been able to recognize if she hadn't been told who it was. North Hamgyong didn't need a damn apology for that.

"Keep your food," he grunted. "I've got rations. I don't need it."

Her arm wavered, but she didn't withdraw the box. "Father said you n-never brought anything but rice to work. That's why he always made sure mother made extra."

'That fucking bastard.'

"Fine." North Hamgyong snatched the wrapped package, feeling the dosirak inside.

Great, now he was going to have to visit her mother to hand it back, and put up with some sappy bullshit and hear more things about Oh that he didn't want to.

Whatever. He'd give the gaetteok to Hae the bottomless void. Maybe it would make her stomach stop growling for a second. Before Korea did something else like what he'd done back in winter.

"Comrade, are you ready to leave?"

North Hamgyong looked over to see the General approaching. He tried to find somewhere to shove the dosirak, but he was just in his general's tunic today. Grudgingly, he tucked it under his arm.

The man looked at it, smiling. "Study hard," he said to Oh's daughter. "The future is in your hands."

"Y-Yes, General." She quickly bowed, flushing as he told her he didn't mind 'Comrade Kim Il-sung.'

Vain fucking effort, like it had been from the start. Everyone liked 'the General' too much.

North Hamgyong was finally able to leave the hall, ambling after the Supreme Commander with Hyon Chol-hae tailing them. He took the chance to rub his aching back.

"I've been thinking it might be beneficial for you to lead classes here sometimes," the General said as they made their way down the underground corridor.

North Hamgyong immediately replied, "No f- No way."

"I will admit that you don't have the most teacherly bearing." The man gave him a look that said he'd overheard him trying not to swear. "But you are one of our most talented engineers. And these aren't children- they are men and women that have fought for their country and faced innumerable hardships. They can handle a bit of tough education, so long as it isn't harsh."

"I don't want to be a teacher."

"Comrade Korea said you were excited enough when he first asked if you would be willing to teach engineering and technical courses."

North Hamgyong grimaced. When he'd been information-gathering to set up his courses for them. The courses that would be postponed for two years in a few days.

Fine. He wasn't like South Hamgyong, lying to himself about how he felt. He had been excited, just as excited as he'd been to take the classes himself. He'd been looking forward to having more engineers, mechanics, and electricians, ones that hadn't been trained in Japan or the Soviet Union, but Korean workers trained by Korean teachers. He'd never thought he'd see the fucking day.

But that had been before the war. Before he'd just be training kids to die.

Because that's what the students in here were being trained for. If they graduated before this war was over, they'd be sent out to the factories and rails or to the front. They might even be able to do something with their skills before they fell to a bomb or enemy bullet. If he taught Oh Jin-bok how to be an engineer worth her spice, he'd probably end up carrying her corpse back to her mom, too, just like her idiot dad.

And even if they survived this damn war, even if Korea was Reunified and everything was fucking sunshine and rainbows, imperialism would always be out there, always waiting to try again. Even if America was beat this time, he wasn't going to make the same mistake- he'd be back with a damn vengeance. And every student North Hamgyong trained would either end up slaughtered or slaving away for the enemy. He couldn't stomach that shit.

He also couldn't say that to the General's face.

"If I have to spend all day watching people die around me on the railways, then come here to hear that dormitory got blown up, I'm going to start screaming," he said bluntly instead.

It was embarrassing to say, and he wouldn't to any of the other provinces or Korea (not that he probably wouldn't hear about this anyway), but he fucking meant it. If he had to know all of these students by name, their dislikes and likes and family lives, the way a teacher was supposed to according to Hwang, just to watch them die, then he was going to strap as many grenades as possible to himself and head south to deal with Korea's burden after all.

"The dormitory will be built safely, comrade," the General reassured. "Comrade South Pyongan and you will collaborate with the best engineers here to make sure it has adequate bomb shelters and the safest location."

"The safest location would be underground." Not built on a 'sunny hillside' like he thought it should be.

"Our students already do their learning underground." The General swept his hand at the dark classroom doors they passed. "They spend their school lives down here. They can't live their extracurricular lives as well hiding from the sun for fear of what could happen to them. Just as I couldn't avoid coming here today for fear of what could happen on the way. The students need light, they need hope to see them through this war."

That fucking word again.

North Hamgyong's teeth grated off each other. "Hope won't help if they're dead."

“And they won’t want to live if they don’t have it.” The General stopped, turning to look at him shrewdly. “You have doubts about our victory in this war, don’t you, comrade?”

Fuck. He was putting him in a tough place, if whatever he said made its way back to Korea.

Then again, maybe he needed to hear it in a way that wouldn’t end with North Hamgyong getting beat.

“And you don’t?” he challenged. “You said yourself at the start of that speech- these truce talks have been going on for almost a damn year now. It’s clear the Yank isn’t going to sign. And you said even if he did, he could invade again at any time.”

The floor swept away beneath his damn boots as it did every time the truth sank in.

Even when his cousins and Korea acted like an armistice would be the magical end to the war, that wasn’t true. Forget America invading again- he could just decide the ceasefire was off before his soldiers had even left.

And they wouldn’t leave. That was why he wanted their airfields to be hobbled- so he could build up his own forces, then make up some shit about them breaking the armistice the same way he’d made up them ‘invading’ the south in the first place, so he’d have an excuse to call in more reinforcements or break out his atom bomb and crush them for real.

Even if they got an armistice, this wasn’t going to end.

“I also said that as much as we’re ready to cease fire, we are also ready to continue the war,” the General said steadily. “And that no matter how desperately the enemy maneuvers, he will surrender to our people before long. And if he doesn’t, and overreaches in his drive to plunge the world into another war, then he will be destroyed. We have nothing to fear.”

“You can’t really fucking believe that.” The word slipped out in his frustration. “The only reason we have nothing to fear is because we have nothing left. Our factories, our farms, our towns. They've all been destroyed."

Kim Il-sung was supposed to be the realist, but there hadn't been a fucking trace of despair in his voice as he said almost those exact words to the fucking students, as he looked them in the eyes and told them they had nothing more left to be destroyed. And there hadn't been a trace of it on their damn faces.

"But we haven't," the General said, looking down the hall as the students started to emerge, laughing and chattering excitedly about the visit. "Korea hasn't. And so long as we have hope in victory, it won't."

He started walking again, leaving North Hamgyong to bow his head with bared teeth.

Hope didn't kill the enemy, it didn't put food in their bowls or cast a shield over the Peninsula to stop an atom bomb from being dropped on it. It couldn't have kept them alive or helped them escape the Japs. So what did it fucking matter if he had it or not?

He stormed after the General, Hyon Chol-hae giving him a sympathetic look that he shrugged off.

"Hope doesn't win a war," he hissed.

"No. But it gives our people the drive to fight it." The General kept his strides long, staying ahead of the crowd. "Would our soldiers risk their lives defending our country if they thought there was no use? Would our students bravely leave their homes and families to become engineers if they thought there was no future in it? Would our Party members strive to feed and house our civilians if they thought they were all going to die anyway?"

He looked sideways at him with a small smile. "Why did we fight the Japanese?"

North Hamgyong had fought because there was no other choice. Either he'd follow Korea or stay rotting in that factory, or in some Jap prison Japan would throw him in. He'd wanted to kill the bastards Occupying them, and make sure South Hamgyong didn't do anything else stupid while he was at it.

He looked away.

"And if I'm not mistaken, I saw your eyes light up when I mentioned building our own automobiles in the future," the General said as they reached the exit, Hyon Chol-hae getting the door for them, clearing the outside world as he did. "What is that if not a hopeful expectation for the future?"

Fucking fine- he had been hanging on his words, too. He always did, the same way he did with Korea's. That was why he hated their speeches so damn much. They got you wrapped up in their pretty words, thinking they were true, or that they could be. When Korea had given that damn speech on Foundation Day, screaming out at their people that they could fight for a thousand years more, for one fucking second, North Hamgyong had almost believed it.

But when they stepped away from the podium, nothing had changed. They were still being bombed to shit, the south was still being colonized, the war was still at a damn standstill that could be broken any day by the atom bomb. That one bright second where it felt like maybe that could change just made reality seem even bleaker.

That was what hope was- an illusion that left you feeling even shittier when it was shattered. His sister and Korea's was just idiot-proof.

The General took a deep breath of the stifling summer air as they stood in the mountain ravine the school was in now, smiling at the farmhouses clustered in it, not even glancing up as a recon plane buzzed overhead.

"Hope doesn't win wars," he repeated. "People do. Hope just gives them a reason to."

With that, he set off for his hidden car with a damn near skip in his step, leaving North Hamgyong to ball his hands into fists.

Even if he got what he meant about needing a reason to fight, how could people still have hope? It wasn't a real thing you could touch, for fuck's sake. You couldn't feed it to someone like rations or hand it out like a damn school uniform or dosirak. You couldn't maintain it like an engine. So how the fuck could the students in there or the soldiers at the front or civilians living in the ground like fucking mole people still have it?

And why the fuck had South Hamgyong needed him to give it to her in order to leave her cage? Had being raped almost every single damn day not been enough? She needed a fucking illusion to convince her?

'Stupid bitch.' He wasn't going to let her police his own damn thoughts when she wouldn't even look in his direction.

He bared his teeth at the rocky ground as he saw the look on her face after he'd told her that stupid fucking thing. Her wide eyes flashing with hurt like she believed him.

Whatever. If she wanted to keep her false hope, she could. She clearly didn't want to be any of his damn business. Even if being idiot-proof didn't mean it wouldn't shatter someday when she finally accepted what he already had, and she'd come crashing down like a bird with an arrow in it.

And did the General even think about what would happen to their country when Korea's shattered? When he stopped living in that bright moment and had to wake up and face the reality that-

North Hamgyong kicked at the rock of the ravine hard enough to bruise his foot, then stomped after the General, the dosirak of gaetteok crushed under his arm.

He'd keep his mouth shut. Not because of South Hamgyong's threat. He just knew no one was going to fucking listen to him.

Not until Korea came crashing down.

—

China's song had been beautiful. Not even North could deny that.

He'd known he had a good voice, but his mourning song had been... different. It was rich and sonorous, filled with a depth of emotion that was nothing like his usual airiness, a bubbling over of the low tone he sometimes dipped into, when he was looking at him over O-geun's body or telling him the photos of the 63rd Army's platoon would turn out.

No. China's song had been grieving. But it hadn't been soft. As he'd cried out on the bloody stage, he had sounded the way he did when he gave his speech to his soldiers at Chorweon. And maybe 'mourning song' wasn't the right term for it.

Like how North hadn't been able to picture him moving at anything more than a relaxed glide until he saw him in real combat for the first time, that outpouring of emotion now seemed just as natural, though he couldn't imagine why China would have wanted him to witness it.

His teeth grit. No. Again, like at Chorweon, he did.

He wished he hadn't. The song had been heartachingly beautiful, only matched by his brother's in the prison shack, the ones he was suddenly remembering too clearly. But it had affected him far more than those ever had, in a way he didn't want. China's song had threaded its way into his mind and rifled through his memories, dragging them out to the forefront.

North had spent so many years trying to block out thoughts of his brother during the Occupation. If he was alive, he would see him again, and if he wasn't… Only he would ever know.

Until one day he had realized that he couldn't remember what he sounded like when he sang. All of those nonsense, feel-good tunes about love and things they had never experienced, all the ones he'd hummed under his breath as they worked on their characters, those he sang for North while he exercised, old working songs from their common sense, or the ones he'd loudly warbled to tempt their guards to come in and beat them so they could try and escape. They were all gone. He could remember the words, but not how his brother had sang them.

Except for 'Arirang,' like a cruel joke.

'My love, if you abandon me
Your feet will be sore before you go ten ri.'

The realization had seized inside his chest, almost suffocating him, as he had to pretend nothing was wrong as SH, Sang, and North Pyongan traded songs with the revolutionaries.

He had more songs now. South had sang after Liberation. On their way across Korea, he'd learned their guerrilla marching songs and sang them with their soldiers, and joined voices with those they met in the villages and cities. North refused to let them fade. He would hold the sound of his brother's songs close until they were one, and could sing them with a new voice.

But he still couldn't remember what it sounded like for South to sing to him. Not a song he wanted to hear anyway.

He could now. China's song had wrapped itself around the memories and pulled them out of the recesses of the past, along with one song in particular. The last one.

He hadn't had the strength to fight against his recuperative coma after his 'something worse' in Keijo Prison. If he had at first, he likely would have died.

But he had still been trying. When the slightest crack in the darkness came, he'd mustered every bit of strength he had to sink his nails into it like he had to Japan, to tear it open. He'd had to wake up, he had to escape. There were people out there that needed him- Kim Byeong-ho, Pak Ok-yeon, An Gum-jin, millions of millions of people like the woman with chestnut eyes.

But he was too weak, just like he'd been too weak to stop Japan from carving him open. He was losing his grip, sinking back under as the gap closed, when the song slipped through.

"The day after tomorrow, over Hallasan, the dawn will break."

'Tondollari,' an old dancing song. South's version, the one where he substituted the green hills with places they'd dreamed of visiting. Another song North had told him to stop singing.

"The day after tomorrow, over Paektusan, the dawn will break."

Even with the cheerful tone South was trying to force, North could hear the deep yearning in the words, for Hallasan, for Paektusan, for all he places they'd never seen. He wanted to see them just as badly as North, he always had, so why had he made him stop fighting for it? Why had North let him?

"By the Han in Seoul, the dawn will break, by the Taedong in Pyongyang, the dawn will break."

North wanted to see it. He wanted to see the dawn on the broad river that had flowed through Pyongyang. He wanted to see the fishermen on the water and the washerwomen by the shore and the girls that went to pick flowers on Moran Hill going about their lives, not being cut down in the streets. He wanted to see the city not dyed with his people's blood. He wanted to see Korea the way he was meant to. He wanted to wake up and fight.

"The day after tomorrow, over mountains and streams, the dawn will break, the day after tomorrow, over fields and seas, the dawn will break."

Always the day after tomorrow, always another day. If South had his way they would be free any day but today. They would never see those sights, their people would never be able to enjoy them without fear.

That feeling that had welled within him as he was pinned to the floor under Japan's boot surged up, uplifting him, and North sank his claws into the song, hauling himself towards it.

"Over the precious green hills, over the precious green hills."

His brother's voice wavered, the fear and grief for North breaking through. But for once that wasn't what kept him going, wasn't what made him force himself to keep climbing out of the dark, to not retreat from the pain creeping back into his body. Once his brother's pain and fear had seemed bigger than anything, but in the face of the March First Movement, it seemed infinitely small, and his own like nothing. What was the pain of one person compared to the agony of a nation?

"The day after tomorrow, over you and me, the dawn will break. The day after tomorrow, over a Liberated Korea, the dawn will break."

Worn hands holding his face, blood pooling under Japan's boots, a sea of people enveloping him, clinging to him, chestnut eyes burning into his.

It wasn't their duty to be Liberated. It was their duty to Liberate.

"Tondollari, tondollari, tondollariyo."

The dawn broke.

"I know you're in a hurry to get back to overworking yourself, but I'd rather not have you bleed out on the floor. Someone would have to clean it."

The voice snapped North out of the intrusive memory, and he instinctively bared his teeth at the person next to his chair.

Kim Yong-hwan was unimpressed. "Fine. But if you pass out from blood loss, I'm not resuscitating. Maybe you'll get some rest for once."

North looked away, ashamed. "That wasn't at you. I was distracted."

"And has nothing to do with me saying I'm going to clean your wounds whether you like it or not, I'm sure."

"Not today," North clipped, not making any effort to slow his pulse and stop how quickly the IV bag of blood was filling. "I'm busy."

CCCP had sent him a message about a topic he was planning on bringing up in the Security Council tomorrow, and he had to draft a letter back, but that wasn't why he was turning her down. He had only torn his burn gash open two days ago, and it couldn't heal right with him constantly being on the move. The damage was still clear. And he wasn't giving the woman another chance to call him an idiot.

And if he had to sit still and let her touch him while that song was still rummaging through his memories…

"'Busy,' he says," Kim Yong-hwan grumbled. "You'll be 'busy' when you're dying of gangrene."

North let her grumble. The bags under her eyes were heavy, and the hands holding his intravenous line were trembling. And the streaks of grey in her hair had gotten lighter.

He would tell her to get more rest. But he knew she wouldn't listen.

The door opened, and his fingers twitched for his gun as his head shot over. Then he turned back to the wall so fast his neck cracked.

"Oh," Kangwon said awkwardly. "Hey, Korea."

North nodded coolly, burning a hole in the cabinets above the hospital counter.

"Just… here to grab some IV bags." Kangwon sidled towards those cabinets, and North turned to face Kim Yong-hwan.

She glowered at him as his province rummaged around, coming out with several clear bags.

"Tell the others I say hi, if you see them," Kangwon said at the door.

North jerked his chin in a nod, still not looking at him. He didn't look away from the nurse until the door closed.

"You two are pathetic," Kim Yong-hwan immediately announced. "Whatever the poor boy did to set you off this time, get over it so he can stop sulking around the hospital."

North wasn't the reason he was sulking. Nothing he said could stop him.

“Mind your own business,” he growled. “And he’s not a ‘boy’- he’s almost as old as you. And he's a Provincehuman.”

“It is my business when I have to take time out of my break to draw your blood when he’s just as available.”

North looked at her, alarmed. “You’re taking time out of your break?”

She *‘tch’*ed. “No. That’s why you were wandering around the hospital for ten minutes before this. But you’re still bothering me.”

North glared at her. “You clearly need to be re-educated until you remember how to speak to your country.”

“I’ll see you there while you learn how to communicate at all.”

Not dignifying her with an answer, North turned pointedly away, the IV still in his arm.

He wasn’t the reason for the way Kangwon was acting. He’d done what he could to stop it. It hadn’t been enough, because how could it be? His province had to overcome his weakness on his own.

And that wasn’t why he was avoiding him.

That song was still there, slithering through his mind, an invader squatting in his skull, dredging up all those memories, making him remember everyone he had ever lost. And his brother. The last person he wanted to think about right now.

‘잘못했어.’

Kangwon would still be grieving and in pain. North couldn’t stop it. He had never been able to. And if his province looked at him like he had before, pleading with those shimmering, round eyes and childish lip quiver as he said ‘It hurts’ like he thought his Countryhuman could do anything about it, while those memories writhed in his mind…

He couldn’t fucking take that.

Kim Yong-hwan was still grumbling to herself and him as she removed the IV. “Since you won’t do it for your own sake or his, at least pretend to get over it so I can deal with patients who won’t give me a premature heart attack instead. Or better yet, here’s an ultimatum- fix things up with him or I’ll make sure you can’t come here and drain yourself dry every day.”

North sat up straighter at her words, an idea striking.

The only way he could truly fix things was by ending the war. But he knew logically that he needed to be able to look at Kangwon again before then. America was still stalling and the International Scientific Commission would be here soon, and while he was planning to meet with them only once so he couldn’t be accused of bribing them as easily, he would be meeting with them. And obviously his top doctor and investigator had to be there.

His province wasn’t like the person from his memories. He was a medic like Kim Yong-hwan, pushing himself to the edge of his limits for others, and he was a revolutionary, like North. He knew that his struggles were nothing compared to those they were sworn to protect.

He just had to be reminded. And North could take care of a few other matters in the meantime.

Kim Yong-hwan eyed him with suspicion. “What are you scheming with that look on your face? I don’t like it.”

“I don’t care what you like.” North stood abruptly, rolling down his sleeve before she could put a patch on the track mark. The skin was already crisped anyway. “Go take another break.”

“Who died and made you hospital manager?” Kim Yong-hwan demanded.

North ignored her, heading out into the hallway with new purpose.

Letter to CCCP as that was time sensitive, review the situation reports on Wonsan he’d asked for again, then visit a few specific places to prepare.

He couldn't stop thinking about his brother or get this stupid song out of his head. But he could fix Kangwon. He could make sure he knew he could. And he could make himself stop feeling that warm glow he didn't deserve to while he was at it.

He knew just how to do it.

China has found his ideal audience- guy who is so emotionally affected by his music that it makes him feel like he's losing his mind. Only matched by woman who is so affected by his dancing that she devotes herself to a life of struggle and fundamentally changes who she is as a person.

US bases leaking evil chemicals across Okinawa and nuclear soil from Fukushima being spread everywhere. If I start going weird(er), just know it's because I am becoming irradiated like a Fallout ghoul. Unfortunately I'm probably just going to get breast cancer.

I had a dream after writing the draft for this where I was infiltrating a run-down, dark, dusty house (it felt like the Staltula House in Ocarina of Time) filled with these demon dogs. I had a long thin gun and tactical gear, and I had to shoot each one six times to kill it, and it was like video game logic where I couldn't see if the bullets were leaving damage. I made my way down to the cellar, where there were two square wells in the ground. One had a dying dog on top and the other had a dying cat. I went to talk to the cat, and I can't remember what exactly was said, but the idea was that hope was trapped deep underground in this house. I couldn't hear my own thoughts in this dream, so I can't explain my rationale for what I did, but I went over to the dog and curb-stomped its skull. Then I dropped it into the very very deep hole, where it vanished. I never heard it hit anything. The cat said something like 'You're going to release hope now, aren't you?' and I stared down at the hole, then said, 'No.' And I stepped back. The cat was suddenly not dying anymore, but it still didn't move from over the other well. We had another conversation that I can't remember, then it told me to take a kitten with me when I left. And a little kitten emerged from behind a pile of moldy boxes to reach up my leg. So I scooped it up and left. As I was ascending the stairs I started to wake up, so my waking mind was wondering what it was all about. I feel like I was sent there by someone, but I don't know who. Did I do what they wanted? Why did I kill the dog if I wasn't going to commit to killing the cat, too? The dog did feel malicious. It didn't talk, but it had an evil energy, and the demons upstairs were dogs, too. Whereas the cat at least felt neutral. Was it a Pandora's box situation? 'All the curses escaped except hope.' And then you have to ask if hope is a curse, and what keeping it trapped means. Did I suddenly realize that releasing hope might be bad for humanity? Maybe it was that hope was trapped under the house, and someone sent me to release it for humankind. And the dog spirit was preventing any hope from getting out, but the cat spirit was keeping it on earth because if it escaped it would leave humanity. Or at least maybe I decided that in the dream. Then maybe the kitten spirit was me bringing a piece of that hope back out into the world as a reward for my decision. I reached the top stair and the house was light and cheerful now, and as the sun hit me I woke up. This is what inspired the chapter title.

Sleep of Death

Kangwon had only been to Wonsan once after the blockade began last February. He'd been near it plenty of times, in the foothills where the ship cannons couldn't reach, and had followed the tunnel systems until he was underneath the outskirts, able to feel the artillery reverberating through the ground above. But he hadn't set foot on his capital's soil since last July, a week away from a year ago.

He hadn't expected to now.

Him and Korea sat in the back of a supply truck, packed in with cases of ammunition on their way to the city. Every bump sent the sharp edges jostling into his burns, making him wince. Korea had no reaction.

Kangwon didn't know what they were doing. Like Wonsan, he'd only even seen his Countryhuman once since that day he'd broke down, almost a month ago now. And it'd been that awkward interaction in the blood lab (also he'd called it that he'd start going to Kim Yong-hwan for his donations instead).

But at midnight last night, Korea had walked in on his ten-minute break and told him to put on his uniform- they were going to Wonsan.

He was glad. He'd wanted to be able to meet up with the defenders there in person again for awhile now. But he was a little nervous, too. Solo missions with Korea usually meant you were going to get a lesson in something. And even though Kangwon was feeling better than he'd been at the end of May (shocking- talking to people about your problems really did help; good thing that's what he'd been telling everyone else to do since forever), he wasn't sure if he was feeling resilient enough for his Countryhuman's teaching methods.

He flexed his right hand, a single brown eye burning in his mind.

He knew he wasn't.

The truck rattled over the mountain road. Kangwon shifted uncomfortably, feeling the bumps echo in his skin.

Something had happened yesterday. Something bad. He'd been in more pain than usual, and when North Pyongan had come to donate blood, he'd had to take the IV out when he suddenly cried out as more burns ate up the last good skin on his forearms. Korea wouldn't say what it'd been, but Kangwon was pretty sure it was still happening.

As they'd been leaving last night, the lights in the hospital had been flickering.

"So, the Americans are saying we should let the Red Cross come and investigate," Kangwon said over the rush of wind.

Korea might be freezing him out, but he needed to think about something other than the pain or how many patients he could lose while he was out.

They were still waiting on the United Nations Disarmament Commission to enact real anti-germ warfare measures (they were getting postponed over nuclear weapons). In the meantime, the Soviets had been pushing for the six states that hadn't ratified the Geneva Protocol of 1925, agreeing not to use biological weapons- the US, Japan, and four South American countries- to finally do it. He'd brought it up in the Security Council on the 18th, but was being blocked from turning it into a resolution.

Kangwon had to say he wasn't surprised they'd been getting pushback (because even a simple ask to sign the same thing everyone else had had to be an evil Communist plot, obviously). But he had been surprised that the Americans had suddenly suggested passing a resolution to send the Red Cross to Korea to look into the biowarfare.

Korea dipped his head to confirm, his expression blank. Just like a few days ago, he didn't look at him.

Honestly maybe he was driving Kangwon out to the coast to offer him up to the American ships. He wouldn't have to worry about seeing him cry again if he was obliterated by 38-caliber guns.

"Do you think they're actually going to bring it to a vote?" he asked, pressing on.

Kangwon had heard from Ri Pyong-nam that it was going to get discussed in a meeting on the 23rd. With the time difference between Pyongyang and New York, the Security Council meeting should be happening right now.

"America wants it to, so it will be," Korea clipped. "We are not invited."

'Of course.'

"What's going to happen?" he asked.

"If they don't agree to invite our representatives today, or whenever the draft resolution is put to a vote, CCCP is going to veto."

His tone said he didn't think they would be. And considering they hadn't been invited to the meetings to intervene in Korea in the first place, that seemed about right.

Kangwon got why that had to be vetoed. Not inviting them was normalizing violating the UN Charter and leaving Korea out in decisions involving their own fate, something that had already happened more than just once. But...

Korea finally turned to look... mostly at him, his eye narrowing. "What?"

Kangwon knew he was just going to get snapped at. But it was his job, so he had to say something.

"Maybe we should let them visit." He winced as his Countryhuman's glare turned sour.

The US had mostly ignored their germ warfare accusations last year with the smallpox, but had offered to send a World Health Organization or Red Cross team to help back in March this year, after they'd made it clear they were going to get someone to. They'd turned them down because the WHO was part of the United Nations, which were, you know, the ones bombing them. Not exactly impartial like they claimed.

The International Committee of the Red Cross was a little more complicated. They hadn't recognized their own Red Cross branch or let them into their organization, but they did have China's and CCCP's, even if neither of them had a lot of influence. China (well, Kangwon got the sense it was more his comrades at home) had actually reached out to them at one point to see if they'd visit his country to investigate, though the foreign branches hadn't seemed as eager to when it was them asking. They weren't part of the UN, so they weren't directly the enemy.

But they were still made up of people from the countries that were the enemy, and the ones that supported it. It was risky to let them in when they knew America wouldn't be offering out of the goodness of his heart. China and CCCP's branches wouldn't be trusted for an investigation by America, and any delegation from another country would likely have at least one spy in it, so couldn't be entirely trusted by them.

"I know they've got problems," he said before Korea could take his head off. "But at least they've been a little truthful about the camps down south."

Even if those articles never made it out of French.

"We could ask that the Red Cross chapters with their countries involved in the war aren't included," he suggested. "Even the ones with just medical missions. Try to get people that are as fair as possible. Even if we have to let them cut us out of the decision again, it might be worth it to let them come investigate."

Korea's jaw feathered the same way it had when he'd told China to go ahead and invite them.

Kangwon hesitated, then said, "You don't want them to investigate."

His Countryhuman's glare dulled, and he looked out the back of the truck, sighing. "America offered to send them before because he knew we would say no. Do you know why he's trying to force this through now?"

Kangwon shook his head.

"As a distraction." He glared at the dark road behind them. "He was running out of excuses as to why he won't ratify the Geneva Protocol. And with the International Scientific Commission arriving and everything coming out of Geoje, he needs an even bigger one. If we let the Red Cross in here, they'll look at our proof, listen to the testimonies, then tell the world there isn't enough evidence. And when the ISC is done with their investigation and says there is, they will be ignored in favour of the 'impartial' one. You will have lost Gangwon for nothing."

Kangwon shifted his hands under his legs.

"Korea," he said gently. "Do you really think every single one of them would be willing to lie?"

"It's June, Kangwon." Korea's voice was bitter. "There are supposed to be insects now."

Right. It was summer again. Tomorrow would be two years since the war began in earnest. The mosquitoes and spiders and fleas and everything else were in season now.

"They waited long enough that they can say all our samples are just natural occurrences, and that the ones that don't belong here came with the foreign soldiers." Korea didn't look his way. "They'll say that's where the illnesses came from, too."

"We have witnesses." Including a foreign reporter and a handful of American POWs that had seen flies get dumped in the river near a camp at the beginning of the month.

His Countryhuman looked at him, still not quite in the eye. "Kangwon. Do you really think that they would believe a single word from a Korean's mouth, or anyone on our side or in our hands.

Did they believe you?"

'I can prove Gangwon's with us because he wants to be!'

It was Kangwon's turn to avoid his gaze.

"They don't need to lie," Korea said heavily. "They just need to choose not to believe it. And the rest of the world will follow because they don't want to believe it either."

Kangwon wrapped his arms around his legs, resting his chin on his knees as the crates of ammunition jostled around him.

Korea turned away. "If they invite us and let us give our side of the story at the vote, I will let them in. But not with that 'free movement' condition. I'm not giving the enemy access to wherever they please."

Kangwon didn't know if he meant it, or if he was just saying it for the same reason America had offered to send the Red Cross before- because he knew it wouldn't be happening.

He wondered what Korea thought about people being good or not. He knew the answer when it came to theirs, obviously. But he wondered what he'd say if he asked him about the rest of the world, whether or not he thought they were, and whether or not he'd lie if he didn't.

And how much he thought their people influenced them.

He couldn't ask. He knew himself well enough to know that his Countryhuman's opinion would influence his too much. And he wanted to come to his own conclusion.

Wonsan sat in an inlet in the broader bay, separated from the wider ocean by the Kalma Peninsula to the east, with the Masikryong Mountains pressing up against its west side, wedging it between the forested peaks and the beach. They were where Kangwon and his comrades had hid during their defense of Wonsan during the tactical retreat, before he'd turned himself in.

As the convoy of trucks crept slowly through the outskirts of the city, the province could see that there was nowhere to hide now.

The mountains and hills were stripped bare, covered in craters from the constant air raids. And the city next to the sea was... gone.

The neat rows of apartments and older, messier huts, the schools, the factories on the edge of town, the airfield, the park in the forest in the middle of town, the forest itself. The hospital.

When he'd been here last year, his capital had been a wreck. All the military targets had been smoking holes and so had half the residential neighbourhoods, thanks to the Americans' aim. He'd thought to himself that there hadn't been a city left to defend.

He'd been wrong. There had still been something last year, the clinging traces of houses and stores. Now there was nothing. Nothing but a sea of jumbled wood, stone, and steel spread out along the shore, more like debris swept in from the ocean than somewhere people had lived.

Artillery pounded the islands scattered off the coast, their shore batteries firing on the ones claimed by reactionaries and the ship cannons firing on those the KPA still held, and back at the shore. It felt like Kangwon could feel the blasts hit him harder now, the way he always could when he visited his province. He didn't know if it was a Provincehuman thing or just psychological. If being able to hear the 'boom' of the shells and see the explosions of earth just made him more aware that the land they were destroying was connected to his body.

The main roads had been cleared, but their truck tires still crunched over wood and rubble as they skirted Wonsan to park on the far east of town, hidden by the low hills that rose at the base of the Kalma Peninsula. Immediately soldiers rushed from the tunnels under them to start unloading the trucks, carrying sacks of grain and crates of ammunition into the darkness before the sun rose.

Kangwon jumped out from the back, quickly starting to help before Korea could tell him to, wincing as his legs almost buckled. He piled the ammo into a handcart, and the moment it was full the porter took off, running it for the coastal defenders. Crate after crate, worth tens of thousands of won, just for a few days and just for this post. Most of it would end up in the ocean, fired in an unending barrage to keep the minesweepers back.

He lifted another crate, passing it to a soldier.

"Thanks, com-" The man's shadowed eyes widened as he actually saw the person holding it. "Comrade Kangwon? And Comrade Korea?"

The names rippled through their soldiers and civilian porters as they looked towards the truck. Kangwon lifted his hand in greeting.

"Finish your work," Korea ordered, not stopping as he hauled rice sacks over to the tunnel. "We aren't going anywhere."

The men launched back into action, moving with more energy now. But as the dawn got brighter, Kangwon didn't like what he saw.

Despite their vigour, they all looked exhausted. Almost every soldier had at least one bandage wrapped around his head or peeking out from his undershirt, and their uniforms had been mended repeatedly, stitches threading down their arms and torsos, marking where an injury had been. Their faces were streaked with grime and soot, almost black with it. It was caked into the lines on the hands that took the ammo from him, and the wrinkles on their faces.

It'd been bad last July. It was worse now.

"Apologies for the appearance, Comrade Kangwon." One of the men caught him looking. "We've been trying to keep up with hygiene, but the bastards've been pounding the coast all night. No time to sleep, let alone wash up."

Kangwon was alarmed to hear that his voice was a young man's. Between the deep crevasses carved into the corners of his mouth and the edges of his eyes, he'd thought he was forty at least.

"It's no problem," he assured him, even though it definitely was.

As soon as all the cargo was out, the trucks lurched into motion, speeding back towards the mountains just as the sun crested over the horizon. Kangwon looked east over the base of the peninsula.

He'd used to come here a lot after Liberation and before the war. He'd wake up at five and hike up the hills to watch the sun rise, spilling pale light over the vast East Sea. He'd watch the fishing boats set sail and the monks at Tokwon Abbey go about their morning routine, then after the land had been reclaimed from the foreigners, the students of the Wonsan Agricultural University, the first of its kind in their country.

The buildings had been bombed like everything else. They'd been built in a square ring, and while the lower parts of the seminary were still standing, the monastery-turned-teaching building had collapsed, the pointed tower spilling down into the courtyard. Cracks spiderwebbed across the brick, and holes gaped in the tile roofs. The farmland that stretched around them was almost fallow, way too close to the coast to work it, proven by the gaping craters that peppered it. Kangwon could only see a few green patches where brave peasants were trying. And they were empty right now.

He hoped they were just sheltering from the day, like the students had just moved into the hills.

"Kangwon." Korea appeared in the tunnel entrance, jerking his head, and his province realized the soldiers had almost all disappeared inside.

He quickly followed, feeling the weight of the hills press down on him. The air was filled with the smell of hundreds of soldiers packed into a small space, sweaty and human.

'Definitely better than the hospital.'

But the faint smell of blood still lurked somewhere under the funk.

Dim bulbs lit the tunnel, each one just beyond the light cast by the one before it, leaving puddles of shadow in between. They swayed as the earth shuddered around them, and Korea and Kangwon followed them to a slightly wider section of tunnel. Sturdy wooden beams held up a ceiling of compacted dirt and stone. None of the soldiers looked up as they trembled under the assault outside.

The bare light bulbs flickered.

"Comrades Korea and Kangwon," a man rasped, stepping out of the throng to salute. "Officer Kim Heung-su. What brings you here?"

A few other unit commanders came to stand next to him. This wasn't one of the main complexes, so there were no generals or lieutenant-generals here.

Korea wasn't answering, so Kangwon guessed it was up to him.

"We came to see how our coastal defenders are doing," he said, and got a nod from his Countryhuman.

Kim Heung-su exchanged dull-eyed looks with the men around him. "We're doing, comrades."

It was clear by the fact that he couldn't even act upbeat for his country and province that they weren't doing well.

"Tell me about it," Kangwon said, looking around at all the bandages and cuts. "I'll perform some check-ups while you do."

He set up in the tunnel with the medical kit he'd brought, and the new supplies that had came in with the convoy, tending to the worst injuries and making sure the soldiers and civilians were healthy. Crammed together in the tunnels like this, even a natural minor cold could be trouble.

While he worked, Korea walked away with Kim Heung-su to ask about the military situation. And maybe so their comrades wouldn't realize that he still couldn't look at Kangwon.

Some of the men weren't that badly injured, but they came up to him anyways. Kangwon didn't tell them they didn't need treatment, he just used the boiled water they'd brought to clean their scrapes, giving them a chance to feel cared for while he asked how they were holding up.

"I won't lie," the man he was cleaning- Pak Jung-hwi- rasped, his voice thick with exhaustion. "It's tough out here, comrade. The damn ships never let up for a second."

"Day and night, nothing but that damned blastin'," another soldier with deep shadows under his wild eyes said, his voice cracking. "A man can't even fuckin' sleep."

Even in here, they could hear the dull booming of the guns outside, shaking dirt from the ceiling. Kangwon knew from the front that the sound could get maddeningly repetitive. Inescapable, the same way he'd started to feel about the sterile hospital smell and the stench of sickness. Combined with not letting them rest, it was basically psychological torture.

Another single eye burned in his mind, dark and hopeless as it stared out at him, the other one covered in bandages.

'If we sleep, we die.'

"And we can't shoot at them half the time," another soldier growled, stitching a tear in his jacket in the corner. "They just float out there. And even when they come close enough, the field artillery barely leaves a scratch. Every time we manage to hit one, it sails back to Japan and is back in a month."

That's why they had to concentrate fire on the enemy-occupied islands, as Kangwon heard. They didn't have the equipment to permanently eliminate the ships, so mines were stealthily laid in the bay by sampan to keep them out while they focused on trying to force the southern army off their batteries on the islands.

"And if it's not them, it's the reactionaries shipping landing parties in at night," Pak Jung-hwi said. "You think they're focusing on the other side of the harbour, and you can finally get some shut-eye, then you wake up with a traitor on top of you."

"Are they sending infiltrators?" Kangwon asked to keep them talking, even though he knew.

Most of them were caught on the shores by their batteries. The landing missions were dangerous. It was why the Americans sent the 'expendable' soldiers from Rhee's army, or the KPA's POWs. But some made it through to sabotage communications and supply dumps, or railway tunnels, blowing them up so their trains couldn't shelter from the barrage, and supplies couldn't make it into the city.

The man nodded grimly. "The Yanks send 'em in with socks and soap, things the civs need, and try to bribe 'em for intelligence."

"One offered me half a bag of rice," one of the civilian porters volunteered. "I turned him over. But people around here are desperate. They won't even let us fish the waters."

"They target our boats!" a woman cried, her voice high and warbling. "They send their whalers out to sink them, then take our fishers on board their big destroyers and make them spill what they know. They took my father and he never came back!"

"I'm so sorry," Kangwon murmured, wiping soot from the creases around Pak Jung-hwi's mouth. "I've heard you can't do any fishing at all now. Is that right?"

"None," she said, her eyes glistening. "Some of the stubborn folk still try, but it isn't worth it. They almost never make it back."

The ocean right on their doorstep, and they couldn't even eat what it provided. If the rations didn't come in time, they'd starve.

"I'm sorry to say it about my birth city," Pak Jung-hwi said tiredly, looking Kangwon in the eyes. "But right now, Wonsan is hell on earth, Comrade Kangwon."

Kangwon's heart panged. "How long have you been on duty?"

"Two months," he said, and some of the other units chimed in with theirs.

One month, two, a little longer for the more experienced officers in logistical roles. None of them were over that. All of them looked like they'd been here since the siege began. The civilians had been.

They had more divisions in reserve, around eighty thousand people when you added China's. But they couldn't afford to rotate coastline duty as often as they should. They had to keep those reserves fresh in case there was another landing like there'd been at Incheon. If the Americans managed to take Wonsan, they'd have a direct inroad to Pyongyang, like during the landing here in the first year. They could easily cut off the eastern part of the frontline, and even if they couldn't make it all the way to the capital, it would let them seize even more territory for the ceasefire, half of Kangwon's province.

And they couldn't afford to take the soldiers with experience in combatting the blockade off the line. They needed it held.

"You're all very brave." Kangwon wiped the last bit of grime from Pak Jung-hwi's face and stood, looking around the room. "All of you comrades protecting our coasts from the enemy are the most courageous soldiers we have. Even the ones without a uniform." He nodded to the civilian porters.

"Pardon me for saying, Comrade Kangwon," the woman in the corner said quietly. "But I don't feel very brave. I just don't have anywhere else to go. This is my home."

"And you could've left it, or just hunkered down in the hills," Kangwon said. "But you've stayed since the tactical retreat."

She blinked in surprise. "I didn't think you recognized me."

"Of course."

The defense of Wonsan had been a blur of blood, dust, and chaos, but Kangwon hadn't forgotten the faces that helped him and the militia.

"I remember all of Korea's defenders," he told her. "And you're one of them. You aren't battening down and hoping you make it through this- you're helping make sure our army gets everyone through it, and keeps the enemy from taking our city again. That's pretty brave to me, comrade."

"It's- It's what my father would want," she whispered.

"I'm sure it is," he said. "If the Americans didn't send him back, it means he stayed loyal to the end, even surrounded by the enemy. What's your name, by the way? Since no one can mind-control it out of me now."

America had made South try. Luckily Kangwon had made sure the civilians knew not to tell him who they were.

The woman looked down, the tears in her eyes spilling over. "K-Kim Ju-kyu."

Kangwon nodded, looking around at the tunnel full of soldiers, uniformed and not. "If it wasn't for people like Comrade Kim and our militia members, we wouldn't've been able to keep the Americans from landing as long as we did during the tactical withdrawal. They would've flanked Pyongyang and taken Hamhung even sooner, or hobbled our Second Corps and kept them from entrenching in the Liberated zone."

Thinking of the Second Corps made him want to gnaw his nails, hoping Choe Kang-ok was still okay down at the front. But he kept them at his sides.

"They could've even cut off our army's retreat in the east entirely, and crushed half of our divisions," he told his comrades soberly. "If it wasn't for you, they could do the same thing now. But because you're here, our soldiers at the front can trust that their backs are guarded. And I can focus on keeping our country healthy.

"I know it's hard." He wished he had a better word that could show how difficult he knew it really was, so they could understand how much he was aching for them. "But we couldn't keep fighting this war without you."

He took off his medical glove and smiled down at Pak Jung-hwi, holding out his hand. After a moment, the man took it, letting him pull him to his feet.

"Right now, everyone in Korea knows our coastal defenders are fighting for them," he told his soldiers. "And Kangwon province is proud of all of you for it."

Pak Jung-hwi took a shaky breath, and Kim Ju-kyu started to sob. Kangwon could see more than a few people in the crowd of dozens duck their heads and flush the way he did when Korea praised him (not common lately), which was what he'd been hoping for.

"And so is Korea." Korea strode back down the tunnel with Kim Heung-su in tow. He went straight for Kangwon, pulling a stack of cheap papers from his bag and putting them in his hand.

Kangwon looked at him, hoping for a message in their silent language, but he was still refusing to look at him. Hurriedly, he glanced at the first paper and saw it was a letter. So was the one under it. When he saw the address written in clumsy, childish characters, he got it.

"I meant it when I said everyone knows you're fighting for us," he said, holding up the paper. "The students at the Mangyongdae School and the Pyongyang orphanage wrote some letters for us to bring you."

The soldiers' eyes widened, and as Pak Jung-hwi took the one Kangwon offered, opening it to read, his filled with tears.

Kangwon handed out the rest of the letters as his comrades crowded in, eager to read the words written for them. From the snatches he caught as some were read out loud, there were calls to kill the Yankee invaders from the older students, and cheers from the younger.

Kangwon opened the last one in his hands, one of the ones from the orphanage. 'Do your best!' it ordered, scribbled next to a doodle of a small girl in a rainbow choson-ot holding hands with a man in uniform. They both had huge smiles on their faces.

He smiled to himself, unforced for the first time in awhile, and handed it to the soldier who'd been on the verge of breaking down earlier. His haggard face crumpled as he read it, before he carefully folded and tucked it into his pocket like it was sacred treasure.

Korea stepped into the center of the tunnel, raising his voice. "Our orphans at the Mangyongdae School For Bereaved Family of Revolutionaries know that you here in Wonsan are carrying on the noble tradition of their parents who gave their lives fighting to Liberate our nation! They wanted us to pass on to you their fervent desire for you to avenge their fallen kin and keep the enemy from ever setting foot on our shores again."

"We will," a soldier vowed, crushing a letter to his chest.

"I know the post has difficulty getting in to the city right now," Korea said, pulling another sheath of papers from his bag. "With that in mind, if you have a letter you would like to write for those who have placed their hopes in you, or your own families, Comrade Kangwon and I will make sure it gets where it needs to."

'Smart.' His cousins were probably included in that. They had to travel a lot for the germ warfare, gathering any last evidence they could before the Commission showed up, and keeping hygiene protocols in place.

Korea had been keeping him near Pyongyang ever since he'd caught him crying, so Kangwon wondered if that meant he'd be going out in the field again soon.

The thought filled him with dread. It'd be a relief to get away from the sickness smell for longer, but... He was more likely to find people it was already too late to save while investigating, like Choi Ki-tak's family.

Some of the soldiers hustled over to take paper from Korea, and the few pencils and charcoal stubs he offered them, passing them around so they could write home or reply to the kids.

That was good. It'd mean almost as much to the orphans as it did to the soldiers to have a pen pal. And giving them the choice to write to the kids made sure the people with no family left wouldn't be left out.

Kangwon knew it was just how Korea was, but sometimes it hurt a little that he could be so thoughtful with their people, then turn around and slam the door on him when he cried.

He looked over at his Countryhuman, who scanned the room, nodding in satisfaction to himself. Then he tilted his head, and Kangwon followed him out of the gathering area, through the tunnels, passing offshoots to medical areas and barracks. They exited the underground a few times, only to plunge into another tunnel, until they were on the other side of the hills.

Sunlight streamed in through the exit, and Korea stopped just inside. Kangwon looked out, and felt the little bit of lightness he'd managed to feel over the letters get crushed by the pressure again.

The ship cannons were louder here, roaring like bears, or more like one of the folklore creatures he dreaded meeting in the dark. The sound as their rounds slammed into the shore only a hundred metres away was deafening. They struck the Kalma beaches, sending sprays of sand and stone into the sky, and shrieked over the peninsula to smash into Wonsan, fracturing the debris, reducing it to dust. More rounds arced between Hwangto Island and the mainland, coming from the reactionary artillery and their own shore batteries ferreted away in dug-outs and the hills across the river.

As Kangwon watched, fighter-bombers lifted off from the airfield the Americans had built on Ryo Island, soaring over Wonsan. Their bellies opened, dropping bombs on the remains of the railway repair station, the fishery, the petroleum factory and anything else they could find. His capital was already a morass of destruction, but somehow as Kangwon watched, the ruins were reduced to rubble. There were no landmarks left, no homes. Nothing but destruction.

His skin burned. The lights behind them flickered.

The sea swarmed with ships- dozens of whaling boats, small motorboats, and landing craft sitting farther out. But too close to shore were three huge destroyers flanking four smaller minesweepers like hulking black blades. Guns bristled from their decks, firing the unending bombardment. As Kangwon watched, white clouds bloomed over the Kalma Peninsula.

"White phosphorus," he observed, the blisters on his chest popping with a sound he could hear.

"Always," one of the soldiers watching said tiredly. "Always always always al-"

"Mun," one of the men with him cut him off sharply. He put a hand on his thin shoulder and said more gently, "Go inside."

Mun gave him a despairing look, then staggered back into the dimly-lit tunnel.

"Sorry about him," the other man said. "We were on last shore battery duty. He hasn't slept in a couple days."

Kangwon suddenly recognized the voice and tore his eyes away from the destruction of Wonsan.

"Comrade Heung?"

The militiaman smiled tiredly. "Hey, Comrade Kangwon."

Relief washed through him. The last time he'd seen the man, he'd been heading off into the hills with the less-injured militiamen during the defense of Wonsan. He'd made sure to find out that he was alive, but that had been two Januaries ago.

"It's good to see you," he said over the bombardment, clasping his forearm. "You're with the KPA now?"

"The army needed soldiers," he replied, voice raw as he shouted to be heard. "And I needed to kill traitors."

"How'd your arm heal?"

Heung In-kun put a hand on his shoulder, rolling it. "Still aches in winter. But I'm alive, thanks to you."

"You're the one who got our comrades away."

"Because you bought us time," he countered. "I heard about you letting yourself get captured. You shouldn't've done that."

Kangwon cringed internally, feeling Korea's glare on his back. "Yeah, probably not. But things worked out."

"Yeah." Heung In-kun turned back to the sea. "Yeah."

The water was dark, filled with dirty chemical foam and the oily rainbow sheen of gasoline from punctured boat tanks. The smell of brine and fish was completely covered by gunpowder and more acrid, worse scents. Kangwon could see the shrapnel from shells glinting dully as it washed up against the sandy shore.

Another ecological disaster in the making. Even if one day the waters were clear of enemy ships, there still wouldn't be any fishing in Wonsan for a long time.

"How many ships have you taken out?" Kangwon asked.

The lines in Heung In-kun's face deepened. "Major ones? Four. All from the mines."

The number hadn't changed in months. Four. In the two years since the war began.

What had North Pyongan told him after his Guk Island mission? That four was pretty much already a miracle. They were up against the most powerful navy in the world without one of their own, almost no real anti-ship guns, and no planes. When you thought about it like that, it was pretty miraculous that they'd managed to even take that many out.

But when he was looking at the place where his capital had once stood, the number felt very small. A city for four ships. Not exactly an equal trade.

As Kangwon watched, the planes soared back over, more bombs tumbling from them, more destruction following. A trumpet bungled as the shore batteries towards the city went quiet for a long moment before resuming, less of them now. Heung Ik-kun flinched like he could feel what his Provincehuman felt.

Back when American pilots had shot and killed that twelve-year old boy at Kaesong, Ridgway had apologized. He'd stood up and said that he was so pained because the prime objective of the UN had always been to avoid the loss of life and destruction of property of Korean non-combatants.

Kangwon had travelled across the country searching for proof of America's germ warfare. He'd seen Hungnam and Chongjin. He'd seen the toppled smokestacks and shattered piers, the piles of tinder and ash that had once been people's homes. He'd seen the fields of Sinuiju pocked with craters. He'd seen every single one of their capitals reduced to nothing, entire villages, houses, wells, barns, medical stations, burnt to the ground with only dead earth left. He'd held an old woman so covered with blisters her skin had looked like a plucked chicken as she hacked bloody spittle while smallpox ravaged her fragile frame. He'd held a little girl's hand while she miscarried a baby forced on her by foreign men, and he'd held a boy's as he stared at him with an eye that knew more pain than anyone should have ever felt, let alone a child.

He'd seen Wonsan before. And he had seen it now. If this was what avoiding a loss of property and life looked like, then he didn't want to know what aiming for it would.

"How are you holding up?" he asked Heung past the lump in his throat. His comrade was less talkative than he remembered him.

The man stared out at the sea, his dark eyes unfocused. "The well-being of the Republic is more important than life itself."

Kangwon clapped him on the shoulder, leaving his hand there.

The day had arrived hot and sticky, making his uniform cling to his ravaged flesh, sweat soaking his burns. Soldiers came to stand by them, the ones that still couldn't find sleep, hounded by the guns. They watched from the cooler shadows with haunted eyes as their comrades fired uselessly back on the guns.

A round soared straight for a destroyer that had drifted closer, slamming into the side, bursting with a flash of light and a roar.

The only thing it left on the armour was a scorch mark.

The guns on the destroyer started to blast, firing on the Kalma Peninsula, round after round after round, a monotonous stream of 'thoom thoom thoom thoom thoom' that obscured the entire side of the peninsula in clouds of sand and smoke and poisonous white phosphorous. A slow and steady annihilation.

When they stopped, the air felt too quiet. No cannons, no jets, no artillery. Just for a moment, there was no sound except the ringing in Kangwon's throbbing skull.

Then the planes soared back in with another high-pitched whine and the ship guns started to blast again.

Their own guns stayed silent.

A trumpet blew from the direction of the Peninsula and Heung cursed, lurching forward.

"Battery went dead and I'm not seeing the reserves, we need replacements on those now!"

Footsteps were already pounding in the tunnel, and men burst past Kangwon, shrugging on their uniform jackets, woken up from half-sleep or interrupted in the middle of a meal. One boy rushed past with his rifle clutched tightly in his hands, even though there was nothing he could do with it, and a grain of rice on the corner of his mouth.

Kangwon felt the inane urge to stop him and wipe his face, but he let him run past.

"Get more men ready for when we fall," Kim Heung-su ordered, charging by with his unit, and a soldier ran inside to do it.

Heung Ik-kun went to follow the men, and Kangwon tried to go with him.

But his comrade whirled around. "Comrade Kangwon, stay here."

"You need-"

"This isn't like the tactical withdraw." The man's face was grim. "This isn't for you."

'When we fall.' Not if. When.

Kangwon looked back at Korea, asking for help.

His Countryhuman stared back at him, finally in the eye.

'We can't afford to lose you.'

So he couldn't afford to put his emotions above their fight.

Kangwon closed his eyes. This was a lesson after all, Korea trying to make sure the one from all those years ago would finally stick.

Kangwon turned to Heung Ik-kun, jaw clenched. And he raised the edge of his hand to his brow.

His comrade's face didn't waver. He saluted back. "Long live Korea."

"Long live the Korean people," Kangwon managed to respond with their Countryhuman.

Heung nodded soberly and turned to run with the other soldiers, charging for the peninsula as the destroyer's guns turned their black eyes on them.

"LONG LIVE KOREA!" Heung screamed as the shore disappeared under clouds of black and white.

